

School of Theology at Claremont

10011463629

The Library of the
CLAREMONT

---

SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY

1325 North College Avenue
Claremont, CA 91711-3199
1/800-626-7820

HARPER'S BIBLE COMMENTARY

BS
491.2
H37
1988

Harper's Bible Commentary

GENERAL EDITOR

James L. Mays

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

Joseph Blenkinsopp

Jon D. Levenson

Wayne A. Meeks

Carol A. Newsom

David L. Petersen

With the Society of Biblical Literature

1817

Harper & Row, Publishers, San Francisco

Cambridge, Hagerstown, New York, Philadelphia, Washington
London, Mexico City, São Paulo, Singapore, Sydney

Publication Staff

Senior Editor:

John B. Shopp

Associate Editor:

Kandace Hawkinson

Chief Copyeditor:

Ann Moru

Copyediting Coordinator:

Dorian Gossy

Copyeditors:

Jean Blomquist, Phil Harnden, Virginia Rich

Proofreading Coordinator:

Janet Reed

Proofreaders:

Arla Ertz, Kathy Lee, Jean Mann, Annelise Zamula, Beverly Zegarski

Editorial Assistant:

Hilary M. Vartanian

Photo Researcher:

Lindsay Kefauver

Design:

Design Office Bruce Kortebein, Leigh McLellan

Typesetter:

Auto-Graphics, Inc.

Text Printer and Binder:

The Haddon Craftsmen

Cartographer and Color Maps Printer:

Hammond, Inc.

Jacket Printer:

The Longacre Press, Inc.

Color Photographs Printer:

New England Book Components, Inc.

Credits are listed on p. 1320 and are considered a continuation of this copyright page.

HARPER'S BIBLE COMMENTARY. Copyright © 1988 by The Society of Biblical Literature. All rights reserved. Printed in the United States of America. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews. For information address Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc., 10 East 53rd Street, New York, NY 10022. Published simultaneously in Canada by Fitzhenry & Whiteside, Limited, Toronto.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Harper's Bible commentary.

Bibliographies.

Includes index.

1. Bible—Commentaries. I. Mays, James Luther. II. Harper & Row. III. Society of Biblical Literature.

BS491.2.H37 1988 220.7 88-45148

ISBN 0-06-065541-0

89 90 91 92 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2

Theology Library
SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY
AT CLAREMONT
California

EDITORIAL BOARD

---

General Editor

James Luther Mays, Ph.D.
Cyrus McCormick Professor of Hebrew and the Old Testament
Union Theological Seminary in Virginia
Richmond, Virginia

Associate Editors

Articles:

Joseph Blenkinsopp, D. Phil.
John A. O'Brien Professor of Biblical Studies
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana
Introduction to the Prophetic Books

Genesis-Esther:

Jon D. Levenson, Ph.D.
Albert A. List Professor of Jewish Studies
Harvard University
Cambridge, Massachusetts

Job-Malachi:

David L. Petersen, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Iliff School of Theology
Denver, Colorado
Zechariah

1 Esdras-Psalm 151:

Carol A. Newsom, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Old Testament
Candler School of Theology
Emory University
Atlanta, Georgia

Matthew-Revelation:

Wayne A. Meeks, Ph.D.
Woolsey Professor of Biblical Studies
Yale University
New Haven, Connecticut

CONTRIBUTORS

---

Elizabeth Achtemeier, Ph.D.
Adjunct Professor of Bible and Homiletics
Union Theological Seminary in Virginia
Richmond, Virginia
Zephaniah

Paul J. Achtemeier, Th.D.
Jackson Professor of Biblical Interpretation
Union Theological Seminary in Virginia
Richmond, Virginia
1 Peter

Peter R. Ackroyd, Ph.D.
Professor Emeritus, Old Testament Studies
University of London
London, England
Haggai

Harold W. Attridge, Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana
Hebrews

David E. Aune, Ph.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
Saint Xavier College
Chicago, Illinois
*The Bible and the Literature of Antiquity:
The Greco-Roman Period, Revelation*

William Baird, Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament
Brite Divinity School
Texas Christian University
Fort Worth, Texas
Galatians

James Barr, Th.D.
Regius Professor of Hebrew
Oxford University
Oxford, England
The Bible and Its Communities

John Barton, D. Phil.
Lecturer in Theology (Old Testament)
St. Cross College
Oxford University
Oxford, England
Reading and Interpreting the Bible

Richard J. Bauckham, Ph.D.
Reader in the History of Christian Thought
University of Manchester
Manchester, England
2 Peter, Jude

J. Christiaan Beker, Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament Theology
Princeton Theological Seminary
Princeton, New Jersey
Colossians

Theodore A. Bergren, Ph.D.
University of Pennsylvania
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
2 Esdras

Adele Berlin, Ph.D.
Professor of Hebrew
University of Maryland
College Park, Maryland
Ruth

Roger S. Boraas, Ph.D.
Professor of Religion
Upsala College
East Orange, New Jersey
Consultant for Maps

Roddy L. Braun, Th.D.
Pastor
Our Savior Lutheran Church
Arlington, Virginia
1 Chronicles, 2 Chronicles

Duane L. Christensen, Th.D.
Professor of Old Testament Languages and Literature
American Baptist Seminary of the West and Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California
Nahum

Richard J. Clifford, Ph.D.
Dean and Professor of Old Testament
Weston School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts
Isaiah 40-66

David J. A. Clines, M.A.
Professor of Biblical Studies
University of Sheffield
Sheffield, England
Introduction to the Biblical Story: Genesis-Esther, Esther, The Additions to Esther

Robert L. Cohn, Ph.D.
Philip and Muriel Berman Scholar in Jewish Studies
Lafayette College
Easton, Pennsylvania
1 Samuel

- John J. Collins, Ph.D.
Professor of Hebrew Bible and Judaica
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Indiana
Introduction to the Apocrypha,
3 Maccabees
- Fred B. Craddock, Ph.D.
Bandy Professor of Preaching and New Testament
Candler School of Theology
Emory University
Atlanta, Georgia
Luke
- James L. Crenshaw, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
The Divinity School
Duke University
Durham, North Carolina
Ecclesiastes, Sirach
- R. Alan Culpepper, Ph.D.
James Buchanan Harrison Professor of New Testament Interpretation
Southern Baptist Theological Seminary
Louisville, Kentucky
1, 2, 3 John
- Nils A. Dahl, Dr. Theol.
Buckingham Professor Emeritus of New Testament Criticism and Interpretation
Yale University
New Haven, Connecticut
Ephesians
- John R. Donahue, S.J., Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament
Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley and Graduate Theological Union
Berkeley, California
Mark
- Robert Doran, Th.D.
Associate Professor in Religion
Amherst College
Amherst, Massachusetts
The Additions to Daniel
- Eldon Jay Epp, Ph.D.
Harkness Professor of Biblical Literature
Case Western Reserve University
Cleveland, Ohio
Biblical Literature in Its Historical Context:
The Apocrypha and the New Testament
- J. Cheryl Exum, Ph.D.
Associate Professor, Department of Theology
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts
Judges
- Marcia Falk, Ph.D.
Visiting Associate Professor of Religious Studies
Stanford University
Palo Alto, California
Song of Songs
- Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Dr. Theol.
The Krister Stendahl Professor of New Testament
Harvard University
Cambridge, Massachusetts
1 Corinthians
- Michael Fishbane, Ph.D.
Samuel Lane Professor of Jewish Religious History and Social Ethics
Brandeis University
Waltham, Massachusetts
The Bible and Its Interpreters: Jewish Biblical Interpretation
- Michael H. Floyd, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Episcopal Theological Seminary of the Southwest
Austin, Texas
Obadiah
- Carole R. Fontaine, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Old Testament
Andover-Newton Theological School
Newton Centre, Massachusetts
Proverbs
- Terence E. Fretheim, Th.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Luther Northwestern Theological Seminary
St. Paul, Minnesota
Jonah
- Reginald H. Fuller, S.T.D.
Professor Emeritus
Virginia Theological Seminary
Alexandria, Virginia
Matthew
- Victor Paul Furnish, Ph.D.
University Distinguished Professor of New Testament
Perkins School of Theology
Southern Methodist University
Dallas, Texas
2 Corinthians
- Edwin M. Good, Ph.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
Stanford University
Palo Alto, California
Job
- Norman K. Gottwald, Ph.D.
W. W. White Professor of Biblical Studies
New York Theological Seminary
New York, New York
Lamentations

CONTRIBUTORS

---

David M. Gunn, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Columbia Theological Seminary
Decatur, Georgia
2 Samuel

Paul D. Hanson, Ph.D.
Florence Corliss Lamont Professor of Divinity
Harvard University
Cambridge, Massachusetts
Malachi

Daniel J. Harrington, S.J., Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament
Weston School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts
Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, Prayer of Manasseh, Psalm 151

John H. Hayes, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Candler School of Theology
Emory University
Atlanta, Georgia
Leviticus

Ronald F. Hock, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Religion
University of Southern California
Los Angeles, California
Philippians

Carl R. Holladay, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of New Testament and Associate Dean
Candler School of Theology
Emory University
Atlanta, Georgia
Acts

Robert Jewett, Dr. Theol.
Harry R. Kendall Professor of New Testament Interpretation
Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary
Evanston, Illinois
Introduction to the Pauline Letters

Luke Timothy Johnson, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Religious Studies
Indiana University
Bloomington, Indiana
James

Ralph W. Klein, Th.D.
Christ Seminary-Seminex Professor of Old Testament
Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago
Chicago, Illinois
Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 Esdras

John S. Kselman, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Old Testament
Weston School of Theology
Cambridge, Massachusetts
Genesis

James L. Kugel, Ph.D.
Professor of Near Eastern Languages
Harvard University
Cambridge, Massachusetts
Introduction to Psalms and Wisdom

Burke O. Long, Ph.D.
Professor of Religion
Bowdoin College
Brunswick, Maine
2 Kings

W. Eugene March, Ph.D.
A. B. Rhodes Professor of Old Testament
Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary
Louisville, Kentucky
Micah

Ralph P. Martin, Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament and Director of Graduate Studies Program Fuller Theological Seminary
Pasadena, California
1, 2 Timothy and Titus

S. Dean McBride, Jr., Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament Interpretation
Union Theological Seminary in Virginia
Richmond, Virginia
*Biblical Literature in Its Historical Context:
The Old Testament*

P. Kyle McCarter, Jr., Ph.D.
W. F. Albright Professor of Biblical and Ancient Near Eastern Studies
Johns Hopkins University
Baltimore, Maryland
Exodus, 1 Kings

Roy F. Melugin, Ph.D.
Cloud Professor of Religion
Austin College
Sherman, Texas
Amos

Paul W. Meyer, Th.D.
Helen H. P. Manson Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis
Princeton Theological Seminary
Princeton, New Jersey
Romans

Richard D. Nelson, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Lutheran Theological Seminary
Gettysburg, Pennsylvania
Deuteronomy

George W. E. Nickelsburg, Th.D.
Professor of New Testament and Early Judaism
University of Iowa
Iowa City, Iowa
Tobit

- Dennis T. Olson, Ph.D.
Assistant Professor of Old Testament
Princeton Theological Seminary
Princeton, New Jersey
Numbers
- Thomas W. Overholt, Ph.D.
Professor of Religious Studies
University of Wisconsin, Stevens Point
Stevens Point, Wisconsin
Jeremiah
- PHEME PERKINS, Ph.D.
Professor of Theology (New Testament)
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts
1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, Introduction to the General Letters to the Churches
- NORMAN R. PETERSEN, Ph.D.
Washington Gladden Professor of Religion
Williams College
Williamstown, Massachusetts
Introduction to the Gospels and Acts, Philemon
- WALTER E. RAST, Ph.D.
Professor, Department of Theology
Valparaiso University
Valparaiso, Indiana
Joshua
- JAMES M. REESE, S.T.D.
Associate Professor, Department of Theology
St. John's University
Jamaica, New York
Wisdom of Solomon
- J. J. M. ROBERTS, Ph.D.
W. H. Green Professor of Old Testament
Literature
Princeton Theological Seminary
Princeton, New Jersey
The Bible and the Literature of Antiquity: The Ancient Near East
- LAWRENCE H. SCHIFFMAN, Ph.D.
Professor of Hebrew and Judaic Studies
New York University
New York, New York
1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees
- LUIS ALONSO SCHÖKEL, Dr. S. S.
Professor of Old Testament Theology
Pontificio Istituto Biblico
Rome, Italy
Judith
- GERALD T. SHEPPARD, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Old Testament
Emmanuel College of Victoria University in the University of Toronto
Isaiah 1-39
- D. MOODY SMITH, Ph.D.
George Washington Ivey Professor of New Testament
The Divinity School, Duke University
Durham, North Carolina
John
- MICHAEL F. STONE, Ph.D.
Professor of Armenian Studies
Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Jerusalem, Israel
2 Esdras
- STANLEY K. STOWERS, Ph.D.
Associate Professor of Religious Studies
Brown University
Providence, Rhode Island
4 Maccabees
- CARROLL STUHLMEUeller, C.P., S.S.D.
Professor of Old Testament Studies
Catholic Theological Union at Chicago
Chicago, Illinois
Psalms
- MARVIN A. SWEENEY, Ph.D.
Assistant Professor of Religious Studies
University of Miami
Coral Gables, Florida
Habakkuk
- W. SIBLEY TOWNER, Ph.D.
The Reverend Archibald McFadyen
Professor of Biblical Interpretation
Union Theological Seminary in Virginia
Richmond, Virginia
Daniel
- GENE M. TUCKER, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament
Candler School of Theology
Emory University
Atlanta, Georgia
Hosea
- J. WILLIAM WHEDBEE, Ph.D.
Nancy M. Lyon Professor of Biblical History and Literature
Pomona College
Claremont, California
Joel
- ROBERT L. WILKEN, Ph.D.
William R. Kenan, Jr., Professor of the History of Christianity
University of Virginia
Charlottesville, Virginia
The Bible and Its Interpreters: Christian Biblical Interpretation
- ROBERT R. WILSON, Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament and Religious Studies
Yale University
New Haven, Connecticut
Ezekiel

SHORT ESSAYS

	Page		Page
Genesis		Sirach
Genealogies	89	Ben Sira's Attitude Toward	852
Myth	93	Women
Jacob and Esau, Israel and Edom	109	The Hymn in Praise of Israel's	853
Women in Genesis	116	Heroes
Dreams in Genesis	120	Matthew
Numbers		Matthew's Fulfillment Citations	954
The Census Lists in Numbers 1	184	The Sermon on the Mount Today	961
and 26		The Church in Matthew	971
Psalms		The Passion According to	982
The Psalms of Ascent	487	Matthew
Proverbs		Mark
The Personification of Wisdom	501	The Miracles of Jesus in Mark	987
Isaiah 1-39		The "Trials" of Jesus and the Re-	1005
"A Young Woman/Virgin Shall	555	sponsibility for His Execution
Conceive and Bear a Son and		Romans
Shall Call His Name Emmanuel"		Distinctive Words and Themes in	1143
The "Torah" in Isaiah 1-39	562	Romans 5-8
Jeremiah		2 Corinthians
The Interaction Between Prophet	610	Were Chapters 10-13 Originally a	1198
and God		Separate Letter?
The Social Dynamics of Prophetic	613	Ephesians
Behavior		The World and the Church	1215
Jeremiah's Struggle Against "False-	614	Philippians
hood"		2:6-11, The Christ Hymn	1223
Repetition in the Book of Jeremiah	616	Revelation
Jeremiah's Complaints	618	Hymns in Revelation	1310
Jeremiah's Symbolic Actions	625
The Problem of "False" Prophecy	630
Expressions of Hope in the Book	636 of Jeremiah
Zephaniah
The Day of the Lord	743

ABBREVIATIONS

Gk.	Greek	Dt.	Deuteronomic
Heb.	Hebrew	Dtr.	Deuteronomistic historian
Lat.	Latin	DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls
		LXX	Septuagint
ASV	American Standard Version	MT	Masoretic Text
JB	Jerusalem Bible	NT	New Testament
JPS	New Jewish Translation/ Jewish Publication Society	OT	Old Testament
KJV	King James Version	Vg.	Vulgate
NAB	New American Bible	chap(s).	chapter(s)
NASB	New American Standard Bible	col(s).	column(s)
NEB	New English Bible	fol(s).	folio(s)
NIV	New International Version	ms(s).	manuscript(s)
NJB	New Jerusalem Bible	n(n).	note(s)
RSV	Revised Standard Version	pl(s).	plate(s)
TEV	Today's English Version	p(p).	page(s)
		v(v).	verse(s)
→	Further information can be found in Harper's Bible Dictionary under the article(s) listed.	vol(s).	volume(s)
		vs(s).	version(s)

BOOKS OF THE BIBLE (WITH APOCRYPHA)

Old Testament

Gen.	Genesis	Eccles.	Ecclesiastes
Exod.	Exodus	Song of Sg.	Song of Songs
Lev.	Leviticus	Isa.	Isaiah
Num.	Numbers	Jer.	Jeremiah
Deut.	Deuteronomy	Lam.	Lamentations
Josh.	Joshua	Ezek.	Ezekiel
Judg.	Judges	Dan.	Daniel
Ruth	Ruth	Hos.	Hosea
1 Sam.	1 Samuel	Joel	Joel
2 Sam.	2 Samuel	Amos	Amos
1 Kings	1 Kings	Obad.	Obadiah
2 Kings	2 Kings	Jon.	Jonah
1 Chron.	1 Chronicles	Mic.	Micah
2 Chron.	2 Chronicles	Nah.	Nahum
Ezra	Ezra	Hab.	Habakkuk
Neh.	Nehemiah	Zeph.	Zephaniah
Esther	Esther	Hag.	Haggai
Job	Job	Zech.	Zechariah
Ps. (Pss.)	Psalms	Mal.	Malachi
Prov.	Proverbs

Apocrypha

1 Esd.	1 Esdras	Add. to Dan.	Additions to Daniel
2 Esd.	2 Esdras	Song of Three	Song of the
Tob.	Tobit	Youths	Three Youths
Jth.	Judith	Sus.	Susanna
Add. to Esther	Additions to Esther	Bel and Dragon	Bel and the Dragon
Wisd. of Sol.	Wisdom of Solomon	Pr. of Man.	Prayer of Manasseh
Sir.	Sirach	1 Macc.	1 Maccabees
Bar.	Baruch	2 Macc.	2 Maccabees
Let. Jer.	Letter of Jeremiah	3 Macc.	3 Maccabees
		4 Macc.	4 Maccabees
		Ps. 151	Psalm 151

ABBREVIATIONS

New Testament

Matt.	Matthew	1 Tim.	1 Timothy
Mark	Mark	2 Tim.	2 Timothy
Luke	Luke	Titus	Titus
John	John	Philem.	Philemon
Acts	Acts of the Apostles	Heb.	Hebrews
Rom.	Romans	James	James
1 Cor.	1 Corinthians	1 Pet.	1 Peter
2 Cor.	2 Corinthians	2 Pet.	2 Peter
Gal.	Galatians	1 John	1 John
Eph.	Ephesians	2 John	2 John
Phil.	Philippians	3 John	3 John
Col.	Colossians	Jude	Jude
1 Thess.	1 Thessalonians	Rev.	Revelation
2 Thess.	2 Thessalonians

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA AND EARLY PATRISTIC BOOKS

Adam and Eve	Books of Adam and Eve	Gos. Naass.	Gospel of the Naassenes
2-3 Apoc. Bar.	Syriac, Greek Apocalypse of Baruch	Gos. Pet.	Gospel of Peter
Apoc. Mos.	Apocalypse of Moses	Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
As. Mos.	Assumption of Moses	Prot. Jas.	Protevangelium of James
4 Bar.	4 Baruch (Expansions of Jeremiah)	1-2 Clem.	1-2 Clement
1-2-3 Enoch	Ethiopic, Slavonic, Hebrew Enoch	Did.	Didache
Jos. Asen.	Joseph and Aseneth	Diogn.	Diognetus
Jub.	Jubilees	Herm. Man.	Hermas, Mandate
Let. Arist.	Letter of Aristeas	Sim.	Similitude
Mart. Isa.	Martyrdom of Isaiah	Vis.	Vision
Odes Sol.	Odes of Solomon	Ign. Eph.	Ignatius, Letter to the Ephesians
Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon	Magn.	Ignatius, Letter to the Magnesians
Sib. Or.	Sibylline Oracles	Phld.	Ignatius, Letter to the Philadelphians
T. 12 Patr.	Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs	Pol.	Ignatius, Letter to Polycarp
T. Levi	Testament of Levi	Rom.	Ignatius, Letter to the Romans
T. Benj.	Testament of Benjamin, etc.	Smyrn.	Ignatius, Letter to the Smyrnaeans
Acts Pil.	Acts of Pilate	Trall.	Ignatius, Letter to the Trallians
Apoc. Abr.	Apocalypse of Abraham	Let. Barn.	Letter of Barnabas
Apoc. Elij.	Apocalypse of Elijah	Mart. Pol.	Martyrdom of Polycarp
Apoc. Pet.	Apocalypse of Peter	Pol. Phil.	Polycarp, Letter to the Philippians
Apoc. Zeph.	Apocalypse of Zephaniah	Bib. Ant.	Ps.-Philo, Biblical Antiquities
Gos. Eb.	Gospel of the Ebionites
Gos. Eg.	Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Heb.	Gospel of the Hebrews

DEAD SEA SCROLLS AND RELATED TEXTS

CD	Cairo (Genizah text of the) Damascus (Document)
Hev	Naḥal Ḥever texts
Mas	Masada texts
Mird	Khirbet Mird texts
Mur	Wadi Murabba'at texts
p.	Pesher (commentary)
Q	Qumran
QL	Qumran literature
1Q, 2Q, 3Q, etc.	Numbered caves of Qumran, yielding written material; followed by abbreviation of biblical book or other writing
1QapGen	Genesis Apocryphon of Qumran Cave 1
1QH	Hôdâyôt (Thanksgiving Hymns) from Qumran Cave 1

1QpHab	Pesher on Habakkuk from Qumran Cave 1
1QIsa <sup>a,b</sup>	First or second copy of Isaiah from Qumran Cave 1
1QM	Milḥāmāh (War Scroll)
1QS	Serek hayyāḥād (Rule of the Community, Manual of Discipline)
1QSa	Appendix A (Rule of the Congregation) to 1QS
1QSb	Appendix B (Blessings) to 1QS
3Q15	Copper Scroll from Qumran Cave 3
4QBibHam	Words of the Heavenly Luminaries from Qumran Cave 4
4QFlor	Florilegium (or Eschatological Midrashim) from Qumran Cave 4
4QJudg	Text of Judges from Qumran Cave 4
4QMess ar	Aramaic "Messianic" text from Qumran Cave 4
4QPhyl	Phylacteries from Qumran Cave 4
4QPsAp <sup>a</sup>	Apocryphal psalms from Qumran Cave 4
4QPBless	Patriarchal Blessings from Qumran Cave 4
4QPseudoDan	Pseudo-Daniel from Qumran Cave 4
4QPrNab	Prayer of Nabonidus from Qumran Cave 4
4QSam <sup>a</sup>	First copy of Samuel from Qumran Cave 4
4QShirShab	Song of the Sabbath Sacrifice from Qumran Cave 4
4QTestim	Testamonia text from Qumran Cave 4
4QTLevi	Testament of Levi from Qumran Cave 4
4Q380-381	Fragments of Extra-canonical psalms from Qumran Cave 4
4Q510-511	Manuscript fragment from Qumran Cave 4
11QtgJob	Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 11
11QMelch	Melchizedek text from Qumran Cave 11
11QPs <sup>a</sup>	Psalms Scroll from Qumran Cave 11
11QTemple	Temple Scroll from Qumran Cave 11

TARGUMIC MATERIAL

Tg. Onq.	Targum Onqelos	Tg. Neof.	Targum Neofiti 1
Tg. Neb.	Targum of the Prophets	Tg. Ps.-J.	Targum Pseudo-Jonathan
Tg. Ket.	Targum of the Writings	Tg. Yer. I	Targum Yerušalmi I
Frg. Tg.	Fragmentary Targum	Tg. Yer. II	Targum Yerušalmi II
Sam. Tg.	Samaritan Targum	Yem. Tg.	Yemenite Targum
Tg. Isa.	Targum of Isaiah	Tg. Esth. I,	First or Second Targum of
Pal. Tgs.	Palestinian Targums	II	Esther

MISHNAIC AND RELATED LITERATURE

m.	Mishnah	Ker.	Keritot
t.	Tosepta	Ketub.	Ketubot
b.	Babylonian Talmud	Kil.	Kil'ayim
y.	Jerusalem (Palestinian) Talmud	Ma'as.	Ma'ašerot
'Abod. Zar.	'Aboda Zara	Ma'as. Š.	Ma'ašer Šeni
'Abot	'Abot	Mak.	Makkot
'Arak.	'Arakin	Makš.	Makširin (= Mašqin)
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	Meg.	Megilla
Bek.	Bekorot	Me'il.	Me'ila
Ber.	Berakot	Menah.	Menahot
Beša	Beša (= Yom Ṭo)	Mid.	Middot
Bik.	Bikkurim	Miqw.	Miqwa'ot
B. Mes.	Baba Meši'a	Mo'ed	Mo'ed
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma	Mo'ed Qať.	Mo'ed Qaťan
Dem.	Demai	Našim	Našim
'Ed.	'Eduyyot	Nazir	Nazir
'Erub.	'Erubin	Ned.	Nedarim
Giť.	Giťin	Neg.	Nega'im
Ḥag.	Ḥagiga	Nez.	Neziqin
Ḥal.	Ḥalla	Nid.	Niddah
Hor.	Horayot	Ohol.	Oholot
Ḥul.	Ḥullin	'Or.	'Orla
Kelim	Kelim	Para	Para

ABBREVIATIONS

Pe'a	Pe'a	Ta'an.	Ta'anit
Pesah.	Pesahim	Tamid	Tamid
Qidd.	Qiddušin	Tem.	Temura
Qinnim	Qinnim	Ter.	Terumot
Qod.	Qodašin	Tohar.	Toharot
Roš. Haš.	Roš Haššana	T. Yom	Tebul Yom
Šabb.	Šabbat	'Uq.	'Uqšin
Sanh.	Sanhedrin	Yad.	Yadayim
Šeb.	Šebi'it	Yebam.	Yebamot
Šebu.	Šebu'ot	Yoma	Yoma (= Kippurim)
Šeqal.	Šeqalim	Zabim	Zabim
Soṭa	Soṭa	Zebaḥ	Zebaḥim
Sukk.	Sukka	Zer.	Zera'im

OTHER RABBINIC WORKS

'Abot R. Nat.	'Abot de Rabbi Nathan	Pesiq. R.	Pesiqta Rabbati
'Ag. Ber.	'Aggadat Berešit	Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana
Bab.	Babylonian	Pirqe R. El.	Pirqe Rabbi Eleizer
Bar.	Baraita	Rab.	Rabbah (following abbreviation for biblical book: Gen. Rab. [with periods] = Genesis Rabbah)
Der. Er. Rab.	Derek Ereš Rabba
Der. Er. Zuṭ.	Derek Ereš Zuṭa
Gem.	Gemara
Kalla	Kalla
Mek.	Mekilta	Sem.	Semaḥot
Midr.	Midraš; cited with usual abbreviation for biblical book; but Midr. Qoh. = Midraš Qohelet	Sipra	Sipra
		Sipre	Sipre
		Sop.	Soperim
		S. 'Olam Rab.	Seder 'Olam Rabbah
Pal.	Palestinian	Talm.	Talmud
		Yal.	Yalquṭ

NAG HAMMADI TRACTATES

Acts Pet. 12	Acts of Peter and the Twelve	Marsanes	Marsanes
Apost.	Apostles	Melch.	Melchizedek
Allogenes	Allogenes	Norea	Thought of Norea
Ap. Jas.	Apocryphon of James	On Bap. A	On Baptism A
Ap. John.	Apocryphon of John	On Bap. B	On Baptism B
Apoc. Adam	Apocalypse of Adam	On Bap. C	On Baptism C
1 Apoc. Jas.	First Apocalypse of James	On Euch. A	On the Eucharist A
2 Apoc. Jas.	Second Apocalypse of James	On Euch. B	On the Eucharist B
Apoc. Paul	Apocalypse of Paul	Orig. World	On the Origin of the World
Apoc. Pet.	Apocalypse of Peter	Paraph. Shem	Paraphrase of Shem
Asclepius	Asclepius 21–29	Pr. Paul	Prayer of the Apostle Paul
Auth. Teach.	Authoritative Teaching	Pr. Thanks.	Prayer of Thanksgiving
Dial. Sav.	Dialogue of the Savior	Sent. Sextus	Sentences of Sextus
Disc. 8–9	Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth	Soph. Jes. Chr.	Sophia of Jesus Christ
Ep. Pet. Phil.	Letter of Peter to Philip	Steles Seth	Three Steles of Seth
Eugnostos	Eugnostos the Blessed	Teach. Silv.	Teachings of Silvanus
Exeg. Soul	Exegesis on the Soul	Testim. Truth	Testimony of Truth
Gos. Eg.	Gospel of the Egyptians	Thom. Cont.	Book of Thomas the Contender
Gos. Phil.	Gospel of Philip
Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas	Thund.	Thunder, Perfect Mind
Gos. Truth	Gospel of Truth	Treat. Res.	Treatise on Resurrection
Great Pow.	Concept of our Great Power	Treat. Seth	Second Treatise of the Great Seth
Hyp. Arch.	Hypostatis of the Archons	Tri. Trac.	Tripartite Tractate
Hypsiph.	Hypsiphron	Trim. Prot.	Trimorphic Protennoia
Interp. Know.	Interpretation of Knowledge	Val. Exp.	A Valentinian Exposition
		Zost.	Zostrianos

PREFACE

---

J A M E S L. M A Y S

THE BIBLE DEMANDS commentary because of its importance and character. It contains the sacred Scriptures of Judaism and Christianity and the primal literature of our culture; its significance for religion and culture calls for perennial work to interpret its texts in every generation. The books collected in the Bible were written in three different languages, in a succession of cultures, across centuries of time. To understand them, we need to call upon all the resources which the new knowledge available in our time can provide about their languages, cultures, and thought.

In this Commentary the members of the Society of Biblical Literature together with Harper & Row, Publishers, have undertaken to respond to that demand. The Commentary is designed to make the best current scholarship available to general audiences for reading and studying the books of the Bible. The contributors are all specialists in their subjects, but they use a style and vocabulary that will make their scholarship accessible to all who seek help in understanding the Bible. The general public, students, and teachers will all find in this Commentary a kind of interpretive writing that, on the one hand, does justice to the demands of the Bible for serious scholarship and, on the other, speaks to all who seek to use the Bible with discernment.

Like Harper's Bible Dictionary, this Commentary is the result of a cooperative effort between the Society of Biblical Literature and Harper & Row. The Society of Biblical Literature has assumed responsibility for the conception and content of the Commentary. As the major association of biblical scholars in North America, the Society has been able to enlist a panel of contributors from North America and abroad particularly qualified to write on the subjects assigned them. Harper & Row has brought to the project its outstanding experience and competence in designing and publishing resources for biblical study. The result is a volume of the highest usefulness and quality.

Harper's Bible Commentary and Harper's Bible Dictionary are companion volumes. They have been planned and written to complement each other. The Dictionary deals with the Bible in terms of subjects, the Commentary in terms of books. Of course each volume stands on its own, is complete in itself, and can be used independently, but one enriches and extends the resources available in the other. Used together, Commentary and Dictionary compose a little library for biblical study that is unique in comprehensiveness and usefulness for such a compact set.

The contributors were selected because of their recognized competence in the interpretation of the particular subjects and literature on which they have written. The contributors are diverse as a group, coming from the two major religious traditions that have the Bible as their heritage. Their contributions to the Commentary are composed to put their learning to work to interpret the biblical books as documents of the times in which the books were written. The editors have not sought to impose artificial uniformity on the contributors. The positions and approaches presented in this volume represent the mainstream of scholarship typical of the Society of Biblical Literature; eccentric and improbable positions are avoided. The individual commentaries and articles, however, do express the learning and judgment of their authors as scholars.

As a result, the volume includes a rich diversity of biblical scholarship. Those who use this Commentary encounter the variety that characterizes the continuing work of scholarship on the Bible rather than the single approach of one school of interpretation.

How the Commentary Is Organized. The focus of the Commentary is on the books of the Bible. The commentary on a particular book offers an interpretation based primarily on the book's structure and language. Behind many of the biblical books is a long history of development. Scholarly interpretation works in light of the history of a book's composition, but here the concern is not primarily with the history of the formation of the book. The goal rather is to help readers understand and appreciate the books as documents of the religious communities in which they arose.

The Commentary introduces and interprets all of the Hebrew Scriptures, the books of the Apocrypha, and those in the New Testament. It thus covers the biblical canons of Judaism, Catholicism, Eastern Orthodoxy, and Protestantism. The order of the books is that of the Revised Standard Version. To the traditional list of books that make up the Apocrypha have been added 3 Maccabees, 4 Maccabees, and Psalm 151 because of their importance as literature and the regard in which they are held by the Eastern Orthodox churches.

The Commentary introduces the books of the Bible in three ways. A set of general articles in the Introduction deals with matters that concern the entire Bible (e.g., "Reading and Interpreting the Bible"). A second series of articles introduces the parts of the Bible in which the books show a similarity and have a relationship to each other (e.g., "Introduction to the Biblical Story: Genesis–Esther"). Then there are the commentaries on the individual books. This plan provides readers with three approaches for study: to the Bible as a whole, to the major divisions of its literature, and to the particular books. By reversing the order and combining the approaches, one book of the Bible can be put in successively broader contexts. For instance, the book of Amos can be studied in detail in the commentary "Amos." Then it can be read in its relation to other prophetic books in "Introduction to the Prophetic Books." And finally, it can be read in the context of prophecy's historical course in Israel and the ancient Near East in "Biblical Literature in Its Historical Context: The Old Testament."

General Articles. The general articles in the Introduction are comprehensive and integrative. Their number has been kept to a minimum to avoid separating related matters into the subjects of many short treatments. Instead, subjects are held together so that readers can learn about them in their connectedness. For instance, rather than having one article on the history of Israel and others treating the historical setting of the Hebrew Scriptures, this Commentary provides one article that shows how the Hebrew Scriptures emerged in the course of Israel's unfolding history, thus holding the history of the people and the origin of its sacred literature together. Each of the general articles explores a relationship of the biblical literature that is crucial for its understanding and appreciation. The relation of the Bible to contemporary readers is discussed in "Reading and Interpreting the Bible." One article on "Biblical Literature in Its Historical Context" describes the relation between biblical literature and the history of Israel, early Judaism and the beginnings of Christianity. "The Bible and the Literature of Antiquity" explores the relation between the biblical genres and books and the literature of the cultures and nations in whose midst Israel existed and Judaism and Christianity emerged. The Bible has from the time of its earliest forms never been without interpreters; "The Bible and Its Interpreters" shows how these interpreters, by their methods and conclusions, created a variegated tradition of how the Bible is to be understood. Finally, the Bible has different forms for different religious communities, so the last article in the Introduction tells how and why the various canons of Judaism, Catholicism, and Protestantism arose.

Part Introductory Articles. The articles of the second type, which stand at the beginning of the parts into which the Commentary divides the Bible, offer further introductory help. There are special articles introducing the narrative books of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Psalms and the books of wisdom literature, the books of the Prophets, the apocryphal books, the Gospels and Acts, and the books written in the form of letters. These special articles are also comprehensive and integrative in purpose. They discuss in one place the common characteristics and roles of books that have a similarity and relationship. This arrangement helps readers see a book as part of a larger group of literature to which it belongs. It relieves the necessity for a repeated treatment of the same matters in the introductions to particular books. The location of these articles at the beginning of the parts of the Commentary identifies the introductory discussion that is relevant to the following books.

Commentaries on Individual Books. The commentaries on the individual books of the Bible provide an introduction, section-by-section comment on the book, and a bibliography.

The introductions furnish the information and orientation needed for reading each book. Because biblical books are so different, the task of particular introductions differs, but, generally, the introduction describes the literary character and form of the book, locates it in the historical, social, and religious settings in which it was composed, and assesses its role and significance for the community in which it appeared.

The parts, sections, and units into which the text is divided for comment display the structure of the book's contents. These divisions assist in reading and studying the book in light of its own order and arrangement. The headings of the divisions make a running outline of that book of the Bible. Comment on these divisions does not proceed verse by verse, nor is it composed of a series of unrelated explanations of details in the text. Rather, it takes the form of integrated exposition that interprets the unit under discussion as a whole and so gives users a coherent commentary to accompany the reading of that book of the Bible. From time to time, short essays develop topics of particular importance. The aim has been to provide an understandable explanatory guide that may be read alongside the text.

This Commentary is compatible with the major contemporary English translations of the Bible rather than being bound to one. This volume may be used profitably with any of them. The commentators on the individual books often cite one or another of the current English versions where a particular translation helps clarify meaning, but the commentaries are based on the Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek texts of the Bible. All translations appearing in the volume in quotation marks are those of the commentator unless otherwise identified. Where the original language of the text is cited, a general phonetic system of transliteration is used so that readers may read and pronounce the words, and a translation or explanation always stands immediately beside the transliteration.

A system of reference is used in the articles and commentaries to assist in using Harper's Bible Dictionary as a companion. Where the Dictionary contains further and more detailed information about people and places, topics and terms, methods and judgments, readers are alerted by the use of the arrow symbol (→), e.g., (→Corinth) or (→Samuel; Saul).

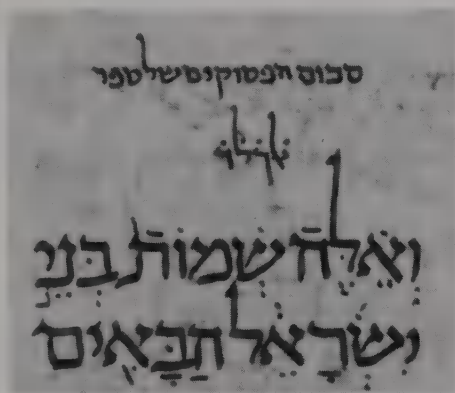

Historical dates are identified by the use of the designations B.C. and A.D. because these abbreviations are the most widely used and recognized. They are employed here as historical conventions and are not to be interpreted as confessional statements. Dates for persons and events may be found to vary within the Commentary and in comparison to the Dictionary. Such variations, usually small, express the differing best judgments of scholars about matters subject only to estimates of probability.

This volume is the work of many. The development of its plan, the selection of its writers, and the editorial oversight of its content were carried out by the five associate editors whose excellence and assiduousness as a team are surely unmatched. The general editor of the Dictionary assisted with advice and counsel. Some eighty-two contributors gave their assignments a place of priority in the midst of commitments already made. Professors Kent H. Richards and Gene M. Tucker, as officers of the Society of Biblical Literature, gave the project support and encouragement from its inception. From the publisher's side, John B. Shopp and Kandace Hawkinson provided the knowledge, skills, and collegial cordiality indispensable to such a project. Mrs. Robert M. Lumpkin cared for administrative and coordinating tasks with an interest that never flagged.

The work of writing and publication having been done, it remains for readers to take up the work and enjoy the reward of answering the Bible's demand for understanding. The scholars of the Society of Biblical Literature offer this Commentary in hope that it will be found useful in that venture.

INTRODUCTION

---

READING AND INTERPRETING THE BIBLE

---

J O H N B A R T O N

“So Philip ran to him, and heard him reading Isaiah the prophet, and asked, ‘Do you understand what you are reading?’ And he said, ‘How can I, unless someone guides me?’ ” (Acts 8:30–31).

In this conversation between Philip and the Ethiopian official we have the only justification for commentaries on the books of the Bible: these books are not always easy to understand without help. For most Jewish and Christian readers the books of the Bible seem more in need of commentaries than other books for two reasons. First, they are of unique importance from a religious point of view. To understand them correctly is not just a question of satisfying intellectual curiosity; it has a religious significance. Second, they are very old books, much older than any other books most modern people ever read. This means that there is much in them that is bound to be obscure without a certain amount of background information. Good translations can be a great help in bridging the gap between modern readers and these ancient texts, but translation cannot bear the whole weight of the explanation needed if the Bible is to be properly understood.

But the Bible's uniqueness can easily obscure the fact that understanding any piece of writing, religious or secular, modern or ancient, is a far from simple matter. Reading and interpreting any book is a complicated and subtle process. It is just that when we read straightforward texts written by our own contemporaries we do not notice the complications, because we have grown used to them—just as we do not think about the grammar of our own native language. Reading and interpreting the Bible is only a special case of a general problem, the problem of how one human being understands words written by another. The study of this problem is sometimes called hermeneutics (→ Hermeneutics). Three processes are involved in reading and interpreting any book: understanding, exposition, and application.

---

Previous page: The beginning of Exodus in Hebrew; detail of a manuscript page from the British Museum Codex of the Pentateuch (ca. A.D. 950), one of the most important Masoretic manuscripts of the first five books of the Hebrew Bible.

---

 UNDERSTANDING

---

To understand the Bible we must first, as with any book, understand the words it is composed of: that is, we must either know the biblical languages (→ Hebrew; Aramaic; Greek, New Testament) or have access to good translations (→ English Bible, The; Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions). On one level a commentary can be useful in explaining obscure words or technical terms (e.g., “ephod,” “teraphim,” “elder,” “covenant”) or unraveling complex and ambiguous or obscure sentences (e.g., Rom. 3:9).

But it is also necessary to understand what kind of book we are reading, and this is a literary, not just a linguistic, matter. To understand the Psalms, for example, we have to realize that they are poems and hymns, and that we should not read them as though they were statements of doctrine. To understand the writings of Paul it is essential to know that they are letters, written to a particular set of readers whose problems and questions the writer was dealing with. One of the difficulties for modern readers is that sometimes we do not know exactly what kind of works biblical books are. Thus, it is hard to know how far the narrative books such as Samuel, Chronicles, or Acts are to be understood as similar to what we call history or to what we call legend, folktale, or even fiction. An important part of the task of biblical criticism is therefore to classify the books of the Bible into different types or genres and thus to help modern readers understand the intentions of the writers (→ Biblical Criticism).

Even in reading modern books this need to classify is familiar to us. We do not read a “whodunit” with the same expectations as we do a romantic novel; we do not read laws as if they were poems, or political speeches as if they were encyclopedia articles. But as soon as we try to classify the books in the Bible we notice a feature common in ancient literature but much rarer today: many biblical books are composite. They are not the work of a single author but seem to be put together from fragmentary earlier works. Sometimes this means that they are in effect anthologies (Psalms, Proverbs), sometimes that they have gone through a number of editions before reaching their present form. Understanding books such as Genesis or the Gospel of Matthew demands the ability to trace their growth through a number of stages (→ Sources of the Pentateuch; Gospel, Gospels). At some of these stages editors may have incorporated small units of material that originated not in writing at all but in oral tradition (→ Oral Materials, Sources, and Traditions). These small units are classified and studied by form criticism (→ Form Criticism). The earlier stages through which these units in their turn may have developed before they were fixed in writing can sometimes be reconstructed. To understand a biblical book fully is thus a three-dimensional undertaking involving earlier stages in the text’s growth as well as its present, finished form.

To say that we have understood a book implies that we have a grasp of the book’s meaning. In most of our everyday reading, we assume that the meaning of a piece of writing is what its author intended. This is unproblematic with material like personal letters, newspaper reports, and most nonfiction, where known authors have written to communicate their thoughts and enable us to reproduce them in our own minds. But matters are not quite so simple with the Bible.

First, and most obviously, composite writings do not have an “author” in the same sense that most modern books do. We need to speak instead of the intentions of the many individuals or groups who were responsible for the various stages in the book’s growth: the worshipers in the Temple who composed and used the psalms, early preachers proclaiming the gospel by telling and retelling stories and sayings of Jesus, and so on. Where the final form of a composite biblical book is concerned, we have to speak of the intentions of the “editor,” or “redactor,” rather than of the “author.” Nevertheless, this editor’s intentions can sometimes be discerned from the way material has been arranged. In the last thirty years biblical scholars have spent much effort in trying to understand the minds of redactors and have used the term redaction criticism to describe this task (→ Redaction Criticism).

A second, more complex question arises with the kinds of writing we call “literature.” Novels and poems often seem to have a life of their own: a fresh “reading” of a great tragedy, like a fresh interpretation of a great symphony, can sometimes go beyond anything the author consciously intended and yet can strike us as true to what he or she wrote. One of the things that makes the Bible special even for many people who are not religious believers is that it is a great literary classic, with the power, like that of the greatest works of literature, to stimulate fresh interpretations. Some biblical scholars would say that the “meaning” a new interpretation finds in it is just as legitimate as the meaning intended by those who first wrote or compiled it. They would argue that the text of the Bible as it now stands has a certain priority over hypothetical earlier stages, so that what readers should be trying to understand is not the intention of the writer or compiler but a meaning that inheres in the words of the text itself (sometimes called a “text-immanent” meaning). This tendency can be seen in the works of some modern literary critics who have studied the Bible. Others who feel that the task of readers is to understand the final form of the biblical text have religious rather than literary reasons for this belief. The Bible as it stands, they argue, not the fragments from which it was composed, is the Bible that Jews and Christians have received. Its “author” is the believing community that (under God) accepted this particular version as canonical.

---

EXPOSITION

---

The test of understanding is exposition. Having grasped what a text means, one’s next step is to state its meaning in one’s own words. Of course our restatement of the meaning can never be a substitute for the original words of the Bible. If it could, we could replace the Bible with our own handbooks of biblical thought. But unless we can find words of our own that will express at least partially what we have understood, our understanding is mute. Exposition involves two elements: contextualization and systematization.

Contextualization

In expounding a text we have to begin by explaining the context within which it makes sense. This does not mean merely the place within a longer work where a given passage belongs, but the whole cultural and historical setting of the text. Just as we ourselves cannot understand a piece of writing without knowing something of the culture from which it derives, so it is impossible to explain the book to others without sketching for them the background against which it is to be read. Any good commentary will include information about the place and time at which a book (or the parts of which it is composed) was written and will explain customs and ways of thought in it that are unfamiliar to modern readers. Thus, in expounding many OT stories one will need to explain family and tribal customs, geographical settings, and aspects of language and idiom. In NT exposition it is often necessary to describe the society of the Mediterranean world in the first century of our era and to explain Jewish customs of the time.

One reason biblical exposition has to be done anew in each generation is that what is familiar and what unfamiliar changes with cultural change in our own society. We need to explain many of the cultural assumptions of NT times—for example, about the world of spirits—precisely because they are no longer ours. Other features of NT thought, however, that seemed so alien as to need explanation, or indeed apology, a century ago are now once again part of the common currency of modern thought. An example is the common first-century belief that the end of the present world-order is at hand. This struck many nineteenth-century readers of the Bible as an extremely alien and remote idea, but the concerns of a nuclear age have put it back on our own intellectual map.

For some biblical scholars the contextualization of biblical books is always an exercise in “cultural relativism.” It means pointing out to modern readers that the world of the Bible is not their world, thus distancing readers from the text. It is undoubtedly good for modern believers to realize that the Bible comes from a culture that is radically different from our own, and so not to make too ready an equation of its concerns with ours. Biblical criticism helps to guard against naïveté in assuming that the Bible has answers to all our questions and that everything in it can be simply read as if it were written for our situation.

On the other hand, there is continuity as well as discontinuity between human cultures, and much of the skill of biblical exposition lies in discerning where the Bible’s concerns and ours are and where they are not the same. One of the major programs of biblical interpretation this century has been that of Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976), whose key idea, “demythologization,” depends crucially on this distinction. Bultmann stressed that many of the Bible’s modes of expression presupposed a system of thought that he called “mythological” (heaven as a physical place, the world as full of angels and demons, sickness as divine punishment for sin). But the whole purpose of pointing this out in biblical exposition was to clear the ground for readers to grasp the central truths of biblical faith, which transcend cultural relativity—the direct address of God to the individual and his call for response in faith. Thus for Bultmann contextualization was not a way of relegating the Bible to the status of an antique but precisely of liberating it from being treated as such.

Systematization

In trying to understand any piece of writing there is always a strong drive toward finding coherence and unity in it. As we have seen, there are times when this drive is frustrated in reading the Bible, and then readers are forced to the conclusion that the text is really fragmentary or composite. But even in these cases redaction criticism looks for some unity of purpose that editors may have imposed on the text, despite its fragmentary character. And although the Bible is clearly not a literary unity in the way that a single work by a single author is a unity, it does derive from a religious tradition with common roots and a recognizable common flavor. One major task of biblical exposition is to lay bare the underlying system of beliefs, presuppositions, and experiences that unite the biblical books and enable us to speak of a “biblical faith.”

One of the chief manifestations of this systematizing drive in twentieth-century biblical study has been the production of books on biblical theology (→ Theology, New Testament; Theology, Old Testament). The aim of biblical theology has been to articulate the common themes running through the whole Bible and to expound individual books and sections in accordance with them. Though most scholars who have written such works would agree that the Bible does not form a single, completely unified work, their attempts to locate particular guiding threads can be a great help to readers finding their way through this varied literature. Such themes as “covenant,” “saving history,” and “promise and fulfillment” provide focal points that help one to make sense of the whole.

Again, such aids to exposition have to be reforged for each new generation of readers, not because the Bible itself changes, but because the questions readers put to the text change. In principle there are many different ways in which one could do justice to the underlying thematic unity of the Bible, and it is legitimate to allow our own most pressing concerns to shape the investigation. However, the aim in such exposition is always to let the Bible itself act as a control on what is said about it, so that appeal to the text, not to the interpreter’s needs or concerns, remains the final appeal. Contextualization and systematization act as checks on each other, to ensure that the interpreter expounds the Bible in a way that does equal justice to the givenness of the text and to the interests and concerns of readers. (Recent challenges to this way of seeing the interpreter’s task are discussed below.)

APPLICATION

It is obvious that understanding and exposition are needed in reading any book, but application may seem uniquely a feature of reading the Bible or, at least, religious literature. It is, after all, possible to read a book with merely "academic" interest, that is, without any concern for applying its message in one's own life.

In fact, however, there are other kinds of writing than simply religious literature where application is a concern. Laws, for example, exist principally to be applied, and there is a long tradition of legal hermeneutics concerned with such questions as how the meaning of an ambiguous law is to be settled and whether or not one should attend to the original intentions of those who framed it. Much traditional Jewish exposition of Scripture has been a kind of legal hermeneutic, having the practical application of the biblical text to ethical life as its major concern (→ Law; Halakah).

But quite apart from this narrow sense of the word "application," all reading of texts is in a broader sense just as concerned with application as with understanding and exposition. We read books because we expect to "get something out" of them; we expect to benefit in some way from what we read. The kind of benefit we look for naturally depends on the kind of book we are reading. Just as it is a mistake in understanding to look for factual information in a lyric poem or spiritual enlightenment in a computer manual, so it may also be called a mistake in application—it is an attempt to use the text for an inappropriate purpose. But application of some kind is nearly always in our minds when we read.

In the case of the Bible, exposition tends to pass over almost unnoticed into application. When we expound the text in a way that takes account of our own concerns as well as those of its authors, we are trying to find ways of making it as fruitful in our own context as it was in its original context. Bultmann's demythologization program, already mentioned, is a clear case of exposition serving application. Most scholars who have written on the theology of the Bible have had it as their further aim to make the Bible come alive in the modern religious context by showing that its underlying system of thought and faith can be applied today. What was true then, they have believed, can still be true now.

An alternative possibility, if one is seeking to "apply" the Bible, lies in exploring the potential religious importance of some of those earlier stages in the development of the biblical text that source, form, and redaction criticism have illuminated. Biblical criticism has enabled scholars to rediscover the process by which the religious faith of ancient Israel and of the early church was transmitted, to reconstruct the history within which it took shape and the individuals and groups who formed it. It is quite possible to regard any of these as theologically significant in its own right. Thus someone might want to say that the prophet Isaiah himself had something to say that is of great application today, even though, strictly speaking, what he taught is not identical with the message that appears in his name in the Bible, since the book called Isaiah is something of a compendium of prophecies from many different periods, many of them not by Isaiah himself. Or again, we may think that the character of God was revealed in the fact that Israel, his chosen nation, was in reality small and politically insignificant, even though the Bible's own presentation suggests that it was an important power. Or again, it may be said that Christians today can learn how best to preach the gospel by following the example of those early preachers who (according to form critics) freely retold and readapted the story of Jesus to the needs of their audience—rather than by imitating the fixity of form the Gospels eventually achieved. Strictly speaking, these are not applications of the Bible but of hypotheses arrived at through research into the origins of the Bible. The theological ideas they represent are not so much biblical ideas as ideas prompted by the study of the Bible.

Because the Bible is the foundation document for both Judaism and Christianity, people will have quite varied ways of finding spiritual value in it, and if some of these are not strictly ways of applying the Bible itself but ways of applying insights reached by studying the Bible, that only demonstrates how enormously fruitful a book the Bible is. Like other great classics of literature and religion, it can stimulate an endless diversity of new thoughts and ideas.

---

CRITICAL AND PRECRITICAL INTERPRETATION

---

The account of reading and interpreting the Bible given so far describes the way in which most serious students of the Bible have seen their task since the European Enlightenment of the eighteenth century. Understanding, exposition, and application have been presented as three successive phases in interpreting the Bible, indeed, any piece of writing. The order cannot be reversed. We cannot apply a text until we have expounded it, that is, stated its meaning, and we cannot state its meaning until we have understood it. Consequently it is incorrect to try to apply a biblical text until we have discovered its meaning by paying attention to its original context. It is equally incorrect to think that we can discover its context without first grasping the type of text it is.

This methodical way of proceeding is usually called a "critical" approach and is distinguished from the "precritical" style of interpretation—really a large number of different styles—that can be found in early Jewish biblical exposition, in the Christian fathers, in medieval biblical commentaries, and in the work of the Reformers. For a "critical" reading, the most important thing about the text is its literary character: what kind of work it is, how it came to be written, what the intentions of its author(s) were, what purpose it was meant to serve. Only when these things have been established can any further progress be made. Thus, until we know whether a book in the Bible was written to convey factual information or not, we cannot form any opinion on the truth of statements contained in it. If a book is a piece of fiction, then statements it appears to make about the past are not meant seriously as fact and should not be treated as such. It is because most scholars now think, for example, that the book of Jonah is a piece of conscious fiction that they regard questions about the possibility of Jonah's having survived being swallowed by the great fish as pointless—there never was such a fish, and no one ever meant to affirm that there was.

This is not the way people saw the Bible before the rise of critical scholarship. Traditionally, the most important fact about the Bible, which determined the whole way it was read and interpreted, was its status as divine revelation. Since the Bible is inspired by God, it was held to follow that it would always be possible to apply it in every fresh situation, and complex methods were devised to ensure that it would be interpreted correctly. Instead of the order understanding–exposition–application, precritical interpretation tended to favor the order application–exposition–understanding. The text was not read for itself and for its natural meaning but only in the process of applying it. It was then expounded in accordance with the application it was believed to have, and this exposition provided the basis on which readers understood it.

When the Bible is approached in this way, one effect is that it becomes extremely difficult for any reader to notice when its plain sense contradicts what the religious community believes to be true. Indeed, in both Judaism and Christianity many of the methods of interpretation developed in the course of time were expressly designed to avoid any possible clash between what the Bible might be understood to mean and the beliefs and practices current among its readers. Judaism has long had a primary concern with “legal” applications of the Bible: the Bible has been important primarily as a source of instruction in living as an observant Jew. Much energy was expended in the rabbinical schools of medieval Europe in reconciling conflicting regulations in the Pentateuch or Torah and in interpreting the rest of the Hebrew Bible (the Prophets and Writings) so that they too could be read in relation to the Law and so that they did not appear to differ from the Torah itself in the rules they laid down (→ Torah). Precritical Christian interpretations were less interested in ethical questions—though where these arose there was a similar desire to reconcile one text with another—and showed a greater concern for the predictive, prophetic aspect of OT texts and the doctrinal implications of the NT. The methods used to ensure that the Bible spoke with a single voice on doctrinal matters were very similar, however, to the Jewish methods.

A particular characteristic of medieval Christian exegesis was its allegorical style. Many biblical texts—especially those whose surface meaning is obscure, trivial, or seemingly indecent—were interpreted as having a figurative meaning, so that they convey, through a kind of code, deeper truths about God, the spiritual life, or the church. The context of passages was often entirely disregarded in this way of reading the Bible, and a religious significance was assigned to individual verses, sentences, or even words.

Allegorical interpretation and the attribution of hidden meanings to obscure passages are no longer practiced in the biblical exposition of mainstream Christian churches, though they survive in small sects, some extreme fundamentalist groups, and in the liturgical use of the Bible. The last case, however, is not so much a case of scriptural interpretation as of the use of scriptural texts for their literary and evocative power, regardless of their original meaning. Churches that continue to use Scripture in this way generally do not retain the allegorical approach when using the Bible in theological discussion. The resulting discord between the use of Scripture in liturgy and in doctrine is a source of difficulty in those Christian traditions for which public worship is the primary context in which believers encounter the Bible.

---

"POSTCRITICAL" INTERPRETATION

---

By no means everyone believes that the triumph of the critical approach to the Bible has been a blessing. Though few would probably wish or feel able to return to precritical methods, recent biblical study has shown a widespread desire to move beyond what is felt to be the excessively "historical" orientation of critical approaches. We have already noted that some scholars consider a concern for the earlier stages in the growth of biblical books to be misplaced, stressing the primacy of the "final form" of a book as the object of study.

Canonical Criticism

Among those who favor this line of approach, some are motivated partly by dissatisfaction with many traditional works on biblical theology. Typically, a "New Testament theology" is a description not of the theological contents of the NT (read as if it were a single, continuous work) but of the development of religious thought in the early church during the period for which the NT simply happens to be our best or only witness (roughly the first century of our era). "Canonical critics" feel that, though this is an entirely legitimate subject for study, it is not, strictly speaking, the theology of the New Testament, which is a religious classic in its own right, irrespective of its potential usefulness to the historian of Christian origins. It would be perfectly possible to treat the NT as a literary work and to analyze the theological ideas that it conveys if read, as it were, two-dimensionally—with a deliberate lack of interest in its historical and cultural context. Some tentative studies along these lines are now being written. In some ways the results resemble the sorts of theological systems that used to be derived from the Bible before critical questions began to be asked. It is too early to say whether this "canonical" approach will come to command general assent.

Structuralism

In the 1960s and 1970s structuralist critics in France and North America became interested in the Bible, and many studies were written that subjected the biblical text to the procedures of structural analysis. Structuralist interpretations pay great attention to the articulation of the text and the way in which its parts cohere to form a whole—generally with a deliberate disregard for questions about the text's historical origins. Thus features that critical readers see as evidence that the biblical books are composite (such as apparently pointless repetition of trivial detail or dislocations in thought or syntax) are treated by structuralists as part of the data that the interpreter ought to integrate into a coherent reading of the text, rather than as a problem, and they are often seen as charged with a great deal of meaning. Structuralist interpretations make no claims about the original meaning of the text but simply propose a creative and interesting reading that readers are asked to consider on its own merits.

Folktale and other essentially oral genres of literature have proved particularly congenial material for structural analysis, and since some of the Bible (especially the narrative portions of the OT and the Gospels) has some similarity to folktale and may well reflect a lengthy oral transmission, interesting results have been achieved.

Reader-Response Criticism

Recently some critics have begun to argue that the meaning of a piece of writing lies neither in the author's intentions nor within the words of the text itself but in the interplay between the text and the reader. Reading, in other words, should be seen as a creative activity, on the analogy of musical performance. Whereas traditional criticism, as we have seen, requires the interpreter to allow the text to exercise control over the interpretation, in reader-response criticism the creative role of the reader is regarded as entirely legitimate.

Everyone acknowledges that readers bring particular questions, assumptions, and interests to the books they read; as argued above, it is because each generation asks different questions that the exposition of texts is never a completed process but is an activity that has to be carried out anew in every age. But traditional criticism has set itself the goal of achieving as much objectivity as possible. Critics have tried to become conscious of their own interests and prejudices to prevent these from distorting their critical judgment and have insisted on applying texts only after they have been expounded with as much objectivity as possible. In reader-response criticism prejudgment or "preunderstanding" (German Vorverständnis) is regarded as a necessary tool in interpretation, and objectivity in the traditional sense is seen as not only impossible but also undesirable. The reader is an active partner in dialogue with the text, and an assumption of neutrality is only self-deception. Reader-response criticism has contributed to the interpretation of biblical texts that seem inherently to call for a response of commitment on the reader's part, such as some of the parables. It is not yet clear whether it will prove able to deal as effectively with other genres within the Bible.

“Committed” Interpretation

The idea that reading is a dialogue between text and reader can be seen in a slightly different way by taking these thoughts about “preunderstanding” somewhat further. One particularly powerful presupposition of most traditional study of the Bible, whether critical or precritical, has been that the reader’s job is to understand the text intellectually. Bible study has usually been a branch of academic study, and modern biblical scholarship in particular is clearly understood by most of those engaged in it as a branch of the study of literature, which in its turn is part of the humanities or liberal arts studied in universities. The Bible thus belongs, in this way of seeing it, to the university curriculum. Some Christians, especially those engaged in difficult pastoral work in contexts far removed from the centers of intellectual life, feel that this is such a false context for the study of the Bible as to call in question any interpretations that might be arrived at through it. They point out that university-based biblical scholars are far more remote from the sort of people who wrote the Bible than are many of the poor and dispossessed in today’s world, and they claim that the Bible can be properly understood only by those who have a prior commitment to the Bible’s own values—especially what liberation theology calls its “preferential option” for the poor. They suggest that a commitment to various political and social concerns, such as the liberation of the poor or the cause of feminism, can function as fruitful “preunderstandings” to help unlock truths in the Bible that have been suppressed by scholars claiming to work “objectively” (but actually betraying a commitment to the political status quo). The stories of the Exodus and the books of the prophets have been especially important for critics of this persuasion, since they show that the God of the Bible sides with the oppressed against their oppressors. There is a strong sense that the Bible needs to be taken out of the hands of academic scholars and given back to ordinary believers, to live and work by.

---

PERSONAL BIBLE READING

---

Even a brief survey of the issues that biblical interpretation raises may make the Bible seem remote from the experience of ordinary persons whose main motive for reading the Bible is personal religious faith. It is important to realize that nearly all the methods and hypotheses about the Bible developed by specialists have arisen from experiences of reading the Bible that began from the very same religious motives as those of ordinary Jewish or Christian Bible readers. With most precritical interpretation, however complicated, this is apparent in the concern to make the Bible’s message conform with religious orthodoxy. Critical study does not begin with an opposition in principle to this approach but simply with a concern to read the text for itself and to let the Bible be the arbiter of its own meaning. This concern was in its origins related to the Protestant insistence that the Bible must not be interpreted by the church in defiance of its natural sense but must be heard in its own right. Thus critical study of the Bible is not in itself a secularizing approach but has religious roots, even though it can be practiced without religious commitment.

Ordinary readers are free to accept or reject the particular interpretations that biblical scholars offer in commentaries by testing them out against the words of the text itself, which are there for all to read. With the exception of scholars who support the "committed" styles of interpretation just discussed, biblical specialists regard unprejudiced readers as the best judge of the interpretations they put forward. Commentaries are never a substitute for the text itself; they are meant to send readers back to the text with clearer eyes, to explore its riches for themselves.

Bibliography

- Armerding, C. E. The Old Testament and Criticism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983.
- Barr, J. The Bible in the Modern World. London: SCM, 1973.
- . Holy Scripture: Canon, Authority, Criticism. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983.
- Barton, J. Reading the Old Testament: Method in Biblical Study. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984.
- Stuhlmacher, P. Historical Criticism and Theological Interpretation of Scripture. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977.

BIBLICAL LITERATURE IN ITS HISTORICAL CONTEXT: THE OLD TESTAMENT

S. DEAN McBRIDE, J.R.

INTRODUCTION

The Hebrew Bible insists that ancient Israel was forged on the anvil of history for a singular purpose: to be an enduring witness among the world's nations to the beneficent sovereignty and providence of the God who had fashioned it. This sublime consciousness of corporate vocation is expressed most fully in the books of the Pentateuch and Prophets, which together provide a more or less continuous account of Israel's antecedents, its formation as the covenant people of God, and its national history from the time a homeland was acquired at the end of the Bronze Age through the restoration of a Judean state in the earlier Persian period. The third division of the Jewish canon, the Writings, enriches this account not only by supplementing the historical narrative, but by preserving vivid literary testimony to ways in which psalmists and sages contributed to Israel's sense that divine providence embraced every aspect of its own life and of all creaturely existence.

Study of the intricate relationships between the literature comprising this canonical legacy and the history to which it bears witness has in large measure shaped the agenda of modern biblical scholarship.

FORMATION OF THE PEOPLE "ISRAEL"

Civilization was already old in the Near East when Israel appeared on the scene of history. Over the course of the fourth and third millennia B.C., literate cultures had flourished, and in some cases died or grown moribund, in Mesopotamia (→ Accad; Babylon; Mitanni; Sumer), Anatolia (→ Hittites), Syria (→ Ebla; Mari; Ras-Shamra), and of course Egypt. Israel was at least an indirect heir to intellectual achievements of most of these predecessors, and in the traditions of Genesis it traced back its own lineage among them. Yet when biblical sources describe the events that indelibly fixed Israel's peculiar character, they focus on a religious drama, recalling how a warrior deity, Yahweh, created a people distinct from all others, nurtured it in wilderness isolation, and granted it through conquest arable land in which to dwell. Israel thus knew itself to be both continuous with and radically separate from other peoples; this contributes to the difficulty of reconstructing the formative stages of its political development.

Palestine During the Transition from Late Bronze to Early Iron Ages (ca. 1250–1100 B.C.)

Israel's proximate origins, as distinct from the antecedent histories of the groups that comprised it, must be sought in the turmoil of late Bronze Age politics, which effectively destroyed both the Hittite and Egyptian empires in greater Syro-Palestine. Upheavals of the thirteenth century B.C. were followed in the first half of the twelfth by gradual consolidation of regional powers.

According to biblical sources, all of these regional powers figured prominently as peers and competitors in the history of Israel's own political formation. The earliest extrabiblical evidence to establish a specifically Israelite presence among them is a remarkable reference in the victory stele of Pharaoh Merneptah, now dated to 1207 B.C. The text records Merneptah's claim to have reasserted hegemony over the southern district of Egypt's former province of Canaan—by defeating several city-states and wholly obliterating the population of "Israel." The very mention of Israel by Merneptah suggests that it was able to muster a significant force against him, but secure evidence is still wanting to determine how much earlier an entity by this name may have been present in Canaan, where it came from, and the extent of its initial occupation. However, because neither the fourteenth-century B.C. Amarna letters nor campaign reports of Merneptah's immediate pharaonic predecessors refer to such a population, it is likely that "Israel" only emerged in Canaan toward the end of the thirteenth century.

Merneptah's campaign may well have dealt severe blows to Canaanite city-states and "Israel" alike in central Palestine, so that the twelfth century became a period of recovery and extended struggle for dominance among them. But Israelite clans and tribes can be associated with the numerous new agricultural settlements that appear in the central Palestinian highlands during the initial phase of the Iron Age.

Traditions of the Israelite League

The oldest literary compositions preserved in the Hebrew Bible are poetic works dating probably to the latter half of the twelfth century B.C. that celebrate triumphs of Yahweh, Israel's God, over historical adversaries. The lyric poem in Exod. 15:1–18 (cf. v. 21) may be likened to a national anthem, serving both to preserve and to shape popular memory of formative experiences. While the anthem is imbued with an intense patriotic consciousness, the corporate unity it evokes is Yahweh's "people" rather than "Israel." Throughout, hymnic praise of Yahweh—as ancestral deity and, especially, preeminent divine warrior—is juxtaposed with terse narrative elements: God's victory over Pharaoh and Egypt's chariot forces at the Sea of Reeds (→ Red Sea); God's guidance of those delivered from the Egyptian foe to a haven in the wilderness; the trepidation felt by political leaders of Philistia, Transjordan, and Canaan when word reaches them of Yahweh's deeds; and, finally, implantation of the newly created people of God in the Palestinian highlands, thereby establishing a sacral kingdom over which Yahweh is to rule forever.

The victory ode in Judges 5, ascribed to the prophetess Deborah and the military commander Barak, provides a sharper portrait of early Israel's social composition. An objective political entity "Israel" is expressly in view here; it is exalted alongside "Yahweh, Israel's God," whose timely intervention has enabled a volunteer army of Israelites to prevail in battle near Megiddo against a coalition of Canaanite kings.

These archaic poems, together with similar sources dating to the following century (e.g., the hymnically framed tribal blessings in Deut. 33), sketch a reasonably coherent picture of an emergent community joined by religious traditions as well as common political interests. Available evidence warrants several interrelated conclusions regarding the character and significance of this early Israelite league or confederation.

The alliance of tribes had military capability and purpose. When occasion demanded, "Israel" could muster a militia. Whether defensive or offensive, the league wars were considered to be Yahweh's wars, because God not only sanctioned them but participated as warrior in them.

The tribes understood themselves to form an extended family, joined together in covenant with Yahweh to whom they owed ultimate political allegiance (Deut. 33:3–5; cf. 6:4–5; Josh. 24:1–27). The concept of Yahweh's kingship over Israel and the related ideology of sacral warfare had ritual expression, no doubt in irregular tribal conclaves to prepare for battle but more importantly in periodic pilgrimage festivals held at various regional shrines (esp. Gilgal, Bethel, Shechem, and Shiloh). Such occasions for celebrating Yahweh's providential deeds and gifts to Israel were the settings in which a national epic began to emerge.

Except for extraordinary circumstances (cf. Judg. 19–21), judicial authority, like military leadership, was exercised at the levels of clan and tribe rather than league. In sacral affairs, however, professionalism took hold early on in the form of clerical "families" or guilds serving at major regional sanctuaries who traced their lineages to notable priestly ancestors, Moses and Aaron in particular (cf. Judg. 18:30; 20:26–28; and 1 Sam. 1–3). These guilds became increasingly important channels for transmission of Yahwistic ethos and league traditions (cf. Deut. 33:6–11). For example, legislation preserved in the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21–23) may represent the tradition of covenantal law transmitted by the Shiloh circle of Mosaic priests (cf. Deut. 33:6–11).

---

STATEHOOD AND EMPIRE (ca. 1000–922 B.C.)

---

After more than a century of securing a homeland, early Israel sought to stabilize a polity and to interact with and become more like other successful nations round about it. This did not inevitably mean the demise of the Yahwistic league and its ideals. The tribal confederation had shaped a communal identity—"Israel," the people of Yahweh—and this endured; but the alliance had yet to build a political structure able to promote internal justice and pursue advantageous relations with its neighbors. Efforts to do so brought rapid social change and greatly expanded cultural horizons, along with strong opposition from traditionalists.

Monarchical Governance and the Kingdom of Yahweh

By the middle of the eleventh century B.C., parts of greater Israel had begun to experiment with monarchy in several guises. Some of the figures with the title "judge" (Heb. shofet) were patricians who at least acted like petty kings (Judg. 10:3–5; 12:8–15). After leading Israel to victory against Midianite raiders, Gideon turned down an offer to become its "king" (Heb. melek), a status that one of his sons, Abimelech, actively sought and gained over the city of Shechem (Judg. 8:22–23; 9:1–6). But it was Saul, a Benjaminite, who created the first royal house and the territorial state of Israel. His accomplishments should not be underestimated. Yet in all respects, Saul's achievement was overshadowed by that of David, an erstwhile Saulide commander who in the span of several decades transformed Israel into an imperial power.

After his breach with Saul, David established a petty kingdom of his own in the southeastern corner of the Judean highlands. Despite nominal vassalage to the Philistines, he enlarged his own dominion and, about the time of Saul's death (ca. 1000 B.C.), became independent monarch of a Judean territorial state, with Hebron as his capital. A period of intermittent warfare between David's forces and the reduced kingdom of Israel ended with the assassination of Ishbosheth, Saul's son and successor. Elders of the old tribal league assembled in Hebron where they enacted a covenant establishing David as Israel's king. In a series of bold moves, David consolidated and vastly expanded his rule: he used his personal troops to conquer the Jebusite city of Jerusalem, making it his new capital; he established friendly relations with Phoenician Tyre; he led Israel's militia to victory against the Philistine coalition, reducing it to vassal status; and in subsequent years he waged successful wars against the Transjordanian kingdoms of Ammon, Edom, and Moab as well as the Aramean city-states of Syria to the north and the Amalekites to the south. Thus the regional powers that in the twelfth century B.C. had replaced pharaonic rule over Syro-Palestine were, by the mid-tenth, once again linked through military conquest and treaty. In effect, David restored an imperium to the whole of Egypt's former province of Canaan.

The impact of all this on Israelite religion must have been profound. David's conquests were also Yahweh's, so Yahweh too ruled an empire; its religious center was the pavilion erected by David on Jerusalem's acropolis to enshrine the Ark, an object symbolic of divine presence during the earlier period of the league (2 Sam. 6; cf. Ps. 132). In another important move, David reorganized the old priestly guilds of Israel and Judah into a unified "levitical" clergy, which officiated at the central sanctuary in Jerusalem but was also deployed widely in greater Israel to oversee civil and sacral affairs alike (cf. 1 Chron. 26:29–32).

Later years of David's reign were troubled by civil strife and bitter struggles among his sons to gain succession to the imperial throne. Solomon emerged victorious and dealt severely with those who had opposed him. He reorganized the administration of united Israel, rebuilt cities to defend it, exploited the economic resources of both kingdom and empire, and vigorously promoted international trade. He expended some of the new wealth to construct a monumental Temple for Yahweh, of Canaanite-Phoenician design, thus replacing the Davidic tent-shrine with a far more conspicuous and permanent symbol of divine presence. He also built in the eastern environs of Jerusalem lesser shrines for the deities of states subject to and allied with him, no doubt symbolizing thereby that just as he was ruler of nations so Yahweh was sovereign among national gods. For traditionalists, especially in the north, the question was whether either Yahwism or "Israel" could survive Solomon's splendidly cosmopolitan achievements.

Israelite Literature of the Early Monarchical Period

Israel's culture had been literate from the outset, but under monarchy the written word grew in importance and with it the scribal profession. The literary accumulation that was to culminate in the Hebrew Bible seems also to have begun in the golden age of empire.

David himself had renown in Israel as a balladeer and poet. Apart from the numerous psalms ascribed to him, Scripture preserves several works of poetry that most likely exhibit his personal imprint (2 Sam. 1:19–27; 3:33–34; 23:1–7). The internationalism studiously cultivated by Solomon's regime provides a likely setting for the beginnings of Israelite literary wisdom, whose basic genres and motifs are well attested in sapiential works of other Near Eastern monarchical societies. Whether any of the collections of proverbial lore bearing Solomon's name in the book of Proverbs actually derive from him or his immediate courtly circle is debatable (cf. Prov. 25:1; 1 Kings 4:29–34). The other two biblical books associated with him—Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes—belong to a considerably later period.

Much of the evidence used by scholars to reconstruct the early history of the Jerusalem cult—(cult is used here in its more general sense to mean a system of worship)—and its liturgy is derived from the book of Psalms. Although the Psalter itself is a postexilic anthology and precise dating of individual psalms is notoriously difficult, typologically early hymns and prayers that celebrate Yahweh's enthronement and sovereignty over the nations and glorify Zion and its king (e.g., Pss. 2; 18; 29; 68; 72; 93) may be taken to represent the oldest traditions of the Temple cult in Jerusalem.

Criticism has also discerned literary deposits from the early monarchical period embedded within the sixth-century B.C. historiographical works of the Pentateuch and Former Prophets (1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings). Because this old material has been supplemented and in some parts extensively reworked by authors responsible for the later forms of the literature, much is uncertain regarding its original extent and character. Most critics have taken the view that the deposits represent a number of originally self-contained compositions, possibly written or compiled from oral traditions by scribes attached to the courts of David and Solomon. Typically posited are the following discrete sources or documents: the so-called Yahwist narrative (J) underlying or incorporated into the pentateuchal books of Genesis, Exodus, and Numbers; an “Ark narrative” (attested principally in 1 Sam. 4–6) that recounts the story of the Ark’s capture and return during the early period of the wars between the Israelite league and the Philistines; the account of David’s rise to power (comprising most of 1 Sam. 16–2 Sam. 5); and the brilliantly crafted narrative that traces the threads of court intrigue, blood vengeance, and conspiracy that have their denouement in Solomon’s accession to the throne of David (2 Sam. 9–20; 1 Kings 1–2). Yet none of these narratives seems complete in itself, and there are features of style, theme, and theology common to all of them. Thus it is possible that they represent not independent works but only the most conspicuous parts of a comprehensive national epic—crafted from earlier Israelite sources and popular Near Eastern traditions during the Solomonic era—that traced, as it were, a history of human civilization, from primeval times and the rise of nations through the origins and exaltation of Israel, culminating with accounts of the transcendent achievements of David and Solomon.

FROM DIVIDED MONARCHY TO EXILE (922–586 B.C.)

Rebellion abroad and growing unrest in the north of Israel itself tarnished Solomon’s splendor even before his long reign had ended. During the next four centuries there were few occasions for realistic hope that the golden age of empire could be recovered. And yet the legacy of David and Solomon, like that of the Israelite league before them, was never lost. Israel had begun its historical pilgrimage learning itself to be the people of Yahweh; it had explored a new form of this identity in the dazzling era of United Kingdom and empire. The ideals and limitations of both of these Israels endured not merely as treasured memories but as models to be reexamined and reinterpreted in the light of subsequent events.

The Royal Houses of Israel and Judah

While Judah became a more or less integral part of Israel under David, it kept its own identity, so that Solomon had in effect worn a double crown. Soon after his death (ca. 925), representatives of the Israelite tribes convened again, this time at Shechem in the heartland of the original league, to reconsider and nullify their oath of allegiance to the house of David. Instead of Rehoboam, Solomon’s defiant heir, they elected to royal office one of their own, Jeroboam, an Ephraimite. The rupture between the kingdoms proved to be permanent, and the torn fabric of a united Israel, Yahweh’s people, was almost irreparable.

Jeroboam reestablished under royal auspices the Israelite sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan, where the old Yahwistic iconography of the bull replaced the cherubim of Solomon’s Temple. Provincialization of the national religion may have served Jeroboam’s immediate purposes but it seems also to have contributed to the continuing instability of the northern state. Under Omri, Ahab, and their two dynastic successors, Israel did become a major power in Syro-Palestine and Samaria became a cosmopolitan center rivaling Solomon’s Jerusalem. But the biblical record describes this as an era of growing apostasy from Yahwism and its traditional values.

National resurgence of Assyria in the mid-ninth century B.C., under Shalmaneser III (858–824), and the waxing and waning of its imperial power throughout the following two centuries dramatically affected the political fortunes of Israel and other Syro-Palestinian states. Under the rule of Tiglath-pileser III (745–727) Assyria’s empire expanded to include virtually all Syro-Palestine as well as Mesopotamia and eastern Anatolia. Israel’s rapid decline during this period was punctuated by a series of coups and futile efforts, in alliance with other states, first to resist and then to rebel against Assyrian sovereignty. When the last Israelite ruler, Hoshea, began to reign in 732, his reduced kingdom consisted only of Samaria and its immediate environs. Yet he took Tiglath-pileser’s death as occasion for another rebellion. The brutal response came a few years later, in 722–720, when the forces of Shalmaneser V (727–722) and his successor, Sargon II (722–705), besieged and destroyed Samaria, deported its surviving population, and moved in settlers from other parts of the Assyrian Empire.

Later History of the Judean Monarchy

During Ahaz’s reign, Judah too became an Assyrian vassal (ca. 730 B.C.), but refrained from joining in the rebellions that brought Israel’s downfall. However the next Davidic dynast, Hezekiah, was a zealous nationalist who systematically prepared for revolt. In addition to conspiring with other states, Hezekiah welcomed refugee settlers from the northern tribes into Judah; he encouraged them to identify with his realm by instigating major religious and political reforms aimed at restoring preeminence to Jerusalem's Temple as the center of an all-Israelite Yahwism. Consistent with this, he seems to have reorganized the Yahwistic clergy on the model of David's levitical priesthood. Jerusalem's own defenses were extended and strengthened. When Sargon died and Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) acceded to the Assyrian throne, revolts flared up throughout the empire; Hezekiah began his with an assault on Philistine coastal cities whose rulers remained loyal to Assyria. Sennacherib retaliated in 701, securing the Phoenician coast and easily defeating Hezekiah's Philistine allies; Assyrian troops laid siege to Judean fortresses. Hezekiah capitulated, but Jerusalem itself was spared when Sennacherib's forces withdrew.

Assyria remained strong through the reigns of Esarhaddon (680–669 B.C.) and Ashurbanipal (668–627 B.C.), but the empire declined rapidly thereafter. The capital city of Ashur was taken by the Medes in 614, and they, together with the Babylonians, conquered Nineveh and other Assyrian strongholds two years later.

In the first half of the seventh century B.C. Hezekiah's successors, Manasseh and Amon, reintroduced non-Yahwistic cults and practices into Judah. Amon was assassinated (640), and Judean forces secured the throne for his son, Josiah, who was only eight at the time. In the years following Ashurbanipal's death, when Assyria lost hold on its empire, Josiah seems to have made a bold bid to restore Davidic rule over territories of the former United Kingdom of Israel and Judah. Like Hezekiah a century before him, he purged Jerusalem and Judah of alien cults, and restricted sacrificial worship of Yahweh to Zion's Temple. But he also desecrated the altar of Bethel to the north of greater Judah and destroyed shrines throughout the Assyrian province of Samaria. The most celebrated events occurred in the eighteenth year of his reign (622 B.C.) when a document called "the book of the law [Heb. torah]" (2 Kings 22:8), or "the book of the covenant [Heb. berit]" (2 Kings 23:2) was recovered from the Temple archives. Convinced of the document's constitutional import, Josiah read it aloud before a plenary assembly of Judah's citizens, and he and they together entered into covenant with Yahweh to observe faithfully all of its stipulations. But if Josiah aspired to restore the Davidic kingdoms, it was not to be. In 609 B.C. he was slain in battle, attempting to halt at the pass of Megiddo a contingent of Egyptian troops, commanded by Pharaoh Neco II, which was marching north in a futile attempt to save the remnants of Assyria's army from final destruction at Haran.

Josiah's son, Jehoahaz (Shallum), reigned for only three months. He was deposed by Pharaoh Neco, who enthroned Jehoahaz's older brother, Jehoiakim (Eliakim), as an Egyptian vassal. But Egypt's renewed claims on Syro-Palestine collapsed after Neco's forces were defeated by Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar, at Carchemish in 605 B.C. Jehoiakim became vassal to Babylon, only to rebel several years later. It was his newly enthroned son, Jehoiachin (Jeconiah/Coniah), who suffered the consequences. In 598, Nebuchadnezzar's army took Jerusalem and looted its coffers; Jehoiachin, along with many of Jerusalem's elite, was deported to Babylon where he spent the rest of his life in exile. His uncle, Zedekiah (Mattaniah), was appointed to remain in Jerusalem as surrogate vassal-ruler. In league with Egypt, he too rebelled. Nebuchadnezzar's army returned and after a prolonged siege conquered the city in 587–586, reducing it, including the despoiled Solomonic Temple, to rubble. Leading priests, other officials, and Zedekiah's own sons were executed; Zedekiah was blinded, then led into exile together with other survivors. Although decimated, Judah was not depopulated. North of the ruined capital, the Babylonians established a provincial garrison, Mizpah, which served as a residence for Gedaliah, a member of a prominent family of Judean scribes, who was appointed to remain as governor. His overtures to Judah's remnant population, to lay down arms and begin rebuilding a stable society under Babylonian auspices, had some success, until he was assassinated by a band of die-hard rebels. Fearing Babylonian retaliation, some remaining Judeans fled to Egypt, taking the prophet Jeremiah with them.

Prophecy and Kingship

Most of the phenomena typical of Israelite prophetism are now closely paralleled in literary sources from other ancient Near Eastern cultures. Under various titles, prophets functioned as spiritually sensitive channels through whom gods could convey visions and oracles to human audiences. Not surprisingly, kings figure most prominently among those to whom such divine communications are addressed in extant sources (e.g., letters from Mari, an ancient city of the upper Euphrates River area). In biblical traditions, the correlation between prophetism and monarchy is particularly close.

Opposite: Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III and his attendants; detail of a mural from the palace at Til Barsib, eighth century B.C..

Israelite prophecy thus acquired a special institutional significance: prophets were seen as having central responsibility in defining the intersection between divine and human politics. They were more than inspired advisers to kings, because they were empowered to speak and act on behalf of Yahweh, Israel's preeminent sovereign.

This institutional understanding of prophecy seems to have developed especially in the Northern Kingdom during the ninth century B.C. The review of Omride rule and its demise gives unusual prominence to prophetic figures (1 Kings 16–2 Kings 10). Moreover, there are thematic links between this material and so-called Elohistic (E) narrative segments embedded in the Pentateuch. The old national epic drafted by Solomon's scribes (represented in the Pentateuch by the "J" narrative) may have been reworked and expanded in the court of Jehu to justify the consolidation of his reign as a return to pristine covenantal Yahwism.

A century later, a new flowering of Israelite prophetism occurred. Spoken words of at least some prophets were committed to writing, the better to preserve their testimony to God's involvement in affairs of the world. Around these early collections of prophetic traditions grew the canonical books of the Latter Prophets (Isaiah to Malachi).

Literary witnesses to eighth-century B.C. prophecy exhibit many similarities of genre and message but also significant differences in perspective, theological theme, and emotional tone. In the preserved visions and speeches of Amos, a Judean who addressed the elite of the Northern Kingdom during the heyday of Jeroboam II's reign (ca. 750 B.C.), it is outrage at Israel's perversion of social justice, abuse of prosperity, and religious hypocrisy that predominates. Hosea, a northerner, seems to have prophesied during the era of frantic royal politics that preceded the nation's total collapse. His message, like Amos's, knows the certainty of divine judgment, but the depth of God's compassion means that there is always prospect of restoration beyond punishment. Materials in the anthological books of Isaiah and Micah that can be assigned to the late eighth century B.C. portray Yahweh, the divine warrior of old, as majestically enthroned above the fray of human history and yet acting diligently as judge to guide its course toward fulfillment of a master plan that includes vindication of Zion and the Davidic dynasty.

The Covenantal Legacy of Israel

Israelites who found refuge in Judah after the destruction of Samaria brought a rich legacy with them: their version of the national epic; traditions of prophecy, hymnody, and wisdom; and, above all, their memory that long before divine election of Zion a pact had been made in the wilderness between Yahweh and Hebrew refugees from Egyptian oppression. If the ethos of the Israelite league had faded in monarchial Judah, Hezekiah's policies were midwife to its rebirth. His reforms enabled Jerusalem to nurture visions of Mount Horeb as well as Zion, to celebrate Moses, model liberator and lawgiver, as well as David, archetypal builder of Yahweh's empire among the nations.

The most enduring achievement of Hezekiah's reign is probably the "Torah of Moses" preserved in the book of Deuteronomy (chaps. 4–28); its earliest form may have been drafted by levitical officials of Hezekiah's reorganized clergy, which included priests of Mosaic lineage (cf. Deut. 10:8–9; 18:1–8; 33:4–5, 8–11). An edition of the national epic may have been written in Hezekiah's court, not only updating the old Solomonic version but enlarging it with traditions brought from the north. That Hezekiah's scribes endeavored to preserve a literary heritage of wisdom is indicated by Prov. 25:1; perhaps the archaic poetical drama of Job (whose familiar themes are as pertinent to the crises of the later eighth century B.C. as to those of the early sixth) is the work of this same circle.

The revitalization of Israelite nationalism and Yahwistic religion initiated under Hezekiah seems to have suffered a serious setback during the reigns of his successors, until the era of the Josian reforms at the end of the seventh century B.C. At this time, apparently, the Deuteronomic Torah was brought out of the Temple archives and made the law of the land. Josiah's scribes were probably responsible for the penultimate form of the outer framework of Deuteronomy (chaps. 1–3, 29–34), which served as an introduction to their edition of the following books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. This "Deuteronomic" (or "early Deuteronomistic") version of the national epic thus traced the history of the covenant people, "all Israel," from the time of its formation under Moses' leadership in the wilderness through its ostensible reconstitution under Josiah, when the Mosaic law once again became the polity of the nation (cf. 2 Kings 23:24–25). Obviously, there was still a final chapter of monarchial history to be tragically lived and then written in exile.

Literary reflections of the Josian period and its aftermath can also be discerned elsewhere in Scripture. The oldest stratum of the so-called Priestly pentateuchal laws—specifically the Holiness Code represented mainly in Leviticus 17–26—appears to be the work of Josiah's Aaronitic clergy, drafted in part as a corrective to the levitical program promulgated in the Deuteronomic Torah. The Yahwistic nationalism generated by Josiah's religious reforms and political policies is attested in the books of Zephaniah and Nahum, the latter celebrating Nineveh's fall in 612 B.C. The somber dialogue of Habakkuk reflects a slightly later period, after Josiah's death and about the time of the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). However, the fullest witnesses to the final decades of the kingdom of Judah and the beginning of the Exile are found in the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

Jeremiah belonged to a family of levitical priests that traced its lineage back through the old Shiloh clergy to Moses; his prophecy consistently reflects this ancestral heritage as it was most forcefully expressed in the traditions of Deuteronomic covenantal Yahwism. In Jeremiah's view, the demise of the Judean state, like that of monarchical Israel before it, was the inevitable result of God's people having wantonly violated the covenant obligations upon which their corporate existence depended. Ezekiel, on the other hand, was a priest of Zadokite lineage who was taken into exile with the deportation of 597 B.C. While influence of Deuteronomic covenantal themes and language can be discerned in the work ascribed to him, his theological perspective, with its reciprocal emphases on divine glory and ritual purity, indicates closest affiliation with the Priestly circle responsible for the Holiness Code.

The greatest achievement of Judean prophecy was to envision a future beyond judgment, sustaining the faithful, whether they lived in distant exile or in sight of the Temple's ruins; but for the while, the appropriate liturgical response to disaster was mourning and prayerful petition (Lamentations; Pss. 44, 74, 79, 137; 1 Kings 8:22-53).

THE AGE OF RESTORATION (538-432 B.C.)

Throughout the six centuries of Israelite and Judean history preceding the Exile, the entire eastern Mediterranean world had been a seething cauldron of political violence. A degree of international calm, especially in Syro-Palestine, was effected by the more tolerant policies of early Achaemenid rulers. The scattered remnants of "Israel" not only benefited from these policies in the short term but brought them to eloquent intellectual expression, at once preserving their own spiritual heritage while making a lasting contribution to human civilization.

Reconstruction and Reform

After his spectacular victories in Asia Minor Cyrus "the Great" of Persia defeated the forces of Babylon in 539 B.C. and established hegemony over its exhausted empire. He cultivated an image of himself as divinely chosen liberator of captive peoples and restorer of the sanctuaries of their gods. In accord with this program (outlined in the text of the "Cyrus Cylinder") he issued an edict in 538, claiming that "Yahweh, God of Heaven" had granted him sovereignty over all the world's kingdoms and had charged him to rebuild the Jerusalem Temple. Judeans were urged to return to their homeland and carry out the mandate (Ezra 1:2-4; cf. 6:3-5; 2 Chron. 36:22-23). Sheshbazzar (Shenazzar), a member of the Judean royal family, was appointed to serve as Jerusalem's governor. He and those who returned with him may have laid foundations for a new Temple (Ezra 1:7-11; 5:13-16; cf. 1 Chron. 3:18).

Early in the reign of Darius (522-486 B.C.) another group of Judeans reached Jerusalem and, despite some initial interference from officials of the Syrian satrapy, secured a renewal of Cyrus's mandate; construction of the Temple was resumed in 520 and completed in 515 (Ezra 5-6).

The biblical account of this era and the rest of the Persian period is laconic, focusing narrowly on the restoration of the Temple cultus and emphasizing that every stage of the work had the active support of the Persian crown. Major attention is given to the efforts of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The date of Ezra's journey from Babylon to Jerusalem, leading back another party of exiles, is disputed, but an earlier setting in the reign of Xerxes I (486-464 B.C.) or Artaxerxes I (464-423 B.C.) is preferable, if only because the authority granted to Ezra in matters pertaining to both Persian and traditional Mosaic law (Ezra 7:11-26) is most easily understood to be a direct outgrowth of policies initiated by Darius. Ezra, the "scribe," seems to have been a prominent legal scholar within the continuing Judean community of Babylonia, who served as adviser to the Persian crown on matters affecting especially the Jerusalem Temple. Thus he was not simply leader of yet another phase of the return but was sent to Jerusalem as a royal ambassador, empowered to finish the work of reconstituting the Temple cult in accord with ancient Yahwistic tradition and to establish judicial procedures relevant to the Temple's status as an imperial institution (Ezra 7:21-26; cf. 6:8-10).

Jerusalem's consolidation as a Persian provincial center is credited to Nehemiah. While serving as "cupbearer" to Artaxerxes I in Susa (Neh. 1:11) he solicited and received from the king a term appointment as "governor" (Neh. 5:14) in order to rebuild Jerusalem's fortifications. Once the city wall had been repaired (ca. 445 B.C.), Nehemiah used the rest of his initial term as governor and a second some years later to implement important economic, political, and religious reforms; these measures were consistent with Persian imperial interests but they also enforced provisions of the polity that Ezra had previously established.

Israelite Theology in the Setting of Exile

The Deuteronomistic History in its completed form is an early exilic attempt (ca. 560 B.C.) to take stock of what had happened to all Israel and why. The final segment of the work (2 Kings 23:26–25:30) narrates the rapid decline and fall of monarchical Judah, ending with notice of King Jehoichin's release from Babylonian prison. Conspicuous is the segment's introductory claim that Manasseh's gross acts of apostasy had sealed Judah's fate (2 Kings 23:26–27; cf. 21:10–15). Other exilic supplements to the work spread blame for national disaster more widely, declaring the whole people culpable for breach of covenant (e.g., Deut. 28:64–68; 29:20–28; Josh. 23:11–16). But if painful awareness of retributive justice is the dominant theme of such passages, a deeper perception of divine providence is adumbrated in the theological discourse of Deut. 4:1–40. Here dispersal of Israel from the land is just recompense but emphatically not the end of the covenant relationship, for Yahweh is not only "divine retributor" but the "compassionate deity" who never abrogates promises made in the past (Deut. 4:24, 31). Moreover, the degradation of exile among the nations becomes occasion for Israel to discover new profundity in its own unique historical experience: Yahweh, the God who created Israel in unparalleled fashion, who gave it the wisdom of Torah through Moses, and who remains forever with it in victory and defeat, is the sole sovereign of the cosmos (Deut. 4:5–8, 32–40).

This insight came to even more eloquent expression in the growth of Isaian tradition that critics designate "Second Isaiah" (Isa. 40–55), a work composed at the time of Cyrus's edict of 538 B.C. The poet envisioned a courtroom drama of cosmic scope, involving a plenary assembly of the world's nations, in which Yahweh is at once presiding judge and defendant. While the case focuses on Israel's experiences, and above all the ruin of Zion (cf. Isa. 34:8; 40:2; 49:14–26; 51:17–23; 52:1–10), the crucial issue is whether universal sovereignty is exercised by Yahweh or the putative gods of nations that have prevailed over the covenant people. The trial unveils wondrous things about which Israel is called to give witness (40:27–31; 43:8–13; cf. 2:1–5); Yahweh alone is God, creator and lord of history, whose justice is manifest in Zion's humiliation and imminent restoration; Cyrus is God's anointed and through his conquests the rule of Yahweh is being extended to the nations; and, most astonishing of all, the destiny of the covenant people—God's chosen "servant," personified also as Zion, trampled down and despised by the nations—is to become a prophetic light to the nations, instructing them in the ways of true justice revealed through Torah (42:1–9, 18–25; 51:4–8).

The grand vision of Second Isaiah foresaw a glorious future for those who immigrated with Sheshbazzar to Jerusalem, but it offered little guidance on what to do once they got there. The first generations of the return had to deal with formidable obstacles, not the least of which were created by divergent views among them regarding who was to comprise the new Israel, how it was to be governed, and what it should strive to become. Largely in consideration of such issues, the later works included in the Hebrew Bible were written and the Scriptural canon itself began to take shape.

Prophetic Vision and Mosaic Constitution

Biblical sources agree that the crux of the restoration was the reestablishment of Jerusalem as cultic center of Yahwism. At the same time, prophetic texts dating to the early Persian period show that some within the restoration community had considerably broader goals in view. The final chapters of the Isaian anthology (Isa. 56–66), often designated "Third Isaiah," understand the promised exaltation of Zion to include a full ingathering of the Israelite Diaspora (Isa. 60:4; 65:1–12; 66:18–21) and even incorporation of gentile converts into the community of the new Israel (Isa. 56:3–8). Obadiah, Joel, Ezekiel 38–39, and Zechariah 9–14 exhibit a more militant stance toward the nations, envisioning Yahweh's imminent kingdom to involve a revival of Israelite nationalism. These differences of perspective bear upon the final stages in the literary formation of biblical Torah, "Law."

In addition to contents of the Pentateuch, there is another corpus in the Hebrew Bible identified as Torah, specifically the "Torah of the Temple" (Ezek. 43:12) preserved within the elaborate vision report of Ezekiel 40–48. The entire report, dated to the year 573 B.C. but certainly supplemented during the initial phase of the Persian period, lays out under the prophetic authority of Ezekiel a restoration program that is both grandly idealistic and decidedly more concrete than the vision of Second Isaiah.

It includes a revelational blueprint—with specific measurements and description of materials and decor—for rebuilding the Temple complex. Various factors suggest that this text was the charter under which the Jerusalem Temple was reconstructed as an imperial shrine in the first years of the reign of Darius I. At least the initial phase of the work was completed under the direction of Zerubbabel and Jeshua, leader of the Zadokite clergy, and with the prophetic support of Haggai and Zechariah.

However, the Torah ascribed to Ezekiel did not long remain the official polity of the Judean community. The prophecy of Malachi, probably dating to the early fifth century B.C., provides insight into why and with what it was replaced. Zadokite exclusivism is attacked as a perversion of God's "covenant" with all the families of Levi (Mal. 2:1–9), while the community as a whole is indicted for abandoning its ancient covenantal commitments as set forth in the Torah of Moses (Mal. 3:1–12; cf. 4:4). The issue was definitively resolved some years later, when Ezra reached Jerusalem with a royal commission to establish and implement "the Law [Aramaic data'] of the God of Heaven" (Ezra 7:11–26).

Although critics continue to debate the matter, in all likelihood the Pentateuch in its completed form preserves the literary traditions of divine "Law" or Torah that Ezra brought with him to Jerusalem. His reforms and those of Nehemiah somewhat later presuppose juridical interpretations of a constitutional document that included the Mosaic Torah of Deuteronomy but also ritual ordinances preserved in the "Priestly" (P) edition of Genesis through Numbers. The latter is a remarkable work of theological history writing, apparently crafted by Judean clergy in Babylonia, which restructured and extensively supplemented the initial segments of the Israelite national epic of late monarchial times. "P" preserves older traditions of covenantal law (esp. the Decalogue, the Book of the Covenant, and the Holiness Code), but emphasis is placed on revelation of the design of a portable sanctuary, the "tabernacle" (Heb. mishkan), along with its attendant institutions and rites. When, under the close supervision of Moses and Aaron, Israel carries out the divine instructions, it is transformed from a tribal assembly into an articulated cultic community, a human temple as it were, both serving and sustained by the sovereign God who tabernacles in its midst.

The Pentateuch is thus a sacral archive designed to include both the Deuteronomic corpus of Mosaic law and the "Priestly" history of Israel's formation as the unique people of God. What provides coherence to this archive is less a matter of its broad narrative integrity than of the claim that it preserves authoritative record of Moses' work. In short, neither the visionary program of Ezekiel 40–48 nor any other prophetic testimony could replace or supersede what God had revealed to Israel through Moses (cf. Deut. 34:10–12).

ISRAEL AMONG THE NATIONS

Ezra and Nehemiah successfully reformed the Judean community around Temple worship and Mosaic Torah. If alternative visions of Israel's destiny were left unresolved, they had been relativized.

The Judean Commonwealth During the Later Persian and Early Hellenistic Periods (432–164 B.C.)

Governors who followed Nehemiah seem to have kept the province of Judah relatively prosperous and secure, even though Achaemenid rule grew increasingly weaker through the first half of the fourth century B.C. When the Macedonian forces of Alexander III shattered the Persian Empire altogether in 334–332 B.C., Jerusalem neither gave resistance to the conquerors nor, apparently, experienced any immediate change in circumstances.

After Alexander's death in 323 B.C., control of the Near Eastern territories he had conquered passed to two of his generals. Seleucus ruled Babylonia and most of Syria, while Ptolemy claimed Egypt, building Alexandria as his capital. Jerusalem's position as cultic and judicial center of Judea seems largely to have been unaffected by Ptolemaic policies.

A second and politically tumultuous phase of the Hellenistic period began for Judea when the Seleucids gained control over the whole of Syro-Palestine at the beginning of the second century B.C. Although Antiochus III (223–187 B.C.) was magnanimous in victory, recognizing Jerusalem's autonomy in religious affairs, the kingdom inherited by his successor, Seleucus IV (187–175 B.C.), was in financial disarray and threatened externally on every major front. International events had once again conspired to put Palestine at the center of a world locked in conflict.

After Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.) ascended to the Seleucid throne, Judea experienced a series of convulsions that provoked anew questions of "Israel's" true identity and its destiny among the nations. Antiochus took an interventionist stance toward Judean affairs, perhaps above all because he coveted the Temple's pecuniary resources but also, in the interest of unifying his realm, to support those among the Judean aristocracy who wanted isolated, conservative Jerusalem to catch up with the Hellenistic cultural revolution that had already engulfed other urban centers of Syro-Palestine. Antiochus resorted to force when Judean society, already polarized into Hellenist and traditionalist parties, was torn apart by strife over the high-priestly office. Seleucid troops brutally enforced a decree banning traditional practices of Yahwism. The Temple became a shrine of the realm, where divine Antiochus was venerated alongside the imperial deity, Zeus Olympios, whose altar was raised in the forecourt.

When the zealots of Hellenistic nationalism controlling Jerusalem tried to uproot Yahwism from the Judean countryside and to enforce observance of the imperial cult, they soon met vigorous resistance. Insurgent groups of varying political and religious persuasions coalesced under the leadership of the Hasmonean priestly family of Mattathias and his five sons, the third of whom—Judah, called the “hammer” (Maccabeus)—proved to be a brilliant guerrilla strategist. The Hasmonean army reclaimed most of Jerusalem itself in 164 B.C. The Temple precincts were purged of pagan accoutrements, repairs were made, and a loyal priesthood was restored to office; the sacrificial altar in the forecourt was rebuilt according to provisions of the Mosaic Torah and consecrated to Yahweh alone (1 Macc. 4:36–58). While this era of violent political strife had not yet completed its course, the flames rekindled on the altar and in the lamps of the Temple became a new memorial to the ancient concept of Israel as the liberated people of God. (This period overlaps with the period in which books of the Apocrypha took shape, and its story is continued and told in more detail in another article; see “Biblical Literature in Its Historical Context: The Apocrypha and the New Testament.”)

Torah and Prophets

Although modern scholars have generally viewed the Exile as the major turning point in ancient Israel's religious and political history, the canonical sources—or, if one prefers, those who designed the canon of the Hebrew Bible—identify the era of Ezra and Nehemiah as decisive, because it was then that a normative social order, supported by an expansive synthesis of Yahwistic traditions, was achieved. The crux of this synthesis is, of course, the pentateuchal Torah of Moses, understood to be the sufficient though not exclusive revelation of God's sovereign design of the cosmos, with the sanctuary people, Israel, forming its human center in the midst of the nations.

Mosaic Torah undergirded the role of Temple worship and clergy in mediating divine blessing to all humanity (Num. 6:22–27; cf. Gen. 1:28; 12:1–3; 22:15–19), but its import for Israel's religious thought was by no means limited to sacerdotal concerns. At the broadest social level, affecting Diaspora Judaism as well as the Temple community, provisions of the Torah encouraged a piety fully embracing both love of God and love of neighbor. To live in accord with the mandate of Torah involved study, prayer, and communal worship but also diligent observance of covenantal demands to pursue public well-being, justice, and human rights.

In large extent, the synthesis that formed around commitment to the preeminent revelation of Torah was able to absorb Yahwistic prophetism and its varied literary traditions. This occurred conceptually in a twofold development based on the pentateuchal claim that Moses had been Israel's “prophet” par excellence (Deut. 34:10–12); his promulgation of Torah became the measure of truth by which all subsequent prophetic revelations were to be assessed and interpreted (cf. Num. 12:1–8; Deut. 18:15–22; 30:11–14); and prophecy itself was broadened to include gifts of the spirit, especially “inspired” leadership, in the model and legitimate succession of Moses (cf. Num. 11:16–29; Deut. 34:9; Sir. 44:1–3; 46:1). The Deuteronomistic History of Israel from conquest to exile came to be included in the canonical division “Prophets” because it witnessed both to activities of Moses' prophetic successors (e.g., 1 Sam. 3:19–20; 1 Kings 11:29–39; 2 Kings 17:13) and, above all, to the perduring prophetic authority of Mosaic Torah itself in the life of Israel (e.g., Josh. 1:2–8; 1 Kings 2:1–4; 2 Kings 23:24–25; cf. Deut. 31:28–32:47; Ezra 9:10–15). Similarly, works included in the literary corpus of Isaiah through Malachi supplement and extend the record of authentic Israelite prophecy through the restoration period; but they were also read and interpreted as testimony that Torah disclosed the trustworthy plan of God's continuing rule over Israel and, in the fullness of time, all the world's nations (e.g., Isa. 2:3; 51:7; Jer. 31:33; Mal. 4:1–6; cf. Jonah).

The Writings

As the name itself indicates, the canonical division “Writings” (Heb. ketubim) is a miscellany of Israelite literature. Individual works in this collection differ widely in literary genre, content, and provenance. Although most of them were composed before or during the restoration era, some—notably Esther and Ecclesiastes—probably belong to the end of the fourth century B.C. or the beginning of the third; the book of Daniel in its completed form is even later, dating to the time of Antiochus' assault on traditional Yahwism (ca. 165 B.C.). Yet the diversity of the Writings exemplifies the scope of the late restoration synthesis.

A comprehensive historiographical presentation of the synthesis is found in the work of the so-called Chronicler, which at least in its composite edition dates to the end of the fifth century B.C. and comprises the books of 1 and 2 Chronicles together with their narrative sequel in Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. also 1 Esdras). Drawing extensively on the Deuteronomistic narrative, the central part of the work selectively reviews monarchical history, stressing that through the inspired efforts of David and the continued patronage of his loyal dynastic successors the people "Israel" was institutionally formed around the Jerusalem Temple worship (cf. esp. 1 Chron. 16–17; 22–29; 2 Chron. 2–7; 30–35); yet Israel's sacral constitution, fidelity to which was the sine qua non of its existence, remained the Torah mediated through Moses and reaffirmed by subsequent prophetic messengers (e.g., 1 Chron. 22:12–13; 2 Chron. 8:12–13; 36:15–16). The account of the restoration itself in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah completes the work, confirming the centrality of both Temple worship and pentateuchal Torah in Israel's corporate life while committing Israel's future among the nations to the intricacies of divine providence.

The hymnic compositions preserved in the canonical book of Psalms, most of which derive from pre-exilic times, provide ample witness to the continuity of liturgical tradition between the communities that worshiped at the First and Second Temples (cf. Ps. 126). However, some of the postexilic additions to the corpus (esp. Pss. 1; 19; 37; 111–12; 119) are particularly noteworthy because they attest the full development of a piety centered on Torah.

Integration of Israel's sapiential lore with other Yahwistic traditions was a natural development, which had begun during monarchical times if not before. But a more inclusive agenda for the pursuit of wisdom emerged in the Persian period and accounts in large measure for the continuing intellectual creativity of postexilic Judaism, especially in its confrontation with Hellenistic culture. The most compelling factor in setting this agenda was the conviction that Mosaic Torah, complemented by subsequent prophetic revelations, not only laid out the peculiar covenantal norms of Israelite life but disclosed the perennial scheme of divine rule over all space and time. If Yahweh alone was sovereign "God of Heaven," as restoration theology insisted, then all genuine knowledge—whether imparted through Scripture or gleaned from observation of historical process, the phenomenal universe, and the manifold data of human experience—should ultimately coalesce into a unitary theological design (cf.

Sir. 1:1–20; 24; 39; 43). Given the epistemological breadth of this agenda, it is possible to understand inclusion in the Writings not only of Proverbs and Job but also of such ostensibly "humanistic" works as Song of Songs and the didactic novellas of Ruth and Esther. However the books of Ecclesiastes and Daniel offer the most conspicuous canonical witnesses to the scope of sapiential thought in postexilic Judaism.

Ecclesiastes (Qohelet) contains the purported memoirs of an anonymous "sage." The memoirs stress the futility of every effort to secure on human terms a meaningful existence. Particularly in light of the narrator's epilogue (Eccles. 12:9–14), the book can more readily be interpreted as a response to the pretensions of Hellenistic rationalism than as a critique of traditional Yahwism. Reverence for God through observance of Torah's stipulations remains the supreme human wisdom (cf. esp. Eccles. 3:12–14; 8:12–13; 12:13–14).

Throughout the narratives and vision reports that comprise the book of Daniel, the chief protagonist is a sage whose life and learning variously model the inspiration attributed to Israel's former prophets and kings (cf. 2 Sam. 23:1–7; 1 Kings 3:5–14; Sir. 24:33–34). The core of the narratives (Dan. 1–6) validate trust in Yahweh's universal sovereignty and providence: through fidelity to the demands of Torah and diligent exercise of God-given wisdom, the faithful may not only withstand the pressures of an alien cultural environment but triumph over them (e.g., Dan. 1:17–20; 2:20–23, 47–49; 6:25–28; cf. Deut. 4:2–8). In their received form, the narratives anticipate the vision reports (Dan. 7–12; cf. 2:36–45), which reflect the era of Antiochene persecutions. The message to the faithful remains essentially the same in the visions, even though it is more urgent here and appears in the elaborate guise of mythological symbolism and "apocalyptic" scenario.

When one recalls Pharaoh Merneptah's claim to have obliterated "Israel" and the celebration of Yahweh's kingship in Exodus 15, there is a remarkable symmetry between the beginning of ancient Israel's history and the latest witness to divine providence preserved in the literature of the Hebrew Bible.

Bibliography

Ben-Sasson, H. H., ed. A History of the Jewish People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976.

Blenkinsopp, J. A History of Prophecy in Israel. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983.

Bright, J. A History of Israel. 3d ed. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1981.

Cross, F. M. Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973.

Hanson, P. D. The People Called: The Growth of Community in the Bible. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986.

Hayes, J. H., and J. M. Miller, eds. Israelite and Judaeon History. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977.

Knight, D. A., and G. M. Tucker, eds. The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985.

BIBLICAL LITERATURE IN ITS HISTORICAL CONTEXT: THE APOCRYPHA AND THE NEW TESTAMENT

---

ELDON J. EPP

Biblical literature, like other literature, cannot be fully understood apart from its historical and cultural context. Each of the writings that became part of the Apocrypha and the NT originated within a set of real-life circumstances. For some writings these can be rather easily discovered and described with considerable specificity, while the situation out of which other writings emerged may never be clearly known. To the extent possible, specific circumstances must be sought for each separate writing, but this general introduction seeks mainly to sketch the broad historical context in which and out of which the large body of apocryphal and NT writings arose.

Traditionally, many Christians of past generations—and ultra-conservative Christians even today—have been taught that there were “four hundred silent years” between the OT and the NT, an assertion made on the incorrect assumption that the latest book of the OT was written around 400 B.C., that the earliest NT books were written when Christianity originated, and that the Jewish people produced no literature in the intervening period while, presumably, they passively awaited the expected Messiah. Such a perception, of course, is completely wrong, for neither were there four hundred years between the OT and NT (rather, about two hundred years), nor were they by any means silent or passive years. Indeed, it was during these two centuries prior to Christianity, as well as the one or two centuries following, that both the apocryphal and related writings and the NT books themselves were produced.

The term “Apocrypha” refers to about fifteen books or parts of books that were not included in the Hebrew canon but, with an exception or two, were contained in the Greek OT. Another group of related works, known as the Pseudepigrapha, comprises some sixty-five writings by Jews and Christians, though probably none of them was part of a Jewish or Christian canon of Scripture (→ Apocrypha, Old Testament; Pseudepigrapha).

What was the historical, cultural, and social climate that produced this vast quantity and wide variety of religious works? A consideration of the various periods of Jewish history will provide a convenient framework for discovering the answer.

---

THE BABYLONIAN (587–539 B.C.) AND PERSIAN (539–333 B.C.) PERIODS

---

Following Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and the Exile of the Jewish people that accompanied it, the Jews were open to foreign influences as never before. These extraneous influences continued in the Persian period, which began when Cyrus II conquered the Babylonians in 539 B.C. His lenient policies toward conquered peoples permitted the Jews—within limits—to develop their own life, culture, and religion, including the rebuilding of the Temple between 520 and 515 B.C. in the reign of Darius I. Persian rule, of course, permitted the migration of Jewish exiles from Babylonia where, in the absence of the Temple, the study and authority of Torah had assumed the central place in the Jewish religion.

Although none of the apocryphal or pseudepigraphical books was written during these periods, many claim to be written then or find their setting in these times. For example, the Letter of Jeremiah was probably written in the fourth century B.C.; 1 Esdras; Baruch; Tobit; Song of the Three Youths; Susanna; and Bel and the Dragon (three additions to Daniel); Judith; and The Additions to Esther are all works written actually in the second century B.C. or thereabouts. Others, notably the apocalyptic writings, contain ideas or motifs that influenced the Jews during their exile in Babylonia or Persia, for example, the procedure of periodizing history that is found in much apocalyptic literature. 2 Esdras (= 4 Ezra) is such an apocalyptic work, completed about A.D. 200.

THE HELLENISTIC PERIOD (333–63 B.C.)

Alexander and His Successors

Alexander the Great became king of Macedon and leader of the Hellenic League of Greek states upon the assassination of his father, Philip II, in 336 B.C. He adopted his father's determination to master the Persian Empire and to spread Greek culture throughout the known world. Only ten years were required to achieve this incomparable goal, including Alexander's defeat of Darius III at Issus in 333, his liberation of Egypt in 332 and the building of the city of Alexandria, and his march north through Syro-Palestine and then eastward to Babylon and to the Persian capital, Susa, and finally to India. Alexander died in Babylon in 323 at the age of thirty-three. Perhaps no one before or after so significantly changed the course of world history, for Alexander opened the East to Greek culture and brought into the "known world" a unity of Greek language and culture. The environment thus created (and carried forward by the Romans) was that in which both Judaism and Christianity were to thrive—in spite of the difficulties and persecutions that were to intervene periodically.

Alexander's early death, however, left the new empire without clearly delineated leadership, and forty years of struggles among his generals and other successors (the Diadochi) led finally in 281 B.C. to two dynasties: that of Egypt and Coele Syria (including Palestine) under Ptolemy and that of northern Syria, Babylon, and Asia Minor under Seleucus. A substantial period of peace prevailed in Palestine, until the Seleucid ruler Antiochus III defeated the Ptolemaic forces in 198 B.C. and took control of Coele Syria, bringing Palestine also under Seleucid rule. The dire effects of this change began to be obvious when Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) proclaimed himself king in 175 B.C. His eagerness to embrace and enhance hellenizing ways of life, including the athletics of the gymnasium and other urban and progressive Hellenistic cultural activities, created difficult choices and deep tensions in the Jewish community of Judea and Jerusalem. In fact, struggles over the high-priesthood in Jerusalem soon were based on pro-Greek versus orthodox Jewish views, and intrigue was the order of the day.

The hellenizing practices of Antiochus IV were not, at least in the beginning, intended to displace Torah as a way of life for pious Jews, but the increased mingling with Gentiles and the rising peer pressure heightened the intra-Jewish tensions. Then in 169 B.C. Antiochus IV committed hostile acts against the Jews, plundering the Temple, and in 167 he ordered a pagan altar to Zeus Olympios to be erected on the altar of sacrifice, thus defiling the Temple. This is the "abomination of desolation" referred to in Dan. 11:31; 12:11; 1 Macc. 1:54; and Mark 13:14. This desecration, along with Antiochus' proscription of the central features of Jewish religion (sacrifices, festivals, circumcision, and reading of Torah), instigated the Maccabean or Hasmonean revolt against the Hellenistic powers in 168 B.C. These events are described, with embellishments and sometimes in legendary form, in 1 and 2 Maccabees, and also in the writings of the first-century Jewish historian Josephus. 1 Maccabees attempts to defend the Hasmonean high-priestly dynasty by tracing its achievements in stopping the persecution, reinstating Torah, and winning for Israel a period of religious and political independence. Originally composed in Hebrew, it is preserved in Greek and was written between 104 and 63 B.C. 2 Maccabees emphasizes the hellenizing of Jerusalem, with vivid depictions of atrocities and heroism. It is a condensation of a five-volume work by an otherwise unknown Jason of Cyrene and was written in Greek after 110 B.C. The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) was written about 180 B.C. and depicts Jewish society just before the Maccabean revolt.

The Maccabean Revolt (168–142 B.C.)

Mattathias, a priest at Modein (seventeen miles northwest of Jerusalem), not only refused to comply with Syrian orders to offer improper sacrifice, but he killed a Jew about to do so, as well as a Syrian officer. Fleeing to the wilderness with his five sons and followers, Mattathias determined to secure religious freedom for Judea. They were joined for a time by the "Pious" (Hasidim), who opposed hellenization (and from whom the Pharisees seem to have sprung). Early in the movement, they made a wrenching decision to fight on the Sabbath, and when Mattathias died in 166 B.C., leadership fell to his third son, Judas (known as Judas Maccabeus, "the hammer"), who successfully fought the Seleucid forces and reclaimed and rededicated the Temple in 164 B.C. His successes were aided by the divisions and diversions of the Syrians, but the triumph of Judas was of extraordinary significance and is still celebrated among Jews on Hanukkah (→ Dedication, Feast of).

This achievement of religious liberty, however, was not sufficient for Judas, and the campaign soon became a nationalistic movement for political freedom as well. In 162 B.C. Demetrius I assumed Seleucid control and defeated the army of Judas at Elasa, near Jerusalem, in 160, where Judas was killed. Jonathan, Judas's younger brother, succeeded him as head of the Hasmonean house (160–143 B.C.), and was able to make peace with the Syrians for a five-year period (157–152), during which his influence increased. Rivalry between Demetrius I and a pretender, Alexander Balas, further enhanced Jonathan's position by the alternate courting of his favor. In the process, the Hellenizers in the Jewish community—against whom both Judas and Jonathan had fought—lost their Syrian support. Balas appointed Jonathan high priest in 152 B.C., and from that point until 63 B.C. religious, political, and military authority all rested in one person (the various successors) in the Hasmonean family. Soon Demetrius I met Balas in battle (150 B.C.) and was killed; in 145 B.C., however, Demetrius II (Nicator), Demetrius' son and successor, defeated Balas and assumed the Syrian throne. Intra-Seleucid power struggles found Jonathan supporting and being supported by Demetrius II and then by Tryphon, Demetrius' rival, one of Balas's generals. Jonathan, however, was finally betrayed and soon murdered by Tryphon in 143 B.C., and his brother Simon, the only surviving son of Mattathias, was chosen to head the Hasmoneans.

Political Independence for the Jewish Nation (142–63 B.C.)

Simon achieved what both Judas and Jonathan had sought: complete political independence from Syria. This was granted by Demetrius II in 142 B.C. and lasted—through troubled times—until 63 B.C. when the Romans took control. In 134, however, Simon and two of his sons were murdered by Ptolemy, Simon's ambitious son-in-law. His surviving son, John Hyrcanus, became high priest and ruled for thirty years. In 109 B.C. he became the first Jewish ruler to mint his own coins, which were inscribed, "John the High Priest and the Community of the Jews." Although their origins are obscure, at this time the Pharisees and Sadducees were well established and prominently mentioned. Hyrcanus sided with the Sadducees, apparently in face of Pharisaic criticism of Hasmoneans holding the high-priesthood. He died in 104 B.C.

Following an ignominious year of rule by his eldest son, Aristobulus I (104–103 B.C.), the latter's brother Alexander Jannaeus became high priest and also officially claimed the title of king. A ruthless warmonger, he enlarged an already extensive kingdom so that it equaled the ancient kingdoms of David and Solomon. His infamous atrocity—crucifying eight hundred opposing Pharisees and killing their families—is the first use by a Jewish ruler of this Roman form of execution, an event that seems to be recalled in the Qumran commentary on Nahum. Upon his death, his widow, Salome Alexandra, became queen (76–67 B.C.). Excluded by Torah—as a woman—from the high-priesthood, she appointed her elder son, Hyrcanus II, to that office. During her reign, the Pharisees gained substantial influence, and the Sadducees declined correspondingly.

Upon Alexandra's death in 67, Hyrcanus II briefly became king but was forced to relinquish power to his younger brother, Aristobulus II, who ruled from 67 to 63 B.C. After Pompey defeated Aristobulus and took Jerusalem in 63—and entered the Temple's Holy of Holies—he reinstated Hyrcanus as high priest, naming him "ethnarch" ("ruler of the people"). The title "king" was no longer used, and Hyrcanus, who reported directly to the Roman governor, now in actuality was merely a high priest over a religious community—and a rather small one, since it now included only Judea, Galilee, Idumea, and Perea. The rule of the Hasmonean house, therefore, came to an end, and once again the Jewish nation was under foreign domination.

The Psalms of Solomon, written about mid-first century B.C., obviously refer to the events of Pompey's conquest, lamenting the desecration of the Temple and looking forward to better times in a Messianic future.

---

ROMAN PERIOD (63 B.C.–A.D. 135)

---

Hyrcanus II continued as high priest and was reconfirmed in the position by Gabinus, governor of Syria, and again in 47 B.C. by Julius Caesar. Caesar also made Antipater procurator of Judea, and he, in turn, constituted his son Herod as governor of Galilee. After Antipater's assassination in 43 B.C., Herod was named governor of Coele Syria and then tetrarch of Galilee, while Antipater's other son, Phasaël, became tetrarch of southern Judea. They supported and were supported by Antony, who ruled the eastern part of the Roman territory. Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II, however, supported the Parthians, and—by their support in return—ruled as high priest and king of the Jews from 40 to 37 B.C. (issuing coins inscribed "King Antigonus" and "Mattathias the High Priest"). He assumed the high-priesthood after having Hyrcanus' ears cut off—since a mutilated person could not hold that office.

Thus, Antigonus and Herod alone remained as rivals. Herod cleverly allied himself with the Romans, and in 40 B.C. the Senate named him king of the Jews, though he had yet to claim his territory from the Parthians. With Roman help, he captured Jerusalem in 37 B.C. and then actually assumed his office. With the execution of Antigonus, the last power struggle of the Hasmoneans had been put down, and Herod ruled from 37 to 4 B.C.

Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.)

Under the emperor Octavian (Augustus), Rome was generally peaceful, and Herod enjoyed the benefits of this favorable situation. Civil war did break out between Octavian and Antony, which Octavian won at the Battle of Actium in 31 B.C., marking the beginning of the Roman Empire. Herod, a nominal Jew but culturally a Greek and politically a Roman, tried to please all his subjects, attempting to be a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Gentiles. He rebuilt and enlarged the Temple, though the power of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish high council, diminished under his rule. His attitude toward the Pharisees, however, was positive, but they were cautious toward Herod; even though he avoided offending Jewish religious scruples, pious Jews in general despised the calculating and ruthless king. These characteristics were more clearly seen when Herod provided for the succession of power by arranging the deaths of three of his sons and calling for the division of his kingdom into three parts, each headed by other sons: Archelaus over Judea, Samaria, and Idumea; Antipas over Galilee and Perea; Philip over the northern, Transjordanian regions. Augustus confirmed these arrangements, in spite of Jewish petitions to Rome to abolish Herodian rule. A year or two before Herod's reign ended, John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth were born.

The Herodians (4 B.C.–A.D. 39)

Archelaus, with the title ethnarch ("ruler of a nation," which suggested he was in line to be king), controlled Judea, Samaria, and Idumea only ten years—until A.D. 6—when he was exiled by Rome after a joint complaint to Augustus by his otherwise divided subjects, the Jews and Samaritans. His brief reign was marked by brutality and capriciousness, and he was succeeded by Roman governors.

Herod Antipas, as tetrarch ("ruler of a fourth"), controlled Galilee and Perea until 39. This was the home territory of John the Baptist and Jesus, and events involving Antipas' second wife, Herodias, and their daughter, Salome, as well as the death of John the Baptist, are narrated in the Gospels. Antipas was a builder, and the city of Tiberias was his proud creation. The first three decades of his rule were calm, but the last decade much less so, and power struggles led finally to his deposition in 39 by Gaius Caligula.

In contrast to his brothers, Philip, also named tetrarch, controlled his largely non-Jewish territory justly and efficiently until his death in 34. During his regime, the city of Caesarea Philippi was enlarged and modernized.

Philip left no heirs, and his kingdom was placed under the Roman province of Syria from 34 to 37. Then his brother-in-law Agrippa, a grandson of Herod, was named king by the new emperor Gaius Caligula in 37. In 39, Caligula exiled Herod Antipas to Gaul and gave his territories to Agrippa. Upon Caligula's assassination in 41, the new emperor, Claudius, gave Agrippa I both consular rank and the territories of Judea and Samaria, making Agrippa's kingdom coterminous with the former kingdom of Herod. The Wisdom of Solomon may have been written by a Jew in Caligula's time, when the Jewish people were suffering under the Romans (→ Agrippa I; Herod).

Judea Under Roman Procurators (A.D. 6–41)

When Judea became a Roman province after the exile of Archelaus, it fell under the direct control of the emperor Augustus, who appointed Quirinius as governor, with headquarters at Antioch. In A.D. 6 or 7, a census, as a basis for tax assessment, was carried out under his authority. This seems to be the "enrollment" referred to in Luke 2:1–3, though serious chronological problems arise when this link is made (→ Enrollment; Quirinius, P. Sulpicius).

Procurators, stationed at Caesarea by the Sea, followed up on Quirinius' tax registration. They supervised tax collection (the term "procurator" means "financial agent"), had soldiers at their command, and had the power of capital punishment.

With the consent of Quirinius and under the procurators, the Sanhedrin was restored as a kind of parliament. Annas, as high priest, was the leader of this body from 6 to 15 and unofficially thereafter until his death in 35. Caiaphas, his son-in-law, was high priest from 18 to 36; then Jonathan, Annas's son, in 36–37; then Ananias from 48–58; and another son of Annas, Ananus II, in 62.

Under Augustus, procurators served terms of about three years (Coponius, 6–9; Ambibulus, 9–12; and Rufus, 12–15), but Tiberius (emperor from 14–37) instituted longer terms, and Gratus served 15–26, followed by Pontius Pilate, 26–36. The trial and death of Jesus, of course, occurred during Pilate's term, though again the dating of these events varies from 27 to 33. Pilate, whose contemporaries considered him corrupt and savage, was deposed in 36 by the Syrian legate, Vitellius, who appointed Marcellus temporarily. When Tiberius was succeeded by Caligula (emperor from 37–41), the latter appointed Marullus as procurator (37–41—though it is possible that Marcellus and Marullus are the same person).

Agrippa I (A.D. 41–44) and the Last Roman Procurators (A.D. 44–66)

Like his grandfather, Herod the Great, Agrippa represented himself to the Jews as a devout Jew, but as a Hellenist to those outside Judaism. During his brief reign, James the son of Zebedee was executed (Acts 12:1–3), perhaps in 42. Agrippa died in 44. Claudius (41–54) renewed the procurators in 44, as follows (though now including not only Judea and Samaria, but Galilee as well): Fadus (44–46); Alexander (46–48), who was a nephew of the Jewish scholar Philo of Alexandria; Cumanus (48–52), whose soldiers perpetrated anti-Jewish acts, leading to riots and slaughter; and Felix (52–60), during whose rule Paul was arrested, eventually to be tried before the emperor in Rome.

In 54 Nero became emperor, ruling until 68. Three procurators governed the Jewish territory during this period: Festus (60; perhaps 60–62), also mentioned in Acts; Albinus (62–64); and Florus (64–66). During these procuratorships, especially the last few, Jewish-Roman relationships deteriorated and open revolt was inevitable.

The First Jewish Revolt (A.D. 66–70)

Many events prepared the way for the Jewish revolt in 66, such as the execution of two Zealots under the procurator Alexander, the Jewish riots and civil war under Cumanus, the greed and plundering of Florus, and even the devastating fire in Rome in 64, which occasioned the disintegration of Nero's power and furthered unrest throughout the empire. Some wanted to blame Nero himself for the fire—an unlikely charge—while Nero sought to blame foreigners. Jews were not a likely target, however, for a Jewish section of the city was also burned and the empress Poppea had protected the Jews since her intervention for them against Festus. But Poppea died in 65, and the increasing Jewish nationalism and especially the revolutionary Sicarii and Zealot movements led to the Jewish-Roman conflict in 66. At the same time, Christians in Rome were blamed for the Roman fire and were severely persecuted by Nero around 65, though this was a local and limited persecution. Thereafter Jews and Christians—who generally had been considered a single group by the Romans—were seen as distinct groups.

The financial demands of Florus, who extracted a large sum from the Temple treasury in 66, which precipitated an anti-Roman demonstration and a bloody military raid, was followed by the Temple officials' decision to suspend the daily sacrifices offered on behalf of the emperor (and all Romans). This action placed the Jewish nation officially in rebellion against Rome, for it violated a treaty with Rome; at the same time, a Jewish revolutionary force secured the surrender of the Roman garrison at Masada, but then massacred the Roman soldiers. Before the year 68 ended, Jerusalem was entirely controlled by the Jews, that is, by the Zealots, with whom the pro-Roman Jews also united, and the government was again under a succession of high priests.

Factions developed in Jerusalem; beside the Zealots, John of Gischala led a group, as did Simon bar Giora. These groups fought one another, as well as taking vengeance on the moderates who wanted peace with Rome. In 67, Nero placed the general Vespasian in charge of the problem, and he gathered numerous troops, including those of his son Titus from Egypt, and moved toward Jerusalem. City after city fell, first those of Galilee and then, in 68, those of Perea and in the countryside of Judea, including the Qumran community, which produced the Dead Sea Scrolls. According to the historian Eusebius, it was at this time that the Jerusalem Christians fled to Pella. Nero died in 68, causing Vespasian to pause in the Jerusalem campaign, though he resumed it in 69, when only Masada, Jerusalem, and two other cities remained under Jewish control. In the meantime, during 68 and 69, three emperors had been installed and had become victims of murder or suicide. Vespasian became emperor in 69, to rule until 79, and he put the Jewish war in the hands of his son, Titus. Jerusalem fell in autumn of 70; the Temple went up in flames as Titus entered the Holy of Holies to snatch its trophies, and survivors were executed, enslaved, or used as forced labor in the mines. The Temple tax, formerly used to support the Temple activities, was ordered by Vespasian to be used in support of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus in Rome, and Judea became an imperial province. The capture of Masada followed, perhaps in 74, under Flavius Silva.

Judaism had to be reorganized outside of Jerusalem and in the absence of the Temple. This was accomplished, with Vespasian's approval, at Jamnia under Rabbi Johanan ben Zakai, a Pharisee, who reopened the schools and established a new council to replace the Sanhedrin. In contrast to the latter, which was under the control of the Sadducees (who had dominated the Temple priesthood), the council now consisted entirely of scribes or lawyers—men learned in Torah. The high-priesthood, apparently, had ended. The synagogue, now a widespread and flourishing institution, facilitated the practice and growth of Judaism. This scholarly form of Judaism was permitted to prosper under the Flavian dynasty (Vespasian, 69–79; Titus, 79–81; and Domitian, 81–96).

Titus proved to be a tolerant and even generous emperor but died of sickness after a short reign. Domitian, Titus's brother (both were sons of Vespasian), was judged negatively by history primarily because of his actions at the end of his reign, but his conduct in office was actually more along the lines of his father's. He had positive concerns for Roman religion, morality, and society in general, aiming to improve the middle class; this was done to the disadvantage of the upper class and created senatorial opposition. In 89 and following, aristocrats and philosophers were terrorized, and in 93 the senatorial party and more philosophers were castigated. Finally, in 95–96, Domitian heightened his own position in the Roman ruler cult and notable Romans were persecuted for lack of attention to it. Some of these were charged with atheism (rejecting the state gods) and others with blasphemy (rejecting Roman majesty). The same charge could have been made against Jews and Christians, though there is no evidence to suggest persecution or suppression of Judaism; rather, as noted earlier, it flourished under the Flavians. Domitian's involvement in the Roman religious trials, however, led him to be portrayed as a tyrant, and this period may be reflected in the Apocalypse of Ezra and in the Revelation of John (at least, the latter is often interpreted against the background of Domitian's reign).

Persecution of Christians had occurred locally under Nero in 65, but Vespasian was seen as tolerant by early Christian writers, and there is no suggestion of persecution by Titus, or by Domitian during the first twelve years of his rule (81–92). 1 Clement (written about 95) reports, however, that the church at Rome was severely persecuted about 94. Then in 96 Domitian was murdered, and Nerva ruled from 96 to 98.

All of the books of the NT were written during the period from the reign of Claudius (41–54) to that of Trajan (98–117), that is, between about A.D. 50 to 115, though the dates of very few NT writings are certain and many are disputed.

The Last Jewish Revolt (A.D. 132–35)

Nerva was succeeded by Trajan (98–117), and a second unsuccessful Jewish revolt may have broken out in 115–17 (the evidence is slight). During Hadrian's reign (117–38) the final Jewish revolt was led by Simon Ben Kosiba, later known as Simon Bar Kochba ("Son of a Star"), beginning in 131–32 and ending in 135.

It may have been precipitated by Hadrian's construction of a shrine to Jupiter on the Temple site or by a prohibition of circumcision, or both, but the struggle was successful in that a Jewish state was established and existed for three years. But in 135 Bar Kochba was killed, and Jerusalem, renamed Aelia Capitolina, became a Roman colony from which Jews were excluded (except for a ritual wailing once a year), and temples of Jupiter and Hadrian were constructed on the Temple grounds.

CONCLUSION

The foregoing sketch has been limited largely to the geographical area we now call Israel, but ever since the Exile—and especially in the Greek and Roman periods—Jews were to be found nearly everywhere in the ancient world. Christianity also moved quickly from its Jewish matrix into a Hellenistic milieu, becoming virtually a gentile religion within a generation of its beginnings and penetrating every portion of the Roman world. The full portrayal of the complicated histories of early Judaism and Christianity occupies thousands of books and articles, but the brief narrative offered here provides a basis and a point of departure for those important and fascinating epochs of human history.

Bibliography

- Horsley, R. A., and J. S. Hanson. Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements in the Time of Jesus. Minneapolis, MN: Winston, 1985.
- Koester, H. Introduction to the New Testament. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982.
- Leaney, A. R. C. The Jewish and Christian World 200 B.C. to A.D. 200. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- McCullough, W. S. The History and Literature of the Palestinian Jews from Cyrus to Herod, 550 B.C. to 4 B.C. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1975.
- Nickelsburg, G. W. E. Jewish Literature Between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981.
- Reicke, B. The New Testament Era: The World of the Bible from 500 B.C. to A.D. 100. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968.
- Rhoads, D. M. Israel in Revolution: 6–74 C.E.: A Political History Based on the Writings of Josephus. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976.

THE BIBLE AND THE LITERATURE OF ANTIQUITY: THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST

J. J. M. R O B E R T S

INTRODUCTION

Scholars have always been aware that the biblical literature resembled in some respects other ancient literature, and even precritical commentators made comparisons between the biblical and extrabiblical literature. Until Napoleon's campaign in Egypt, however, the earliest extensive sources available for comparison were the classical sources in Greek and Latin. Champollion's decipherment of Egyptian hieroglyphics in 1823, the decipherment of Akkadian in the 1850s, and the subsequent discovery and decipherment of Sumerian, Hittite, Ugaritic, and an increasing number of early West Semitic inscriptions have radically changed this situation. This recovery of the ancient Near Eastern literature contemporary with and even a millennium older than the earliest OT writings has provided an important new framework within which to study OT literature.

A perusal of the collection of ancient Near Eastern texts translated into English in the third edition of Ancient Near Eastern Texts (J. B. Pritchard, ed.), though it is by no means complete, can give one some idea of the scope and significance of this body of ancient literature. The value of ancient Near Eastern literature for the interpretation of the OT is profound, and that value is immediately apparent when one studies OT law, psalmody, or wisdom literature.

LAW AND COVENANT

In addition to numerous legal formulations scattered throughout the Pentateuch, the OT contains three major bodies of law: the so-called Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21:1–23:33), the Holiness Code (Lev. 17–26), and the Deuteronomical Law Code (Deut. 12–26). Prior to V. Scheil's publication of the stele of Hammurabi's law code in 1902, the study of these biblical collections was carried out in what one could well call a cultural vacuum. As late as 1861 an important German commentator in his treatment of the goring ox law (Exod. 21:28–36) could claim that of all ancient peoples only Israel had a law that held owners responsible if their animals killed or injured another person. The reason for this difference, he claimed, was because no other people had recognized that humans were made in the image of God.

Such a claim would be impossible for a responsible contemporary critic, because the cultural vacuum has been filled. The modern student of OT law has several major collections of cuneiform law with which to compare the biblical material. There are the Sumerian laws of Ur Nammu and Lipit Ishtar, the Old Babylonian laws of Eshnunna and Hammurabi, the Middle Assyrian laws from Asshur, the Hittite law code, and a small collection of Late Babylonian laws. Apart from the Late Babylonian collection, all these collections are prior in date to the period of composition of the biblical collections of law. Not only are these collections of cuneiform law older than the legal collections in the OT, comparative study shows that they constitute particular embodiments of a common law tradition that, for all its local and temporal variations, was basically shared throughout the region of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine. The formal similarity between these written collections suggests that the act of making such written collections had itself become, probably under strong Mesopotamian influence, part of this widespread legal tradition.

To return to the goring ox law, far from the value placed on human life in this law being unique to the biblical material, a comparison with Eshnunna laws 53–55 and Hammurabi laws 250–52 shows that the biblical law is just a slightly different formulation of a much older law embodying the same legal principle. The slight differences in formulation do not suggest any superior evaluation of human life. Moreover, a comparative study of these laws demonstrates that the respect for human life reflected in the biblical law is not dependent on the theological doctrine of creation in the image of God. Respect for human life was part of the legal tradition in the Near East and in Israel well before the formulation of the doctrine of the image of God in Genesis 1. Its author has simply undergirded received ethical and legal mores with theological reflection.

Such theological elaboration of the received ethical and legal mores is paradigmatic for the whole development of biblical law. Very little in biblical law is unique to Israel. Even the Ten Commandments, delivered to the Israelites at Mount Sinai/Horeb by the voice of Yahweh, contain little that would not have been acknowledged everywhere else in the Near East. Apart from the limitation of worship to the one God, the prohibition of images, and perhaps the observance of the Sabbath, these commands simply embody in a very pithy formulation the ethical standards common in the region. As we know from Mesopotamian sources, other religious communities had their own sacred days of abstention from work, so the only significant elements of uniqueness in the Ten Commandments are closely tied to the monotheistic thrust of Israelite religion. Even the biblical laws concerning the Sabbatical and Jubilee years (Exod. 23:11; Lev. 25; Deut. 15:1-4), long considered utopian and unenforceable, may have their roots in much earlier Mesopotamian legal tradition. Throughout the Old Babylonian period the Babylonian government issued periodic mesharum-edicts (Akkadian) at fairly regular intervals cancelling debts and otherwise easing the economic plight of the impoverished elements of Babylonian society. The Israelite Sabbatical Year, which seems to have the same purpose and recurs at about the same interval, appears to be an Israelite adaptation of this mesharum-edict tradition. The Jubilee Year probably represents a later easing of the Sabbatical Year requirements by lengthening the period between such attempts at economic redress.

In the light of this older legal tradition, the role of Moses as lawgiver must be reevaluated. His work must be seen as in some sense analogous to that of Hammurabi. Neither was primarily engaged in the formulation of brand-new laws. Both were responsible for a new collection, revision, and necessary updating of laws already current in the legal tradition of the people or the region.

On the other hand, Moses appears to have placed Israelite law in a new religious context. While the gods, and particularly Shamash, the god of justice, appear as the ultimate source and guarantors of Mesopotamian law, the revision and promulgation of particular collections is primarily the work of the king. Divine revelation of the individual commandments is not stressed, and the concept of the commandments as the stipulations of a covenant between the gods and the people is simply unknown in Mesopotamia. In Israel, on the contrary, not only the major collections of law, but almost all laws are considered stipulations in the covenant that Yahweh graciously entered into with Israel under the mediatorship of Moses. As a part of God's covenant they were given to Moses by direct revelation from God. The tensions, con-traditions, and redundancies in the biblical legal material give ample evidence of later revisions and additions just as one finds such revisions in earlier Mesopotamian law. But while a new Mesopotamian ruler could issue a new collection of law in his own name, there was tremendous pressure in Israel to attribute all law, no matter how late, to Moses. Divine sanction for the law was more secure if the laws were seen as a part of the covenant stipulations God revealed to Moses on the sacred mountain.

Covenant, then, is an important ingredient in Israel's concept of law. The Bible speaks of God's covenant with Noah, with Abraham, with David and his house, with particular priestly families, and of the covenant with Israel given at Sinai or Horeb, but the search for ancient Near Eastern analogues has not produced any clear examples of a covenant between a god and his people or even a very convincing example of a covenant between a god and his chosen king. On the contrary, the evidence suggests that Israel adapted political language dealing with contractual relations between human parties to describe the religio-political relationship between God and his people or between God and his chosen representatives. The study of ancient Near Eastern political treaties of various types, however, has been very fruitful for a clearer understanding of Israelite covenant theology. Despite the ongoing debate and many unresolved questions, few would deny that the careful study of the many political treaties from the ancient Near East has aided in the understanding of Israelite covenant theology, especially as it is formulated in Deuteronomy. The study of royal grants given by Babylonian and Assyrian kings to chosen officials to reward meritorious service to the crown has also proven fruitful in providing a possible political model for the Davidic type covenant.

Because Israelite law was set within the context of covenant and obedience to it was seen as the appropriate religious response to Yahweh's gracious deeds on behalf of Israel, the content of that law came to include specifically religious and ritual obligations, and in the course of time some of the legal collections were elaborated in a hortatory style. The ancient Near Eastern law codes have nothing that would correspond to the ritual demands found in the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 23:14-19), much less to the detailed laws for the various kinds of sacrifice legislated in the book of Leviticus. For parallels to this type of ritual instruction, one must turn from the ancient law codes to the Hittite instruction texts or to the Akkadian, Egyptian, Hittite, and Ugaritic ritual texts. There one will find much helpful material for understanding this genre of biblical law.

PSALMODY

The biblical psalms have very important parallels in the hymns and prayers preserved in the surrounding Near Eastern cultures. Egypt and Mesopotamia provide both the greatest number of these texts and the most important ones as well. Given the striking number of parallels between Israelite religious poetry and Ugaritic poetry, one would expect that Canaanite hymns and prayers would be even closer to the biblical texts. Israel's hymnic tradition probably developed largely under the influence of Canaanite poetic canons. It has been seriously argued that Psalm 29, for instance, is just a superficially edited Canaanite hymn originally addressed to Baal. Unfortunately, the many texts uncovered at Ugarit included only one Ugaritic text that could legitimately be considered a hymn, and there were no examples of prayers. Canaan proper has yielded even less, not much more than a few phrases gleaned from the Amarna letters. Some of the West Semitic inscriptions have properly been compared to the individual prayers of thanksgiving, but the corpus of the relevant inscriptions is quite small and therefore less helpful than could be wished. There are a significant number of Hittite prayers that should be considered and apparently some Hurrian prayers, though the present stage of our knowledge of Hurrian provides no adequate base for the use of these texts in comparative study.

Mesopotamian

There is still much work to be done in the study of Mesopotamian hymns and prayers, but the large corpus of Mesopotamian texts contains clear counterparts to Israelite hymns and individual laments. Both the resemblances and the differences should be noted.

Apart from stylistic differences in the poetic canons that govern Sumerian, Akkadian, and Hebrew poetry, the major discontinuities between Mesopotamian and Israelite psalmody can be attributed to the fundamental distinction between monotheistic and polytheistic religion. Mesopotamian texts make far greater use of divine epithets in the praise of their deities, and the invocation of the deity in Mesopotamian individual laments is normally extended with a long introductory section of praise built up of such epithets. This is in sharp contrast to the Israelite laments, which typically begin the lament proper with a very simple and short invocation of Yahweh. The difference probably arises from the need of the polytheist to clearly specify which god is being invoked, but this difference does not justify denigrating the introductory praise in the Mesopotamian texts as mere calculated flattery. The motif in Mesopotamian prayers of calling upon one god to intercede with another god is obviously rooted in polytheism, and the pervasiveness of the set formulas that occur in many Mesopotamian prayers expressing fear over bad omens or blaming one's suffering on the work of sorcerers owes a great deal to the multiplicity of independent powers in a polytheistic universe.

Despite these obvious differences, Mesopotamian hymns and prayers share much in common with their Israelite counterparts. Many of the same motifs and metaphors are found in the prayers of both cultures. The psychological approach to the deity is hardly distinguishable. Mesopotamian hymns tend to focus on what Claus Westermann, in studying the biblical hymns, has called "descriptive praise," the praise of the deity for what the deity customarily does or is, rather than focusing on what Westermann calls "narrative praise," praising the deity by narrating a particular action of the deity. There are exceptions, however, such as the hymn to Marduk celebrating his victory over Elam at the time of Nebuchadnezzar I.

Some differences are actually more apparent than real. Akkadian shu-illa prayers are typically accompanied by ritual directions following a ruled line at the end of the prayer. These normally indicate that the prayer was to be recited several times as accompaniment to a sacrificial offering. Biblical psalms lack such ritual directions, but it is clear from references in the Psalms and the historical books that the biblical laments and thanksgiving songs were also accompanied by sacrifice. In fact, the same Hebrew term, todah, designates both the thanksgiving song and the thanksgiving sacrifice. It is important to remember that, both when studying the Psalms and when studying the rules for sacrifice in Leviticus. The relative separation of word and ritual act in the biblical sources is a literary phenomenon that does not reflect what actually went on in worship. In addition to the brief ritual directions that accompany Mesopotamian prayers, Mesopotamia also provides us with more extended rituals for particular cultic celebrations, and these enable us to get a glimpse of how hymns and prayers of different genres could actually form a part of the same cultic celebration—a key point in Sigmund Mowinckel's cult-centered approach to the Psalms. Finally, one should note the occurrence in Mesopotamian prayers of the formula identifying the speaker in the form "I so-and-so, the son of so-and-so. . . ." These prayers were obviously intended for repeated use by different individuals; the supplicant needed only to insert his or her own name at the appropriate place. Such a formula is not found in the biblical psalms, but their stereotypical nature points to the same intention for their repeated use by different individuals in roughly analogous situations. In neither case, however, does such public use imply any lack of sincerity in the spirituality expressed in the text of the Mesopotamian or Israelite prayer. The works of professional composers of psalms were presumably preserved in both cultures precisely because they articulated for the masses their inchoate religious sensibilities. One must take the words of these prayers seriously.

Egyptian

Egyptian hymns and prayers also provide important parallels for the study of the biblical material. Psalm 104 is widely regarded as modeled on Amenophis IV's famous hymn to the sun god, and Egyptian enthronement hymns are helpful in the comparative study of the Israelite enthronement ritual and in the exegesis of such texts as Psalms 2, 110, and Isa. 9:1-6. Given the large number of Egyptian hymns and prayers belonging to carefully differentiated genres now available for study, the next few years should see significant progress in the comparative study of these texts.

Hittite

There are also a number of Hittite prayers that may be profitably studied for comparative purposes—one thinks especially of the plague prayers of the Hittite king Mursilis. Mursilis' religious interpretation of the plague as a judgment on his Hittite people because of their breach of a treaty with Egypt under an earlier Hittite king provides an interesting commentary on David's religious interpretation of the drought in his days as a judgment on Israel because of Saul's breach of the ancient treaty with the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:1-14). Moreover, Mursilis' pathetic appeal to the gods at least to tell him, through one or another of the various means of revelation, why they were angry, provides a striking parallel to the biblical statement that when Saul inquired of Yahweh, "Yahweh did not answer him, either by dreams, or by Urim, or by prophets" (1 Sam. 28:6).

Sumerian

Finally, one should mention the Sumerian laments over the destruction of important cult centers. These laments, such as the famous lament over the destruction of Ur, provide interesting parallels to the biblical book of Lamentations and to the Israelite public laments found scattered in the Psalms and elsewhere in the Bible. Motifs from pre-Israelite traditions of public lament very similar to those found in the Sumerian laments are adapted by such prophets as Jeremiah to give profound pathos to his description of Yahweh's anguish over the sin of his people.

WISDOM LITERATURE

Wisdom literature tends to be international in character, so it is not surprising to find striking Egyptian and Mesopotamian parallels to the biblical books of Proverbs, Job, and, to a lesser extent, Ecclesiastes. Mesopotamia provides several collections of moral admonitions similar to parts of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and there is a large collection of Sumerian and bilingual proverbs, though proverbs do not seem to have represented an important genre of Akkadian Babylonian literature. The numerous Egyptian works giving the "instructions" of a famous vizier, king, or wise man of the past are even more impressive as parallels to Proverbs. One of them, "The Instruction of Amen-em-Opet," appears to have been the literary model for structuring Prov. 22:17-24:22, though the passage in Proverbs can hardly be considered a direct paraphrase of the Egyptian text, much less a straight translation. Recent comparative study has shown the influence of Mesopotamian texts as well as a number of other Egyptian texts on Prov. 22:17-24:22. Its author was apparently well versed in a variety of international wisdom traditions and simply used Amen-em-Opet to provide a model structure in which to incorporate insights drawn from various sources. One should also mention the Aramaic proverbs preserved in the story of the Assyrian Sage Ahikar.

The Mesopotamian texts dealing with the problem of the righteous sufferer give one a glimpse of the intellectual tradition within which the book of Job fits. It is a long tradition that includes an early Sumerian composition and an Old Babylonian Akkadian text. Its most elaborate literary expressions, however, are found in the long poem "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom" (Ludlul bel nemeqi) and "The Babylonian Theodicy," a text constructed in the form of a cycle of dialogues between the righteous sufferer and a friend. Other texts resembling Ludlul, though considerably shorter, have been found among the Akkadian documents from Ugarit. Ludlul and the texts similar to it have many points of contact with individual prayers of lament. In fact, Ludlul could be analyzed as the literary expansion of an individual thanksgiving song that incorporates major elements of the lament in its description of the evil from which the deity has delivered the worshiper. Such an analysis is very suggestive in explaining the development of the wisdom psalm from the individual thanksgiving song. In contrast to Ludlul, "The Babylonian Theodicy" owes more to the tradition of scribal-school debates with their convention of insulting or ironic address to one's opponent in the debate. The book of Job seems to have been influenced by both strands in the tradition. It has incorporated the psalmic lament motifs found in the Ludlul strand, but it has structured them in an expanded symposium inspired by the "Theodicy" strand.

OTHER GENRES IN GENESIS-NUMBERS

Outside of law, psalmody, and wisdom literature, one would be hard pressed to find Near Eastern parallels to the larger Israelite compositions. There is really nothing comparable in the preserved writings of the surrounding cultures to Genesis-Numbers or the Deuteronomistic History (Deuteronomy-2 Kings). For that matter, even individual books within these compilations have no real ancient Near Eastern counterparts. Nor do the books of the writing prophets or the book of Chronicles. What one can speak of are parallels to smaller genres used in the composition of these larger works.

Mythological Texts

The primeval history in the early chapters of Genesis contains a number of shorter stories with clear parallels in the surrounding cultures. The two creation stories (Gen. 1:1-2:4; 2:4-3:24) share certain features with some of the large number of creation stories known from Mesopotamia and Egypt. Given the structural similarities, the differences in detail between these accounts and the biblical stories are helpful in specifying the issue addressed in the Genesis accounts. The comparison of Gen. 1:1-2:4a with the Babylonian creation poem the Enuma elish, for instance, suggests a conscious polemic on the part of the biblical writer against the polytheistic theology reflected in this Babylonian myth. This account has been stripped of almost all the traces of the cosmogonic battle found in the Babylonian story, despite the fact that a similar form of this cosmogonic myth of the origin of world order was well known in Israel (Ps. 74:12-17; Isa. 27:1-2; 51:9-10; Job 9:13; 26:12-13). The closest parallels to the Israelite cosmogonic myth come from the Baal Epic at Ugarit—though the preserved Ugaritic texts do not explicitly tie Baal's defeat of the sea dragon to creation—but there are also Egyptian and Hittite texts of a similar character (→ Baal).

The Fall story in Genesis 2-3 has no clear analogues, and the story of the first murder (Gen. 4) is only loosely paralleled by a Mesopotamian account of a debate between the shepherd and the farmer as to which of the two professions was superior. This debate between professions is a genre known in both Mesopotamia and Egypt, but the typical texts end on a far friendlier note than the Cain and Abel story. It is not until one reaches the Flood story that the external parallels are again compelling. The Genesis Flood story (chaps. 6-9) appears to be derived from Mesopotamian tradition, where the Flood story is known in a Sumerian version, in the Akkadian version found in the Atrahasis Epic, and in the well-known version of the Gilgamesh Epic. The Atrahasis Epic is particularly important because it shows that Genesis' linking of the creation of humankind and the Flood story in a history that leads to the present structures of society was not a unique achievement of Israelite theology. This move finds a remarkable, if partial, parallel in the Babylonian Epic. The Atrahasis Epic fills out the history between the creation of humankind and the Flood differently than the Genesis account does, and the Atrahasis Epic does not continue with an account of the origin of the various languages. But its linking of creation and the Flood account, with strong etiological elements similar to those found in the biblical Fall story, provides a theological interpretation of humankind's place in this world analogous to one level of the biblical text. The motif of the confusion of the languages does seem to be mentioned in a Sumerian myth, and the somewhat mysterious figure of Nimrod, mentioned without elaboration in Genesis, may have its background in very popular Akkadian heroic legends about Sargon the Great or Naram-sin. Moreover, the Akkadian genealogies of the Hammurabi dynasty and of the ancestors of the Assyrian kings have proven very helpful in the study of the background and function of the biblical genealogies in Genesis.

Patriarchal Stories

One can find parallels to motifs in the patriarchal stories in Genesis 12-50, but the parallels do not extend much beyond that level. The concern for a male heir integral to the patriarchal narratives is also reflected in the Keret and Daniel epics from Ugarit. The Egyptian story of Sinuhe has certain points of similarity to the story of Jacob's flight from Canaan to escape Esau's anger. Both Sinuhe and Jacob flee to another country where they stay for an extended period, marry into the family of the wealthy patron who receives them, and prosper in their new surroundings before returning to the land from which they had fled. The story of Moses' flight to Midian in the book of Exodus also follows this line with some variation. The Moses story does not emphasize the refugee's financial success in his new country, but it is closer to the Sinuhe narrative in the political motivation for the flight. In this connection one should also mention Idrimi's autobiographical account of his flight from and eventual return to his ancestral Aleppo.

The revelatory importance of dreams in these stories and elsewhere in the OT has many parallels in the ancient Near Eastern literature, and such texts as the Assyrian Dream Book show a very similar pattern of interpretation to that reflected in the Bible. One should also mention the Egyptian tale of the two brothers that provides an oft-cited but rather remote parallel to the incident with Potiphar's wife in the Joseph story. On the whole, however, the narrative art reflected in the patriarchal stories has no real counterpart in the preserved literature of the surrounding cultures.

Moses' Birth

There are more points of contact with elements in the other pentateuchal books. The parallel between the Akkadian birth story of Sargon the Great and the Exodus account of Moses' birth is particularly striking. In both stories a baby boy who cannot be kept by the real parents is placed in a reed basket and left in the water at the edge of a river. Eventually the child is discovered by someone else who adopts the child and raises it as his or her own.

Construction of a Sanctuary

The Near Eastern parallels to the legal and ritual material have already been noted, but there are also Near Eastern texts that provide parallels to the Exodus account of the building of the tabernacle, to the accounts in Kings and Chronicles of the building of Solomon's Temple, and to Ezekiel's description of the future Temple. One thinks especially of the Sumerian text of Gudea in which King Gudea of Lagash relates how he was given the command in a dream to (re)build the temple of the city god Ningirsu. Gudea asks for further instruction, which the god provides, and after very careful preparation the temple is constructed, Ningirsu and his fellow deities are brought into the temple, and the gods bless the king. The text and the statues of Gudea showing him holding the divine blueprint given him by the gods reveal the very ancient background to the biblical references that speak of God's blueprint for the tabernacle (Exod. 25:9, 40) or for the Temple (1 Chron. 28:11–19).

The concern for building or rebuilding the temple precisely according to the pattern originally given by the deity is reflected in "The Curse of Agade," an early Sumerian text that attributes the fall of the Akkad dynasty to Naram-sin's offense against Enlil's temple in Nippur. Naram-sin did major repair work on Enlil's temple, but according to this text he did it without sufficient regard to Enlil's wishes. The temple was a microcosm of the world, and Naram-sin's abuse of various parts of the temple resulted in dislocations in their macrocosmic counterparts in the external world. Thus when grain was cut in the gate where grain is not to be cut, grain was cut off from the land, etc. The same concern is still reflected in the late Neo-Babylonian building inscriptions that stress how the king rebuilt the temple precisely upon the original foundation trenches. If one missed the original line by so much as a finger's breadth, the results could be disastrous, resulting in the early collapse of the restored building. This understanding of the importance of following the divine pattern in temple construction is part of the background to the famous passage about God's foundation stone in Zion (Isa. 28:16–17). With regard to the detailed descriptions of the tabernacle and Temple and their contents, one should note that the building inscriptions of the Assyrian and Babylonian kings sometimes contain rather detailed descriptions of the architectural features of the temples they built.

The biblical story about the Mesopotamian prophet Balaam whom the Moabite king Balak hired to curse Israel (Num. 22–24) has been placed in a new light by the Aramaic wall inscriptions from Deir Alla that also mention this prophet. These texts are in a poor state of preservation and their precise date (ca. seventh century B.C.) is still disputed, but they indicate that a non-Israelite tradition about the seer Balaam was known in the Transjordan area among a presumably non-Israelite population group well before the period of the exile.

OTHER GENRES IN THE DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY

The Mesopotamians, Hittites, and Egyptians all composed annals and chronicles, but none of these texts that have been preserved compare in scope or in complexity with the account of Israel's history that scholars have designated the Deuteronomistic History and that includes the books of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings. That difference remains even though some of these Near Eastern historiographical texts resemble the Deuteronomistic History in important features. The Assyrian Synchronistic History, for example, narrates the history of Assyro-Babylonian relations from ca. 1500 to 783 B.C., discussing each Assyrian king treated—only those who had relations with Babylon are included—along with his Babylonian contemporary or contemporaries. This synchronistic treatment is similar, though not identical, to the Deuteronomistic historian's synchronistic handling of the Israelite and Judean kings from ca. 922 to 722 B.C. Moreover, the Deuteronomistic historian's penchant for judging a king's reign and explaining his successes or failures on the very narrow ground of his religious performance is paralleled by a similar pattern in the Babylonian Weidner Chronicle. This text judges individual kings and explains their fate on the basis of their treatment of Marduk's temple Esagila in Babylon.

Despite such similarities, the biblical text appears far more complex. The Deuteronomistic historian's preservation and incorporation of major preformed blocks of earlier narratives with quite different agendas have given the biblical text an ambiguity that suggests a far more profound appreciation of the complexities of historical phenomena. One need only consider the account of the rise of kingship in 1 Samuel, with its disconcerting juxtaposition of pro- and antimonarchical sources, or the account of Solomon's reign in 1 Kings 1–11, with its peculiar mixture of lavish praise and harsh condemnation, in some cases with regard to the same actions, to illustrate the point. Just as in the case of Genesis–Numbers, the Near Eastern parallels tend to be parallels to some of these earlier narratives preserved in the Deuteronomistic History or to much smaller units or motifs.

The story of the Philistine capture and return of the Ark of the covenant has been compared to Babylonian accounts of the return of the cult statue of Marduk to Babylon after a period of foreign exile. The account of David's rise to power in 1 Samuel and the account of Solomon's succession to David's throne in 2 Samuel 9–20 and 1 Kings 1–2 have been explained as originally apologetic writings commissioned by these kings to justify their irregular accession to the throne on the analogy of such Near Eastern texts as the Hittite "Apology of Hattusilis III." One could also compare the Telepinus edict and Esarhaddon's account of his accession to the throne of Assyria after the assassination of his father, Sennacherib. Still at the level of genre, some scholars would see the Egyptian Königsnovelle, a narrative recounting a Pharaoh's accession to the throne, as a major influence on the narrative about Solomon's dream at Gibeon, but this is denied by other scholars.

At the level of the much smaller units of narrative, and especially at the level of the individual motif, the amount of comparative material is overwhelming. To take only one example, the narratives about military campaigns, which abound in the Bible and in Near Eastern literature, share many of the same ideas and motifs. It is clear from the Moabite stele of King Mesha and from numerous Mesopotamian texts, for instance, that the practices generally associated with "holy war" in Israel were not unique to Israel. The understanding of the outcome of battle as reflecting a judicial decision of the gods was also widespread, and stories about a city being taken by a stratagem are common.

Finally, one should note how the Deuteronomistic historian and many other biblical writers cite written correspondence of various sorts. The large collections of official and private letters from Mesopotamia, Egypt, Ugarit, and Palestine—including the Hebrew inscriptions from Arad and Lachish—have given a clear picture of the conventions governing actual letter writing, thus enabling scholars to better evaluate such literary citations.

PROPHECY

The phenomenon of prophecy was widespread in the ancient Near East. Prophets or prophet-like figures are attested among the Canaanites, the Arameans, the Hittites, in Mesopotamia, and in Egypt, but nowhere else did they leave a literary deposit comparable in any way to the books of the classical Israelite prophets. The Egyptian "Admonitions of Ipu-wer" and "The Prophecy of Neferti" are probably the two longest non-Israelite documents claimed by scholars as prophetic works, but their identification as prophetic is disputed. The latter is often regarded as political propaganda disguised as prophecy but actually composed after the events prophesied, and the former could be treated as political advice from a royal counselor. Caution is also in order in comparing the so-called "Prophecy of Marduk" from Mesopotamia to the biblical material. This text, in which Marduk explains away the ancient capture of his statue by the Hittites and the Assyrians as a business trip and a vacation that he decided to take but then treats the more recent capture of his statue by the Elamites as his judgment on sinful Babylon with which he has become angry, has points of contact with Israelite prophetic theology, especially in its theological interpretation of past history and in its insistence that the deity is in full control of that history. Marduk's promise for the restoration of Babylon even appears to be predictive, if scholars are correct in dating the text prior to Nebuchadnezzar I's conquest of Elam. On the other hand, the text does not mention any human intermediary through whom this revelation of Marduk was given, and its treatment of history might suggest a closer parallel to apocalyptic works such as Daniel in which the major part of "prophecy" is actually prophecy after the event. The Assyrian prophecy texts translated by Pfeiffer and Biggs in Pritchard's Ancient Near Eastern Texts may also be regarded as apocalyptic texts, if they are not simply omen apodoses.

In contrast, the collection of oracles concerning Esarhaddon attributed to various prophetic figures, but apparently all speaking in the name of the goddess Ishtar of Arbela, do appear to be genuine prophetic oracles, and the manner of their collection is suggestive for the study of the preservation and collection of the prophetic material in Israel. The Assyrian collection reflects no clear organizing principle, though it appears to be a collection made for some official purpose, and the concern to identify the speaker of the individual oracles may signal a legal responsibility that the prophet bore for his words. This would correspond to the earlier practice at Mari of taking legal symbols from the prophet, thus holding the prophet responsible for the reliability of his or her prophetic message. The Assyrian collection is rather short, however, and, unlike the majority of the prophetic books in the Bible, it does not even purport to be the collection of the oracles of a single prophet.

If the literary parallels to the prophetic books of the Bible are less than impressive, the same cannot be said for prophetic phenomena in general, nor for the content of particular oracles. Many of the motifs found in Israelite oracles are also attested in the oracles from the surrounding cultures. One thinks, for instance, of the common admonition "Fear not!" followed by a promise of divine assistance. It is found in the response of the Aramaic prophets to King Zakir of Hamath and Lu'ath, and it is very common in the Assyrian oracles.

The some twenty-eight prophetic texts in the Mari correspondence from the first half of the second millennium B.C. are particularly significant, both in the range of their parallels to the later biblical material and in their occurrence in an area and among a population group that might suggest some cultural link between the Mari phenomenon and the later Israelite development. In contrast to the traditional Mesopotamian preference for the technical, institutionalized practice of divination as the chosen means of obtaining communications from the divine world, Mari prophecy depends on inspiration and the initiative of a deity. The Mari prophets see themselves as the messengers or mouthpieces of the deity, speaking for the deity in the first person. Moreover, the reception of the prophetic message takes place in what may be defined broadly as an ecstatic state—a state characterized by somewhat abnormal behavior, if one may judge by the use of the same root to refer to the behavior both of the prophet and of the insane. In all these respects, prophecy at Mari resembles prophecy as it is known in the biblical texts.

Even at Mari, however, technical divination remains the favorite means of obtaining communications from the divine world. The authenticity of prophetic messages was tested by having the divination priests take the omens in the normal way and then comparing their results with the prophetic message. This preference for technical divination of various sorts as the primary means of revelation may account for the relative sparsity of literary collections of prophetic oracles. Mesopotamia's cultural equivalent to the biblical prophet as the central mediator between the divine and human worlds was the divination priest, and the cultural equivalent to the biblical prophetic book is perhaps the Mesopotamian omen collection, of which there are many very extensive examples. Such collections, if they ever existed in Israel, were not preserved in the canonical Israelite literature. The omen collections and the collections of incantations represent the two genres of literature that are very important in Mesopotamia, but are conspicuous by their absence from the Bible.

---

OTHER WRITINGS

Of the biblical writings not yet discussed, the one with the closest Near Eastern parallels is the Song of Songs. Both secular Egyptian love poetry and more religious love poetry from Mesopotamia have been compared to it. The memoirs of Nehemiah have been compared to votive inscriptions of Mesopotamian kings and officials who wanted their deeds on behalf of the god to be remembered and rewarded. Books like Ruth and Esther, on the other hand, present literary genres with no clear counterparts in the early ancient Near Eastern literature. Finally, the anti-Babylonian stories in the book of Daniel may reflect a late development of the Persian-sponsored anti-Nabonidus propaganda of the Marduk priests of Babylon. The particular development of these stories in Daniel, however, reflects a changed literary world. A literature of the powerless or stateless has taken the place of the older literature rooted in the national state. There is an analogy for this in the Aramaic story of Ahiqar, but this major shift in the kind of Israelite literature produced in the late postexilic period (second century B.C.) marks the end of the biblical period.

Bibliography

Hoftijzer, J., and G. Van der Kooij. Aramaic Texts from Deir 'Alla. Leiden: Brill, 1976.

Lambert, W. G., and A. R. Millard. Atra-Hasis: The Babylonian Story of the Flood. Oxford: Clarendon, 1969.

Mowinckel, S. The Psalms in Israel's Worship. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1967.

Pritchard, J. B. Ancient Near Eastern Texts

Relating to the Old Testament. 3d ed. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969.

Roberts, J. J. M. "The Ancient Near Eastern Environment." In The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters. Edited by D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker. Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985. Pp. 75-121.

Westermann, C. Praise and Lament in the Psalms. Atlanta, GA: John Knox, 1981.

THE BIBLE AND THE LITERATURE OF ANTIQUITY: THE GRECO-ROMAN PERIOD

D A V I D E. A U N E

HELLENISTIC LITERARY CULTURE

Early Judaism and early Christianity existed in a world in which the prevailing culture was Hellenistic. This culture, a legacy of Alexander the Great, was modeled on the thought, customs, and life-style of ancient Greece. The Roman Empire, which provided political and economic unity and stability to the entire ancient Mediterranean world after 41 B.C., included scores of native cultures, many of which were vitally concerned with the preservation of their own identities and traditions. Judaism, in both its Palestinian and Diaspora forms, constituted one such ethnic entity. Hellenistic Jewish literature, written primarily in Greek using Hellenistic literary forms and traditions, is the best preserved nativistic literature from the Greco-Roman period. That is not due to the survival of Judaism, for Christians rather than Jews preserved (and modified) the bulk of early Jewish literature written between 200 B.C. and A.D. 100. The history of this literature exhibits the increasing domination of Hellenistic literary culture.

Hellenism and Judaism were traditional societies that anchored the cultural and religious values of the present in the paradigmatic past as preserved by "approved" collections of literature. For Hellenism, that literature included Homer (appropriately labeled "the Bible of the Greeks") and the more than eighty other "classical" authors that constituted the so-called Alexandrian canon (including five epic poets, ten orators, nine lyric poets, five tragic poets, etc.). Approved authors were copied and recopied, studied in the schools, and used as literary and rhetorical models. Other authors were neglected and have largely perished. By the first century A.D. there was a widespread nostalgia for the past among both Greeks and Romans. Hellenistic authors became enamored with the literary style of the Attic prose writers of the classical period (450–330 B.C.) and tried to emulate their archaic style.

Opposite: A Roman wagon, perhaps meant to depict the holy Ark, can still be discerned among lintel decorations from the synagogue at Capernaum, late second–early third century A.D. The lintel decorations hint at the Greco-Roman influence felt in the region.

EARLY JEWISH LITERATURE

Early Judaism produced a large and varied body of literature from ca. 250 B.C. to the codification of the Mishnah, ca. A.D. 200. Much of early Jewish literature (excluding, however, several important groupings of literature, including Philo, Josephus, the Dead Sea Scrolls, the Targums, and rabbinic literature) has come to be associated with two collections, the Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha. "Apocrypha" (from a Greek word meaning "hidden") is a term referring to a collection of thirteen to fifteen books (or additions to books) of Jewish origin but preserved (with the exception of 2 Esdras) as part of the Septuagint (LXX), i.e., the Christian OT in Greek, and not in the Hebrew OT. Though some of these documents were originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic (e.g., 1 Maccabees, Sirach, Tobit, Judith), they have survived only in translation. Since Greek versions of these writings were regularly included in copies of the LXX, they were widely regarded by some Diaspora Jews and later by Christians as sacred. Twelve of these books were included by Jerome in the Latin Vulgate and are part of the Roman Catholic OT. The literary genres represented by the Apocrypha include historiography (1 Esdras; 1 and 2 Maccabees), imaginative fiction or novels (Tobit, Judith, The Additions to Esther, and The Additions to Daniel), letters or homilies (Letter of Jeremiah), apocalypses (2 Esdras), and prayers (Prayer of Manasseh, Prayer of Azariah in Song of the Three Youths).

The word "Pseudepigrapha" means "forgeries" and is a generic term for those very diverse early Jewish compositions (fifty-two separate works are collected in Charlesworth, The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha) that unknown authors tried to pass off as works of famous ancient Israelites. The Pseudepigrapha includes many apocalypses (e.g., the Apocalypses of Abraham, Adam, 1 Enoch, 2 Enoch, 2 Baruch, 3 Baruch) and testaments (e.g., Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Testament of Moses, and the so-called Prayer of Joseph). Several other genres are also represented including prayers (Prayer of Jacob), hymns (Psalms of Solomon, Odes of Solomon), novels (Joseph and Aseneth, 3 Maccabees), wisdom and instructional literature (e.g., Pseudo-Phocylides), expansions of OT texts (Jubilees, Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities), revelatory literature (Sibylline Oracles), and exhortation (4 Maccabees).

EARLY CHRISTIANITY AND HELLENISM

---

Early Christianity emerged from a Judaism already profoundly influenced by Hellenism. Thus the history of early Christian literature reflects a movement from Hellenistic Jewish cultural traditions toward an increasingly Hellenistic orientation. From a historical perspective, then, early Christianity was a Hellenistic religion. By the middle of the first century there were increasing tensions between pagan converts to Christianity and Jewish Christians. These tensions increased until Christianity gradually became separated from Judaism and came to be regarded as a religion in its own right.

At first glance, there appear to be five major literary genres in the New Testament: biography (the four Gospels), history (Acts), letter (the Pauline and general Letters), sermon (1 John and perhaps Hebrews), and apocalypse (the Revelation to John). While biographies and letters are more characteristic of Greco-Roman literary culture, history has possible models in both Greco-Roman and Israelite historiography, sermons have roots in both the Jewish synagogue and in the moral exhortation of popular Hellenistic philosophy, and the apocalyptic genre appears more exclusively linked with early Jewish literary traditions. Each of these literary forms must be examined more closely to determine precisely where they fit in the complex interrelationship that existed in the Hellenistic and Roman period between the Greco-Roman and the Israelite-Jewish literary cultures.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

---

In the ancient world, comparable forms of historical writing arose only in Judaism and in the Greek world. These developments occurred independently of each other; they occurred at about the same time (sixth and fifth centuries B.C.); and they occurred in a similar historical and political climate (conflict with the mighty Persian Empire, 539–332 B.C.).

Greco-Roman Historiography

The English word "history" is derived from the Greek term historia meaning "investigation, inquiry" and was eventually used in the limited sense of the investigation of the past. Greco-

Roman historians often consciously reflected about the problems, tasks, methods, and purpose of historiography and included discussions of such problems in prefaces and digressions. Historians in the Israelite-Jewish tradition, by contrast, rarely revealed what they thought of such matters. Greco-Roman historians also emphasized the accuracy of their narratives by claiming to have "seen" and/or "heard" the evidence recorded in their narratives and therefore tended to limit themselves to narrating contemporary or near-contemporary events. Historians were not specifically trained for their task. They simply applied general rhetorical training (the tertiary stage of Greco-Roman education permitting specialization in either rhetoric or philosophy) to the demands of writing history. One result was that the goals and forms of rhetoric were extremely influential in historiography. This typically included the tendency to "improve" sources by thoroughly rewriting them, the insertion of fabricated speeches as oratorical models, the use of dramatic episodes to involve readers emotionally, and the concern to change the attitude and behavior of readers by depicting individuals as paragons of virtue or vice.

There were several minor types of Greco-Roman historical writing (e.g., genealogy, ethnography, local history, chronography). The three important major forms were the historical (war) monograph, general or universal history, and antiquarian history. The war monograph narrated a contemporary war of great importance based on the assumption that political and military crises constituted the most important types of change in human history. The war monographs of Herodotus and especially Thucydides (fifth century B.C.) were models for this genre throughout antiquity. General or universal history, begun in the fourth century B.C. by Ephorus, treated either Greek or Roman history from the earliest reliable date down to the time of the author. Polybius (ca. 200–118 B.C.) is the earliest universal historian extant. Antiquarian history (the ancient counterpart of social history) combined various forms of systematic research into the past (ethnology, geography, genealogy, local history) with a chronological arrangement of individual states with particular emphasis on internal (political) and external (military) affairs. The Roman Antiquities of Dionysius of Halicarnassus (late first century B.C.) exemplifies this genre.

The three major forms of Greco-Roman history were all-inclusive literary forms that tended to embrace a variety of shorter forms, a feature particularly true of general and antiquarian history. Some of the major literary forms used in historical compositions include historical prefaces, dramatic episodes, speeches in both indirect and direct discourse (often constituting from 20 to 30 percent of the narrative), and digressions. The ideal purpose for which historians wrote was to be truthful, useful, and entertaining. Of these three, it was obviously easier to be useful and entertaining than to be truthful, since historical truth necessitated careful investigation. Many Hellenistic historians (Polybius was a striking exception) were armchair scholars who relied on rhetorical talents more than firsthand research.

Early Jewish Historiography

Narrative, whether historical or fictional, is one of the more characteristic styles of OT literature, where the Pentateuch (Genesis through Deuteronomy) is linked to the Former Prophets (Joshua through 2 Kings) to form a continuous narrative of Israelite history from creation to the aftermath of the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. The increasingly sacrosanct status of this literature from the third century B.C. on meant that it automatically served as a literary paradigm and a source of themes for religious fiction and nonfiction alike. While the Greek historians distinguished between the mythological period (for which sources were unreliable) and the historical period, Israelite historians neither made nor appear to have been aware of any such distinction.

Several historical compositions have been associated with the Apocrypha, each of them very different from the others: 1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees, and 1 Esdras. The only "historical" works included in the Pseudepigrapha are those that involve the interpretive and paraphrastic rewriting or expansions of the text of the OT historical books (e.g., Jubilees, Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities).

Under Ptolemy I of Egypt (died ca. 282 B.C.), Hecataeus of Abdera was commissioned to write Aigyptiaka ("On the Egyptians"), a flattering and propagandistic historical work that widely influenced Hellenistic historiography. The Hellenistic Jewish historians Artapanus, Eupolemus, and Pseudo-Eupolemus (all mid-second century B.C. and all surviving only in fragments quoted by later authors) used Hecataeus' history as a model for their own tolerant but propagandistic reinterpretations of biblical history. Their purpose was to demonstrate the antiquity and superiority of Jewish culture and civilization within a universalistic framework. While these authors all have basically historical intentions they, like many contemporary Hellenistic historians, manipulated "historical" data in the service of nationalistic interests.

1 Maccabees (ca. 100 B.C.) is an anonymous work originally composed in Hebrew or Aramaic. Written in a deliberately archaic style, this work was very probably intended by the author to be a continuation of the work of the Chronicler (1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah). The work focuses on the causes and progress of the Maccabean revolt from ca. 175 B.C. with the accession of the Syrian king Antiochus IV and the eventual revolt of Mattathias and his sons until the death of the last surviving son, Simon, in 134 B.C. The work reflects a rapprochement between biblical and Hellenistic historiography. 2 Maccabees presents itself as an anonymous abridgement of a five-volume work of Jason of Cyrene. The work narrates Palestinian Jewish history from 180 to 161 B.C., overlapping 1 Maccabees. In its present form, the book is a typical example of tragic historiography, though in content it is thoroughly Jewish. 1 Esdras is a problematic work that closely parallels and appears dependent upon a portion of 2 Chronicles (35:1–36:23), all of Ezra, and a section of Nehemiah (7:38–8:12). Josephus (ca. A.D. 37–100) was a Jewish historian who wrote two extensive historical works in Greek closely following the conventions of Hellenistic historiography. The shorter of the two works is Wars of the Jews, which in form is a Thucydidean war monograph focusing on the first Jewish revolt of A.D. 66–73. The longer work (in twenty books), Antiquities of the Jews, used the Roman Antiquities of Dionysius of Halicarnassus as a model. Josephus follows the conventions typical of the tragic historiography of his day.

Luke-Acts as Hellenistic History

Originally, Luke-Acts was composed as a two-volume work with each "book" (cf. Acts 1:1) roughly equal in size (the ancient Gk. and Lat. terms for "book," logos and volumen, referred to the contents of one papyrus roll). In spite of the fact that Luke was separated from Acts to form part of the fourfold Gospel, Luke-Acts must be regarded as a single literary work. While it is legitimate to compare the other Gospels with Greco-Roman biography, the subordination of Luke's first book to a larger literary structure means that it cannot be considered biography. Until quite recently, scholars were generally united in regarding the author of Luke-Acts as a historian. Occasionally, connections between Acts and the Greek novel (i.e., narrative fiction) have been explored. More recently, the theological concerns of the author have been emphasized by several scholars. Yet these three views are not really mutually incompatible. First of all, most Greco-Roman historians of the late Hellenistic period were really "tragic historians." Influenced by rhetoric, they wrote to entertain, an intention to which the discovery and presentation of historical truth were usually subordinated. Second, virtually all ancient historians wrote either for the purpose of moral edification or gave expression to one or another ideology or wrote with (sometimes blatant) propagandistic purposes.

Luke is capable of writing elegant Greek, as the two periodic sentences in Luke 1:1–4 and Acts 15:24–26 indicate. Luke used many literary forms within the framework of Luke-Acts, including historical prefaces (Luke 1:1–4; Acts 1:1–5), a genealogy in typically Hellenistic ascending order (latest descendant to earliest ancestor, Luke 3:23–38), symposia (Luke 7:36–50; 11:37–54; 14:1–24), travel narratives, “we” passages, speeches (Acts contains thirty-two speeches constituting 25 percent of the narrative), quoted documents, dramatic episodes (e.g., Luke 4:16–30; 24:13–25; Acts 25:13–26:32), digressions (e.g., Luke 3:23–38; Acts 17:21; 18:24–25), and summaries (e.g., Acts 2:46–47). Paralleling the contemporary preference for archaism, he wrote extensive passages in Septuagintal Greek (e.g., Luke 1:5–2:52). Luke made innovative use of ancient historiographical traditions by treating early Christianity on analogy to an ethnic group. Like Israelite and early Jewish historians, he focused on Palestine and particularly Jerusalem, yet, like the general or universal histories of Greco-Roman historiographical tradition, he selectively treated the history of early Christianity throughout the various lands of the ancient Mediterranean world.

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE

The term “apocalypse,” from a Greek word meaning “revelation,” is widely used as the name for a literary genre that primarily consists of a report of supernatural visionary experiences. The apocalypse is just one of many types of ancient revelatory literature. Judaism had canonical prophetic books (the end product of collections of edited oracles), testaments, revelatory dialogues, revelatory discourses, and revelatory revisions of Scripture as well as apocalypses. In the Greco-Roman world there were oracles, oracle collections, oracular dialogues, reports of dreams or visions, and procedures for magical revelation. While most surviving apocalypses originated in early Judaism from ca. 200 B.C. to A.D. 100, related forms of revelatory literature were also produced in Persia, Egypt, and in the Hellenistic world. Iranian and Hellenistic apocalypses tend to be included in larger, more encompassing literary forms, in contrast to Jewish and Greco-Egyptian apocalypses, which form independent literary compositions. Some apocalypses may reflect actual visionary experiences, while yet others appear to consist of fabricated vision reports using literary conventions characteristic of apocalyptic literature. Some works (like the Jewish 4 Ezra [another name for 2 Esdras 3–14] and the Christian Revelation and Shepherd of Hermas) seem to be combinations of visionary experience and literary artifice.

Early Jewish Apocalypses

Daniel is the only apocalypse in the OT, though sections of such prophetic books as Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah reflect the transition from prophecy to apocalyptic. Jewish apocalypses consist primarily of “autobiographical” vision reports mediated by an otherworldly revealer. Though usually related in the first person, all Jewish apocalypses are pseudonymous, that is, written in the name of famous ancient Israelites and set in periods centuries earlier than the actual date of composition. The substance of apocalyptic visions is highly symbolic, requiring question-and-answer dialogues between the visionary and an angelic interpreter. The visions, which reveal the events surrounding the end of the world and the secrets of the universe, are usually seen during the course of a guided tour through the heavens in which the ultimate goal is often the vision of God himself (e.g., 1 Enoch 1–13; 2 Enoch). In other apocalypses the visions are experienced in an earthly setting (e.g., Dan. 7–12; 4 Ezra; 2 Baruch). Jewish and other Near Eastern apocalypses usually function as protest literature, that is religious responses to social disorientation as well as political and economic oppression resulting from foreign occupation. Kingship in the ancient Near East was typically regarded as a divine institution upon which temporal prosperity depended. When native kings were overthrown, first by the Greeks and then by the Romans, the oppression and hardships that followed foreign domination were attributed to the interruption of the divine order. These wrongs were made right in eschatological fantasies in which a divinely appointed ruler or messiah was expected to appear, vanquish the foreign oppressors, and introduce an era of peace and prosperity.

Early Christian Apocalypses

In early Christianity, as in ancient Judaism, there was a tendency to create narrative accounts of eschatological events (e.g., Mark 13 and parallels; 2 Thess. 2:1–12; Did. 16). The Revelation to John, the only NT apocalypse, is the longest such narrative presented in the form of a single vision report extending from 4:9 to 22:11. The author has imposed a unifying literary structure on a variety of Jewish, Christian, and Greco-Roman sources and traditions. Unlike Jewish apocalypses, Revelation is not pseudonymous. For that reason the author does not conceal the true circumstances of composition but rather makes a special effort to relate his conception of the eschaton to the concrete situation of the seven churches to which he writes (Rev. 2-3). The three earliest Christian apocalypses reveal an increasing tendency to adopt the conventions of Hellenistic revelatory literature. The Jewish orientation of the Revelation to John is readily apparent. The Shepherd of Hermas (first half of the second century A.D.) combines Jewish with Hellenistic revelatory traditions, while the Apocalypse of Peter (ca. A.D. 135) is primarily dependent on Hellenistic revelatory conventions.

THE GOSPELS AND BIOGRAPHY

Since the earlier part of this century, the prevailing view among NT scholars has been that the Gospels represent a unique literary form created by early Christians to give expression to their faith with no real connections with ancient biographical literature. According to this view the oral kerygma (Gk., "proclamation") about Jesus (found in some evangelistic sermons in Acts, e.g., 10:34-43) was expanded by the addition of various kinds of discourse and narrative material to form the Gospel of Mark. More recently it has become apparent that the Gospels are much closer in form and function to Greco-Roman biographical literature than earlier scholars had recognized. Each of the four Gospels constitutes a Christian adaptation of the genre of Greco-Roman biography with distinctively Christian features.

Characteristics of Ancient Biography

The literary culture of ancient Israel never developed biography as an independent literary form, though OT narratives often focus on the lives and achievements of important political and religious personalities. The biographical literary forms that occur in early Judaism were largely borrowed and developed under Hellenistic influence (e.g., Philo's lives of Abraham, Joseph, and Moses). Even the twenty-two thumbnail sketches of various Israelite prophets presented in the anonymous first-century A.D. composition The Lives of the Prophets were probably composed in Greek (probably in Palestine) in a form analogous to the lives of the Greek poets (both are largely based on inferences from their works). Ancient character depiction, both east and west, had several common features: first, the focus is on a person's public rather than private life; second, people are depicted in conformity to types (i.e., as models of community values) rather than as individuals; and third, human personality was regarded as static and not subject to development. These three factors drive a wedge between ancient and modern biography.

Greek biography has its roots in the fifth century B.C. and continued to evolve through to the end of antiquity. The function of biography was the stereotypical presentation of a person whose life exhibited Hellenistic social and cultural values and hence was worthy of imitation. Ancient critics carefully distinguished between history and biography, but in the Greco-Roman period, when the role of individuals in history was emphasized, the conventional distinction between history and biography became increasingly blurred. The nineteenth-century German classical scholar Friedrich Leo proposed a twofold typology of ancient biography that, though oversimplified, has proven influential: first, Peripatetic biography (e.g., Plutarch's Lives) was a chronological presentation suitable for depicting the careers of generals and politicians. The words and deeds of the subjects form the basis for praising them and presenting them as examples for imitation. Second, Alexandrian biography (e.g., Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars) tended to favor a systematic or topical presentation of a person's career, a form particularly appropriate for writers and artists. This approach emphasized particular Hellenistic virtues (e.g., courage, justice) as exemplified by deeds.

Greco-Roman biographical literature was an inclusive genre that framed other shorter literary forms. One of the major features of ancient biography was the use of various types of anecdotes under the conviction that a person's words and deeds revealed his or her character. The very general term "anecdote" (which in Gk. literally means "not published," i.e., transmitted orally) includes such specific forms as chreiai, "anecdotes," gnomai, "maxims," and apomnemoneumata, "reminiscences." Many collections of anecdotes circulated under the names of various famous people, and they were used (sometimes simply by attributing them to the requisite individual) as raw material for writing biographies.

Biographical Features of the Gospels

The Gospel of Mark, the first written Gospel (ca. A.D. 70), has more generic similarities to Greco-Roman biography than to any literary form within Judaism. Recent research into the language of Mark suggests that it was written in a popular literary style, neither the language of everyday speech as reflected in the papyri nor the elevated Greek of the wealthy and educated. Matthew and Luke show clear signs of a tendency to make Mark more literary by improving his style and by adding material to the beginning and end of Mark's narrative, stories of Jesus' origin and of his resurrection appearances and (in the case of Luke) his ascension. In form, Mark and the other Gospels are Greco-Roman biographies, while in content they preserve distinctively Judeo-Christian conceptions. The distinctive literary features of the Gospels, then, are the result of the combination of Hellenistic biographical conventions with the unique Christian perspective on the significance of Jesus.

The synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke), like other Hellenistic biographies, incorporate a variety of constituent literary forms into their narratives. These include miracle stories, anecdotes (or chreiai and apomnemoneumata), sayings or aphorisms (gnomai), parables, and stories about Jesus. The content of the Gospels focuses on the ultimate religious claims made for Jesus on behalf of Christians, similar to the claims made for philosophers by Hellenistic biographers. The Jesus presented in the Gospels has a paradigmatic function since he both personifies and legitimates distinctively Christian beliefs and values, a function similar to that of the subjects of Greco-Roman biographies.

EPISTOLARY AND HOMILETIC LITERATURE

The letter was one of the more flexible of ancient literary forms. Almost any kind of written text could be framed by formal epistolary features and regarded as a letter.

Early Jewish Letters

The letter never quite achieved the status of an independent literary form in Israelite or Jewish literary culture. The only independent "letter" in the Apocrypha is the Letter of Jeremiah, which does not exhibit epistolary but rather sermonic form. Similarly, the pseudonymous Epistle of Aristaeus is not actually a letter but an apologetic narrative about the origin of the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures. The letter is used, however, as a constituent literary form and is frequently embedded in both historical and fictional narrative literature. Compared with the many studies devoted to Greek and Latin letters of antiquity (primarily documentary papyrus letters), Aramaic and Hebrew letters have been relatively neglected until recently, a fact primarily attributable to the paucity of surviving examples. The total number of Aramaic letters extant is about 120, primarily from the fifth and fourth centuries B.C.; six are embedded in the Aramaic portions of the OT; eight of the fifteen extant letters associated with Bar Kochba, the Jewish revolutionary leader, are in Aramaic, ca. A.D. 132–35. Nearly fifty Hebrew letters are extant, mostly from 630 to 586 B.C.; eleven are embedded in OT documents; five of the fifteen Bar Kochba letters are in Hebrew.

Greco-Roman Letters

The Greco-Roman letters that survive from antiquity fall roughly into three classes: first, documentary letters, actual common letters recovered, usually from ancient garbage dumps in Greco-Roman Egypt; second, literary letters, letters written by educated people of antiquity and preserved in repeatedly recopied collections and regarded as models of epistolary composition and artistic literary expression; and third, official letters, letters drafted in royal or imperial chanceries dealing with diplomatic, administrative, and other governmental concerns and that have survived through being inscribed on stone or by being quoted in historical works.

Early Christian Letters and Homilies

Twenty-one of the twenty-seven documents in the NT are letters; twelve of the fifteen writings by other early Christian leaders not in the NT but collectively designated the "apostolic fathers" are also letters. The letter was obviously the most popular literary form in early Christianity. The flexibility of the letter form in the Greco-Roman world was carried over into Christianity. Opening and closing epistolary formulas were used to frame a variety of literary forms. The Revelation to John, though framed as a letter (cf. 1:4–5; 22:21), is really an apocalypse. The first extant martyr act, the Martyrdom of Polycarp, is similarly framed as a circular letter. Two NT documents commonly regarded as letters appear to be written homilies or sermons. 1 John has no formal epistolary features, and Hebrews has only an epistolary postscript. Most ancient letters, like modern ones, were written substitutes for oral communication necessitated by the physical separation of the writer from the reader(s).

The formal features of early Christian letters, while primarily reflecting Hellenistic epistolography, also exhibit some Semitic influences. Paul's characteristic salutation, for example, "grace and peace," combines an apparent wordplay on the typical Greek epistolary salutation chairein, "greetings," with the Aramaic/Hebrew epistolary salutation shalom, "peace." Further, Judaism had developed religious circular letters or encyclicals, which served both administrative and liturgical purposes (e.g., Esther 9:20–32; 2 Macc. 1:1–10; 1:11–2:18). After the process of reconstructing had begun after the debacle of A.D. 70, rabbinic authorities such as Gamaliel II directed encyclicals to various groups of Diaspora Jews (e.g., b. Sanh. 18d; cf. 2 Bar. 77:19–26; 78:1–86:3); these have formal parallels with James, 1 and 2 Peter, and Jude, which are pseudonymous Christian encyclicals.

Early Christian letters tend to be more complex than most documentary, literary, or official Greco-Roman letters. They, like biography and the major types of historical writing, constitute an inclusive literary genre used to frame a variety of shorter literary forms. NT Letters contain a variety of constitutive literary forms, some of which must have been transmitted orally before they were preserved by being inserted into a letter. These include liturgical forms (grace benedictions, blessings, doxologies, hymns, confessions, eucharistic and baptismal sequences), kerygmatic formulas, and instructional forms (virtue and vice lists, codes of household ethics).

Some NT Letters are pseudepigraphical, i.e., written under the name of such famous Christian leaders as Paul, James, Peter, and Jude to gain a wider acceptance. Pseudonymity was an ancient literary phenomenon that originated primarily in Greco-Roman literary culture. While Israelite literary convention included anonymity, it was not until the Hellenistic period that pseudonymity came into vogue, primarily in connection with the writing of apocalypses in the names of ancient Israelite worthies. Pseudepigraphical compositions in early Christianity, as in the Greco-Roman world, were presented as written by someone other than the putative author. The widespread use of this phenomenon in antiquity generally, and in early Christianity in particular, suggests that many authors regarded pseudonymity as a justifiable expedient if the purpose for which they wrote was sufficiently important. There is widespread agreement among scholars that among the Pauline Letters, Ephesians and the pastoral Letters (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus) are certainly pseudonymous, while Colossians and 2 Thessalonians may be. Similarly, four of the seven general Letters are widely thought to be pseudonymous: James, 1 and 2 Peter, and Jude. Pseudonymity, which characterizes as many as ten of the twenty-seven documents in the NT, was a transitional way of dealing with the crisis in authority occasioned by the passing of the apostolic generation.

The relationship of the composition and structure of NT Letters to Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions is a subject that has only recently become the focus of scholarly research. Hellenistic rhetoricians described three types of rhetoric: judicial (the attempt to convince a court about past events), deliberative (the attempt to persuade an assembly about what to do in the future), and epideictic (entertaining oratory that celebrates common values). Ancient letter writers with some education automatically applied their rhetorical training in the composition of letters. Several handbooks on epistolary theory have survived that reflect the influence of rhetoric and provide model letters (e.g., Ps.-Demetrius On Style 4.223–35, and Ps.-Libanius Epistolary Styles).

Most early Christian letters have a basically deliberative character, though often they combine several epistolary functions. NT Letters with a primary function include Philemon and 3 John, both of which are basically letters of recommendation. 1 Thessalonians is primarily instructional but includes a focus on consolation (4:13–18). Galatians has been regarded by some as an apologetic letter (i.e., an aspect of juridical rhetoric), by others as a letter of advice (i.e., following the rules of deliberative rhetoric), and by still others as a combination of the two types. Romans is also problematic, for some scholars have proposed that it is an epideictic letter, while others have suggested that it is either apologetic or hortatory or even a combination of all three types. It is to be hoped that further research will clarify these questions.

Bibliography

- Aune, D. E. The New Testament in Its Literary Environment. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987.
- Charlesworth, J. H., ed. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. 2 vols. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983, 1985.
- Collins, J. J. Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora. New York: Crossroad, 1983.
- Grant, F. C. Roman Hellenism and the New Testament. New York: Scribner, 1962.
- Hengel, M. Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine During the Early Hellenistic Period. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974.
- Lesky, A. A History of Greek Literature. Translated by J. Willis and C. de Heer. New York: Crowell, 1966.
- Schürer, E. The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ. Vol. 3, part 1. New English version. Revised and edited by G. Vermes, F. Millar, and M. Goodman. Edinburgh: Clark, 1986.
- Stone, M. E., ed. Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period. Vol. 2, section 2 of Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984.

THE BIBLE AND ITS INTERPRETERS: JEWISH BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

M I C H A E L F I S H B A N E

INTRODUCTION

Judaism is an exegetical religious culture par excellence, and the Hebrew Bible constitutes its foundation document and principal text. For over two millennia it has been reinterpreted for simple meaning, for spiritual-moral guidance, for theoretical insight, and for legal applicability. Whether one turns to the classical halakic (legal) or haggadic (theological-moral) texts of late antiquity (→ Haggadah; Halakah), to the homilies or synagogue poetry of medieval times, or to philosophical theologies and mystical theosophies of all periods, the matter is the same. Biblical exegesis either serves as the explicit structural feature of the composition at hand or as its implicit religious foundation. It has therefore been rightly observed that the majority of postbiblical literature is, in some way, an interpretation of the Hebrew Bible.

The reason for this is both simple and far-reaching. As with other book religions (like Christianity and Islam, and in certain respects even Hinduism), Judaism places a sacred Scripture at the very center of its religious life. Indeed, for Judaism, the Hebrew Bible is the sacred textual source of religious authority. This authority, in turn, derives from the belief that this Scripture is rooted in a divine source. It was presumed and believed from early rabbinic times in the first century A.D. that Scripture was an inexhaustible source of truth and meaning—only awaiting the creative human labor of exegesis for its full explication and adaptation.

INNER-BIBLICAL EXEGESIS

The contents of the Hebrew Bible have come to constitute (through exegesis) the prescriptive norms for behavior and the basis for all theological attitudes in Judaism. To be sure, such a notion of a comprehensive Sinaitic revelation did not develop with one masterstroke. A close examination of the Hebrew Bible discloses, in fact, that this document bears witness to a concern for the reinterpretation of its legal and nonlegal content already in ancient Israel itself. Materials perceived to be inexplicit, incomplete, or otherwise inadequate for ongoing religious life were variously explicated or revised. Significantly, these innovations and amendments were not represented as an independent exegetical tradition—complementary or supplementary to revelatory authority. They were, rather, incorporated within Scripture itself. But with the closure of the canon in early rabbinic times, this practice necessarily changed: exegesis then became part of nonbiblical literature.

The range of inner-biblical exegesis is surprisingly diverse. It includes such broad types as scribal, legal, theological, and prophetic exegesis. Within the first type, for example, there is evidence for an ongoing concern to explain or clarify the meaning of older words and the identity of ancient place-names. Thus the clarification of the general term kilayim (Heb., “mixtures”) in Lev. 19:19 by the more specific term sha’tnez shows an early attempt to specify the types of textile mixtures proscribed. The later explication of sha’tnez as “wool and flax” in Deut. 22:11 shows that, in time, this word had also become obscure and was in need of comment.

Such supplementations into the received tradition illustrate one of the main purposes of inner-biblical exegesis: to clarify or adapt the received tradition while also preserving the authority of its instruction and formulation. This feature is found in many examples of legal exegesis. According to one type, where the law was unknown or inadequate, a new divine revelation was sought, received, and added to the divine corpus (cf. Lev. 24:10–23; Num. 9:14). In other cases, divine authority was safeguarded by the inclusion of supplementary addenda into the original law (cf. Exod. 23:9–11; Lev. 25:1–7). Even where these expansions are signaled by explicit formulas, the new element is presented as part of the revealed law, not as a human exegetical stratum. Similar considerations pertain to the book of Deuteronomy.

The overall tendency to preserve the integrity of the Sinaitic revelation continues into the latest biblical strata. For example, blatant contradictions with respect to the paschal offering in our pentateuchal sources are harmonized and re-presented as Mosaic law (2 Chron.

35:11–13). But a new feature is also at work. 2 Chron. 30:2–3 is clearly an attempt to reinterpret and apply an earlier revealed addendum to defer the Passover ceremony (Num. 9:10–14) based solely on human authority. No recourse is made to divine authority even though the new situation is decidedly not identical with the older one.

In addition to scribal and legal exegesis, there are also many examples of theological interpretation in the Hebrew Bible, as well as the reinterpretation and reapplication of old prophecies. In the first case, laws (like the law dealing with remarriage in Deut. 24:1–4) are often spiritualized or adapted for new homiletical purposes (cf. Jer. 3:1–5), and in the second case, oracles that had not been fulfilled were often reapplied to later times. The successive application of Jeremiah's seventy-year prophecy (Jer. 25:9–11) in postexilic literature, especially Daniel 9, is a case in point.

In sum, this early reflex of "biblical exegesis" anticipates several rabbinic concerns of later times: the protection of the divine authority of the laws, the tendency to obscure human innovations, the reapplication of old laws and prophecies, and, especially, the gradual emergence of an explicit exegetical culture. This latter feature is particularly evident in postexilic times; for not only were Ezra and his levitical aides involved in the explication of legal obscurities (Neh. 8), they were also engaged in polemical exegesis. Indeed, their attempts to sanction the exclusion of certain groups from intermarriage with the "community of the Exile" (the returnees) strike a new chord: group maintenance and integrity were now argued and assured via scriptural exegesis (cf. Ezra 9).

FROM ANTIQUITY TO THE REDACTION OF THE TALMUD (ca. 200 B.C.–A.D. 500)

By the postexilic period, then, most of the procedures and tendencies of later Jewish exegesis were well under way. The older sacerdotal structures of the pre-exilic period gave way in the Exile, so that new emphasis was placed—by the priests and increasingly the laity—on public teaching and interpretation of the Torah. In addition, the national decentralization brought on by the Exile sponsored diverse postexilic communities. Each of these groups laid claim to the same scriptural authority but differed radically as to its proper meaning and application. Clearly the Torah required interpretation for the sake of its ongoing vitality and authority. But how was it to be supplemented, and what was to constitute the proper reading tradition?

The deep crisis of religious continuity that underlies such questions was ominous—both for the immediate sectarian developments and for the history of Judaism generally, for at root was the fundamental claim of the diverse post-exilic communities to be the true heir of biblical Israel. In this context, the interpretation of Scripture took a new and fateful turn. It became the cutting edge of group boundaries, even as it provided the content of new religious behaviors, ideas, and hopes.

The Dead Sea Scrolls found at Qumran give paradigmatic expression to these issues. An initiate into the Qumran community was progressively introduced to its unique methods of exegesis, so that to grow in knowledge and authority in this group was inextricably bound up with accepting its claim to the true meanings of Scripture (CD 15:10–13). It is reported that the founder-teacher was granted divine guidance in the exposition of the laws of Moses. As a result, two Torahs were distinguished: the exoteric Torah, revealed to all Israel at Sinai, and an esoteric one known only to the covenanters and the basis of their legal behavior (1QS 5:7–12; 8:15–16; CD 3:12–16). The secret meanings and applications of the ancient prophecies were also revealed to the founder-teacher—as the remarkable peshar literature (commentaries explaining the hidden meaning of OT texts) of this group attests. It was the covenanters' conviction that their legal-ritual life and future expectations would be vindicated in the imminent final days.

The crucial relationship between right interpretation and right observance cannot be underestimated. At stake was the "true meaning" of the divine word. It is recorded, for example, that one early (proto?) Pharisaic group refused to share food with other pious Jews who did not conform to their ultrameticulous food regulations. Along different lines, the Sadducees mocked the Pharisees who "afflict themselves" (with the oral law). The derogation and refutation of the religious claims of rival groups through a condemnation of their modes of exegesis is a recurrent feature in NT sources as well (Matt. 15:1–3; Mark 7:1–3; Col. 2:8; 1 Tim. 6:3–4).

In time, one of these groups, the Pharisees, put forward a remarkable claim—one that was to be of inestimable significance for the history of rabbinic Judaism. Their claim was that their particular exegetical tradition had Sinaitic origins, that it was divinely given at Sinai to Moses, side by side with the written Torah, and that it had been preserved through an unbroken chain of transmission. This opinion was nothing short of revolutionary. The mythicization and retrojection of Pharisaic exegetical claims back to Sinai gave normative sanction to two Torahs—one and inseparable: an oral Torah and a written Torah. Indeed, if Judaism can be said to endorse a notion of progressive revelation, one would at least have to find it here. Whatever a scholar would claim via exegetical diligence, it was said, was already given at Sinai. When God spoke “all these words” (Exod. 20:1) at Sinai, said Rabbi Elazar ben Azariah, he spoke the exterior Torah and the various—even contradictory!—words of human exegesis (b. Hag. 3a–b). Oral Torah is thus a progressive unfolding of the mysterious plenitude of the original divine revelation. “Turn it [i.e., Scripture], and turn it again,” says an early source, “for all is contained therein” (m. ’Abot 5:22). The notion of a continuous revelation even found this remarkable formulation in later times: “The Holy One, Blessed is He, speaks Torah out of the mouths of all rabbis” (b. Hag. 15b).

Throughout the Tannaitic period—that is, from Hasmonean times up to the codification of law in the Mishnah (ca. 200 B.C.–ca. A.D. 200)—the Hebrew Bible was the central preoccupation of Jewish exegesis. At the beginning, some of the most basic exegetical tasks were performed by the Sopherim, or scribes. These scholars were concerned with such matters as establishing the fixed wording of Scripture and the punctuation and phrasing of words and sentences. Many of their textual and contextual observations were continued by the explanations and semantic observations of the ancient rabbis.

The earliest legal exegesis (the halakic midrashim) in, for example, the Sipra and Sipre (classical rabbinic commentaries on Leviticus and Numbers respectively) reflect other procedures that had been developed to derive new applications from the old law, as well as new understanding of the plain sense of the text. The most notable difference between these new modes and the early “Sopheric” style of exegesis lies in their expanded notion of scriptural context. From a concern only with individual words or phrases, the sages turned to the entirety of Scripture as the context for their exegetical observations and correlations. This led to new types of exegetical logic and method. For example, although Exod. 13:16 states that divine teachings should be a sign “upon your hand,” it is not stated whether the right hand or the left is meant. As this prescription was the textual basis of the ritual of donning phylacteries (small boxes containing scriptural phrases), this was no theoretical matter. The matter was resolved through a comparison of other scriptural passages where frequently “right” is in parallelism with “arm.” The neutral word “arm” was thus deduced to refer to the left arm also here (cf. Sipre Deut., 67). But despite this, it must also be noted that not all the legal rulings legitimated by scriptural reference are really exegetically derived. In some cases, it appears that these references merely serve as mnemonic guides for the legal scholars.

Diverse schools of Bible exegesis developed, and hermeneutical techniques became standardized. Among the most prominent exegetes of the first centuries were Rabbi Ishmael, who emphasized that the exegesis of Scripture must follow common usage and meaning, and Rabbi R. Akiba, who utilized every jot and tittle of the biblical text for exegetical derivations. The latter technique is traditionally traced to Nahum Gimzo. In the chain of exegetical method leading from Nahum Gimzo to Akiba, a momentous development occurred: Hillel (first century A.D.) formulated a list of hermeneutical middot (Heb., exegetical techniques; lit., “measures”). Rabbi Ishmael extended this classification to thirteen (Sipra, 3a). The categories are formal in nature and use analogical, elucidative, and syllogistic forms of argumentation. Among the types of procedures used, one may mention klal u-ḥalal (“general and specific,” i.e., when a general formulation is followed by a specific one) or gezerah shavah (“grammatical similarity,” when diverse passages are correlated on the basis of morphological similarities in the language used). These and other types use forms of deductive and inductive reasoning.

A strong formal resemblance has been observed between these old rabbinic hermeneutical rules and contemporary Greco-Roman techniques of rhetoric. In addition, the impact of the methods and terminology of the Alexandrine scribes cannot be disregarded. Quite certainly, the rationalization of methods of Jewish biblical exegesis at this time was part of a larger cultural enterprise that embraced the entire region. Classical antiquity was at an end, and its traditions were being reevaluated and reinterpreted. Homer and Bible gave way to Stoic philosophy and rabbinic exegesis.

The intense preoccupation with Scripture was not limited to legal matters. In addition to these, a broad species of haggadic midrashim (moral and homiletical interpretations of the Hebrew Bible) is preserved in the relatively early and great collections known as Genesis Rabbah and Leviticus Rabbah (compiled during the fourth and fifth centuries A.D.). This literature is replete with evidence of an at once playful and highly serious hermeneutical imagination. Philological and syntactical matters are repeatedly taken up; so too are matters of custom, moral behavior, and theology. As with legal midrash, so with the haggadic—there is the strong presupposition that Scripture is a seamless web. The exegete is permitted and encouraged to move back and forth across its surface, connecting texts and reconnecting them, harmonizing the contradictory and bringing the seemingly discordant into patterns of new and surprising concordance.

Through the vast exegetical enterprise, it is clear that the interpretation of Scripture is a cultural product. Many rabbis commented on diverse verses, and sometimes on a large sequence of them, but no extensive running commentary was produced by any one individual. To the extent that continuous commentaries do exist in this formative phase of classical Judaism, they do so as a cultural product, as anthologies organized around the structure of Scripture—comprising the opinions, observations, and sermonic présis of many scholars. This is a matter of immense significance. Scripture was the organizing prism of the people: it gave focus, structure, and of course authority to the theological speculations, the moral values, and the folk customs of the nation of Israel.

One counterdevelopment deserves comment. Though the Hebrew Bible remained authoritative for ancient halakic and haggadic exegesis, the legal corpus known as the Mishnah (redacted ca. A.D. 200) is a major classical text without an explicit scriptural and exegetical foundation. The formal and abstract style of the document may have derived from the influence of Roman legal style. In any case, because of the prestige of the Mishnah among the sages who continued the legal tradition, all parts of this legal document were quickly subjected to acute analysis. A dominant feature of subsequent Talmudic discussions, in fact, is the attempt to provide or establish the implicit biblical justification of the Mishnaic rulings. Proceeding along a different course, the exegetical discussions in such early collections as Sipra and Sipre started from the scriptural passages themselves and demonstrate how many of the rabbinic rules are derived from them. Both trends reflect a return to, and reemphasis on, biblical legal exegesis.

Concern with the peshat, the literal or plain sense of Scripture, and the derash, the halakic and haggadic modes of exegesis, did not exhaust the modalities of Jewish Bible exegesis in antiquity. Two other types are found: the allegorical and the mystical.

Like the peshat and derash, allegory arises as a result of a crisis in reading—where the text appears opaque or insufficient—for the allegorical impetus does not so much arise from problematics perceived when a text is viewed in its own right as from the encounter between an authoritative text and an attractive and religiously approachable body of religious or philosophical thought. The most notable example of this in Jewish antiquity is reflected in the works of Philo (ca. 20 B.C.–A.D. 50). Like his fellow intellectuals in Alexandria, Philo was confronted with the philosophic sublimity of Stoic–

Middle Platonic thought and its apparently fundamental difference from the teachings of the Hebrew Bible. Faced with this clash of values, Philo (like other biblical allegorists before and since) engaged in a remarkable exegetical strategy: he read one thought-world (the Stoic-philosophical) in terms of another (the biblical-traditional). The result is a mode of syncretistic exegesis that harmonized these competing thought claims and established them as diverse levels of meaning. There is thus both the surface sense to Scripture and its hyponoia, a Greek term meaning its deeper and more spiritual sense. Significantly, this recognition (or assertion) of different levels of scriptural sense did not serve to eclipse the authority of the biblical text. It actually strengthened that claim, for the Stoic and other philosophical truths were not simply harmonized with or exegetically attributed to Torah; they were now dialectically discovered to be inherent in its very nature. Scripture is thus the best of books, for it is a book of many senses, including the philosophical. Correspondingly, philosophy is no alien product or challenge to biblical tradition but part of its comprehensive truth.

Philo's exegesis is profound and subtle. Human personages like Abraham and Sarah become figures of ethical-spiritual virtues; sacrificial rituals or images, like the cherubim, are read as guides to inner piety; legal texts, like the prescription to flee to the city of refuge, are construed in terms of the spiritual quest for God; and narratives, like the garden of Eden and the sin of Adam, are transformed into spiritual patterns that the discerning mind might use to perceive its proper place in Universal Mind, the true City of Man. Correctly read, then, the biblical text was nothing short of a spiritual-philosophical document, an expression of divine wisdom given to humanity to guide its perfectibility.

The capacity of the biblical text to sponsor new and unexpected levels of meaning is nowhere more evident than in mystical exegesis, whose main lines are observable from Tannaitic times. Typical are the ancient mystical interpretations of the Song of Songs. These love lyrics were read in a mystical sense, disclosing theological truths and providing descriptions of the Godhead. Thus, to enter the chambers of the beloved is to ascend into the recesses of the Divine Being; the physical description of the groom in the Song (5:10–16) was understood to veil the actual structure of the divine anthropos! In this way, mystical Bible exegesis served to reveal the illimitable depths of God himself. For it, the face of Scripture is nothing less than the surface play of divine mysteries, the outer map, as it were, of mystical visions and journeys. All this the mystic knows from experience; his exegesis merely confirms it.

THE MEDIEVAL PHASE TO THE ONSET OF MODERN TIMES (A.D. 800–1700)

The four levels of scriptural meaning that developed in the early classical period anticipate their more sophisticated permutations in the Middle Ages. Indeed, the very concept of a multiple, fourfold meaning of Scripture is only first referred to in Jewish mystical texts from the thirteenth century, quite likely because of contemporary trends in Christian exegesis. From the fourteenth century these four senses were referred to by the acronym PaRDeS ("paradise garden"), which stands for the Peshat (plain sense), the Remez (implied or allegorical sense), the Derash (halakic and haggadic exegesis), and the Sod (mystical sense) of Scripture. The widespread use of the term PaRDeS in Jewish sources does not, of course, mean that each level was equally valorized by all groups in all periods. But the acronym does signal a view of Torah and exegesis as the very source and method of all realizable Jewish truth.

The work of Rabbi Abraham Ibn Ezra (A.D. 1089–1164) is particularly characteristic of a Spanish trend toward rational, lexicographical exegesis and the attempt to write a systematic commentary. In the introduction to his Bible commentary, Ibn Ezra discusses the allegorical, midrashic, and Karaite approaches that preceded him and witheringly attacks their styles and conclusions. As for his own method, he says, "I shall be unbiased concerning the Torah and shall [first] investigate the grammatical form of each word with my full ability and then explain its meaning to what extent I am able." Since there are seventy "faces" to Torah, he goes on, the literal approach does not displace the midrashic interpretation, but when "it comes to the laws, rules, and regulations," the opinion "which is in accord with the bearer of Tradition [namely, the rabbis]" must be relied upon. "For God forbid that we get involved with the Sadducean [namely, Karaite!] contention which claims that [rabbinic] Tradition contradicts Scripture and grammar." Ibn Ezra was also greatly exercised by scriptural contradictions and blatant anachronisms in the text (see his comments on Gen. 12:6).

But for all his exegetical zeal for the peshat as the most valid method for recovering the ancient philological and historical sense of Scripture, Ibn Ezra was also a traditional Jew—and thus also recognized that his exegetical enterprise was ultimately subservient to the halakic basis of the community. He therefore remarked that, as a matter of principle, he would accept the legal derash of a passage in those cases where his method (of peshat) would contradict the meaning of a law as interpreted and practiced by the religious community. In this he was not alone. Similar considerations are referred to by Ibn Ezra's great Franco-German contemporary, Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (A.D. 1080–1160, known as Rashbam). He too was a devoted advocate of the peshat sense and advocated it above all others. "I have not come to interpret the halakic rules, even though they are of the essence . . . but I have rather come to interpret the peshat of Scripture, and [thus] I shall interpret laws and halakic rules by rational sense" (see his introduction to the laws of Exod. 21–23).

In this celebration of the peshat, Rashbam took a more determined and methodological position than his celebrated grandfather, Rashi (Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, A.D. 1040–1105), who had been the first in northern France to advocate the peshat sense over the derash (cf. Rashi on Gen. 3:18; 33:20; although in actual practice the two methods are not fully distinguishable in all cases). This determination and methodological rigor even led Rashbam to provide the peshat of a passage even where it appears to diverge from the halakic derash (cf., e.g., his comments on Exod. 22:6). As is now clear, this strong emphasis on the literal, plain sense of the text was part of a larger historical development at this time—particularly noticeable in Christianity. Increasingly, reliance upon the traditional readings of Scripture was deemphasized in certain circles, and the achievements of human reason were privileged.

Medieval Spain was also the scene of another development: philosophical exegesis. If, as stated earlier, allegory is an exegesis born of a conflict between competing thought-worlds, the renewed recourse to remez by Jews who felt the keen challenge of Neoplatonic and Aristotelian philosophy is more than understandable. Since the works of Philo had long been lost to Jewish thought, the new conceptions that developed seemed little short of revolutionary. The Bible was now perceived as a book capable of bringing the adept to ultimate spiritual felicity, for it could guide the adept toward a rational, contemplative love of the God of the philosophers.

The work of Maimonides (A.D. 1135–1204) is a paradigmatic expression of this overall trend. He not only begins his magisterial Guide for the Perplexed with lexicographical considerations but actually devotes forty-seven chapters to a reexamination of the language of Scripture in an effort to reconcile it with philosophical truth. Though drawing upon older considerations regarding the appropriate use of metaphorical interpretation (ta'wil), Maimonides, who was much influenced by Islamic philosophy, put more emphasis on the distinction between the "inner" (batin) and "apparent" (zahir) levels of textual meaning than was common in contemporary Islamic philosophical circles. This disinction (based on an inner-Islamic development of ta'wil to include doctrinal matters) helped him resolve several issues at once. Not only was Maimonides well aware that the written Torah often presents God in highly anthropomorphic and anthropopathic images, which ostensibly violate and preclude a proper philosophical understanding, he was also highly conscious that even philosophical discourse, due to the inherent limitations of language, is often in need of literary figures and tropes (e.g., parables or similes). This Gordian knot was thus deftly cut by the realization that though the masses require figures and tend to read the surface images of Scripture literally, they would not thereby be led astray from the truth. As a divinely revealed teaching, the exterior level of Scripture is sufficient to guide the faithful to spiritual and moral excellence. Nevertheless, this level merely conceals the deeper and philosophically superior one, which establishes "the truth in all its reality."

Maimonides' method produced violent controversy in France and Germany. Though he himself did not disclaim the plain sense of Scripture and wrote a code of halakic observance, it was feared that focus on the inner, spiritual level of Scripture would subtly undermine the public spirituality of Judaism, based as it is on the performance of the divine commandments.

Nahmanides (1194–1274) was asked to mediate this acrimonious dispute, and his great prestige did in fact prove conciliatory. He was a man of vast erudition and interests—a fact reflected in the new style of synthetic commentary that he produced. Nahmanides' exegetical work entered into fruitful—if prolix—debate with the received opinions of his predecessors, from the ancient sages to Rashi and Ibn Ezra. Typically, his argumentation turns on the context and sequence of biblical language. But he did not stop there. Beyond "the way of peshat" and rabbinic legal exegesis, Nahmanides again and again drops hints about "the way of Truth"—the mystical sense (sod) of Scripture.

The Book of Splendor or the Zohar (thirteenth century) is the classical source of medieval Spanish Kabbala (mysticism). Though giving evidence of literal and figurative exegesis, its biblical expositions focus particularly on the luminous truths of sod. The early Kabbalists saw this as the fourth level of PaRDeS—hidden within the shell of outer meanings like the core of a nut, like the seeds of a pomegranate. In another image, sod is personified as the Shekina—or indwelling feminine aspect of God—who is veiled in the exterior garments of exoteric textual sense. This divine Bride beckons even through the plain sense of peshat. For those who can respond, the textual tokens of her bidding lend exegesis a deep erotic drive and yearning—one that is no less than the love of God—to unveil Scripture and robe the Bride in the garments of mystical splendor (see Zohar 2:99 a–b).

Insofar as the mundane Torah is, in truth, a condensation of God in his infinite mystery, the Torah pulses with rhythms of the divine potencies that structure the cosmos. Exegesis thus begets entry into the mysteries and guides a spiritual journey into the emanationist structure of the Godhead. It is a subtle decoding of Torah or, better, a recoding of it into the theological truth that the mystic has been privileged to see. Accordingly, every person and every event described in Scripture—even the most apparently meaningless, like the genealogies of Genesis 36—veils the vitality of the divine. And insofar as the structure of the cosmos is perceived as a divine Anthropos whose earthly reflex is Man, mystical ascent into the recesses of God is also descent into the corresponding depths of the self.

POSTMEDIEVAL AND CONTEMPORARY TRENDS (A.D. 1700–THE PRESENT)

Among the many striking patterns in the history of Judaism is the conjunction of its transformative moments with renewed vigor in biblical exegesis. New spiritual developments or crises continuously sponsored new views of Torah, revelation, and exegesis. This holds, as well, for the modern world—and all the complex spiritual transformations that have unfolded. Let us begin with Hassidism, the popular and late heir of Kabbala. Beginning in the mid-eighteenth century, this pietist movement has produced astonishingly subtle rereadings of Scripture and has guided Jews in exploring new levels of psychospiritual inwardness. For example, where the psalmist once cried, "Do not abandon me in old age," the Baal Shem Tov, the founder of the movement, is reported to have found here a watchword against spiritual aging. Now the text is an agonized plea for divine aid against the decrepitudes of ennui and routine in divine service.

In the more rationalist circles of the Enlightenment and post-Enlightenment period, the works produced reflect different exegetical trends. Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86) and his colleagues produced a commentary (called Bi'ur) that mixed philological economy and traditional perspectives. It focused on the peshat and gave considerable attention to aesthetic matters, as was fashionable at the time, though it clearly did not give expression to the new critical-historical temper of biblical studies then developing in Germany. These matters only begin to appear in Jewish commentaries with S. D. Luzzatto (1800–1865), of Italy. Hereby Jews were exposed to the liberal text-critical and historical assumptions of modern Bible scholarship—though hardly in the strident and radical forms then emerging in Europe. But as the Documentary Hypothesis took on its classical shape, and the religious-historical implications of this method of treating Scripture as any ancient document penetrated the traditional community, rebuttals were soon formulated. Perhaps the most thoughtful and penetrating was that of the important rabbinic scholar D. Z. Hoffmann (1843–1921), who also produced a significant series of commentaries on the books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy that combined in a distinctive manner traditional rabbinic perspectives and literary-critical observations.

Among liberal and secular Jews, the methods and achievements of biblical scholarship have been taken up without apology, though with varying nuances and emphasis. Inquiries into the biblical text have encouraged Jews to see their religious and national past in a new light. This has often meant an emphasis on certain aspects of biblical thought—like ethical monotheism and prophetic polemic against injustice—that serve nontraditional ideology. Thus, matters of ritual or national parochialism have been disregarded in favor of nonritual and universal values.

The relationship between Bible study and ideology has also had its reflexes in the secular and national realm. Thus, the massive reevaluation of the Documentary Hypothesis from a liberal-critical perspective, also influenced by national values, marks the voluminous achievement of Yehezkel Kaufmann (1889–1963). His refocus on the antiquity of monotheism and of many literary strands generally thought to be late gave new emphasis to the independence and integrity of Israel's ancient achievement.

An attempt to recapture the religious power of the Bible without abandoning critical sensitivities has been the achievement of Martin Buber (1878–1965) and Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929). Both in their common Bible translation and in various books and essays, a close attention to the power of biblical language was felt to be a first step to transcending the crisis of a religious reading of the Bible for modern, nontraditional Jews. Such attention would lead, they felt, beyond the cant of "critical orthodoxies" to more penetrating literary and religious levels, even to an encounter with the divine presence. In this way, the Bible would open modern Jews to a new encounter with Israel's ancient God of history and holiness—though, to be sure, the sensibilities thus acquired would be related to the demands of the contemporary historical hour.

Bibliography

Fishbane, M. Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel. Oxford: Clarendon, 1985.

Idel, M. "Infinites of Torah in Kabbalah." In Midrash and Literature. Edited by G. Hartman and S. Budick. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.

Rosenthal, E. I. J. "The Study of the Bible in Medieval Judaism." In The Cambridge History of the Bible. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963–70. Vol. 2, pp. 252–79.

Sarna, N. "Hebrew and Bible Studies in Medieval Spain." In The Sephardi Heritage. Edited by R. Barnett. London: Vellentine-Mitchell, 1971. Pp. 323–66.

Vermes, G. "Bible and Midrash." In The Cambridge History of the Bible. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963–70. Vol. 1, pp. 199–231.

THE BIBLE AND ITS INTERPRETERS: CHRISTIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

ROBERT L. WILKEN

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN AND PATRISTIC PERIOD (FIRST TO NINTH CENTURIES A.D.)

The Bible, like other classics of religion and literature, does not disclose its meaning without interpretation. The interpreter must know the language in which the text is written (or possess a reliable translation), identify names and places, understand stylistic conventions (metaphors and similes), and have some familiarity with the historical circumstances surrounding the text. For Christians, however, the Bible is also sacred Scripture. It is a holy book whose history narrates the story of salvation and whose teachings impart divine wisdom. As one medieval commentator put it: "The subject matter of all the Divine Scriptures is the work of restoration." It is the only book that is read regularly by Christians in public worship. It is at once a historical document and a book of faith handed on in the churches, and its interpretation has been shaped by the worship, practice, and teachings of the Christian communities. Even the texts that seem to yield their meaning readily depend on a tradition of understanding.

The earliest Christians were Jews for whom the Scriptures (i.e., the Jewish Bible, which was to become the Christian OT) was a living book. It was read in the synagogues, used as a guide for communal and personal life, and cited as an authority in debates. The necessity of interpreting these Scriptures had spawned a rich literature in the centuries prior to the beginning of Christianity, and it was these exegetical traditions that set the tone and spirit of early Christian interpretation.

Through the medium of Jewish exegetical traditions, the Jewish Bible and its history and prophecies provided a framework in which to view Jesus' death and resurrection, and in time belief in Christ began to transform the interpretation of these same Scriptures. Events (e.g., the Exodus), persons (e.g., Abraham), places (e.g., Sinai), and things (e.g., manna) now came to have a new dimension. The rock from which the Israelites drank in the desert (Num. 20) was now thought to represent Christ, and the deliverance through the Sea of Reeds (Red Sea) was now seen to foreshadow Christian baptism (1 Cor. 10:1-5).

Much of the study of the history of biblical interpretation has concentrated on the "method" employed by different interpreters. But already in the NT there is no consistent exegetical method even for a specific writer. More often than not, use rather than method shaped interpretation. Matthew quotes Jer. 31:15, for example, "A voice was heard in Ramah, wailing and loud lamentation," a lament over the exiles in Babylon, to mourn the murder of the male children in Bethlehem after Jesus' birth ("the holy innocents") by Herod (Matt. 3:16). Paul cites a law from Deuteronomy (25:4), "You shall not muzzle an ox when it is treading out the grain," to affirm his rights as an apostle (1 Cor. 9:8-12). In Galatians he allegorizes Abraham's two wives, Sarah and Hagar, to signify the two covenants, the one of freedom and the other of bondage. Other writers employ typology, e.g., the lifting up of the brazen serpent (Num. 21:4-9), to relate Christ's death on the cross to a scriptural event (John 3:14; cf. Barn. 12). Method is subservient to use.

The most perplexing and persistent problem for early Christian interpreters arose out of the relation of Christianity to the Jewish Scriptures. The first Christians were Jews who observed the Jewish law, but at an early stage Gentiles began to join the new communities, and in a very short time it became clear that one could not impose the Law on new converts who were not Jewish. Giving up observance of the Law was to create a particularly vexing problem for Christian exegesis. Moses had written: "You shall not add to the word which I command you, nor take from it; that you may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you" (Deut. 4:2). Furthermore, Jesus had observed the Law and had said, "I say to you, till heaven and earth pass away, not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the Law until all is accomplished" (Matt. 5:18). Some Christians continued to observe the Jewish law, but most did not. How, then, asked the early interpreters, does one interpret those texts, especially in the Pentateuch, that enjoin observance of the Law?

In the writings of the NT (esp. Galatians, 2

Corinthians, Matthew, Hebrews) Christians had already addressed this question, and in the second century it emerged as a central theme in The Letter of Barnabas and in Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho. These works offered the first detailed Christian interpretation of texts from the Jewish Bible. Justin's work centers on questions raised by a Jew named Trypho concerning the relationship of Judaism to Christianity. Why, Trypho asked Justin, do you Christians, who claim to be like us, not celebrate the Jewish festivals, or keep the Sabbath, or circumcise? Justin answers that the law of the Jews was only given for a fixed time and only intended for Jews. This law has now been abrogated by the new way in Christ (Dialogue 11), as had been announced by the prophet Jeremiah when he spoke of a new covenant (Jer. 31).

Some Christians in the second century (Marcion and his followers) proposed that the church give up entirely the Jewish Scripture. It seemed to them to be an alien document that spoke only about the Jewish people and about a lesser God. But the majority of Christians rejected these views, and Christian interpreters had to find a way to give the ancient laws and practices meaning for Christian faith and life. This was done by extending the meaning of these laws and practices to comprehend Christ and the Christian life. For example, circumcision was viewed as a type of baptism and the pascal lamb a type of Christ; the offering of fine flour referred to the Eucharist; and the twelve bells on the priest's robe signified the twelve apostles.

Another major exegetical development in the early period centered on Christian theological and exegetical issues. The key figure in this regard was Irenaeus, bishop of Lyon in the late second century, an opponent of the Gnostics. Irenaeus lived at the time when the establishment of the canon—the authoritative collection of Christian writings—was an issue of lively debate. Christians were using as Scripture the Greek translation of the Jewish Bible called the Septuagint (LXX). This translation included additional books (now called the Apocrypha by Protestants or the Deuterocanonicals by Catholics) and followed an order different from the Hebrew Scripture. It was, however, still a Jewish book. Pagan authors knew it and cited it as a Jewish work. It was the principal Scripture of the early Christian church, though many uniquely Christian works had begun to appear.

At first there was no collection of distinctively Christian books. But in time, partly in reaction to Marcion (who had developed a canon that included some Pauline Letters and excluded all Gospels except an edited version of Luke that fitted his own views), the authority of the four Gospels came to be recognized along with the Letters of Paul. Irenaeus is one of the first witnesses to this development. In time these books were supplemented by other early Christian writings. This collection came to be called the NT, and in turn the LXX received its Christian title, the OT. The Christian Bible, then, included two parts, one deriving from Judaism, the other from Christianity, but in the minds of Christian thinkers such as Irenaeus, the two parts constituted one book. The understanding that Christian interpreters had before them a single book became the basis for all later Christian interpretation.

Irenaeus was the first to interpret the Christian Scriptures as a unified document. His interest lay chiefly in the Gospels and the writings of Paul, but the overall framework of his interpretation was provided by the history of salvation beginning in ancient Israel and culminating in Christ, who sums up all things that began in Adam. According to Irenaeus, the Gnostics had misused and perverted the Scriptures to support false and idiosyncratic ideas contrary to the church's tradition. The aim of his work was to show the agreement of the Scriptures with the church's tradition, thereby retaining the Scriptures for the church. To do this he set forth for the first time the idea that the Scriptures have one central meaning, one scope. This unifying sense was found in the rule of faith (Lat. regula fidei), a simple creed used for catechetical instruction and at baptism by Christian congregations in all parts of the Roman world.

The faith expressed in this creed, summarized in the phrase "one God, Father and creator, one Christ, Son of God who became incarnate for our salvation, and Holy Spirit," became the key to interpreting the Scriptures. Irenaeus' approach to interpretation was to have enormous impact on later Christian interpretation. He repudiated piecemeal exegesis, that is, picking and choosing individual texts to defend arcane or idiosyncratic views, and insisted that the Bible was the church's book and had to be interpreted in light of central Christian beliefs. Tertullian, Athanasius, Augustine, and many others followed his lead in their exegesis of the Bible in theological disputes.

Works of interpretation in the late second and early third centuries took the form of treatises on disputed issues, as in Irenaeus' Against Heresies or Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho; in apologies, e.g., Theophilus of Antioch's interpretation of Gen. 1–3; in homilies, e.g., Melito of Sardis on Exodus 14 and the Christian Passover; or in moral essays, e.g., Tertullian On Patience. But in the third century the commentary, a line-by-line exposition of the text, appears as a new literary form of interpreting the text of the Scriptures.

The earliest extant commentary of this type was written on the book of Daniel by Hippolytus of Rome (early third century). Though it is a verse-by-verse exposition of the text, it is not scholarly commentary but an occasional writing prompted by a fervent apocalyptic belief in Hippolytus' day that the end of the world was imminent. Hippolytus uses Daniel to assure the faithful that the end will not soon come and that they must learn patience and endurance. Already in the second century the Gnostic Heracleon may have written a commentary on John, but only fragments are extant (in Origen's commentary on John), and it is difficult to determine Heracleon's intention.

Origen

The commentary as a literary form established itself firmly within the Christian church with the writings of Origen of Alexandria (d. 254), the most significant early Christian biblical interpreter. Origen not only wrote several different types of commentaries, scholia (short comments on particular problems), series of homilies on individual books (e.g., Leviticus or Joshua or Matthew), and massive multivolumed learned commentaries, but he also prepared the Hexapla, an elaborate edition of the OT with several versions in separate columns, and wrote the first theoretical treatise on interpretation (Book 4 of his De Principiis). He realized the importance of Jewish exegesis, and though he frequently opposed Jewish views, he was often indebted to Jewish scholars, as, for example, in his interpretation of the Song of Songs. He was the first to recognize that interpretation was a scholarly as well as a spiritual and theological task.

Origen viewed the Bible as a book of divine oracles that spoke of God's relation to humanity. The Scriptures were written "not to narrate ancient history but for our instruction and use." For this reason he resorted to allegory, typology, and other forms of spiritual and moral interpretation. Like his predecessor Clement of Alexandria, Origen was influenced both by Philo the Jewish philosopher and by the Greek tradition of allegorizing classical texts. Allegory is a technique by which persons and things in a text are understood to signify something other than what they seem to refer to. It was first devised by interpreters of the ancient Greek poets (e.g., Homer), to bridge the gap between the text and contemporary philosophical and moral views. In time it was used to give a text a loftier meaning. The cave of the nymphs in the Odyssey (13:102–12), for example, was thought to signify not simply a cave but "images of higher things." In the first century Philo had employed allegory to deal with passages from the Jewish Scriptures that were offensive to current moral sensibilities, e.g., polygamy, or to make outmoded laws or practices spiritually edifying.

Allegory was particularly suitable to deal with passages from the OT the spiritual significance of which was not apparent to Christians. Commenting on Leviticus, Origen writes: "If I follow the 'simple sense' as some among us wish, without any recourse to the text's artifices and the obscurity of the allegory, I, a man of the church living with faith in Christ and placed in the midst of the church, would be compelled by the authority of the divine precept to sacrifice calves and lambs and to offer wheat cakes with incense and oil" (Homilies on Leviticus 1.1).

Unlike earlier interpreters, Origen set for himself the task of expounding every book of the Bible. He preached his way through entire books of the OT—Genesis, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Jeremiah—and knew that his hearers were often genuinely perplexed and offended by it. The adoption of the commentary form made his task particularly arduous, because it required (even in a sermon) that "nothing be left unexplained." Origen's exegetical labors, his analysis of the text, his study of key biblical terms (e.g., the titles of Jesus in his Commentary on Romans), his use of parallel passages to interpret puzzling concepts, his theological acuity and spiritual depth, his insight into human feelings (in his homily on the sacrifice of Isaac), all had one goal—to make the Scriptures intelligible and enlightening to Christians. His influence on later Christian interpreters is a monument to his success.

More than any other commentator in the patristic period Origen understood the central problems facing Christian interpreters of the Bible. In a sermon on the book of Joshua's account of the battle for the city of Ai, Origen observed that when the text is read in church his hearers ask, What does this history have to do with us? This question confronted Christian interpreters in every age, and the several exegetical techniques, allegory, typology, moral interpretation, all have one aim: to discover the current spiritual significance of the words and events recorded in the Bible. For Christians the Bible is a book about the living God, and its meaning is not exhausted by recounting past history. Whatever the text may have once meant, it must always have meaning for the present.

Although the patristic commentators were aware of their historical distance from biblical times, they recognized no discontinuity between the church and the Scriptures. The same God who inspired the Scriptures enlightened the interpreter. The Bible was a "carried book," interpreted within the context of a living tradition that could be traced back to the Bible itself.

The Bible in the Life of the Church

In the long history of interpretation, the Christian liturgy has been a key factor in giving coherence to biblical interpretation. Here the text did not serve simply to retell past history, but to re-present, along with the sacraments, salvific events in the midst of the Christian assembly. With the development of lectionaries, fixed cycles of readings, the day of the year on which the text was read and the readings that accompanied it came to be as salient a factor in determining its interpretation as the original setting in the book from which it was taken.

Much exegesis continued to focus on theological problems concerning Christian teaching, ecclesiastical problems, and catechesis. For example, "The Lord created me the beginning of his works" (Prov. 8:22) figured large in Athanasius' polemical work against the Arians because "me" in the text referred to "wisdom" and wisdom was identified with Christ. Some texts required extensive comment because they appeared to contradict fundamental tenets of the faith. Romans 9:16, for example, "it depends not upon man's will or exertion, but upon God's mercy" seemed to undermine responsibility for human actions. Others were interpreted in events and movements. "Go sell all and give to the poor" was the charter text for the monastic movement. Phil. 3:12, "I press on towards the goal," appears often in devotional works describing spiritual progress. In the first five centuries of Christian history the Scriptures were the textbook for theology, ethics, and spirituality.

As the commentary form (whose techniques had been learned from commentators on classical texts, e.g., the poems of Homer) became more familiar, interpreters began to address new kinds of questions to the text: authorship of individual books, author's intent, literary style and linguistic usage, historical setting, translations, and the reliability of the text itself. After Origen, the most outstanding representatives of the commentary tradition in the East were the Antiochene exegetes Diodorus of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (late fourth and fifth centuries). In their works, particularly those on the OT, they insisted that the prophets had first to be set within their own historical situation and could not be read solely as referring to Christ. It was illegitimate, Theodore argued, to apply one part of a verse to ancient Israel and the other to Christ. The interpreter had to determine in whose person the text was spoken. Some psalms referred only to David's lifetime; others were spoken in Christ's person, e.g., Psalms 2, 8, and 45. The Antiochenes sought to give a philological and historical basis to the task of exegesis without giving up the distinctively Christian interpretation. The prophets, wrote Theodoret of Cyrrhus, not only prophesied, but also used their words "for exhorting and legislating . . . [and] in teaching morals and doctrine" (Patrologia Graeca 80.861).

Jerome and Augustine

Among all the ancient commentators the Latin writer Jerome (d. 420) was the most learned. He alone mastered Hebrew and based his exposition of the OT on the Hebrew text, rendering it into Latin against strong opposition from Christian leaders and people. Augustine opposed the translation because he believed the LXX was the authoritative version in the church. Jerome's commentaries are filled with philological discussions, analyses of various translations, opinions of earlier commentators, and historical information. Jerome, like the Antiochenes, had contact with Jewish interpreters, and his commentaries on Isaiah, the Minor Prophets, Ezekiel, and others carry on a running debate with Jewish interpretation of the prophecies. Although he recognizes that the prophecies (in Ezekiel, e.g.) were spoken to give hope to the exiles in Babylon, Jerome insists that they also refer to the coming of Christ and the new spiritual reality of the church.

In antiquity Christians wrote commentaries on all the books of the Bible, but all books did not have the same interest or appeal. In contrast to the classical Jewish commentaries—Mekilta, Sipra, and Sipre on Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers (the legal sections of the Pentateuch)—Christian commentators were drawn to Genesis (esp. the first three chaps.), Isaiah, Ezekiel, the Minor Prophets, the Psalms. In the NT they favored Romans and the Gospels of Matthew and John. The wisdom books, however, were popular because they gave commentators greater freedom to develop distinctive spiritual or moral teachings, e.g., Gregory of Nyssa on the Song of Songs, or Gregory the Great on Job.

For Augustine (A.D. 354–430), however, the commentary was not the primary vehicle for his interpretation of the Scriptures. He did write commentaries—several (uncompleted) on Romans, a large work on the Psalms, a commentary on John, several on Genesis—but his major works are polemical, theological, spiritual, or educational tracts. In his early writings he seldom cites the Scriptures. But after his ordination he requested from his bishop time for detailed study of the Scriptures. After this period one can see how key biblical concepts enter into his thinking, e.g., the city of God (Ps. 87) in his work of that title, grace from Romans, love from the Gospel of John, and creation as a good gift of God (against the Manichees) from his study of Genesis. Although Augustine's initial reading of the Scriptures was aided by the allegorical exegesis he heard in the sermons of Ambrose, bishop of Milan, as he matured allegory gave way to a theological interpretation of history based on the biblical story that begins with creation and fall and ends with the beatific vision. This scheme, elaborated with unparalleled detail in the City of God, was to provide an overarching framework for later biblical interpretation.

Augustine also wrote a book on biblical hermeneutics, On Christian Doctrine, a work that drew on the first handbook of interpretation, Tyconius' Book of Rules (fourth century), which was a set of principles designed to guide interpreters into the distinctive features of biblical language and thinking. Like Tyconius, Augustine was concerned less with method than with content. Interpretation became more than a literary task; it was an aptitude or an ability. There could be no proper understanding of the Scripture that does not speak of the double love of God and of the neighbor. Augustine also developed here his notion of "signs," of the usefulness of obscurities in the Scripture, and of the importance of training in the liberal arts for interpretation.

In the East the great age of commentaries came to an end in the sixth century. With some notable exceptions, the commentary gave way to a new literary form, the catena (Lat., "chain"), a collection of citations from earlier commentators arranged according to the text of the Bible. Some catenas contained passages from a single author, but more often they included citations from several authors. The first great catenist was Procopius of Gaza (478–528), whose catenas on the first eight books of the OT, Isaiah, Romans, Matthew, and Job preserve passages from older exegetical works.

The Scriptures, however, continued to play a major role in Christian life through their use in theological discussions, in the liturgy, where they were read and expounded, and in spiritual and monastic writings. In the debate over iconoclasm (eighth and ninth centuries), Exod. 20:4, concerning the prohibition of graven images, and John 4:24 ("God is spirit, and those who worship him must worship in spirit and in truth") received extensive commentary. In the seventh-century Monothelite controversy, over whether Christ had one or two wills, Luke 22:42, "not my will but thine be done" (along with John 6:38), set the terms of the debate. One new form of interpretation, the sung metrical sermon (Gk. kontakion), usually associated with the name of Romanos Melodos (d. 556), became very popular in the East. It allowed the hymnist freedom to present biblical stories in dramatic form, to create dialogues, to develop the character of biblical figures (e.g., Adam and Eve, Abraham, Elijah), and to narrate the events of Jesus' life with uncommon liveliness.

The kontakion probably had its origin in Ephraem Syrus (306–73), the Syriac Christian poet and commentator. Ephraem wrote commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, Acts, and the Pauline Letters, but his liturgical poems are equally significant in the history of biblical interpretation. He believed that the language of the Scriptures was essentially poetic, and his writings employ the images of the Scriptures (e.g., bride, rock, vineyard, tree of life, mother, temple, nation) as the vehicles to interpret communal and personal Christian experience.

THE BIBLE IN THE MIDDLE AGES (TENTH TO SIXTEENTH CENTURIES)

In the West in the early Middle Ages the Bible became the basis for monastic prayer and meditation. The monks believed the interpreter should linger over the text and taste and savor its language and images, which spoke not only to the ears but also to the eyes (the vision at the beginning of Ezekiel, e.g.). They drew on Scripture to nurture spiritual growth and the pursuit of holiness and became skilled at extracting from the text what was important for Christian life. Interpretation was a spiritual discipline, and the exposition of the text a liturgical act.

With the discovery of the logical works of Aristotle in the eleventh century a new form of interpretation was born. This was the quaestio (Lat.), the practice of addressing logical and analytical questions to the text: why is this word used rather than some other? Does the author's statement follow from what was said previously in the book? Can one draw a deduction from the statement? What objections can be raised to the argument? This method, which allowed for a theological or philosophical analysis of the text, was particularly helpful in understanding Paul and other NT Letters, but it was less successful on narrative sections of the Bible or on devotional texts such as the Psalms. In time the quaestiones supplanted exposition of the text, and they were issued separately. These works, when they were arranged according to doctrinal subjects, came to be called Sentences, theological summaries that laid the foundations for medieval Scholasticism.

A new interest in exegesis as such, as distinct from the theological use of the text, emerged in the twelfth century in Paris at the Abbey of Saint Victor. Hugh of Saint Victor, who came to Paris in 1118, was the first to chart the new course. He objected to allegorical interpretations that ignored the meaning of the "letter." If one despises the "literal sense," said Hugh, one despises the Scriptures. The literal sense did not mean the historical sense, as understood today, but it referred to the meaning that the words have in the context of the text, the construction and syntax, and the metaphors and images. For example, in interpreting Isa. 4:1, "Seven women shall take hold of one man," the interpreter must recognize that the biblical writer is referring to war and depopulation and that in that setting sterility was a woman's worst reproach. Only when this is established can the interpreter move on to a spiritual application.

Hugh's disciples Richard and Andrew continued his work but in different ways. Richard employed the literal sense to construct a grand spiritual edifice, and Andrew turned to contemporary Jewish scholars to aid his understanding of the literal sense. The presence of Jewish exegetes has been a significant factor in shaping Christian interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures (OT). Often Jewish exegesis enters the picture because Jews offered a contrary view, but in other cases Jewish scholars gave access to the Hebrew version of a passage or to additional information about the text. This kind of exchange is evident in the early church in the writings of Origen, Jerome, or Theodoret of Cyrrhus, but it is also evident in the eleventh and twelfth centuries in writers such as Andrew, Rupert of Deutz (1070–1129), and others. Andrew's commentaries, almost unknown until recently, are particularly noteworthy because he was the first to have access to the interpretations of Rashi, the great medieval Jewish commentator. In some cases Andrew was so impressed by Jewish commentators that he was willing to adopt Jewish views even when they undermined traditional Christian teaching (e.g., the interpretation of "young woman" or "virgin" in Isa. 7:14–16). His fellow monk Richard criticized him because he sometimes cited Jewish interpretations without "answering" them with the Christian view.

The work of the Victorines was continued by men such as Herbert of Bosham, Peter Comestor, Stephen Langton, and later Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1349), the most influential medieval commentators. Lyra knew Hebrew but no Greek, and he was familiar with earlier Christian commentaries and with Rashi. For Lyra the literal sense was twofold—at once historical and theological. He recognized the historical character of the biblical text but insisted, for example, that the literal sense of the Psalms referred to Christ. Lyra's Postillae perpetuae in universam Sanctam Scripturam, a massive commentary on the entire Bible, became, along with the Glossa Ordinaria, the standard commentary in the later Middle Ages. It was the first biblical commentary to be printed after the invention of printing.

THE REFORMATION

It has been customary to set the sixteenth century Reformers off from the medieval exegetes, as though the Reformers were forerunners of the modern historical-critical method. Their exegesis of the Bible, however, moves within more traditional Christian attitudes toward the Scriptures. For them the OT was a Christian book, and the Scriptures as a whole are interpreted in relation to Christian doctrine. Martin Luther, for example, interpreted the plural name of God in Hebrew (Elohim) and the phrase "Let us make" in Genesis 1 as patristic and medieval commentators had, to signify the Trinity.

The Reformers, however, did introduce a new range of theological themes, and these profoundly altered the interpretation of the Scriptures. Many were trained as humanists, and this gave them an unusual appreciation for the importance of the biblical languages in exegesis. This was not, of course, unique to them, but it is a noteworthy feature of their work. One of Luther's most lasting accomplishments was the translation of the entire Bible into German from Hebrew and Greek. The great insight that informs the Reformers' exegesis is that the Scriptures speak about faith, hence of repentance and grace and of promise and hope. In Luther's commentaries on both the OT and the NT, these themes spring directly out of the biblical text, without being filtered through the medieval School traditions. Luther's exegesis focused always on the concrete life of the believer, of the church, on the people of God in the course of their pilgrimage in history. For this reason allegory appeared contrived and abstract in contrast to the concrete narrative of biblical history and the deeds of biblical heroes.

Luther's commentaries read like sermons. John Calvin's works, though no less theological, were more pedagogical. He was more attentive to detail, less repetitive, less given to imaginative soarings, and more systematic in developing the theological sense of the text. His humanistic learning was more apparent in the discussion of philological questions. He was unwilling to interpret the plural name of God as evidence of the Trinity. He was bolder than Luther in breaking with the traditional Christological interpretation of the OT. Calvin was always the teacher, explaining difficulties to his readers, noting apparent contradictions in the Scriptures, identifying false ascriptions of citations from the OT, and explaining the use of figures and metaphors.

Scriptural interpretation during the Reformation period profited from the humanistic learning that had swept across Europe. Besides promoting study of the languages of the Bible, Greek and Hebrew, the humanists also were interested in textual criticism, and they made available for the first time texts of classical Christian commentaries. Erasmus of Rotterdam, drawing on the work of the Italian humanist Lorenzo Valla (1406–57), who had compared the Vulgate and the Greek NT, edited the Greek NT (1516) with a new Latin translation. This edition was to have enormous influence in the sixteenth century. It also included extensive notes based on his study of early Christian commentators such as Chrysostom, Origen, Jerome, and Augustine. Another notable figure was Cardinal Cajetan (1469–1534), an opponent of the Reformation and a Thomist (a follower of Thomas Aquinas), whose studies led him to the conclusion that the Vulgate was no substitute for the Hebrew and Greek texts of the Scripture. His views, however, were repudiated at the Council of Trent (A.D. 1545–63), where the Vulgate was recognized as the approved version in the Roman Catholic church.

THE MODERN PERIOD

The centrality of exegesis during the Reformation gave way in the seventeenth century to a renewed interest in dogmatics. A number of commentators, however, who were not closely identified with the confessional traditions (e.g., Hugo Grotius or Jean Le Clerc), adopted a philological approach to the text. Grotius drew an analogy between the use of precedent to interpret the law and the role of tradition to interpret the Scriptures.

By the beginning of the eighteenth century other humanistic disciplines besides philology and grammar began to influence the interpretation of the Bible (e.g., ancient Near Eastern history, geography, archaeology). These new interests are apparent in the writings of scholars such as Richard Simon (1638–1712), Jean Le Clerc (1657–1736), and J. Ernesti (1707–81), to name only a few of the more noteworthy figures. Another important figure from this period was Johannes Bengel (1687–1752), a Pietist whose work in text criticism set a new standard. The Reformers had sought to disengage the Bible from traditional authorities. As philological and historical study gained momentum in the succeeding centuries, this legacy of the Reformation was to have unintended consequences. In their appeal to Scripture over and against tradition, the Reformers had not, of course, dispensed with tradition. The very claim, however, that only Scripture was authoritative (Lat. sola scriptura) fostered the idea that the Bible could be interpreted solely in relation to itself—“Scripture interprets Scripture.” In time the Bible lost its context within Christian tradition and came to be viewed, paradoxically, as alien to the very tradition that had cherished it.

With the emergence of new historical disciplines in the eighteenth century and the application of these disciplines to the Scriptures, scholars began, unwittingly at first, to construct a new context to take the place of ecclesiastical tradition. The aim was to break free from the patterns that had shaped Christian interpretation for centuries. The Bible came to be seen more and more as belonging to the past. Its context was the ancient world; hence its interpretation was primarily a historical enterprise.

These two factors, the disengagement of the Bible from tradition in the name of an appeal to sola scriptura and the rise of historical study, changed the relation of interpreters to the Bible. The more the text was studied historically and philologically, the more the Bible appeared foreign to Christian faith and teaching. As the text was analyzed, compared with other ancient texts, dissected into sources, the more apparent it became that the Scriptures could not be read as an account of God’s dealing with humanity in historical events, as had been assumed for centuries. The reliability of the biblical narrative came under question, and its unity as redemptive history began to unravel. The literal sense came to be identified with a historical sense that was distinct from its religious or theological sense.

By the beginning of the nineteenth century historical interpretation came to dominate biblical study, at least among academic interpreters. Interpretation now centered on questions of sources, on authorship, on the relation of the Scripture to other Semitic writings. For Gottfried Eichhorn (1752–1827) the Bible was an oriental book. J. Semler (1725–91) criticized the idea of canon. Canon appeared as a dogmatic and ecclesiastical category that stood in the way of a historical understanding of the NT. The divorce between theology and history reached its culmination in the work of David Friedrich Strauss. His Life of Jesus, one of the most celebrated religious works of the nineteenth century, argued that the historical tradition of the Gospels is too fragile to support faith. We must, he wrote, “reestablish dogmatically what has been destroyed critically.”

Since the early nineteenth century most biblical scholars have assumed that the only legitimate approach to the Scriptures was historical. Some, however, have insisted (e.g., C. F. Staudlin early in the nineteenth century) that the Scriptures are not explicable solely on the basis of grammar and history. Theological, moral, and philosophical considerations are appropriate—indeed, necessary.

The questions of modern scholarship, posed with unprecedented power and clarity during the Enlightenment, are as urgent today as they were two hundred years ago. However necessary a historical interpretation of the Scriptures may be, the Bible is not simply a book from the past. The calm indifference of most Christians, i.e., those who read the Bible for edification and instruction, to a solely historical interpretation bears a message for biblical scholars. As Augustine wrote long ago, "Surely it is only a twisted mind that would maintain that books which have been so scrupulously preserved for thousands of years, which have been safeguarded by such a concern for a well-ordered transmission, that such books were written without serious purpose, or that we should consult them simply for historical facts" (City of God 15.20).

Bibliography

Barr, J. Old and New in Interpretation. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.

The Cambridge History of the Bible. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963-70.

Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1974.

Grant, R. M., and D. Tracy. A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible. 2d ed. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984.

Smalley, B. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1964.

THE BIBLE AND ITS COMMUNITIES

JAMES BARR

We tend to think of the Bible as a known and defined quantity with an unchanging and undifferentiated quality of authority and normativeness. Historically, however, this is not so. The Bible has not always existed, and it was in the communities of ancient Israel and of the early church that it came into existence. The terms that designate it are terms of these communities, and its role as norm and authority has varied in relation to the structures and patterns of religion in these communities.

The books of the OT as we have them today came into being over a very long period, at least a thousand years. Moreover, most books did not come into existence suddenly and completely as they do today when one author writes a book and "publishes" it. Rather, they came into existence gradually—older sources were incorporated, materials were edited, and further additions were made, whether in oral tradition that formed the basis for the text or after the writing down of a text. Thus during what we call "the biblical period" there was as yet no complete "Bible" in existence. Of what we now have, part was not yet in existence and part was in the process of development; and in all probability there were authoritative traditions, oral or written, that were later eliminated, altered, or simply lost, so that we no longer have them.

The NT came into existence during a much shorter time span, hardly over a hundred years, and a larger proportion of the books may be identified as the written product of one author at one point in time. Even then, however, books often refer to earlier traditions; the different Gospels are clearly literarily interdependent; some books and traditions have disappeared; and some works are clearly much later in origin than others. Thus the NT came into its complete form more quickly, but in essence the same relations apply. Any individual Christian community of, say, A.D. 70, or even of A.D. 100, can have had within its purview only a limited part of the written NT as we have it today. Here, once again, the people of the Bible did not possess our Bible.

TERMS DESIGNATING THE BIBLE

Correspondingly, there was in ancient times no one univocal term with exactly the same range of meaning as our word "Bible." The English word "Bible" is emphatically singular: there is only one Bible. But it is derived from the Greek ta biblia, "the books," for it was and is a collection of books. There was no such thing as a Bible in the physical form to which we are now accustomed, a single volume with all the books bound together. Not until the invention (in the Christian era) of the codex did such a form become possible, and it was the invention of printing that made a bound volume popular and familiar.

In ancient times the biblia were a collection of individual scrolls. This meant that there might be no fixed order to the books except where the contents (as in the Pentateuch or the historical books) made a certain sequence natural. It also made it less easy to define and separate authoritative scrolls from other religious writings, since both kinds might be kept in the same cupboard or storeroom. Jesus in the Nazareth synagogue was given the scroll of Isaiah to read, not a complete Hebrew Bible (Luke 4:17); the Ethiopian of Acts 8:28 was doubtless reading the same. The Qumran people had a sort of religious library, which contained scrolls that are part of our Bible and others that were their own books, unknown to us until recent discovery. A scroll was not necessarily identical with one "book" of our modern Bible; several short books, such as the twelve "Minor" Prophets, might be written on one scroll.

It is not surprising therefore that the term "the Bible" is not strictly a biblical term; the books do not use any such designation of themselves. Neither within the OT nor within the NT do the books make frequent explicit mention of other books of our Bible. There is of course much common matter between one book and another and there may be good reason to detect that one book is interpreting something said in another; but actual explicit mention of other books is rare and in each testament seems to be characteristic of the later portions. Thus Daniel learned "in the books" (Dan. 9:2) the number of years mentioned by Jeremiah. 2 Pet. 3:16 refers to Paul's letters and the difficulty of understanding them. But this kind of express cross-reference is infrequent. In spite of the close relationship between the Gospels, none of them refers to any other by name; Luke (1:1-4) refers to "many" other attempts at such narratives but leaves it vague whether others of our Gospels, or of their sources, are intended.

In fact, surprisingly, where there is mention of other books, this is more commonly of books that are not within our Bible than of books that are. Thus Kings often refers its readers for further information to "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (1 Kings 14:29) and the like, which books no longer exist. Paul asks the Colossians to take into account the Laodicean letter, which also is lost (Col. 4:16).

Our term "scripture" comes close to "Bible" when it is commonly understood as a collectivity, i.e., when "Scripture" means the same thing as "the Bible." There is no such expression in the OT, but it is frequent (graphê) in the Greek of the NT (and often plural). This word, however, was not then always identical in scope with our "Bible." In itself it meant "something written" and could apply to any piece of writing such as an inscription or a letter (numerous cases in the OT in Gk.); thus graphê was not then specialized in the sense of canonical sacred writings as "Scripture" now is in English. For religious purposes, of course, the sacred authoritative written texts were immensely the most important "written things," and these were often cited with the formula "as it is written." The term was not then a definition: it did not specify exactly which texts were included, nor did the use of it prove that the boundaries of what was "Scripture" were exactly defined. Moreover, the word might be used for "a scripture," i.e., an individual sentence or phrase, rather than the total body of holy writings, so that 2 Tim. 3:16 might read "all scripture [the totality] is inspired," but it might also read "every [passage of] scripture is inspired." Conversely, it would be possible for a religious writing to be called graphê without according to it the status of being part of the Bible in our sense. Within the Christian Bible the dominant use of "scripture" and of "it is written" is in reference to the OT.

In Jewish usage the main corresponding term in Hebrew is rather miqra'—that which is ritually recited; the expression focuses attention on the liturgical recitation of the text rather than on its being written. Another expression is kitbe ha-qodesh, "the holy writings." The expression Tenach or Tanach, now commonly used, does not go back to ancient times. It is an acronym formed from the first letters, T-N-K, of the names of the three sections of the Hebrew Bible: Torah (Law), Nebi'im (Prophets), and Ketubim (Writings). The Jewish Bible, needless to say, does not include the Christian NT. The term "Old Testament" is traditional in Christianity but is now sometimes felt to be tendentious in its implied judgment of Judaism, so that other expressions such as "Hebrew Scriptures" have come to be used.

We have seen that in actual biblical times, or the earlier portion of them, religion was not yet governed by a defined Scripture. Faced with a religious problem, people did not turn to a written text, for their religion was not yet organized in that way. Quite possibly some traditions such as some legal ordinances had early been committed to written form, but many other religious traditions were transmitted orally. Neither the prophets nor the earlier kings appealed to any existing "Scripture"; prophetic words were mostly spoken, not written, in the first instance. People were related to God through holy persons and institutions, or they spoke with him verbally and directly; holy books were not considered an authoritative norm.

It was probably the Deuteronomic movement, around the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., that first made something like a "Scripture" central to Israel's religious life. Although various particular "books" (in fact, documents) are mentioned in other sources, Deuteronomy is the first major source for a solid and frequent mention of a basic authoritative "book of the law" in which the main divine commands are concentrated and set down. Especially at the end of the book there is a distinct emphasis on "all the words of this Torah which are written in this book" (Deut. 28:58; cf. 30:10; 31:24, 26). Similarly, it was in 622 B.C. that Josiah heard of the discovery of a "book of the Law" in the Temple, a discovery that greatly alarmed the king and caused him to take drastic steps in the reformation of religion (2 Kings 22–23). In 605 B.C. Jeremiah took a scroll and wrote on it all his past prophecies (Jer. 36); the king cut it up and burned it, but the prophet then rewrote the scroll and added more material for good measure. Deuteronomy states the future role of the law, which is to be preserved in written form and read by the kings so that they may learn obedience to God (Deut. 17:19), and it is also to be read publicly before "all Israel" on solemn occasions (Deut. 31:11). Such solemn public reading is particularly attested in the time of Ezra (Neh. 8); after the Exile (598–538 B.C.) the written Torah becomes paramount in the religious life of the nation, or at least of central currents within it. Thus in its later development Judaism became much more a scriptural religion and in this respect had undergone a substantial change as compared with its earlier pattern.

Christianity went through a similar process. It began without having or seeking to produce Scriptures of its own. Jesus wrote nothing and did not tell his disciples to write anything or even to memorize his words for future commitment to writing. Early Christian faith was spread by oral speech and tradition; there was not even a written account of Jesus' life. Neither Jesus himself nor the earliest Christians after him showed any sign of an intention that their faith should become a scripturally controlled religion as Judaism was by that time. It may have been felt that writing was not appropriate for the profoundest truth: the letter "kills" (2 Cor. 3:6). The living voice of persons who had been with Jesus was thought to be better than any book: this was felt by Papias as late as about A.D. 130. The first written texts were letters, which by their nature had to be written; it is only in 2 Peter, one of the later NT writings, that Christian documents (Pauline Letters) are mentioned in the same category as "Scriptures" (2 Pet. 3:16). In 1 Clement (late first century) there are copious citations from both the OT and NT but the terms "scripture" and "it is written" are used only for the former. The "holy writings" that Timothy had known from childhood were perhaps also the OT (2 Tim. 3:15).

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY

The NT did indeed acknowledge previous Jewish Scripture as the Word of God and authoritative, and in this sense its religion is "scriptural" from the beginning. This makes more complex, but does not essentially alter, what has been said above. The meaning of the NT depends at a host of places upon the assumption that a verbally articulated Word of God was already known and acknowledged. This does not mean, however, that nothing could be said without citing previous written authority. On the contrary, the main starting point lay in the new Christian substance, in Jesus himself and in the events surrounding him, his acts and his teaching. To these events and teachings confirmation or exemplification from past Scripture was often given. But it was by no means necessary that this be done. Jesus' own characteristic teaching was through parables, newly created and fictional stories based on experience and imagination, just the opposite of an approach through a scriptural text. Jesus differed from the scribes because he spoke and acted on his own authority and not on the basis of a preexisting authority. Thus the undoubted authority of the OT as Word of God did not alter the fact that for the NT it was no longer the final criterion or the unique starting point; it was not an absolute, but its authority was relative to the supreme position of Jesus. Even where Scripture is taken as "inspired by God" (2 Tim. 3:16), it is said only to be "useful" or "profitable" for moral training and not the final arbiter of faith. Thus within early Christianity, in spite of the recognition of older Scripture as Word of God and fully authoritative, the total structure of authority was different, and Scripture fitted within a new pattern of relations.

COMMUNITY AND LITERARY PRODUCTION

Many biblical books must be regarded as a community product; they emerged from a process of tradition within the community. The community guarded this tradition, respected it, but also remolded it; it might allow it to be amalgamated with other traditions, to be modernized to fit newer conditions, or to be amplified with additional comments or rewritten in a newer form. But the community did not regard the works as simply the expression of its own sense of itself; it cherished them as works of leadership and authority that directed the community in a certain direction. This position of authority can be seen in different features such as the extreme importance of events narrated (creation, Exodus, resurrection), the presence of what was understood to be direct divine speech, the distinction of persons associated with books (Moses, Solomon, the early disciples), the normative force of their legal portions, their use as liturgical material, their role as historical memoirs, their ethical edificatory function, and their general educational use. Many books directed themselves in a critical (warning or reforming) manner to the community. In some books much importance attaches to a final editor or creative writer who brought various traditions together into a total work with its own viewpoint (Gen., Matt.). There is thus an interaction between community and literary production in which traditions are molded to guide the community in a certain way, although they may conflict with other traditions (cf. Jeremiah and Ezekiel; Paul and James; Matthew and Luke) and the community may receive these traditions with respect but with varying degrees of submission, acceptance, evasion, revision, and modification (e.g., the degree of implementation of Deuteronomy; the reaction in 2 Peter to delay of the end of the world).

CONTINUATION AND FINALIZATION

The transmission of sacred texts underwent two contrary impulses. One of these led toward the continuation of the process of composition: a good work could be continued, amplified, modernized. Explanatory glosses might be added. In major cases, a thorough rewriting might be undertaken. On the other side there was a force that favored finalization. A work had reached a stage at which no further change was desirable; it should henceforth be preserved as it was.

In the late stages of the development of Scripture, both these impulses can be seen at work. Books could be largely rewritten; their very excellence might encourage this. There is evidence that Jeremiah came out in two editions. On a larger scale, Chronicles was mainly a rewrite of Samuel/Kings, and Jubilees of Genesis. New works like Judith and Tobit carried forward the style of tales like Esther, and the Testament literature (best seen in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs) expanded and recombined various biblical genres. Later Gospels (Matthew and Luke) carried forward the lines of earlier ones. The disciples of prophets amplified and altered the balance of the sayings of their masters; fragments of an apostolic letter might be similarly amplified and recombined. The impulse to continuation promoted the survival and the continued productivity of the biblical genres.

Finalization worked the other way. The text should be left alone. Existing words should be left as they are; new productions along the same lines should be discouraged. The very words of the text had come from God or from some source of unimpeachable antiquity and should on no account be modified. What was obscure should be elucidated by interpretation rather than improved by rewriting.

These forces were decisive in the formation of what was later to be known as the canon, understood as a collection of authoritative writings, and in the fixation of the text. Continuation meant that new books would be produced; finalization meant that they would not be encouraged and if produced would not be accepted. The same principles could apply to the actual text. Change a few words, add a word here and there, and it becomes a different book—so it could be argued—and all the more so where it was felt that religious and ethical decisions depended on the precise wording of the text. Deut. 4:2, which specifies that nothing is to be added to God's command or taken away from it, doubtless in the first instance meant that no substantial matter should be added to the ethical norms or subtracted from them; but the same principle could easily be extended to mean that the book that contained this command was the final version of it and, beyond that, that the actual wording of its text must be preserved.

These contrasting tendencies were expressed also on the level of interpretation. To rewrite a book entirely, adding new matter or altering its focus, can be called a kind of interpretation, but it is more like a restatement of the substance along literary lines similar to the original. The fixation of book and text encourages a different mode of interpretation: the exact form and wording of a text become data against which interpretation is set. Interpretation may then begin to look less at the general literary structure and more at each individual segment, which may thus be decontextualized; any portion of text, however tiny, may become decisive for the proof of law or doctrine. This tendency is supported by the idea that God is author not only of the books taken as wholes but of every small detail within them; since there is no redundancy, every detail is authoritative.

THE PRIMACY OF THE TORAH

Care should be used in talking about a Jewish "canon," since the concept is a Christian one and there seems to be no Jewish term for it. The central step was the elevation of the Torah, by now a virtually complete block of five books understood to be the Torah of Moses, to a position of religious primacy, a move traditionally associated with Ezra and belonging to the early postexilic community (sixth to fourth centuries B.C.). Other materials, later to form part of Hebrew Scripture, certainly already existed: much of the historical books from Joshua to Kings, the earlier portions of the Prophets, most of the Psalms, and doubtless much of Proverbs. This other body of material had long been recognized but did not yet have the same unity and finality as the Torah had: materials were still being added to the prophetic books until much later. Eventually the historical books and the books named after prophets came to be classified together and known as "the Prophets" (the division into "Former" and "Latter" Prophets is medieval). This classification, which eventually became neat and exact, may at first have been imprecise and fluid. The case of the Torah is clear, because it clearly formed a single block and had supreme religious authority. But some literature that later was classified as within the "Writings" could earlier have belonged to the same grouping as our "Prophets." This would fit the situation in early Christianity, where there is no clear sign of knowledge of the tripartite canon of Judaism and where the common term for older Scriptures is "the Law and the Prophets" (once, Luke 24:44, "the law of Moses and the prophets and Psalms"). Not all groups of Jews need have followed or accepted the same priorities, but the primacy of the Torah marked the dominant trend. It is possible that some laid just as heavy an emphasis on the prophetic books.

The Samaritans, like the Jews, had a Hebrew Bible, but it included only the Torah; their traditions showed influences from the historical books, but only the Torah had status as Scripture. This may be because the elevation of the Torah to primacy was extended by them to the point where no other Scripture existed at all. The Sadducees are said not to have accepted as binding any doctrines that could not be proved from the Torah alone. The Qumran community revered the biblical books (though no portions of Esther as yet have been found), but alongside them they had many other works, including the sacred rule of their own society; it is hard to think that such a document did not have authoritative status among them. Perhaps their writing of commentaries on biblical books is a sign that these were in a special category. Commentaries on the prophetic books such as Habakkuk and Nahum are prominent: in these books they found predictions about their own sect and its experience.

PALESTINIAN CANON GROUPINGS

The tripartite listing that finally emerged as "standard" for the Hebrew Bible contained the Torah as first part, the historical books from Joshua through Kings along with the four main prophetic "books" (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve "Minor" Prophets) as the second part ("the Prophets"), while the third part, the "Writings," contained Psalms, Job, Proverbs, the five smaller Scrolls or Megilloth (Ruth, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther), Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. There are variations in order within the third group but the division between the three major groups has always been the same.

The completion and fixation of this canon is often ascribed to the "Synod of Jamnia," a series of rabbinic discussions held late in the first century A.D., in which it was sometimes discussed whether certain books like Ecclesiastes had full scriptural status. It is now considered doubtful whether these discussions dealt with the fixing of a canon at all, and some think that the canon now standard was achieved back in Maccabean times (second or first century B.C.). But even if the standard canon existed as a list, that does not mean that everyone knew of it or took it as binding. Josephus (first century A.D.) lists twenty-two books: five by Moses, then thirteen from Moses to Artaxerxes written by the prophets, and four containing hymns and ethical precepts. The number twenty-two is significant as being the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Josephus' list may well correspond with the total contents of the standard canon (if we take Ruth with Judges, Lamentations with Jeremiah, etc.) but clearly cuts across the tripartite division of it. 4 Ezra 14:37-48 tells how ninety-four books were written, twenty-four for the general public to read and the other seventy only for the special class of the wise; these seventy would represent the apocalyptic books. As between these various views we have no real knowledge of controversies or of means by which they were settled or of mechanisms through which decisions about a canon could be reached or enforced. This fits with the absence of a term for "canon" that would have been used in such discussions. It is probable that the fading away of certain communities and the destructive effects of war eliminated alternatives and left one strongly represented opinion in control.

THE SEPTUAGINT

Greek-speaking Jews, especially in Egypt, had a translation, made from the third century B.C. onwards; it was called Septuagint (LXX) from the tale that seventy translators were engaged in the work. The books in Greek eventually included not only all that is now in the Hebrew Bible but a number of other books and longer texts of some (e.g., the Additions to Daniel, etc.). Some of these were translated from Hebrew or Aramaic and others were original writings in Greek but in biblical style. It is disputed whether all these materials counted as the Bible of Alexandrian Judaism; perhaps, as elsewhere, the question is a meaningless one. The Alexandrian interpreter Philo commented on the Pentateuch in detail but quoted other books little. The mere act of translation into another language meant that the exact verbal form of the original could not be preserved; but the legend of the (almost miraculously assisted) translation seemed to argue that the translation was as divinely inspired as the original had been and therefore fully authoritative. This was significant for Christianity, where the exact verbal form of the LXX was at times used for proof of doctrine even when it differed from the Hebrew. The LXX often differed in sense from the Hebrew (Masoretic) text, because it was made from a different text or an earlier edition, or misread the Hebrew, or through its translation technique. Both before and after the origin of Christianity steps were taken to revise the Greek and bring it closer to the Hebrew as it was now accepted; finally Jewish preference passed to these newer versions and back to the use of the Hebrew itself. The LXX was thus transmitted to us through Christian channels as the OT of the Greek church, and its books were those that were canonical in that church. Thus most, though not necessarily all, of Hebrew Scripture was already in Greek translation when Christianity began, and so were some books later considered apocryphal. The NT commonly cites the wording of the LXX but sometimes follows other versions.

THE HEBREW TEXT

---

During the first three or four centuries A.D. the Hebrew Bible was transmitted in a very narrow tradition of text. It was later provided with points, or vowel signs, and accents by Jewish scholars known as Masoretes (from the Hebrew word for tradition) and is therefore known as the Masoretic Text (MT). Within it variants of substance are very few. But much evidence suggests that in earlier times considerable variation in the Hebrew text existed. Numerous LXX renderings, at least in some books, came from a different Hebrew original, and are often supported by Qumran fragments or by the Samaritan Hebrew. One major Isaiah scroll from Qumran shows wide divergence in writing and spelling style from the Masoretic, while another approximates it more closely. And differences are not only in scribal minutiae. For instance, the chronological data of Genesis and Exodus differ substantially in the LXX, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the MT, which suggests that these figures were being adjusted to different chronological systems up to a quite late date. Much of the variety within the Jewish transmission was probably obliterated in the wars with Rome. The ancestor of the MT was most likely not chosen through deliberate textual evaluation but through the choice of this or that manuscript as authoritative. Only gradually did the principle come to prevail that texts must be copied with the fullest precision in every detail, and absolute precision was never in fact attained. But the existence of a highly uniform text, variant-free in substance, favored the development of a very precise verbally related interpretation, in which every detail had potential religious import.

TARGUMS

---

For many Jews Aramaic rather than Hebrew was the major vernacular, and translations of biblical books into Aramaic, known as Targums, were important. Just when the main existing Targums originated is uncertain, but rules for the reading of them are already present in the Mishnah (a collection of legal material from the first two centuries A.D.). In general, the Targums are less important than the LXX as evidence for the biblical text, more important as evidence for religious interpretation and supplementation with additional matter. In the end they functioned mainly not independently but as a supplementary text to the Hebrew.

THE LATIN BIBLE AND THE APOCRYPHA

---

Though chronologically later, this topic can be conveniently mentioned here. The older Latin Bible of the Western church was in its OT translated from the Greek and not directly from the Hebrew. Jerome's new version (around A.D. 400) went back to the Hebrew, and his thinking insisted on the "Hebrew truth" as basis for Christian use of the Bible. But this in turn involved the observation that a number of books already within the church's Bible were not within the Hebrew Bible. Jerome argued that only the books of the latter should be accepted; the rest should count as "apocrypha." Thus the "Apocrypha," as the term is generally used, are those books and portions of books that were within the older Christian OT but not within the Hebrew Bible, at least as the latter now, by the "standard" canon, was. Jerome's opinions on this matter were received with doubt, the books in question remained authoritative, and it was during the Reformation that his views bore fruit and Protestant Bibles mostly followed the Hebrew in the extent of their OT canon.

INTERPRETATIVE PATTERNS

---

The modes in which Scripture was interpreted, and the other authorities existing alongside of Scripture, influenced the conception that was held of scripture itself. In Judaism varying traditions prevailed. In Egypt Philo accepted Greek philosophy as the basic interpretative pattern: the texts were allegorically understood; textual details pointed to eternal verities. A sectarian community like Qumran took as key the principle that everything in Scripture concerned that same community; close verse-by-verse commentaries were written. The main current in Judaism emphasized the tradition handed down by the rabbis; this led to a two-source structure, with written Torah and oral law complementing one another. The oral law, originally passed on in unwritten tradition, was later gathered in written form in the Mishnah and further elaborated in the Talmud. Running interpretation of Scripture took the form of midrash, in which words, verses, and details were interrelated with similar features from elsewhere and embellished with story material; some of this overlapped with the Targums. In worship the entire Torah is read in sequence, selections only from the Prophets; the five Megilloth and some Psalms are also important. The oral law, when it quotes Scripture, quotes overwhelmingly the Torah; midrash is directed especially to the Torah and the Megilloth. Thus the tripartite canon has partial, but only partial, correspondence with degrees of importance in ritual use. The question of supremacy as between the Torah and the oral law is not a real one: the Torah is true, the rabbinic tradition is also true, and the question of canonical gradation between them does not arise.

NEW TESTAMENT USE OF ANCIENT SCRIPTURE

We have seen that Christianity from the beginning accepted Jewish Scriptures as the Word of God and authoritative; it is inexact however to say that they thus accepted "the Old Testament," first, because that expression was not yet so used (the Gk. word diathēkē means either a will or the covenant linking God and people; possible exception only at 2 Cor. 3:14, and if so an innovation there) and, second, because we cannot be sure that the books recognized were identical with any one "Old Testament" of today. Some books like Ecclesiastes, Esther, and Song of Songs are scarcely cited or used; some others like Wisdom are clearly influential (e.g., on ideas about Adam, creation, and sin); yet others like Enoch are actually quoted as authoritative prophetic works (Jude 14–15). To stress the precise boundaries of the canon is thus to force upon the NT an emphasis that it simply did not have. Nowhere does it show any interest in discussing or disputing the limits of anyone's canon, even where this could have been relevant (e.g., disputes with the Samaritans or the Sadducees).

The approach to past Scripture is not at all systematic; passages are used where they serve a purpose, many others are left unmentioned. There are few sequential commentaries or verse-by-verse expositions. Some have thought that books of scriptural "testimonies" existed and guided the choice of passages to be cited. Certainly Scripture is used very selectively, with a great preference for certain traditions such as those of Abraham and David and for the prophetic books, especially Isaiah and Daniel; a very large proportion of all express citations come from Isaiah and the Psalms taken together. The emphasis is "Christological," in that passages were seen as converging on the fulfillment of promise through Jesus and the church. As at Qumran, the present situation of the community was a key to the sense of Scripture: it was written "for us" (cf. 1 Pet. 1:12; 1 Cor. 9:10). The emphasis lies more on the realization of messianic prophecy than on the law. The importance of apocalyptic makes it all the more natural that Enoch was accepted as divinely given prophecy.

Although the Mosaic Law remained sacred, a change of emphasis took place. Jesus emphasized the "weightier matters of the law" as against minutiae of observance (Matt. 23:23). Reinterpretation of the law within the new Christian context encouraged allegorical understandings (e.g., Gal. 4:24; 1 Cor. 9:9–10), which were linked with typology (Adam and Christ, Elijah and John the Baptist) and became much more widespread as OT passages were more systematically explored. On the other side Jesus emphasizes Scripture itself as against the tradition of interpretation which contradicted it. Scripture was thus reaffirmed but the balance of its parts and the mode of interpretation were shifted to a different plane.

Another factor was the conception that the Holy Spirit had once again been shed forth. It was a common Jewish concept that the Spirit had departed from Israel after exilic times, when prophecy ceased. Now in the church the Spirit had again been shed forth. This could favor the discernment of "spiritual" meanings; it could act against bondage to a written text; and it could lead to productivity in "prophetic" utterances, some of which eventually appeared as books (Rev.).

NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS AND CANONS

Various factors favored the crystallization of the Christian traditions in a final written form. The practice of reading in church the letters of an apostle; the analogy of the OT read as Scripture; the special importance for Christian faith of the original witnesses of events and the danger that tradition might become distorted and facts forgotten; the rapid expansion into the gentile world, which made oral tradition, rooted in Jewish Palestine, more difficult to maintain—all these may have contributed. The sayings of Jesus himself were particularly cherished. Once the Gospels came into existence they quickly became central in church life and were liturgically emphasized. Their existence and their centrality in turn probably meant that most oral tradition about Jesus died away fairly soon.

Each Gospel may at first have had an attachment to a particular community; but the grouping of the four is explicit and is regarded as necessary in the writing of the early church leader Irenaeus (about A.D. 180). There are signs that, of the four, John suffered most questioning; it is little quoted in early sources and may have been regarded as favoring Gnosticism; when it was later seen that it could be used against that movement, it achieved acceptance. Mark, though doubtless the earliest, tended to drop into the background in comparison with the "fuller" three. The idea of combining the four into one narrative was tried out in Tatian's Diatessaron (also later second century), which was widely popular, especially in Syria, but the four-Gospel canon remained official in the main churches.

The Pauline letters seem to have been collected and some letters amplified or rewritten by Pauline disciples. They circulated in a collection of ten, later perhaps supplemented by the three "pastoral" Letters to Timothy and Titus. Hebrews was disputed until a late time, and of the catholic or general letters 1 Peter and 1 John had widest acceptance, James was more marginal, and the others were never widely used and were long omitted in certain areas. Revelation, if early popular, was also long opposed, its authorship disputed, and its standing damaged by reaction against millenarian movements in early Christianity. Conversely, various early Christian writings that in the end were not canonical were in the early years treated by some as on the same level with books now canonical, e.g., 1 Clement or the Shepherd of Hermas, and some famous Bible manuscripts contain one or the other of these.

Thus the core of the NT canon was agreed upon quite early, but complete agreement in all aspects was only slowly reached, and indeed was never completely reached in all sections of the church. The arguments by which canonicity was determined are somewhat better known than in the case of the OT. Basically it came down to the authority of the opinion of respected senior persons in the churches. Authorship was naturally a consideration, but the question of who was the actual author was itself a matter of opinion; several rejected books bore the name of Peter. Theological content was also a consideration, but again the question whether a book accorded with the church's faith was a matter for the estimation of authoritative persons.

Two conflicts with heresy probably stimulated the creation of a fixed canon. Marcion separated Christianity sharply from its Hebraic past and formed a strictly limited canon of Pauline Letters plus the Gospel of Luke, all modified to remove Jewish elements. The Gnostics, conversely, produced numerous Gospels, apocalypses, and other works expounding their doctrines, often under the names of apostles like Peter or Thomas. Books of this sort are sometimes classified together as "New Testament Apocrypha," but they are unlike the standard OT Apocrypha in that they never formed part of the canon of the great churches.

With the completion and fixation of NT Scripture Christianity had come closer to joining Judaism in the category of scriptural religions. The "Old" and "New" Testaments had a definite shape. Yet it would be wrong to suppose that these written documents were paramount over all other instances of authority, for alongside them there stood the authority of the rule of faith and that of the bishops. The rule of faith crystallized in the creeds and, though the existing creeds may be later than the formation of the New Testament, in principle creed precedes Scripture, for it expresses the central affirmations of faith out of which Scripture arose and that therefore rightly interpret it. Thus early Christianity was never really a fully scriptural religion. It had a Scripture, the Word of God, but that stood in a complex relationship with other authorities. The idea that Scripture was entirely paramount over all other authorities comes more from the Reformation than from the NT. → Biblical Criticism.

Bibliography

Anderson, B. W. "Tradition and Scripture in the Community of Faith." Journal of Biblical Literature 100 (1981): 5–21.

Barr, J. Explorations in Theology 7. London: SCM, 1980.

———. Holy Scripture: Canon, Authority, Criticism. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983.

Sanders, J. A. Torah and Canon. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972.

Von Campenhausen, H. The Formation of the Christian Bible. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972.

PART ONE

---

THE BIBLICAL STORY:
GENESIS—ESTHER

INTRODUCTION TO THE BIBLICAL STORY: GENESIS-ESTHER

---

DAVID J. A. CLINES

Traditionally, the Hebrew Bible has been divided into three sections: the Law (Torah), the Prophets, and the Writings. From a logical point of view, however, this division leaves something to be desired; for example, placing the collection of historical books (Joshua to 2 Kings) together with the prophetic books proper (Isaiah to Malachi) under the one heading, Prophets, is hard to justify. And there is not a lot of sense in placing Ruth among the Writings when its setting in time makes it an obvious appendage to the book of Judges or in including Daniel among the Writings rather than among the Prophets.

For the purposes of this volume, the OT has been divided into three somewhat different groupings of books: the Biblical Story (Genesis to Esther), Psalms and Wisdom (Job to Song of Songs), and the Prophetic Books (Isaiah to Malachi). This is the order to be found in most Christian editions of the Bible (though in Roman Catholic Bibles, Esther does not follow Nehemiah directly).

---

THE STORY IN ITS PRESENT FORM

---

The books Genesis to Esther are the narrative books of the OT. Together they contain two distinct story sequences, which are alike in many ways but which also show surprising and important differences. The first narrative sequence, which may be called the Primary History, runs from Genesis to 2 Kings, and the second, the Secondary History, from 1 Chronicles to Esther. Each sequence begins with the creation and recounts some of the history of the Hebrew people. But they conclude at very different points in the history: the Primary History concludes with the end of the Judean kingdom at the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C., and the Secondary History finishes in the fifth century B.C. with the installation of a Jewish prime minister, Mordecai, in the Persian government with consequent favorable treatment of the Jews throughout the Persian Empire.

The different points of conclusion are not the only sign that the two histories have fundamentally different outlooks on the past. For whereas the Primary History consistently stresses elements of decline, disaster, and failure in the national history, the Secondary History emphasizes positive aspects. The two histories thus represent alternative ways of recounting the past, and in being juxtaposed within the Hebrew Scriptures—without any explanation of why both histories exist—they invite readers of the biblical text to make their own assessment of their significance. In this way readers are compelled to reexamine their own notions of what constitutes success or failure, blessing or curse, promise and fulfillment—which is to say, to reflect theologically in a creative way.

---

Previous page: Head of Moses; detail of a mosaic of Moses receiving the tablets of the law; from the Monastery of St. Catherine, Sinai, sixth century A.D.

The Primary History (Genesis–2 Kings)

The Primary History contains the following twelve books: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1 Samuel, 2 Samuel, 1 Kings, and 2 Kings.

Within the Primary History there are some obvious major divisions corresponding to significant phases in the national life. The death of Moses, who has been the key human figure in the narrative from Exodus to Deuteronomy, is clearly a crucial event, occurring as it does on the eve of the Israelite entry into the Promised Land. The opening of the book of Joshua, “After the death of Moses . . .,” signals that transition and provides a model for other major transitions in the history. Thus Judges begins “After the death of Joshua,” 2 Samuel “After the death of Saul,” 2 Kings “After the death of Ahab” (though in this case the transition seems much less significant); 1 Kings begins just before the death of David. The Primary History is thus arranged around the lifetimes of important individuals: the patriarchs (Genesis), Moses (Exodus to Deuteronomy), Joshua (Joshua), the judges (Judges), Samuel and Saul (1 Samuel), David (2 Samuel), Solomon, Elijah, Ahab (1 Kings), and the other kings (2 Kings).

The narrative of the Primary History may be described as one of fair beginnings and foul endings. The first of those beginnings is the promise in Genesis 12 to Abraham that his descendants—the Israelite people—will be vastly numerous, that they will inhabit a land of their own, that they will be the object of divine blessing, and that they will be a blessing to other nations. But by the end of 2 Kings these promises are shown not to have been ultimately attained, even though there have been signals of their potential success along the way. By the end of the narrative sequence, ten of the twelve tribes of Israel have long ago been lost to view in Assyrian captivity, and the remainder have just now been submerged in Babylonian exile, Judah has been “taken into exile out of its land” (2 Kings 25:21), it has “come to the point” that Yahweh has “cast them [Jerusalem and Judah] out of his presence” (24:20), and the nations have experienced from Israel no blessing but either military domination (when Israel ruled an empire) or else insubordination (when Israel formed part of the Assyrian or Babylonian empires).

Fair beginnings are also announced by the various styles of leadership Israel experiences in the Primary History. Every type of leader—warrior, judge, king, and prophet—though represented as Yahweh’s gift to the nation, proves disastrous or at least ineffectual. Moses the warrior-leader of the people can guide them to the Promised Land but not into it because of a personal failing; he can bring them divine law, but he cannot prevent the curses of Deuteronomy 28 falling upon them if they fail to be obedient. Joshua the warrior, whom no one is supposed to be able to withstand in his fight for territory for his people (Josh. 1:5) and whose function is to gain the land of Canaan as a possession for the Hebrews (1:6, 15), is at the end of his days still stiffening the resolve of his countrymen against “the nations that remain” (23:4) and urging them to remain loyal to the worship of Yahweh rather than “the gods of the Amorites in whose land you dwell” (24:15). The land is still the Amorites’!

The history of the judges, who are “raised up” by God (Judg. 2:16), is likewise a story of decline, from the first and unexceptionable judge Othniel, upon whom the spirit of Yahweh comes and who thereupon can overcome an oppressive “king of Mesopotamia” (3:10), to Samson. Samson, whom also the spirit of Yahweh “stirs” (13:25), but who—unlike other judges—cannot bring “rest” to his nation, cannot control the Philistine threat any more than he can control his own appetites, and he must suffer the indignity of having his era denoted “the days of the Philistines” (15:20). And if it is Samuel rather than Samson who is to be regarded as the last of the judges, even he fails conspicuously to fulfill his boyhood promise as purveyor of the word of Yahweh (1 Sam. 3), appointing his unscrupulous sons as his successors to the judgeship (8:1–3) and resisting the evident intention of Yahweh to institute a monarchy (e.g., 8:22).

The monarchy as an institution holds out great promise, but it too very soon proves its potential for disaster. The first king, Saul, chosen by divinely directed lot (1 Sam. 10:20–24), is very soon “rejected . . . from being king over Israel” (15:26), Yahweh having “repented” that he has made Saul king (15:11). The most esteemed of Israel’s kings, David, is condemned out of his own mouth, sinning against Yahweh in the matter of Bathsheba and Uriah (2 Sam. 12:13) and in the numbering of the people (24:10). Though he is promised that his line will rule over Israel “for ever” (7:13, 16), he is also threatened with a prophecy that his dynasty will “never” be free from feuds and attacks (12:10). His son Solomon, who begins his reign by “loving” Yahweh (1 Kings 3:3) and building him a temple (1 Kings 6–7), in the end proves to be “not wholly true to the LORD his God” (11:4) and is told that Yahweh will “surely tear the kingdom from [him]” (11:11). In consequence, Solomon’s son Rehoboam loses the allegiance of all the tribes except Judah (12:19–20), and Jeroboam, his northern rival, institutes unlicensed sanctuaries, which become “a sin to the house of Jeroboam, so as to cut it off and to destroy it from the face of the earth” (13:34). In the Northern Kingdom, the kings regularly follow the example of Jeroboam and lead their people into sin; Omri, for example, “walked in all the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and in the sins which he made Israel to sin, provoking the LORD, the God of Israel, to anger” (16:26). In the Southern Kingdom, two kings are wholeheartedly approved of by Yahweh: Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:6), who nevertheless is the first to hear of the forthcoming exile to Babylon (20:16–19), and Josiah (22:2; 23:25), who nevertheless is killed in battle (23:29–30) despite a prophecy that he will be “gathered to [his] grave in peace” (22:20). Several others receive qualified praise, but of six of the last seven kings of Judah it is uniformly reported that they “did what was evil in the sight of the LORD” (e.g., 21:2).

The other institution of leadership in Israel is that of the prophets. They appear at various times in the course of the narrative from Moses (Deut. 34:10), who functions both as Yahweh’s mouthpiece and as an intercessor for the people, through anonymous prophets in the period of the judges (Judg. 6:8–10; cf. 2:1–3; 10:11–14), bands of prophets in the time of Samuel (1 Sam. 10:5), and schools of “the sons of the prophets” in the time of Elisha, to the famous individual prophets Samuel, Nathan, Elijah, and Elisha. As a channel of communication between the divine and the human, the prophets hold greater promise than any of the other leaders, but nonetheless they are remarkably ineffectual: quite apart from the more trivial tasks of divination prophets were called upon to perform (like finding lost animals, 1 Sam. 9), their success in influencing national history is minimal. Disobedience to Yahweh’s word as delivered by a prophet is very early on recognized as a fatal crime for a king: Saul is “rejected” from being king because he has rejected the “word” of Yahweh through Samuel (1 Sam. 15:23). Elsewhere, on the whole, the prophetic word does no more than announce a doom-laden future that is not open to adjustment (e.g., Ahijah’s prophecy in 1 Kings 14:7–11) but that merely wakens echoes of the original prophecy as it comes to pass (cf. 15:29; also 2 Kings 9:25–26, 36; 10:10, 17). In the large stretch of the narrative given over to the activity of the prophets Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17–2 Kings 10) there is indeed an outstandingly successful confrontation between the prophet of Yahweh and those prophets of Baal that are supported by the royal court (1 Kings 18); nevertheless, it is not the prophet Elijah but the king Jehu who most decisively defends the worship of Yahweh when he “wipe[s] out Baal from Israel” (10:28), which is to say, from the nation as a whole. Prophets are indeed found designating future kings by anointing (1 Sam. 10:1; 2 Kings 9:1–10), but prophets do not make kings; it needs popular acclamation (1 Sam. 10:24–11:15) or a coup d’état (2 Kings 9:11–37) to achieve real political ends.

The direction of the Primary History, towards national decline and the negation of national hopes entertained at the beginning of the story, was, now that we come to recognize it, already foreshadowed by the opening chapters of Genesis. In Genesis 1–11, the primeval history, fair beginnings for the human race—before ever the scope of the narrative is narrowed down to the Abrahamic family—are very soon tarnished by human perversity. The primal couple is expelled from the Garden in no time at all (3:23), the first brother becomes the first murderer (4:8), the multiplication of humankind is accompanied by a corresponding increase in human wickedness (6:1, 5), and at Babel the first cooperative endeavor in human history leads immediately to a permanent “scattering” of the race across the face of the earth (11:9). Against that background it is perhaps not surprising that the focus on the Abrahamic family from Genesis 12 onward should reveal not some undoing of the primeval tragedy, but a long drawn out replay of it. There is not a lot of difference between Genesis 6:5–7 and 2 Kings 17:18–23: when God sees that humankind's thoughts are "only evil continually," he is sorry that he created them and determines to "blot" them out from the face of the ground by a great flood. Things are not very different when the Israelite people over many generations do "wicked things, provoking the LORD to anger" (2 Kings 17:11), and he "removes" or "casts" them "out of his sight" (17:18, 20, 23). The greatest difference between the primeval history and the rest of the Primary History is that in Genesis 1–11 every episode of human sin followed by divine punishment contains a further element of mitigation of the punishment; Adam and Eve, for example, though expelled from the Garden, do not actually die in the day they eat of the fruit, and Cain, though driven out from the tillable earth to be a fugitive, carries a divine mark of protection against any who might seek to slay him. In the remainder of the history as a whole, however, there is no mitigation, either realized or envisaged, of the fate of the Israelite people.

Or is there? Some have thought that the concluding paragraph of 2 Kings (25:27–30), recounting the release from prison in Babylon of the ex-king Jehoiachin of Judah, injects a note of hope on the very last page of the history, hinting perhaps that Jehoiachin's good fortune may one day be that of the people as a whole. It is true that Jehoiachin is given a royal pension and dines at the Babylonian king's table, at "a seat above the seats of the kings who were with him in Babylon" (25:28). But it is also true that Jehoiachin has spent thirty-seven years in prison in Babylon (twice the time he had lived in Judah; cf. 24:8), that he is still effectively a prisoner in the Babylonian court, that his pension is humiliatingly paid to him on a daily basis, and that at the time of writing Jehoiachin is already dead (25:30: "a regular allowance was given him by the king . . . as long as he lived"). None of this augurs well for the Jewish people, nor can this admittedly undisastrous conclusion reverse the downhill direction in which the whole of the Primary History has been moving.

The Secondary History (1 Chronicles–Esther)

The Secondary History begins with the creation, as does the Primary History, but it carries the story of the Israelite people much further, beyond the Exile to the Persian period of the fifth century B.C. This Secondary History consists of 1 Chronicles, 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther.

By comparison with the Primary History, the Secondary History is remarkable for its omission of any narrative for the period from the creation down to the death of Saul (1 Chron. 10)—genealogies fill the narrative gap—and for its exclusion of the history of the Northern Kingdom. Clearly the first crucial event in this history is not the Exodus or conquest of Canaan, but the reign of David and the establishment of his dynasty. In this history, David does not first rule over Judah and then extend his power over the northern tribes (cf. 2 Sam. 5:5); he is made king by "all Israel" from the beginning (1 Chron. 11:1).

The importance of David in the Secondary History is that he is represented as the institutor of the Israelite system of worship, especially of the Temple, which is his idea and which he instructs his son Solomon to build (1 Chron. 17; 22). The Levites also, who actually perform the worship of the Temple, are appointed by David (1 Chron. 23-26). Nothing is said of David's misdemeanors, and even the narrative of his exploits as a warrior seems to be included only by way of introduction to the story of his bringing the Ark as the focus of the worship of Yahweh to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 13).

The section of the history devoted to Solomon likewise has as its theme Solomon as the builder of the Temple (2 Chron. 1-9). Here too any negative aspects of the king's personality are passed over (cf. 1 Kings 2:1-3:1). Indeed, later kings of Judah are not depicted as uniformly righteous, but special emphasis is given to those who effect religious reforms or repair the Temple: Asa (2 Chron. 15), Jehoshaphat (19:4-11), Joash (24:4-14), Hezekiah (29:3-31:23), and Josiah (34:1-35:19). The history of the monarchy thus seems to be primarily a history of the establishment and maintenance of the worship of God; the function of kings is primarily to promote correct and lavish worship, and the function of the people is to provide the necessary funds and personnel for the Temple services.

In the postexilic section of the Secondary History in Ezra and Nehemiah the same interest is very evident. The return from exile in Babylonia is authorized by the Persian king Cyrus specifically to rebuild the Jerusalem Temple (Ezra 1:2), and the first action of the returned exiles is to rebuild the Temple altar "in its place" (3:3) and to reinstitute sacrifices there, even before the Temple itself has been rebuilt. The first major climax of these books is the completion of the Temple building "by command of the God of Israel and by decree of Cyrus and Darius and Artaxerxes king of Persia" (6:14) and the celebration of the traditional festivals (6:19-22). Other important moments in the narrative are the elimination of foreigners from the worshiping community (Ezra 10), the securing of the city and its people by the enclosure of a wall (Neh. 3-4; 12:27-43), instruction in the law of Yahweh (chap. 8), and cultic reforms (chap. 13). Nehemiah's closing words are in the closest harmony with the history's primary interest: "I established the duties of the priests and Levites, each in his work; and I provided for the wood offering, at appointed times, and for the first fruits" (13:30-31). And Nehemiah is not even a professional religious man, but a Jewish official in the Persian civil service.

The final book of the Secondary History, Esther, is set in Persia and so cannot directly concern itself with the worship of the Jerusalem Temple. But its theme, the preservation of the Jewish people from the threat of genocide against them, makes it a fitting conclusion to the Secondary History: in its present context, it affirms that the continuance of the worship of God by the people of God is guaranteed. The gravest threat to national existence has been faced and overcome, and the Jewish people, though "scattered" and "dispersed" (Esther 3:8) throughout the provinces of the Persian Empire, have their interests safeguarded by the presence at the Persian court of Mordecai the Jew. He is not only “next in rank to King Ahasuerus” but also “great among the Jews” because he habitually “sought the welfare of his people and spoke peace to all his people” (10:3).

So the entire Secondary History concludes on an upbeat note. It harmonizes well with the outlook of the narrative as a whole, that the purpose for which history has existed is the worship of God. And the people of Israel, aided by the right-living kings of Judah, have, in fact, throughout the only history worth writing about, been carrying out that worship faithfully and joyfully. This quite different perspective on national history from that of the Primary History is particularly well illustrated by the way the two histories handle the question of the meaning of the Exile. For 2 Kings, the Exile is a punishment for national iniquity, an unredeemed disaster, and the end point of the whole narrative. But for 2 Chronicles, the Exile is punishment for pollution of the Temple (36:14), it is destined to come to an end at a time predicted by the prophet Jeremiah (36:21; cf. Jer. 25:11; 29:10), and it is no kind of end, for the book concludes not with the Exile but with an announcement of the plans of Cyrus to rebuild the Temple (36:22–23).

Conclusion

The OT presents us, then, with two alternative tellings of the history of the Israelite people. Their difference in outlook does not necessarily make either of them unreliable; it only reinforces the fact that the telling of any story or any history must be selective and must reflect the intentions of some person or group.

The fact that the two histories are found within the same sacred Scriptures has a further meaning than that, however. Any community or individual with a commitment to those Scriptures does not have the freedom to pick or choose between the tellings of the story. They must come to terms with the coexistence of the conflicting narratives.

A very similar conflict of outlook exists between Psalms 105 and 106. These are both “historical” psalms in that they recount selected incidents from national history. But Psalm 105 is positive where Psalm 106 is negative. For Psalm 105, what happened to Israel in Egypt is that there God made his people fruitful and stronger than their enemies (105:24); for Psalm 106, it was a time when Israel ignored God’s power and rebelled against him (106:7). Here too the reader, especially if he or she is a member of a religious group that uses these psalms, is not free simply to ignore the contrast.

---

THE BIBLICAL STORY AS IT HAS BEEN UNDERSTOOD

---

This understanding of the biblical story as essentially two competing historical narratives is not the way in which the books have been usually understood by the communities that have preserved them. This is because it has not been customary to look at ancient sacred books as literary works that generate meaning through their overall shape, their structure, and their dominant tendencies, that is, through their identity as wholes. These books, like the other biblical books, have tended rather to be valued piecemeal for their diverse contents.

Thus, the Primary History has been understood both in the Jewish and the Christian communities as containing law and history. It does, of course. In Exodus to Deuteronomy there is the legal foundation of the Israelite people, which remains essential for the moral and legal beliefs and practices of Jews today. Christians have generally tried to discriminate between the moral laws of these books, which they consider as having some kind of divine authorization, and the more strictly ritual laws, which they have regarded as applicable only to the Jewish people. These interpretations, which may or may not be valid, ignore the fact that the laws of the Primary History are narrated, i.e., set in a narrative context. It would be more appropriate to understand them—even the Ten Commandments—not as laws claiming universal truth but as texts that will yield meanings only as they are understood within the narrative framework that surrounds them.

The Primary History also contains a valuable collection of historical materials. In fact, for most of the period it covers, it is the only source we have for knowing anything at all about what actually happened. But it is plain from the structure of the history that its concern is not primarily historiographical in the sense of recording the events of the past. The narrative has an argument or a thesis it wishes to establish. And since that thesis concerns the religious meaning of the total historical period that it describes, our primary understanding of the narrative should be a theological one.

The Secondary History has been even less highly esteemed for its significance as a whole. Ever since the Septuagint Greek translation in the second century B.C. of 1 and 2 Chronicles under the heading Paraleipomena, "the omitted things," Chronicles has been regarded as no more than a supplement to Samuel and Kings rather than as presenting a distinctive view of the past and indeed of the purpose of creation. Ezra and Nehemiah, for their part, have been treated more as a continuation of the history of Genesis to 2 Kings carried forward into post-exilic times than as further evidence for the argument of Chronicles.

A further effect of regarding the narratives as essentially history is the following. Both Jewish and Christian readers have always known that the history of Israel did not really come to an end with the Exile or with the postexilic age. So the particular point at which the two biblical histories conclude has seemed arbitrary to them and therefore meaningless. By contrast, to recognize the existence of the two sequences of narratives as literary works in their own right leads to an enlargement of meaningfulness.

So long as the narratives have been thought to contribute to a program other than their own—such as laying down the laws by which to live or providing information about the events of the past—their truly challenging and unsettling nature has lain unremarked. This is not surprising, for the communities that have preserved them have always been in the business of conservation, of themselves as much as of their sacred books. Once we acknowledge that the Bible contains in these two historical sequences two divergent ways of remembering the past we become obliged to make decisions for ourselves, not so much about the relative historical worth of each of the histories, but about whether it is possible to give allegiance to Scriptures that contain so much tension within themselves. There is no obviously or objectively correct decision; readers have to become personally involved. The history of the Bible's reception, even by groups that have esteemed it highly, is, in some important respects, a chronicle of misapprehensions of the Bible.

---

THE ORIGINS OF THE BIBLICAL STORY

---

What have been spoken of in this chapter as the two biblical histories did not originate as unified literary works and, indeed, never existed as such in biblical times. The histories as we have them now have an inner logic and coherence that do not depend on their authors. In fact, we may suppose that several different authors composed different parts of the histories at different times, in some cases deliberately intending their works to be read as sequels to narratives already written (e.g., Ruth as an appendix to Judges), at other times writing quite independently of the context in which their work is now to be found (e.g., Esther).

The Primary History

The twelve books of the Primary History are, with one small exception, the first books of the Hebrew Bible. Only Ruth, which belongs chronologically with Judges, is located elsewhere in the Hebrew canon, namely, in its third division, the Writings—for reasons no longer known. The Hebrew Bible, however, does not really regard Genesis to 2 Kings as a unified work because it breaks it apart with one of the major divisions of the canon: thus Genesis to Deuteronomy forms the Pentateuch (the Torah), and Joshua to 2 Kings the Former Prophets.

In modern critical scholarship it is customary to think of Genesis to 2 Kings not as a "Primary History" but as two large independent works composed at different times with differing purposes. These two works are regarded as either the Pentateuch and a Deuteronomistic History (Joshua to 2 Kings) or a Tetrateuch (Genesis to Numbers) and a Deuteronomistic History opening with the book of Deuteronomy.

The Pentateuch has for a century of scholarship been supposed to have been finally edited from various sources or documents in the fifth century B.C. In some versions of this Documentary Hypothesis, it grew by a process of accretion; the earliest narrative source, "J," of the tenth century B.C., was combined with a ninth-century narrative, "E," in the eighth century. In the seventh century, the laws of the book of Deuteronomy, "D," were attached to this narrative. Lastly, an exilic (sixth-century) Priestly work, containing both narrative and laws, was used as a framework for the older material; JEDP thus became, in the fifth century, the Pentateuch.

Though still defended by many scholars, this reconstruction has been challenged recently at every point. The dates and sequence of each of the sources have been questioned, J sometimes being thought postexilic, P pre-exilic. The existence of an E source has been doubted by many. Others have found the arguments for analyzing the sources behind the literature defective, and increasingly it is being felt that the growth of this diverse literary work is likely to have been very much more complex than the Documentary Hypothesis envisaged. No one doubts, however, that the materials from which the Pentateuch (or Tetrateuch) was written come from widely different periods. The material of Genesis and Exodus in particular must have existed for some centuries in oral form, and principles of selection and arrangement that we can no longer identify have shaped a good deal of the material. Surprisingly, few scholars have studied the question of what thesis the Pentateuch in its final form is attempting to sustain. But it may be suggested that its theme is the threefold promise to the Abrahamic family of land, posterity, and divine blessing. Since this promise was only partially fulfilled by the end of the Pentateuch, a more complete fulfillment lay in the future.

The Deuteronomistic History obviously comes in its final form from the sixth century, since the last narrated item refers to 561 B.C. The major critical issue is whether an earlier, pre-exilic edition of the book may be detected. If the first edition of this history was written during the lifetime of Josiah and under the influence of the religious reformation attributed to him, then the whole thrust of the work may perhaps have been very much more positive. The history could then be seen as a record of the graciousness of Yahweh toward the Davidic dynasty, in accordance with the prophetic promises of 2 Samuel 7 (cf. 1 Kings 11:12; 15:4; 2 Kings 8:19; 19:34). Most agree, though, that even if such were the theme of the first edition, the exilic edition, which not only recounts the untimely death of this much-praised king but also concludes with the exile of the people, effected an enormous alteration in its theme from a possibly positive to an almost certainly negative outlook. Some, indeed, have found a note of hope in its last paragraph reporting the release of Jehoiachin from prison (2 Kings 25:27–30), but that hardly prevents the impact of the total work being predominantly negative.

The Secondary History

The Secondary History has been subjected to a curious deformation by the canon of the Hebrew Bible. Not only is it removed as far as possible from the Primary History to the very end of the Hebrew Bible, but it is split in two and the order of its parts reversed. Ezra and Nehemiah, which of course relate the history of the centuries after Chronicles, are confusingly placed before Chronicles. The book of Esther, which belongs chronologically speaking with Ezra (to be precise, it forms an addendum to Ezra 4:6), is—like Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah—one of the Writings but preceding Ezra and separated from it by Daniel (which rightly does precede Ezra).

It was long agreed by critical scholars that Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah did actually once form a unified work, attributed to a Levite or priest of the late fifth century B.C. called by scholars today the "Chronicler." While some now think that Ezra and Nehemiah are not the work of the Chronicler, there can be no doubt that all these books come from the same literary and religious circle. At some time in their early history, these books must have been regarded as part of the same work, because the first two and a half verses of Ezra have been copied to the end of 2 Chronicles (36:22-23), with the result that the forward-looking conclusion that 2 Chronicles already had has been much strengthened.

Chronicles evidently uses Samuel and Kings as its principal source; it is a matter of debate to what extent, if at all, the Chronicler had access to other old sources or whether he composed freely all the material not paralleled in Samuel and Kings. For Ezra and Nehemiah, the editor used a variety of historical documents including Persian administrative texts in Aramaic (e.g., Ezra 5:7-6:12; 7:12-26), records from Jerusalem archives such as the list of inhabitants of Judah in Ezra 2 and the people's pledge of loyalty to the law in Nehemiah 10, and above all the "memoirs" of Ezra (Ezra 7-10; Neh. 8-9) and Nehemiah (Neh. 1:1-7:73; 11:1-2; 12:31-43; 13:4-31).

The Chronicler's work has sometimes been thought to be politically motivated as a defense of the legitimacy of his Judean community against their northern neighbors, the Samaritans. Others have thought it an implicit expression of hope for the restoration of the Davidic monarchy. It seems more probable, however, that its audience is primarily the author's own community and its purpose was to assure them of the value of their life, even under foreign rule: they as a community are sustaining the worship of God, which is the primary function of Israel, indeed, the chief purpose of the world's creation.

Bibliography

- Bailey, L. R. The Pentateuch. Interpreting Biblical Texts. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1981.
- Clines, D. J. A. The Theme of the Pentateuch. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 10. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1978.
- Cross, F. M. Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973. Pp. 217-90.
- Fretheim, T. E. Deuteronomistic History. Interpreting Biblical Texts. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1983.
- Noth, M. The Deuteronomistic History. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 15. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981.
- . The Chronicler's History. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 50. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987.
- Polzin, R. Moses and the Deuteronomist: A Literary Study of the Deuteronomistic History. Vol. 1, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges. New York: Seabury, 1980.
- Whybray, R. N. The Making of the Pentateuch: A Methodological Study. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 53. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987.

GENESIS

JOHN S. K SELMAN

INTRODUCTION

Genesis and the Pentateuch

The book of Genesis comprises a narrative extending from creation to the death of Joseph. It can be divided into four large sections: Genesis 1–11, the beginnings; 12–25, the Abraham cycle; 25–36, the Jacob cycle; and 37–50, the Joseph story. Genesis is part of a larger literary complex of narrative and law commonly designated the “Torah” or the “Pentateuch.” The three sources (J, also called the Yahwist; E, the Elohist; and P, the Priestly writer) that appear in Genesis continue through Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, with their characteristic language, concerns, and themes.

Cast as Moses’ testament to Israel before his death and Israel’s subsequent entrance into the promised land, Deuteronomy reveals a literary source different from J, E, and P; and the presence of the language and themes of this “D source” in Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings has led to the conviction that these works form a great historical corpus (called the “Deuteronomistic History”), prefaced by an address of Moses to Israel in Deuteronomy and ending with the destruction of the kingdom of Judah (→ Elohist; Deuteronomy; Deuteronomistic Historian; Priestly Writer(s); Sources of the Pentateuch; Yahwist). The formation of a five-book Pentateuch from the Tetratauch (Genesis–Numbers) was effected by the attachment of Deuteronomy to the preceding four books, an attachment governed in part by what might be termed “biographical” interests: Deuteronomy is Moses’ farewell, his last words of instruction and warning to Israel; it ends with the death of this heroic figure whose birth and rise to leadership are recorded in Exodus. Thus understood, the Pentateuch relates the story of God’s creation of the world and humanity; his choice of the ancestors and of Moses, God’s chosen instrument in the liberation of slaves from Egypt and the creation of a people; the covenant and the proclamation of the law as a guide for the redeemed community; and God’s care for Israel expressed in his provision for all their needs and his guidance of them through the wilderness to the border of the land of promise, where Moses preaches his final sermon to Israel before his death. It is also possible to speak of a six-book Hexateuch extending from Genesis through Joshua and carrying the story to the conquest of the land of Canaan under the leadership of Moses’ chosen successor Joshua (→ Hexateuch).

Methods in the Study of Genesis

Modern study of the book of Genesis had its beginnings in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in the researches of R. Simon and J. Astruc. From those beginnings, the study of Genesis has moved in several directions. For some scholars, the history and society behind the text have been major concerns. The aim has been the reconstruction of Israel’s history in its ancient Near Eastern context, especially through archaeology and the attempt to correlate its findings with the biblical literary record. The name of William F. Albright and those of his students are associated with this approach (→ Archaeology, History, and the Bible).

Other scholars have focused rather on the history and development of the book. The methods employed include source criticism, the recognition and isolation of the component narrative strands (for Genesis: J, E, and P) through the perspective of the Documentary Hypothesis given classic statement by Julius Wellhausen in his Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1883), and form criticism, the study of the origin and development, both oral and written, of the smaller constituent parts of these larger complexes and sources and the institutional setting of these identified units (→ Oral Materials, Sources, and Traditions). This method was employed with great success by Hermann Gunkel in his commentary on Genesis in 1901.

The attention of a number of scholars has shifted recently from the diachronic study of the parts of a composite like Genesis to the synchronic study of the finished product at the end of its development. The final form of the text can be approached as literature and studied with the appropriate tools of literary criticism (as in the work of Robert Alter) or as Scripture, as the sacred collection of writings normative for two communities of faith, Jewish and Christian. This method has been termed canonical criticism and is associated with the names of Brevard S. Childs and James Sanders (→ Biblical Criticism). These moves toward synthesis do not make irrelevant the gains of the traditional methods of source and form criticism; but they do bring into focus a reality sometimes not given sufficient attention by the more analytical methods, the final form of the text and the totality in which the constituent parts find their meaning and speak today.

Other contemporary approaches include feminist interpretation, which in Genesis would involve the examination of the role and status of women in the creation accounts of chaps. 1–3 and in the ancestor stories of chaps. 12–50. Sociology and anthropology have recently had considerable impact on OT studies; in Genesis, methods drawn from the social sciences have illuminated such issues as genealogies and kinship structures (→ Sociology of the Old Testament).

Major Themes of Genesis

Some prominent themes that occur throughout Genesis include the following: the theme of the promise, of blessing in place of curse, of election, and of familial strife.

The theme of God's promise (Gen. 12:1–3, 7) and its partial or incomplete fulfillment touches both the promise of descendants and of land. The promise of descendants is organized around a series of questions: how will Abram (Abraham) be the father of numerous descendants when he has not even one son? Which of his sons (Ishmael or Isaac) will be the bearer of the promise? Will the chosen son survive to carry on the line (chaps. 22, 27)? The partial fulfillment of the promise of descendants is recorded in the genealogy in Gen. 46:8–27. The promise of land is also delayed in fulfillment. The ancestors to whom Canaan is promised spend more time outside the promised land than in it: Abraham and Sarah in Egypt (chap. 12) and Gerar (chap. 20); Isaac and Rebekah in Gerar (chap. 26); Jacob in Haran (chaps. 29–31); Joseph in Egypt (chaps. 39–50); and Jacob, Joseph's brothers, and their families also in Egypt (chaps. 46–50).

Both of the promises are faced with obstacles that seem to make the promises humanly impossible to accomplish, obstacles that are overcome by divine intervention. To the promise of descendants, the obstacle is the barrenness of the matriarchs Sarah (Gen. 16), Rebekah (25:21), and Rachel (30:1). At the outset, Sarah's old age (17:17; 18:12) is a further obstacle. To the promise of land, the obstacles are its occupation by the indigenous population (12:6; 13:7) and the famines that provoke the ancestors' departure (12:10; 26:1; 41:54).

The second important theme is the blessing that is also promised by God to the ancestors, their descendants, and ultimately all humanity. There are two models of the activity or involvement of the Deity with humankind, and both models find a place in Genesis: salvation and blessing. By salvation is meant the deliverance of the community or of individuals from various crises and dangers by divine intervention. While the prime example of God's saving activity is certainly the Exodus, saving divine interventions occur as well in Genesis: the salvation of Abram and Sarai (Sarah) in Egypt (chap. 12) and Gerar (chap. 20); of Hagar and Ishmael in the wilderness (chaps. 16, 21); of Lot and his daughters in Sodom (chap. 19); and of Isaac from death (chap. 22).

Blessing, God's provision of human need, is an even more important theme in Genesis. The narrative begins with the blessing of humanity in 1:28 with progeny ("Increase and multiply!") and land ("Fill the earth and subdue it!"). The blessing is continued in the garden of Eden in Genesis 2, but blessing soon gives way to curse (chap. 3) and expulsion from the garden where the human needs for food and companionship were met. Humanity under the curse progresses to the fratricide of Cain and the universal violence and corruption that brought about the divine judgment of the Flood (chaps. 6–9). The blessing of humanity is renewed after the Flood, but the hubris of the tower builders of Babel threatens to start the whole cycle of sin and destruction over again. The dispersal of those who would challenge the sovereignty of God, however, leads into a new history of blessing inaugurated by God in the stories of the ancestors (→ Curse and Blessing; Salvation).

In Genesis, the theme of election appears pointedly in the mystery of God passing over the firstborn to choose the younger son. This theme is first announced in the story of Cain and Abel, where God looks with favor on the gift of the younger son. As the narrative continues, the divine choice falls not on Ishmael but on Isaac (Gen. 17, 21); not on Esau but on Jacob (chaps. 25, 27); not on Reuben but on Joseph (chap. 37); not on Zerah but on Perez (38:27–30; cf. Ruth 4:18–22); not on Manasseh but on Ephraim (Gen. 48:8–19); and not on Reuben, Simeon, or Levi but on Judah (49:8–12). If the major narrative strand in which these stories appear (J) was written in the Davidic-Solomonic era, this theme would have relevance for the accession to power of David and of Solomon, neither of whom was the oldest son (1 Sam. 16; 1 Kings 1).

The theme of rivalry, discord, and strife in the family has not until recently received the attention it deserves. Throughout Genesis, every familial relationship is riven by strife. There is discord between husband and wife (Gen. 3:12; 16:5; 27:1–13; 30:1–2), between wives (16:4–6; 29:21–30:24), between parent and child (27:11–12; 37:10), between brothers (chaps. 4, 27, and 37), and between other relatives (chaps. 13, 30). Like the theme of the choice of the younger son, this theme may be an indirect comment on the royal court of David. It may also reflect the strife and the hope for reconciliation between the two kingdoms.

COMMENTARY

1:1-11:32

The Beginnings

The narrative of Genesis 1-11 begins with the creation of the good world and of humanity as its blessed resident and regent. The divine intention was frustrated by human evil, however, in a story of progressive deterioration and alienation: from the primal act of disobedience (chap. 3) to another act of hubris (chap. 11) in which the boundaries that separate the divine and human worlds are challenged. Since Genesis 1 showed creation to be a process of separation and distinction, the ignoring or blurring of these distinctions reverses the very process of creation and brings about the return to chaos in the Flood.

The growth and spread of sin from disobedience (chap. 3) to murder (chap. 4) to total corruption (chap. 6) to universal destruction (chaps. 7-8) show humanity under the curse as the consequence of sin. But there is a parallel history of divine blessing and grace as well, a history that begins with the creation of a blessed humanity, wherein God continues to show his care for his sinful creatures and in which is renewed the blessing of all humanity (in chap. 9) and of a particular family (in chap. 12), which will become a source of blessing for all.

1:1-2:24

The Two Creation Accounts

1:1-2, In the Beginning. As most modern translations recognize, the P creation account (1:1-2:4a) begins with a temporal clause ("When, in the beginning, God created"); such a translation puts Gen. 1:1 in agreement with the opening of the J account (2:4b) and with other ancient, Near Eastern creation myths. The Hebrew verb bara', "create," is used exclusively of divine activity; "heavens and earth" are a merism (an expression of totality by the use of two polar expressions) meaning "everything" (→ Creation).

The description of the precreation state in v. 2 probably is meant to suggest a storm-tossed sea: darkness, a great wind, the watery abyss. God's superiority over the sea here and in vv.

9-10 may be a reminiscence of the ancient Near Eastern mythic portrait of creation as the victory of order over hostile, chaotic forces like the divinized sea (→ Polytheism; Sea). The tripartite form and downward movement from "heaven" to "earth" to "sea" is frequent elsewhere in the OT (e.g., Pss. 135:6; 146:6; Amos 9:6).

1:3-31, The Six Days of Creation. The six days of P's creation week are described in solemn, repetitive language and are arranged in two sets of three, in which days 1 and 4 correspond, as do days 2 and 5, and 3 and 6. The first three days describe the divine work of separation (light from darkness, water above from water below, sea from land) that prepares a habitable world, while the last three days describe the inhabitants. Day 1 describes the creation of light, and day 4 the sources of light (sun, moon, stars); in day 2 the creation of the dome of the sky ("firmament" in the older translations) provides an air space and waters for the creatures of day 5, fish and birds; in day 3, dry land and plants are provided for the land animals and human beings of day 6 (→ Firmament).

The climax of the six days of creation is the creation of humankind on day 6, which differs from the other days in God's prior consultation of the heavenly court, Israel's demythologized version of the ancient Near Eastern pantheon (v. 26: "Let us make humanity"; cf. Isa. 6:8) and in the designation of humanity as the image of God (→ Image of God). The context suggests that humanity is the image of God in the dominion it exercises over the rest of creation; ancient Near Eastern parallels suggest that "image of God" is a royal designation, emphasizing the godlike nature of the ruling monarch. In the imageless religious tradition of Israel, the only acceptable image of God is the human being.

The divine command to humanity in v. 28 to reproduce prepares for the Genesis genealogies, the continuation of God's initial act of creation, and reaches its climax in the fruitfulness of Israel in Egypt (Exod. 1:7, 12).

2:1-4a, The Divine Sabbath. The P week of creation closes with God's resting on the seventh day and his blessing that day, which will be the Israelite Sabbath (Exod. 20:8-11). The language here is remarkably similar to that found at the end of the account of the construction of the desert tabernacle in Exod. 39:32, 42-43; 40:33 (→ Tabernacle). The creation stories of the ancient Near East often conclude with the construction of a dwelling for the victorious deity. In the Israelite use of this motif, human beings participate in the divine work of creation by extending and completing it. While most scholars consider 2:4a to be the end of the P creation account, echoing 1:1, some understand it rather as the heading of the second creation account.

2:4b–24, The Second Creation Account.

Like P, the J creation account begins with a temporal clause, this time one that describes the precreation state as a waterless, lifeless desert. There may be echoes here of the Canaanite myth of Baal's struggle with a demonic adversary Mot (Death), as there are similar reminiscences of the combat myth of the creator-god Baal versus the Sea in 1:1–2 (→ Baal). The Israelite adaptation and reuse of the Canaanite myths of Baal versus the Sea in Genesis 1 and of Baal versus Death in his desert domain in Genesis 2 recall Yahweh's victory over the sea (Exod. 14–15) and the desert (Exod. 16–17) in the creation of Israel.

The water from the earth transforms the desert into a garden filled with the bounty of the earth; in the center of the garden stand the tree of life, a common ancient Near Eastern motif, and the tree of knowledge (→ Tree of Life, The).

Yahweh's first act of creation in J is the creation of a man from the clay produced by the mixture of the water and dry earth of Gen. 2:6, enlivened by the divine breath (→ Adam; Adamah; Flesh and Spirit). The man's responsibility in Eden, whose abundance comes from Yahweh and not from any of the fertility gods of polytheism, is to cultivate the garden and to obey the divine prohibition of eating from the tree of knowledge (→ Eden). The naming of the animals by the human being (vv. 19–20) is J's way of indicating human dominion over the created world (as in 1:28–30); it recalls the divine name giving in Genesis 1.

The J creation account reaches its climax in the creation of woman as a helping counterpart to the man; the creation of woman from man does not imply subordination, any more than the creation of the man from the earth implies subordination. The subordination of woman to man is effected by the frustration of the divine intention of equality.

2:25–3:24

Crime and Punishment

2:25–3:7, The Sin. The reference to the nakedness of the man and woman is the beginning of the sin account, as the Hebrew pun of 'arummim, "naked," in 2:25 and 3:7 and 'arum, "crafty," in 3:1 suggests. Nakedness in the OT suggests weakness, neediness, and the like (Deut. 28:48; Job 1:21; Isa. 58:7). The unawareness of their nakedness on the part of the man and the woman suggests their unawareness of their dependence on God who provides in the garden for all their needs. "Good and evil" is another instance of merism; the "knowledge of good and evil" is thus the unlimited knowledge appropriate to divinity, as the serpent suggests in v. 5 ("You shall be like gods"). In v. 6 the woman "saw how good the tree was for food"; the language recalls God's delight in his creation (in the repeated "God saw how good it was" of Gen. 1), which culminated in blessing; here the woman's seeing will lead rather to curse (→ Fall, The; Serpent).

Ironically, what the man and woman discover is not that they are gods but that they are naked—weak, vulnerable, and helpless, having rejected their dependence upon God.

3:8–24, The Divine Judgment. The J author continues the ironical tone of the narrative in the description of the human efforts to remedy the situation by attempting to cover their nakedness and hide from Yahweh. Unconscious irony marks the man's answer to the divine interrogation ("I heard your voice in the garden"), since the Hebrew idiom "to hear the voice of" means to obey—precisely what the man did not do.

In vv. 14–19, the divine judgment having been imposed on the participants, the order of their appearance in Genesis 2–3 (man, woman, serpent) is inverted; this literary reversal may imply the reversal of Yahweh's original intentions because of human sin. The divine judgment speech begins with a curse on the serpent (based on an etiology of the serpent's manner of locomotion) and a prediction of the enmity between the human and subhuman worlds. The curse of the woman involves the pain of childbearing, as the concomitant of the replacement of immortality (by eating of the tree of life) by progeny, and subordination to the man. Significantly, this cultural given of female subordination to the male is understood in the J narrative as the result of human sin rather than the divine intention. The curse on the man involves disharmony with the earth from which he was made and to which he will return in death, after a life of hard labor for food. The naming of the woman by the man in v. 20 (Eve; Heb. chawwah, "life") underlines the new situation of dominion by the man over the woman.

The J creation account ends on a note of grace, thus establishing a precedent that will operate in the other J sin stories to come. In place of their inadequate garments, Yahweh provides more durable clothing before expelling the man and woman from the garden; banished from the garden and kept from the tree of life, they are yet not separated from God's care.

Brokenness, disharmony, the sundering of relationships between God and humanity, between man and woman, and between the human and the nonhuman world (hostile serpent and cursed earth) are the result of sin and will continue to appear in Genesis 4–11.

4:1–5:32

Sin and Curse and the Blessing of Progeny

4:1–16, Cain and Abel. The sundering of the familial bond between husband and wife is now paralleled and intensified by another act of violence in the family, fratricide. While the conflict between Cain and Abel may indicate the enmity and rivalry between two ways of life, the pastoral nomad and the sedentary peasant farmer, their brotherhood may reflect the interaction and symbiosis of farmer and shepherd in the ancient Near East. Cain's act of violence is an attack on the integrity of the family, an offense against the divinely intended order of creation expressed in the command to reproduce. But Cain's sin is more than a rejection of the divinely established order; in arrogating to himself the divine sovereignty over life in ending a life, Cain has repeated the sin of his parents by making himself "like God."

There are several other important links between the Cain and Abel story and Genesis 3. The similarity of Yahweh's address to Cain in v. 7 and to the woman in 3:16 underscores the relationship between the two primal sins. Further, like his father, Cain the farmer will be cursed with unproductive land, which he has polluted with his brother's blood (vv. 11–12), and will be banished as a wanderer east of Eden (3:24; 4:16). Characteristically, the story ends not with judgment alone but with mitigating grace; the fugitive's life is protected by the tattoo that Yahweh places on Cain.

Several themes that will recur throughout Genesis make their first appearance here: the strife between brothers (Jacob and Esau, Joseph and the other sons of Jacob) and the rejection of primogeniture for the mysterious divine choice of the younger son.

4:17–25, The Descendants of Cain and the Birth of Seth.

The ambiguity of human progress is highlighted by J's paralleling of advances in civilization and technology with the increase of violence. To Cain is attributed the building of the first city, an advance that will culminate in Genesis 11 in the building of a city that will challenge the supremacy of Yahweh. Among Cain's descendants are Jubal the ancestor of pastoral nomads, Jubal the ancestor of musicians, and Tubal-cain, the originator of metallurgy. Over against these descendants of Cain is set Lamech, who boasts of his vengeful reign of terror. This dark story of violence ends with a genealogy that moves from murderer to murderer; the framing of a genealogy by two acts that bring death stands in contradiction to the genealogical record of the continued life of a family. In sharp contrast to the surrounding darkness is the light that dawns in the announcement of the birth of Seth, who fathers Enosh and a family of those who call upon Yahweh's name (v. 26), a family that will include Abram, who will call upon that same God (12:8).

5:1–32, The Descendants of Adam and Seth.

Genesis 5 begins by recalling the P account of the creation of humanity in the divine image (Gen. 1:26–27) and of the divine command to reproduce (1:28). Obedience to this divine command is demonstrated in the following genealogy of 'adam. In Gen. 1:26 and in 5:1b–2, the Hebrew word 'adam has the generic and inclusive meaning "human being." In Gen. 4:25 ("adam had relations with his wife"), 5:1a ("This is the record of the descendants of 'adam"), and 5:3 ("adam was 130 years of age"), the generic noun has been transformed into a proper name. This transformation of "humanity" into "Adam" depends on the intervening J narratives in Genesis 2–4 that use ha-'adam ("the man") from Gen. 2:8 to 4:1.

In 5:3, Adam's begetting a son "in his image and likeness" understands human reproduction as the continuation of the creative act of God. There is a sharp contrast between the genealogy of Adam through Seth to Noah, in which the divine image and blessing are transmitted, and the curse-laden line of Cain in Genesis 4. The recurring pattern of the standard genealogical notice is: "A had lived X years when he fathered B [the firstborn male]; after B's birth A lived for Y more years and had other children. The whole lifetime of A was (X + Y) years; then he died." This pattern is altered twice. In v. 24, readers are told that Enoch, who "walked with God" (an expression of continuing service and constant performance of duty; Gen. 6:9; 24:40; 1 Kings 3:6; 2 Kings 20:3), "was no more"; and although this expression can mean death (Gen. 42:13, 32; Jer. 31:15), readers learn that "God took" Enoch (as he did Elijah in 2 Kings 2:9–10; cf. Ps. 49:15). In Gen. 5:29, Noah's genealogical notice is expanded by his naming (paralleling the naming of Seth at the beginning of the genealogy in v. 3) and by an etiology for the name. Noah's genealogical notice is further distinctive in that it begins in 5:32 and is concluded in 9:28–29, so that it serves as a frame to the Flood story and the post-Deluge renewal of creation (→ Noah).

---

Genealogies

The biblical genealogies have been the subject of several important studies in recent years. Two factors have provoked renewed interest in this generally neglected material. First, a larger context for the understanding of the genealogies has been provided by anthropological study of the form and function of genealogies in societies where they are still alive. Second, greater interest in the final form of the text has meant that the biblical genealogies can be studied as parts of a literary and theological totality.

Several significant features of genealogies ought to be mentioned. First, they can be linear, focusing on one individual in each generation, or segmented, in which more than one line of descent from a single ancestor is considered. The genealogies of Cain in Genesis 4 and of Adam through Seth in Genesis 5 both begin as linear genealogies and conclude as segmented ones. Second, the most important names in a genealogy are those that occur at its beginning and end (Adam and Noah in Gen. 5). The intervening names can show a high degree of variation and fluidity, with addition and subtraction of names depending on the purpose of the genealogy. To a person reciting or preserving a genealogy, such alterations reflect present social and political relationships rather than past biological history. Thus, it is possible to have differing linear genealogies from the same ancestor on the basis of changed relationships and different functions.

J and P, the two predominant pentateuchal sources in Genesis 1–11, both place a genealogy early in their material: J's genealogy of Cain in Genesis 4 and P's genealogy of Adam through Seth in Genesis 5. Both genealogies are linear (from father to firstborn son), with a segmented conclusion (Lamech's three sons and a daughter in Gen. 4:20–22; Noah's three sons in 5:32). Other genealogies in Genesis include the so-called Table of Nations in Genesis 10 (the descendants of Noah's three sons); 11:10–26 (the extension of the line of Shem to Abram); 25:1–26 (the descendants of Abraham); chap. 36 (the descendants of Esau); and 46:8–25 (the descendants of Jacob).

In regard to the Genesis genealogies in particular, some observations are in order. Theologically, the genealogies in Genesis 1–11 show a double movement of expansion (increase in the world's population in obedience to the divine command to reproduce) and of restriction (the singling out of one line of descent into which Abram will be born). The Genesis narratives share this focus on one family. Literarily, the Genesis genealogies function to create and underline the tension between the orderliness and fixity of the fundamental moments in human life (birth, death, continuation of family line) recorded in the genealogies and the disorderly, contingent openness of the related narratives. For instance, the story of the Flood and the preservation of Noah and the seed of human life in Genesis 6–9 is a narrative marked by contingency and questions about God's intentions and human fate: what does God mean to do with those in the ark? Have the Flood waters abated? Will the dove return to the ark? But the bracketing of the Flood story by the genealogies in Genesis 5 and 10 demonstrates, beneath the flux and uncertainty of events, the unchanged intention of God, neither frustrated nor revoked by human or cosmic evil. On the other hand, if the genealogies tend towards a deterministic view of history, the narratives in which they are embedded present a history shaped by the indeterminacy of events and the freedom of the human participants in the story. Seen together, then, the genealogies and narratives of Genesis show, from different perspectives, God's sovereign control of history.

6:1–9:17

The Flood

6:1–4, Prologue to the Flood. As an introduction to the Flood story, J has used 6:1–4, a fragment of old mythic material with reminiscences of the ancient Near Eastern motif of "rebellion of the gods" in which a younger generation of gods challenges the authority of their divine elders and progenitors. Whatever the origin and history of this fragment, J has included it because it fits so well the narrative of the growth of sin and evil begun in Genesis 3–4. Gen. 6:1–4 is a story of the blurring of the distinction between the human and divine worlds, already heard in the challenges to the divine sovereignty in Genesis 3–4 and to be heard again in the story of the ill-fated tower in Genesis 11. The improper mating of heavenly beings and earthly women is an attack on the boundaries that are meant to separate the heavenly and earthly realms. It thus threatens the integrity of creation as God intended it (cf. Lev. 11:44–47; 20:24–26).

6:5–13, The Causes of the Flood. Following the mythic prologue, the narrative moves to the reasons for the Flood. The two sources (J and P) agree that the Flood was provoked by human evil. In J (vv. 5–8) there is an effective contrast between the evil inclination of the human heart and the pained heart of God. P specifies the evil as violence (vv. 11–12), graphically illustrated in the murderous behavior of Cain and Lamech in Genesis 4. The disordered violence that characterizes interhuman relationships parallels the disordered heavenly-earthly relationships portrayed in 6:1–4.

Set between these two pictures of unceasing human wickedness (J) and of violence and universal corruption (P) is Noah, who "found favor in the eyes of Yahweh" (J) and who walked with God as a righteous and blameless man (P). The similar language in 1 Kings 9:4 ("If you walk before me . . . with a blameless heart") and in Ps.

101:2 and 6 points up the royal features of Noah. The description of Job as "righteous and blameless" (Job 12:4) recalls the linking in Ezek. 14:14 and 20 of Noah, Dan'el, and Job as men saved by their own righteousness.

There are several interesting links between Gen. 6:1-13 and the creation stories in Genesis 1-3. In Gen. 6:2, the "sons of God" saw how beautiful ("how good") were the human women, a seeing that leads to a limited life span and eventual death (cf. Ps. 82:6-7). In Gen. 3:6 the woman "saw how good was the fruit of the tree of knowledge," a seeing that led to mortality. Similarly, when in Gen. 6:5 Yahweh saw how great was the evil of humanity, what he perceives is the reversal of Genesis 1, where "God saw how good" were the works of his creation, with its climax in the creation of humanity. Finally, Gen. 6:12 ("God saw the earth, and behold, it was corrupt") is a dark reminder of the conclusion of the six days of creation in Gen. 1:31 ("God saw all that he had made, and behold, it was very good"). The purpose of such echoes is to emphasize the meaning of the Flood as the reversal of the process of creation.

6:14-7:24, The Flood. The Flood story has traditionally been a parade example of the Documentary Hypothesis, by which the J and P versions of the Flood story can be identified and separated. The presence of more than one source can be seen in the doublets and in the irregularities and inconsistencies in the narrative. Such inconsistencies include, for instance, the distinction of the divine names "Yahweh" in J and "Elohim" in P (→Names of God in the Old Testament); the pair of each species brought into the ark in P (6:19-20) against the seven pairs of clean and the single pair of unclean creatures in J (7:2-3); and the forty days and nights of rainfall in J (7:4, 12) over against the Flood's cresting after 150 days in P (7:24).

Further, there are duplicate accounts of the divine command to Noah to enter the ark in 6:18-20 (P) and 7:1-3 (J), of the entrance into the ark by Noah and his family in 7:7 (J) and 7:13 (P), and the promise never again to destroy the earth in 8:21 (J) and 9:11 (P). More examples can be found in any standard commentary. Suggestions vary on how such originally disparate material was brought together; a recent proposal conceives of a Flood story from Priestly circles into which traditional epic material from J has been incorporated. Whatever the solution, the final product is not an unimaginative collection of material drawn from distinct sources, but an artful, unified composition arranged chiastically around the central affirmation in 8:1 that "God remembered Noah." A presentation of the chiastic structure of chaps. 7-8 will make this clear: A command to enter the ark, 7:1-3; B two mentions of seven days' wait for the Flood, 7:4-10; C entry into the ark, 7:11-15; D Yahweh shuts Noah in, 7:16; E the Flood waters rise, covering the mountains, 7:17-24; F God remembered Noah, 8:1a; E' the Flood waters begin to recede and the tops of the mountains appear, 8:1b-6a; D' Noah opens a window in the ark, 8:6b; C' the raven and dove leave the ark, 8:7-9; B' two periods of seven days each waiting for the waters to recede and the earth to dry, 8:10-14; A' command to leave ark, 8:15-17. The first half of the chiasmus narrates the descent and return of the world to precreation chaos (cf. 7:17-24 to the first creation account in Gen. 1), while the second half moves toward the new creation, explicitly affirmed in Gen. 9:1-7.

Also noteworthy is the dependence of the biblical Flood story on such Babylonian sources as the Gilgamesh Epic and the Atrahasis myth. This ancient Near Eastern material was consciously reshaped and altered in accord with Israelite theological perspectives: e.g., Noah, the survivor of the Flood, is not immortal; the cause of the Flood is ethical (human sin) and not overpopulation, as in some ancient Near Eastern parallels—indeed the Flood is followed by the divine command to Noah to repopulate the earth.

Over against the forty-day downpour of rain in J (7:4, 12), P describes the Flood in more cosmic and mythological terms, with the reduction of the world to precreation chaos effected by the opening of windows in the firmament, the barrier holding back the waters above, and the upsurge of the subterranean waters (Gen. 1:6-8). Only a small bubble of order remains, in which is the vessel carrying the possibility of new life. In 7:21-23, the annihilation of all life is the divine punishment brought on by human evil and sin. While the primary focus of the Flood narrative is on the Flood as divine punishment, as the destruction of a thoroughly evil world, there is present as well a subtheme of the Flood as the divine means of purification, the cleansing of pollution from the earth (→Flood, The).

8:1-22, The End of the Flood. As was mentioned above, the dramatic climax and turning point of the narrative comes in 8:1, when "God remembered Noah." In v. 4, the ark comes to rest (a wordplay on the meaning of the name of Noah in Heb., "rest"). The gradual ebbing of the water and the drying of the earth (vv. 3-14) introduce the theme of the renewal of creation by recalling the gathering of the waters and the appearance of dry land in Gen. 1:9-12.

Our passage also foreshadows another kind of creation, God's creation of his people Israel, who pass through the sea on dry land in Exod. 14:16, 22, 29. Another shared motif linking the creation in Genesis 1, the Flood, and the passage of Israel through the sea is the mention of the wind in each of the narratives (Gen. 1:2; 8:1; Exod. 14:21). The parallelism of the conclusion of the Flood story with creation continues when Noah, at God's command, "brings forth" all the living creatures from the ark (v. 17), just as the earth "brings forth" plants and animals at God's command (Gen. 1:12, 24). The Flood story comes to an end as it began, with mention of the continuing evil designs of the human heart (6:5; 8:21) and the construction of an altar by Noah for the initiation of the postdiluvian system of divine service (cf. Gen. 12:8; 13:18; 22:9; 35:7).

9:1–17, Creation Restored. P continues the dominant theme of the renewal of creation with the repetition to Noah and his family of the command to primordial humanity to reproduce (Gen. 1:28; 9:1) and the divine blessing. The genealogy in Genesis 10 will demonstrate the obedience of Noah's family to this divine command. Unlike Adam, Noah was obedient and righteous; like him, Noah will be the progenitor of a reconstituted humanity. The prohibition of murder in vv. 5–6 is followed by the repeated divine injunction to increase and multiply; this repeats the pattern of murder followed by reproduction in Genesis 4–5. The narrative concludes with the establishment by God of a covenant with Noah and his descendants. The covenant with Noah initiated by God is unilateral, like the covenants with the patriarchs that follow; God binds himself by a promise, without imposing any obligation on Noah. Not surprisingly, this P covenant is similar to the P covenant with Abraham in Genesis 17. The idiom for "establishing a covenant" is employed in both accounts (9:9, 11, 17; 17:7, 19, 21). Other elements shared by Genesis 9 and 17 include the "eternal covenant" (9:16; 17:13, 19); the phrase occurs as well in Lev. 24:8; Num. 18:19; and Ezek. 16:60; 37:26 (all material related to P) and in the royal poem of 2 Sam. 23:5, as well as in Isa. 24:5; 55:3; 61:8; Jer. 32:40; and 50:5. In both Genesis 9 and 17 there is a sign of the covenant (the rainbow in 9:12, 13, 17; circumcision in 17:11). A final connection may be the expressions "remember the covenant" in 9:15–16 and "keep the covenant" in 17:9–10, given the equivalence of the verbs in the two versions of the command to sanctify the Sabbath (Exod. 20:8: "Remember the sabbath day"; Deut. 5:12: "Keep the sabbath day").

9:18–10:32

Noah and His Sons

9:18–29, Noah's Drunkenness and the Cursing of Canaan. Like Cain, Noah is identified as a farmer, a man of the soil (Gen. 4:2). As the first to practice viticulture and winemaking, Noah fits the pattern of those descendants of Cain who invented musical instruments and metallurgy (4:21–22). Noah's winemaking fulfills the prediction of his father Lamech that Noah would provide relief from the cursed ground and human toil (Gen. 5:29; cf. 3:17; 4:11–12).

This etiology is followed by the story of the sin of Ham and the cursing of his son Canaan. The story is obscure and seems to involve some breach of sexual propriety; "uncovering the nakedness of one's father" is prohibited in Lev. 18:7–8 (where, however, it refers to sexual relations with one's mother). The story is similar to Gen. 19:30–38, in which Lot's drunkenness is associated with sexual union with his daughters.

Whether sexual misconduct or simply lack of filial piety, Ham's act results in the cursing of his son Canaan, who is to be slave to his blessed brothers Shem and Japheth. The blessing of Shem is another step in the narrowing focus that culminates in Abraham, descendant of Shem (→ Canaan, Canaanites; Shem).

10:1–32, The Table of Nations. The prehistory of Genesis 10 is complex and obscure. It is a composite of J and P genealogical material with later interpolations. Its tripartite scheme of Noah's sons recalls the three sons of Adam (Gen. 4:1–2, 25), of Lamech (Gen. 4:19–22), and of Terah (Gen. 11:26).

As an ethnological statement, Genesis 10 has grouped and related peoples in perplexing ways that have been the subject of considerable examination. One recent study has suggested that the distinguishing features of the three lines of descent are sociocultural, based on distinct ways of life, group characteristics, and professions: Shem's descendants comprise the nonsedentary, migratory segment of the population, the nomadic tribes; the descendants of Ham, the sedentary agrarian population of village and town; and the descendants of Japheth, the maritime nations, the seafaring inhabitants of islands and coastal areas.

Whatever its original intent, in its present context Genesis 10 continues the segmented genealogy of Noah (Gen. 5:32; 9:28–29). Untypically, it moves from Japheth, the youngest of Noah's sons (vv. 1–5), through Ham (vv. 6–20), to Shem (vv. 21–31), the oldest son. The movement from the youngest son with his descendants to the oldest focuses attention on the genealogical line of descent in which the narrator is interested.

The spreading abroad (vv. 5, 32) and the dispersal (v. 18) of the peoples with their distinct languages receive a positive evaluation in Genesis 10 as a movement and distinction intended by God. A negative evaluation of the same phenomena is presented in the following episode in Gen. 11:1–9.

11:1–32

The End of the Beginnings

11:1–9, The Tower of Babel. This concluding narrative of the prehistory parallels Genesis 3 as a story of human rebellion against the limits and distinctions of the divine and human worlds. The individual rebellion of the first man and woman has become universal and characteristic of humankind. The cycle of creation (chaps. 1–2), sin and its progress (chaps. 3–4), and divine punishment (chaps. 6–8) begins again, with a statement of the unchanged evil of the human heart (8:21) followed by the renewal of creation (chap. 9) and a story of the worldwide extent of sin (chap. 11).

The hubris of humanity, the attempt to overcome the boundaries ordained by God, consists in the construction of a city with a temple-tower reaching to the heavens, challenging the supremacy of Yahweh. Thus the city builders will make a name for themselves. Since Hebrew shem, “name,” includes the nuance both of fame or renown and of progeny, the city builders are engaged in an attempt to overcome the human fate of mortality as well (Gen. 3:4–5).

In an ironical comment of J, the Deity has to descend from his heavenly dwelling even to catch a glimpse of this product of human arrogance. The divine monologue in vv. 6–7 is similar to that in Gen. 3:22; this time the divine response is the confusion of language and the dispersal of the builders. While the universal extent of sin seems to call for a judgment as inclusive in its extent, Yahweh is faithful to his promise (8:21–22); the tower of Babel episode is followed not by a cataclysmic devastation but by the call of Abram, whose migration from Mesopotamia to Canaan is part of the great dispersal that follows Babel.

Gen. 11:1–9 shows some ambivalence about the works and achievements of civilization, a motif already evident in Gen. 4:17, where Cain is identified as the first city builder. The “achievement” of the city builders of Genesis 11 is alienation, inability to communicate, and dispersal. Given the context of J, perhaps we can see here an ambivalence toward Solomon’s construction of the Temple, an ambivalence evident in the prophetic critique of Temple and Temple service. Such a reading of Genesis 11 would balance the critique of the royal theology of the divine king that some have seen at the beginning of the J material in chaps. 2–3.

11:10–32, From Shem to Abraham. The prehistory concludes with a ten-generation genealogy (like that in Gen. 5:1–32, which it continues) that traces the line of descent from Shem to Abram and his two brothers, Nahor and Haran. Nahor’s twelve sons are listed in Gen. 22:20–24. Haran’s son Lot will figure in several episodes in the Abraham cycle. The fact that several of the personal names in the Shem genealogy, including Nahor and Haran, are also place names of cities in Mesopotamia has been understood to support the Mesopotamian origins of the patriarchs (→ Haran; Nahor).

---

Myth

The relationship and dependence of the early chapters of Genesis on ancient Near Eastern myth raise the question of whether these chapters can themselves be designated as myths. The problem is compounded by the controversial issue of the definition of myth. While myth is notoriously difficult to define, at least the following characteristics are involved in its description. First, the language of myth is narrative and dramatic, and myths may have been related to ritual and cult; on occasion they served as the libretto, the interpretive text for the ritual. Second, the actors and participants in myth are supernatural agents (gods, angels, demons). Third, the action of myth is characterized by remoteness in time and space (in the beginning, at the end time, in the divine world). Fourth, myths are related to communities, for which they order human experience by providing a vision of the underlying structure of reality; myth informs the community about its origins, its identity, and its destiny. Fifth, the goal of myth is “salvation,” broadly understood as whatever contributes to human well-being.

If these characteristics are an adequate description of myth, there need be little difficulty in describing the material in Genesis 1–11 as myth, especially when so much of it is the Israelite version of ancient Near Eastern myth. Given the lack of consensus even on the proper definition of myth, however, perhaps it would be better to think of the stories of Genesis 1–11 as “parables,” theological narratives whose intention is to present the Israelite view of the meaning of such fundamental realities as God transcendent and immanent, the creation, blessed humankind, the frustration of God’s design by human sin, and the restoration and renewal of humanity by divine grace.

---

12:1–25:18

The Abraham Cycle

The Abraham stories are linked to Genesis 1–11 by the genealogy in chap. 11 that traces the line of descent from Shem to Abraham. The genealogies in Genesis 5, 10, and 11 have progressively narrowed the focus from Adam to Noah to Shem and finally to Abraham. The Genesis narratives continue this genealogical interest in the passages that deal with Abraham and his descendants Isaac, Jacob, and Jacob's sons, the progenitors of the people of Israel. In these narratives there is further narrowing and divine election (not Ishmael but Isaac; not Esau but Jacob).

Genesis 2–11 vividly portrayed humanity under the curse (Gen. 3:14, 17; 4:11; 5:29). Genesis 12 begins the narrative of humanity blessed, in the family of Abraham. If the blessing of Abraham is a centripetal force, promising the patriarch a son and descendants who will be the source of blessing for all humanity, there is also a centrifugal force at work: strife and deception in the family of Abraham. Deception on the part of Abraham endangers the matriarch and therefore the divine promise; family conflict breaks out between Abraham's wives, Sarah and Hagar, and their respective sons. Stories of strife and deception continue in the Jacob-Esau and the Jacob-Laban stories, finally escalating to the disintegration of a family in the Joseph narrative. Yet through all this divine grace is at work, tending toward the reconciliation with which Genesis ends.

12:1–20

The Call of Abraham and His Response

12:1–3, The Call of the Patriarch. With the call of Abram there begins a new history of blessing, which is passed on in each instance to the chosen successor (Gen. 18:18; 22:15–18; 26:2–4; 28:14). The call of Abram is linked to the last narrative of the prehistory by catchwords: the settlers in the valley of Shinar propose to build a city, to make a name for themselves, and to avoid being dispersed. The human effort to secure community and renown is judged by God as human hubris. But the pattern of God's judgment mitigated by his grace in the J narratives of Genesis 2–11 continues, reaching a climax in the call of Abram, who is promised a great nation and a great name as the source of blessing for all humanity. What human beings failed to achieve by their own efforts comes to the family of Abram and through that family to all humanity as divine gift.

Not only do the promised blessings conferred on Abram recall the Tower of Babel narrative. Yahweh's promised gifts of land, progeny, and earthly prosperity in 12:1–3 are a reversal of the curses in Eden (3:16–19) of a hostile earth, pain in human generativity, and endless human toil (→ Patriarch).

The opening of the Abraham cycle (vv. 1–3) is programmatic for the whole J narrative: association with the ancestors will bring blessing to humanity (30:27; 39:5; 50:20); separation from the blessed family results in curse (13:1–13; 19; 21). The Deuteronomist understands the promises to Abraham to be fulfilled in the success of David, to whom Yahweh gives a great name, a land, and an heir (2 Sam. 7:9–12).

12:4–9, The Patriarch's Response. Abram is directed by Yahweh to leave the security of his past ("your land, your kin, and the house of your father") to become a great nation. Obvious obstacles standing in the way of the promise are the barrenness of Sarai (11:30), complicated by the advanced age of the husband and wife (12:4), and the fact that the promised land is already occupied and inhabited (12:6; 13:7). Abram responds to the divine command by migrating to Canaan, which is identified as the land of promise (12:7) in a theophany (a visible manifestation of God) and a reaffirmation of the promise of land. Closing the section is Abram's construction of an altar on a site made holy by a theophany and his invocation of the name of Yahweh (13:4, 18; 22:9).

12:10–20, The Promise Endangered. In this episode, Abram's conduct threatens the promises of land and descendants. Directed by Yahweh to the land of Canaan, which is confirmed as the promised land in 12:7, Abram nevertheless leaves Canaan because of famine and travels to Egypt. Having put into question his relationship to the promised land, Abram adds the further complication of a deception that threatens to undo the promise of a child born of Sarai. Fearing that Sarai's beauty will lead to her husband's murder by those who would possess her, Abram directs Sarai to claim that she is his sister rather than his wife. This is the first of three versions of the endangering of the ancestress (Gen. 20; 26:1–11). It can also profitably be compared to the story of David's adultery with Bathsheba in 2 Samuel 11–12 and the story of Ahab's seizure of Naboth's vineyard in 1 Kings 21. All these narratives deal with royal desire (for Sarai, for Bathsheba, for a vineyard) and its fulfillment by violence (Abram in 12:12 is afraid that he will be murdered; Uriah and Naboth are actually murdered).

The story contains several ironic notes. Abram, who is to be the source of blessing, becomes rather the occasion of danger and curse to Sarai and to the Pharaoh; also ironic is the list of the wealth Abram acquires in Egypt, since it does not include his wife, described by J as an essential element of a man's life (Gen. 2:23-24).

Two final observations on 12:1-20 are in order. First, in this narrative Abram experiences in advance what his descendants would later undergo: descent into Egypt because of famine, involvement with the Pharaoh, enrichment in Egypt, plagues, and release. Both stories involve a deception as well, the identification of Sarai as Abram's sister, and the request to celebrate a feast in the desert (Exod. 5:1-3). This same motif of the anticipation of the Exodus occurs in the Hagar stories in Genesis 16 and 21. Second, a noteworthy subtheme in the narrative is the contrast of Abram's plan with Yahweh's plan, a motif found prominently in the Joseph story (45:5-8; 50:20) and in wisdom literature (Prov. 16:9; 19:21).

13:1-14:24

Abraham the Shepherd and Sheik

13:1-18, Abram and Lot. Genesis 13 is the first of several narratives involving Abraham's nephew Lot. His birth was reported in 11:27, and his association with Abram is noted in 11:31 and 12:4-5. Genesis 13 describes the prosperity of Lot resulting from this association with the blessed family of Abram (13:1, 5). The family, however, is divided by conflict, and the strife leads to separation (v. 11). For Lot, separation from Abram means separation from the blessing. Abram ends the strife by inviting Lot to take what land he wishes. Lot chooses the well-watered Jordan plain, but his choice is not without a dark side. The narrator describes Lot's chosen territory as "like Yahweh's garden" (the site of the primal sin and the divine curse) and "like Egypt" (the place of oppression, as Gen. 15:13 indicates), and as including the doomed cities Sodom and Gomorrah (vv. 10-13).

The contrast the story builds between Abram and Lot is striking. To Abram Yahweh gives the land "forever" (v. 15), while Lot (v. 11) takes for himself land that is soon to be destroyed (chap. 19). Abram responds to the divine gift by building an altar at Hebron (v. 18), while Lot settles near Sodom (v. 12). Abram the tent dweller invokes Yahweh by name, while Lot the city dweller associates with the inhabitants of Sodom who are "evil and very sinful against Yahweh" (v. 13). The separation of Lot from Abram involves separation from the source of blessing to a place under the curse. The stories about Lot will continue in chaps. 14 and 19.

14:1-24, Abram's Rescue of Lot and His Tithe to Melchizedek. Genesis 14 cannot be aligned with any of the traditional pentateuchal sources. It is composed of annalistic material (battle reports) and a hero story celebrating the military exploits of Abram. Its closest parallel is 1 Samuel 30, David's campaign against the Amalekites. The description of Abram as a "Hebrew" (v. 13) is unparalleled, as is his presentation as a sheik who can call up a large contingent of 318 servants and retainers.

The story begins with an account of a rebellion by vassals of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam; among the rebellious vassals are the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah. The victory of Chedorlaomer and his allies over a pentapolis including Sodom involves Abram because his kinsman Lot has been taken with all his possessions as spoils of the victor. (The reference to Lot may be secondary; at any rate it was the occasion for the placing of this story in its present context, after Gen. 13.)

On his return after his rescue of Lot, Abram is met by Melchizedek, king of Salem (Jerusalem, Ps. 76:2) and priest of God Most High (Heb. 'El 'Elyon; for the identification of this god with Yahweh cf. Pss. 47:2; 57:2; 78:35, 56). In his ceremonious greeting of a hero returning from his victory (cf. 1 Sam. 18:6), Melchizedek (who appears only here, in Ps. 110:4, and in the NT in Heb. 5-7) blesses Abram, who responds to the blessing with a tithe. The point of the story may be the legitimization of the sacral status of Jerusalem as far back as the ancestor Abram (cf. a similar concern in 2 Chron. 3:1). As adopted by J, the story has become part of the narratives dealing with Abram and Lot. The effect of Lot's separation from Abram in Genesis 13 is seen in Lot's loss of his freedom and his wealth (gained through his association with Abram) as spoils to the victorious kings (14:11-12). Lot recovers his freedom and his goods when, in vv. 13-16, he is reconnected with Abram (→ El; Hebrews).

15:1-17:27

The Covenant with Abraham and the Birth of Ishmael

15:1-21, The Covenant with Abram. The major concern of the divine speech in Genesis 15 is the promise to Abram of progeny and land. The assignment of this chapter to one of the pentateuchal sources (either J or E) is debated, and no attempt to divide the material into sources has been entirely convincing.

The chapter falls naturally into two parts (vv. 1-6 and 7-21), each with the same basic structure: an initial self-identification by the Deity (vv. 1 and 7); Abram's response, a complaint (v. 3) or a question (v. 8); Yahweh's reiteration of the promise of an heir and of numerous descendants (vv. 4-5) or of land (vv. 7, 18-21). In the first part, the expression "The word of Yahweh came to Abram," which occurs twice (vv. 1, 4), is a stereotypical prophetic formula (Jer. 1:2; Hos. 1:1; Mic. 1:1). This formula and the communication to Abram in a vision (Gen. 15:1) or a dream (v. 12) have suggested to some that we meet in Genesis 15 the first appearance of E material in the Pentateuch.

The second divine speech can be further subdivided into three sections: vv. 7–12, 13–16, and 17–21. The middle section, in which Yahweh speaks of the coming Egyptian oppression and the Exodus, interrupts the preparation for the ritual act in vv. 9–12 and its execution in v. 17. The passage of the symbols of the Deity between the parts of the sacrifice is an enacted ritual of self-cursing in which the one passing through the pieces of the slaughtered animals calls upon himself the same fate for not adhering to the pledge. Other instances of such self-imprecation are Jer. 34:18–19 and an Aramaic inscription of the eighth century B.C. (the Sefire treaty).

This ritual, described as a covenant (v. 18), is of the “royal grant” type, in which a king rewards a servant or vassal for past loyalty and faithful service and in which the obligations of the covenant do not fall upon the inferior party, but are self-imposed by the king. Since such royal grants often involved grants of land, boundaries had to be precisely and exactly drawn, as in v. 18 (→Covenant). The boundaries of v. 18 are the ideal limits of the Davidic-Solomonic state in the tenth century B.C.

The similarity of the patriarchal covenant to the royal covenant (2 Sam. 7:11–16; Ps. 89:19–37) has often been noted. To explain the similarity, it has been suggested that the old tradition of a covenant with Abraham was reshaped by contact with the royal theology and ideology of the ancient Near East, in its Israelite version. Such a covenant with Abraham, with royal features highlighted and perhaps retrojected (read back into the distant past), would supply a welcome and needed precedent for the innovation of royal ideology in Israel.

16:1–16, The Birth of Ishmael. The divine promise of progeny to Abram in Genesis 15 is followed by the birth in chap. 16 of his son Ishmael, as the result of Sarai’s initiative and impatience. Verse 1 introduces the two principals in the story, the barren Sarai and Hagar her slave, who is given to Abram as a secondary wife and whose child will be considered legally the offspring of Sarai (vv. 2–3). Such substitute childbearing, reflected also in Gen. 30:1–13, was apparently an accepted social institution in the ancient Near East. Verses 4–5 introduce the motif of familial discord between the childless Sarai and the pregnant Hagar (cf. 1 Sam. 1:4–6) and between Sarai and Abraham. This theme of familial strife occurs throughout Genesis, between spouses (Gen. 3:12; 30:1–2), between brothers (Gen. 4:1–16, 27; 37), and between kin (Genesis 29–31). Sarai’s abuse of Hagar (v. 6) provokes the slave’s flight, until she is commanded to return by a theophany in which the angel of Yahweh directs her to submit to her mistress’s abuse (v. 9), with the assurance that “Yahweh has heard your [complaint of] abuse” (v. 11).

This discord between Sarai and Hagar takes up the language of the promise to Abram that “those who curse you [Heb. qillel] I will curse” (12:3). Because in 16:4–5 Sarai was treated with disdain by the pregnant Hagar (lit., Sarai was “cursed” [qillel] in Hagar’s eyes), Hagar and her family will be separated like Lot (chap. 13) from Abram and the blessing (Gen. 16:6–8; 21:14–21).

The angelic announcement of the birth of a son to Hagar in vv. 7–13 follows a standard biblical pattern that usually includes the following: first, the appearance of an angel of the Lord (Gen. 16:7; 18:2; Judg. 13:3; Matt. 1:20; Luke 1:11, 26) or of Yahweh himself (Gen. 16:13; 17:1); second, fear or prostration of the visionary (Gen. 17:3; Judg. 13:22; Luke 1:12, 29); third, the angelic promise to the visionary of the birth of a son (Gen. 16:11; 17:19; 18:10; Judg. 13:3–5; Matt. 1:20–21; Luke 1:13, 31); fourth, the name of the child, sometimes with an etymology (Gen. 16:11; 17:17–19; Matt. 1:21; Luke 1:31); fifth, the future achievements of the child (Gen. 16:12; 17:16, 19; Judg. 13:5; Matt. 1:21; Luke 1:15–17, 32–33, 35); and sixth, objection or question of the visionary (Gen. 17:17; 18:12; Judg. 13:8, 17; Luke 1:18, 34). Often the objection or question will be concerned with the obstacles (barrenness, advanced age, virginity) seemingly in the way of the accomplishment of the divine purpose.

Another noteworthy element in the announcement of the birth of Ishmael is the striking similarity of Gen. 16:11 to Deut. 26:6–7 (“Since the Egyptians mistreated and abused us, we cried out to Yahweh, the God of our ancestors; Yahweh heard our voice, and he saw our abuse”). The “abuse” that is mentioned twice in the Deuteronomy passage and three times in Genesis 16 (vv. 6, 9, 11) occurs as well in Gen. 15:13, in the prediction of Israel’s oppression by Egypt. In an ironic twist, it is Hagar the Egyptian who, in Genesis 16, endures slavery and abuse by Sarai. This link with the Exodus story is further underlined by Hagar’s flight to the wilderness (Gen. 16:6–7; Exod. 14:3, 5) and her encounter there with an angel of the Lord (Gen. 16:7; Exod. 2:15–3:2; 14:19). In both cases (Sarai’s mistreatment of the Egyptian slave Hagar and the oppression of the descendants of Sarai by Hagar’s compatriots), a cry for help is answered by a compassionate God (Exod. 3:7–8).

17:1–27, The Covenant with Abraham. Genesis 17 is the P version of God’s covenant with the patriarch, involving promises of a son and of the eternal possession of the land of Canaan. Like its parallel in chap. 15, it begins with a theophany; the Deity's self-identification here is El Shaddai (traditionally rendered "God the Almighty"); its probable original meaning is "God, the One of the mountain," an epithet that recalls the standard association of gods with their mountain abodes, like Baal's Mount Zaphon and Yahweh's Sinai and Zion (→ Mount, Mountain). This pre-Mosaic designation of God in P (Exod. 6:2-3) is followed by a divine command ("Walk before me and be perfect"; cf. Gen. 24:40; 48:15) that is similar to the command given to Solomon (1 Kings 3:6; 9:4) and to the appeal of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:3). Such royal language is appropriate for the patriarch who will be the father of kings (vv. 6, 16).

The name changes of the ancestors to Abraham and Sarah (vv. 5, 15) imply both the authority of the giver of the new name (cf. Gen. 3:20) and the new destiny or mission indicated by the new name (cf. Gen. 32:29; Mark 3:16).

P's designation of the covenant with Abraham as "eternal" recalls P's "eternal covenant" with Noah in Gen. 9:1-17 and asserts the covenant's unconditional character and permanent validity. Similarly, the ritual institution of circumcision as a sign of the covenant recalls the divine institution of the Sabbath at the creation (Gen. 2:3) and the Noachian prohibition upon eating meat with the blood still in it (Gen. 9:4). Note, too, that circumcision as the eternal sign of the covenant recalls the role of the rainbow in the story of Noah (Gen. 9:12-16) and of the Sabbath in the revelation to Moses (Exod. 31:12-17).

While Ishmael will be the progenitor of a great people (Gen. 16:10; 17:20), God declares that the child of the promise will be born of the matriarch Sarah. Abraham's laughter (Heb. yitzchaq in v. 17), provoked by this divine declaration, provides an etymology for the name Isaac (v. 21).

18:1-19:38

The Fate of Sodom and Gomorrah

18:1-15, Abraham's Hospitality. Abraham is again repeatedly characterized (vv. 2, 6, 9, 10) as a nomadic tent-dweller, in tacit contrast to the urbanite Lot of Genesis 19. When three unexpected travelers arrive at his tent at midday, Abraham's hospitable invitation and solicitude are described in some detail (cf. 1 Sam. 28:24-25). He runs to greet his unexpected guests, then hurries off to instruct Sarah to prepare bread for a meal, runs again to choose an animal for the feast, and serves them (v. 8, lit., "stands before them") himself (→ Hospitality).

The accompaniment of a major deity by two attendants, a common feature in Canaanite polytheism, is reflected here in Yahweh and his two companions and, in demythologized form, in Pss. 23:6 (Yahweh's "goodness and kindness"); 43:3 (his "light and truth"); and 97:2 (his "justice and judgment").

The point of this first scene in the chapter is the announcement by Yahweh of the birth of a son to Abraham and Sarah, despite her barrenness and their advanced age. Sarah's incredulous laughter at this announcement (Heb. titzchaq) parallels Abraham's laughter in 17:17; however, Sarah's laughter, unlike that of Abraham, is judged negatively by Yahweh as revealing a lack of trust in the divine word.

18:16-33, Abraham's Intercession and Yahweh's Justice.

With the typical politeness of a good host, Abraham intends to accompany his guests for part of their journey, as they continue on toward Sodom. In an interior monologue (vv. 17-19), Yahweh considers revealing his intentions to Abraham (cf. Amos 3:7). In the present Hebrew text, Abraham's dialogue with Yahweh begins with the statement that he is in attendance upon (v. 22, lit., "standing before" as in v. 8) Yahweh. This is one of the rare scribal adjustments of the text, which originally pictured Yahweh as "standing before" Abraham; it is not the anthropomorphism of the text that provoked the change, but the description (inappropriate to the scribes) of Yahweh standing in attendance before the patriarch. The description of Abraham in attendance upon Yahweh in 18:8 may have suggested the change of the text here.

While the two attendants make their way to the doomed city, Abraham intercedes for Sodom, raising the possibility of the influence of a righteous few on an evil majority. The same question is raised in Jer. 5:1, where the presence of only one righteous person could save Jerusalem, and in Ezek. 14:12-20, where the righteous will save only themselves. Also indicating the likely late origin of this passage are the echoes of Job in Abraham's intercession: mere dust and ashes (Gen. 18:27; Job 30:19; 42:6), Abraham presumes to question the Deity (Gen. 18:24-25; Job 9:12) about divine justice (Gen. 18:25; Job 9:22). The connections of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Job with Abraham's intercession have suggested to some commentators that Gen. 18:22-33 is a late addition to the text provoked by the religious crisis of the Exile of the sixth century B.C. and the questions about God's justice it raised. The prophetic denunciations of Jerusalem as Sodom (Isa. 3:9; Jer. 23:14; Ezek. 16:46-56) may give some credence to this view.

In his intercession for Sodom, Abraham assumes the function of a prophet (1 Sam. 7:5; 12:19, 23; Jer. 7:16; 11:14; 37:3; 42:2, 4, 20). And Abraham will be explicitly identified as a prophet in Gen. 20:7, where he is also involved in intercession. Of all the instances of prophetic intercession, however, the one most closely related to Gen. 18:22–33 is Amos 7:1–6. Not only does this intercession take the form of a dialogue between Yahweh and the prophet; but one of the punishments averted by Amos is a rain of fire (cf. Gen. 19:24).

19:1–29, The Rescue of Lot from Sodom.

Genesis 19 takes up the story of Lot, who last appeared in chaps. 13–14. The account of Lot's hospitality to the two angels who traveled on to Sodom (19:1–3) is an abbreviated parallel to Gen. 18:1–8, but with several revealing differences. Abraham the tent dweller provides refreshment characteristic of a pastoral nomad: cream and curds (Gen. 18:8; cf. Isa. 7:21–22) and a choice steer. Lot is a city dweller who lives in a house in Sodom and meets the two strangers who arrive in the evening at the city gate. Abraham runs to greet the travelers and serves them himself; Lot stands and bows in greeting. In place of bread made from about a bushel of the finest flour (Gen. 18:6), Lot offers unleavened bread to his guests. Such differences may serve to contrast Lot's entertainment of the guests with the greater generosity of Abraham.

The meal is soon interrupted by the inhabitants of Sodom, who surround Lot's house and demand that he bring out his guests for gang rape. Lot's responsibility as host leads him to offer his two daughters to the mob, until he is rescued from their violence by the angelic visitors. There is an effective contrast between the hospitality of Lot, who "pressed" (v. 3—Heb. yiptzar) the visitors to stay with him, and the inhospitality of the townspeople who "pressed" (v. 9—Heb. yiptzeru) against Lot in their attempt to break into his house.

The violent, unnatural lust of humans for heavenly beings (vv. 4–11) is the reverse of the situation in Gen. 6:1–4 where, as a prelude to the Flood, divine beings mate with human women. Like Noah, Lot too will be saved from the cataclysmic disaster that will befall Sodom.

There is a close parallel account to Gen. 19:1–11 in Judg. 19:10–30. In both stories, there is a strong contrast between hospitality and the brutality of a violent sexual attack. In Judges 19, the men of Gibeah demand that the guest be brought out for sexual abuse. The host offers rather his daughter, or the concubine of his guest, who is put out and abused throughout the night and is found dead at the door the next morning. Homosexual acts, which threaten proper family relationships and boundaries (Lev. 18:22; 20:13; 1 Cor. 6:9–10; Rom. 1:26–27), run counter to the divine command to procreate (Gen. 1:28; 9:1, 7), a command that is part of the order of creation (→Homosexuality).

The danger to Lot's guests is averted when they afflict the inhabitants of Sodom with temporary blindness (cf. 2 Kings 6:18). After the angels order Lot to leave Sodom, he informs his sons-in-law, who treat his warning like a joke; their laughter (v. 14) reminds readers of Sarah's laughter at the promise of one of the angelic visitors that she would bear a child (18:12–15; this catchword also looks forward to Gen. 21:6). A second time the angels order departure and Lot again hesitates, irresolute, until the angels take Lot, his wife, and his daughters by the hand and lead them like children out of the city.

Outside the doomed city, when the angels direct Lot to flee with his family to the hill country, he asks rather to go to Zoar instead (19:20–23). In v. 30, he will change his mind and go to the hill country, one more indication of his confusion. When Lot's wife mirrors his irresolution and violates the prohibition of looking back (v. 17), she is turned into a pillar of salt (v. 26). One is reminded of the laughter of Abraham and Sarah in Genesis 17–18. Abraham's laughter at the promise of a child in 17:17 is passed over without comment; Sarah's similarly provoked laughter (18:12) is judged to be an indication of a lack of faith. The summarizing conclusion of the story in 19:29 is from P; it notes that "God remembered Abraham" and thus saved Lot, in a reminiscence of the high point of the Flood story in Gen. 8:1 ("God remembered Noah").

19:30–38, Lot's Daughters. Lot's passivity is underscored by the concluding episode in chap. 19. Since their husbands perished in the destruction of Sodom, the daughters of Lot realize their desire for offspring by incest with their father, another offense against the proper use of sexuality. Lot, who volunteered his daughters for sexual abuse by the men of Sodom, is plied with wine and becomes himself a passive object in the incestuous relations with his daughters, who give birth to Moab and Ammon. There are two more indications of Lot's passivity in the story. First, the Hebrew verb used in the episode for sexual relations (shakab, "lie [with]") generally has a masculine subject and a feminine object (as in Gen. 26:10; 30:15, 16; 34:2, 7; 35:22; 39:7, 12, 14). In the story of Lot and his daughters, the sexual stereotype of a patriarchal culture is reversed when the five uses of shakab have Lot's daughters as subject and their inebriated father as object. Second, it is noteworthy that the sons are named not by Lot but by his daughters (cf. Gen. 21:3).

Mention was made above of the connection of Gen. 6:1–4, the initial scene of the Flood story, to Gen. 19:4–11 and of the P conclusion to the destruction of Sodom in Gen. 19:29 to the climax of the Flood story in Gen. 8:1. The episode in 19:30–38 is similarly related to the closing scene of the Flood story in Gen. 9:18– 24, which also involves the violation of some sexual taboo by one of Noah's sons when Noah was overcome with wine. Given these links, it is not surprising that the two NT references to Lot connect him with Noah (Luke 17:26-29; 2 Pet. 2:5-7).

20:1-22:24

Stories from the Elohist

In this cycle of stories from the E source, each of the three stories displays the same structure: God instructs Abraham to initiate a course of action that will involve mortal danger to another family member (Gen. 20:13; 21:12; 22:2); the patriarch obeys (20:1-2; 21:14; 22:3); the threatening situation is about to be realized (20:2, 18; 21:16; 22:9-10); and God intervenes to prevent the expected outcome (20:6-7, 17; 21:19-20; 22:11-13).

20:1-18, Abraham and Sarah in Gerar.

The first of these stories is the E version of the wife-sister deception story that first appeared in Gen. 12:10-20. In E, Abraham and Sarah journey to the Negeb and settle in Gerar. The sexual relations between the Pharaoh and Sarah implied in chap. 12 are prevented here by a divine warning to Abimelech in a dream. Characteristics of the E source besides the divine name Elohim (Heb.) include the motif of the fear of God (20:8, 11), Abraham's prophetic intercession for the monarch (vv. 7, 17), and the justification of the patriarch's claim that Sarah is his sister (v. 12). While divine communication by a dream is sometimes seen as also characteristic of E, such dreams are ubiquitous in the ancient Near East and in the OT. The story ends with the enriching of Abraham (20:14; cf. 12:16) and the restoration of health and fertility to Abimelech's house, as a prelude to the pregnancy of Sarah (21:1-2). (For wealth and progeny as a sign of divine favor, see also Gen. 24:35-36.)

As the J version of the story in Genesis 12 included Abraham's proleptic experience of the Torah story of Egyptian oppression and liberation, so the E version focuses its attention on Abraham as a prophetic figure (cf. "the law and the prophets" in Mal. 4:4-5 and, in the NT, in Matt. 22:40 and Luke 24:27).

The story reveals an openness to non-Israelites. It is Abimelech the righteous Gentile who displays proper fear of God and receives a divine communication, while Abraham underestimates the extent of God's influence and power.

21:1-34, The Birth of Isaac and the Expulsion of Hagar. In the present form of the tradition, Isaac serves chiefly as a link between the larger Abraham and Jacob cycles; the Isaac material is limited to the account of his birth (chap. 21), his sacrifice (chap. 22), his marriage (chap. 24), his trip to Gerar (chap. 26), and his blessing of Jacob (chap. 27).

The E story of the birth of Isaac (21:1-8) repeats the motif of Sarah's laughter (v. 6) from 18:12; here it is an expression of joy at the birth of her son, not an indication of a lack of faith. Gen. 21:9 reintroduces Hagar the Egyptian and her son Ishmael (chap. 16) and the recurring theme of family discord. In 21:3, Abraham names his son by Sarah Isaac (Heb. yitzchaq). What Ishmael is doing in the Hebrew text of v. 9 is described as metzacheq, a verbal form derived from the same root as the name Isaac. Modern translations favor the interpretation "playing" for the verb, with the addition of "with her son Isaac" (which is not in the Hebrew) from the Septuagint (LXX). Perhaps the most economical and reasonable solution is to understand the LXX addition as interpretive and to translate the Hebrew in v. 9 thus: "Sarah saw Hagar the Egyptian's son, whom she had borne to Abraham, 'Isaacing' [i.e., taking the place of Sarah's son Isaac]." An angry Sarah orders Abraham to expel Hagar and the pretender to Isaac's rights. Sarah's demand is confirmed by a divine oracle (vv. 12-13), and so Abraham proceeds. His feelings are delicately hinted at in his solicitude for Hagar and Ishmael (v. 14). The imminent death of the child Ishmael in the wilderness to which Hagar has gone is averted by the angel of God (as will be the imminent death of Isaac in the next chapter). The angel repeats the divine declaration (21:13) that Ishmael will be the progenitor of a great nation (16:10). There is a subtle contrast between 21:12, where God instructs Abraham to "hear the voice" of ("obey") Sarah in her lack of compassion, and v. 17, where God twice "heard the voice of the youth" because of his compassion. This play reminds readers of the etymology of the name Ishmael ("May God hear") in Gen. 16:11.

As in Genesis 20, we meet the theme of the righteous Gentile in Hagar, who like Abimelech the God-fearer is given a message from God and whose child was saved by divine intervention.

Like Genesis 16, this chapter contains echoes of the Exodus story. When Sarah demands that Abraham "drive out" (v. 10) Hagar and her son, he "sends them away" (v. 14) to wander in the wilderness. Similarly, Moses asks Pharaoh to "send my people away" (Exod. 5:1) and so the people are "driven out" of Egypt (Exod. 6:1; 11:1).

The chapter is concluded with a pact between Abimelech and Abraham (21:22-34) to settle a dispute over water rights (cf. Gen. 13:6-7; 26:15-22).

22:1-24, Abraham's Sacrifice of Isaac. In Gen. 12:1-3, Abraham was called by God to relinquish his past for the promise that he would be the father of a great nation. In the divine command to sacrifice Isaac in chap. 22, Abraham is directed to give up the future and the promise as well. Since the style of this magnificently told story is spare and compressed, any apparent prolixity is meant to catch readers' attention. For instance, v. 2 emphasizes the enormity of what Abraham is asked by the piling up of synonyms: "Take your son, your only one, the one you love, Isaac." In wordless obedience Abraham journeys with his son and two attendants to Moriah. In v. 5, when he tells the attendants that "I and the boy . . . will return," he unconsciously prepares for the unexpected conclusion of this dark story. In vv. 7–8, the poignancy of the story is highlighted by the dialogue between Abraham and Isaac, in which "father" and "son" are each used twice. The movement slows in vv. 9–10, as each act in preparation for the sacrifice is carefully described. The tension is finally resolved by a divine intervention in vv. 11–12, and Abraham's obedient loyalty is rewarded with a repetition of the promise (vv. 17–18).

Appended to the story of the binding of Isaac is Gen. 22:20–24, a list of the twelve sons of Abraham's brother Nahor. One of these sons is Bethuel, the father of Rebekah, who will become Isaac's wife in chap. 24.

Examined form-critically, this E narrative of Abraham's fidelity shows evidence of earlier stages and concerns. Verses 1–14 probably explain the origin of the form of worship of a particular sanctuary; they legitimate the substitution of an animal for child sacrifice. For the practice of child sacrifice, cf. 2 Kings 3:27; Jer. 7:31; Ezek. 16:20; for its prohibition, Exod. 13:15; Deut. 12:29–31; 18:9–12.

Genesis 21 and 22 are linked both by theme and by key word repetition. In chap. 21, Ishmael's expulsion, demanded by Sarah and approved by God, is carried out by Abraham, although it means the death of the child who was legally Sarah's. In chap. 22, Isaac, born to Sarah after long infertility, now is taken from her by Abraham's obedience to his apparent death. Both Ishmael and Isaac are exposed to death by the patriarch's obedience to God. A key word link can be seen in 21:14, where Abraham places (Heb. sam) bread and water on Hagar's back, and in 22:6, where Abraham places (Heb. yasem) the wood for the holocaust upon Isaac.

23:1–25:18

From the Death of Sarah to Abraham's Death

23:1–20, Abraham's Purchase of Land in Canaan. The purchase of a family burial plot occasioned by the death of Sarah is the subject of this P story. The transaction between Abraham and Ephron the Hittite seems to involve both Oriental politeness and ancient Near Eastern property law. Ephron's insistence that he sell to Abraham both the cave of Machpelah and the field where it is located reflects the attachment of certain feudal duties to the field, which Ephron would be glad to pass on to Abraham. In the present context, it foreshadows the eventual possession of the land of Canaan by Abraham's descendants, as does Jacob's purchase of land in 33:19. Abraham's death and burial here is recorded in 25:8–10. The burial of Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah there is noted in Gen. 49:29–31 (→ Hittites; Machpelah).

24:1–67, The Wooing of Rebekah. The story of the mission of Abraham's steward to seek a wife for Isaac among Abraham's kindred in Mesopotamia is told twice, first in Abraham's instructions to his servant, followed by the narration in vv. 1–27 of the servant's arrival and then in the servant's retelling of the story to Rebekah and her family in vv. 34–49. The meeting at a well in vv. 11–27 that leads to a marriage is a stock scene that appears also in Genesis 29, Exodus 2, and John 4.

J has fashioned the account of the wooing of Rebekah upon the model of the call of Abraham. In 24:1, 35–36 we learn that, in accord with his promise in Gen. 12:2, Yahweh has blessed Abraham with long years, great wealth, and a son. The verb "bless" is a key word in this chapter, occurring in vv. 1, 27, 31, 35, 48, and 60. God's command "Go!" to the patriarch in 12:1 is complemented by Rebekah's "I will go" in 24:58 (and her family's "she will go" in v. 55). In 12:1, Yahweh commands Abraham to leave "your land and your kinsfolk and the house of your father." In chap. 24, the same expression occurs in whole or in part in vv. 4, 7, 38, and 40. Yahweh's promise to Abraham in 12:2 ("I will make your name great") is repeated in his servant's words in v. 35 ("Yahweh has blessed my master exceedingly and he has become great").

The echoes of Genesis 12 in this chapter make the point that Rebekah is an essential link in the transmission of the divine promise and is thus called by Yahweh, as Abraham was, to her matriarchal role. The climax of the account is Rebekah's one-word answer in v. 58, 'elek (Heb., "I will go"). The parallelism of 12:1, where Abram goes from his land, his family, and his father's house, with 24:4 and 38, where he sends his steward back to his land, kin, and father's house, forms a frame around most of the Abraham cycle of narratives.

The final element worthy of note is the comparison of Hagar in chap. 21, who, in departing from Abraham, moves away from the source of blessing and Rebekah in chap. 24, who, in agreeing to the marriage with Isaac, moves toward the blessing and becomes an honored member of the blessed family.

25:1-18, The Death of Abraham. Gen. 25:1-18 recounts Abraham's marriage to Keturah after Sarah's death and a genealogy of their progeny. This is followed by a report of the patriarch's death and burial in the cave of Machpelah. The special status of Isaac is underlined in several ways in this material. Before his death, "Abraham gave everything that belonged to him to Isaac" while he gave "gifts" to the children of Keturah (vv. 5-6). As in the case of Hagar (21:14), Abraham sends these children away from Isaac (and thus from the blessing that he is to carry). After Abraham's death he is buried by his sons Isaac and Ishmael, a report followed by the statement that "God blessed [Abraham's] son Isaac" (25:11). The section concludes with a genealogy of the twelve sons of Ishmael and their father's death report. Thus, this chapter is structured with Isaac, his father's heir and blessed by God, in the middle with other children of Abraham ranged on either side (the sons of Keturah before and the sons of Ishmael after). The literary shape reflects the theological point that Isaac and his descendants bear a special status and a special destiny.

25:19-36:43

The Jacob Cycle

The chief themes of the Jacob material are announced in the account of the birth and youth of Jacob and Esau (25:19-34). As in the narratives about Abraham and his family, competition and family strife are the hallmarks of these stories: discord between the brothers Jacob and Esau that begins even before their birth and parental discord revealed in the love of Isaac for the elder Esau and of Rebekah for Jacob (25:28). After Jacob's departure from his murderously angry brother and his arrival in Mesopotamia, strife soon arises between Jacob and his kinsman Laban and between the wives of Jacob, the unloved Leah and the barren Rachel. Of climactic importance is Jacob's struggle with God on his return to Canaan. Fraternal and familial strife will be central to the ensuing Joseph story as well.

Another important theme of both the Abraham cycle and the Jacob material is deception: the deception of Isaac by Rebekah and Jacob, of Jacob by Laban, and finally of Laban by Jacob and Rachel. The theme of deception will continue powerfully and dramatically in the Joseph narrative as well. Its appearance throughout Genesis, from the deception of the woman in chap. 3 to the final deception of Joseph by his brothers in 50:15-17, shows it to be a major theme in the book.

The Jacob material can be approached in several ways. A traditional method has been source criticism, whereby the discrete elements of the composite narrative are distinguished and studied separately. J, E, and P are all present in the Jacob cycle of stories. For J, Jacob is a picaresque figure, a calculating deceiver and yet by divine choice the bearer of the blessing for his family and for those who come into connection with him. The character of Jacob undergoes a decisive and fundamental change in his contest with the Deity at Jabboq (32:23-32). In E, according to traditional source criticism, Jacob gains his brother's birthright not by deception but by Esau's exchange of it for food; Esau thus proves himself unworthy of the birthright that passes to Jacob. In the Elohist's view, Jacob's decisive encounter with God takes place at Bethel (chap. 28, of which vv. 11b-12, 17-18, 20-21a, and 22 are commonly assigned to E). In P, the encounter of Jacob at Bethel is recounted in 35:9-13.

Although source criticism has been one of the major advances in the study of a book like Genesis, there are problems associated with it. First of all, such neat and clear division of the material into its sources is not always possible. More recent study has understood the material not as the editorial compilation of sources, but as a corpus of material whose growth and development are more appropriately studied by tradition history. Further, it is debatable whether the fragmentary E material and the minimal P contribution offer any clear picture of Jacob independent of the Yahwist's presentation. Finally, such source criticism does not always pay enough attention to the unity into which the disparate material has been welded. For instance, is it really possible to assign the birthright incident in chap. 25 to E and the gaining of the parental blessing by deception in chap. 27 to J? Significantly, Esau in 27:36 combines both events with a wordplay on "birth-right" (Heb. bekorah) and "blessing" (Heb. beracah) in a fragment of poetry in a chapter in which the direct discourse of Isaac is also cast in poetry (vv. 28-29; 39-40). In such an instance, the division of v. 36 into two sources would be illegitimate. The study of Genesis as literature by contemporary literary critics and as Scripture by canonical critics has brought back into focus the importance of the finished product now in our hands. While such perspectives do not cancel out the established gains of such historical-critical methods as source criticism, they do provide a salutary reminder that the final form of the text is the primary object of study and interpretation.

25:19-28:22

Jacob and Esau

25:19-34, The Birth and the Birthright.

The story of the birth of Esau and Jacob begins with the motif of the matriarch's sterility (v. 21—cf. Gen. 11:30; 30:1), a motif that highlights

Yahweh's accomplishment of his intent of numerous progeny from Abraham over apparently insuperable odds. The struggle of the twins even in Rebekah's womb provokes her to consult Yahweh, who announces the ultimate superiority of the younger brother (cf. Gen. 4:1-5; 37:5-11). The description in 25:25 of the firstborn Esau as "red" (Heb. 'admoni) and "hairy" (Heb. se'ar) involve folk etymologies that indicate Esau's relationship to Edom (v. 30) and to Seir, a relationship spelled out in the genealogy of Esau in chap. 36 (→ Edom; Edomites). This punning is continued in Esau's description in v. 30 of the requested food as "red" ('adom).

The conflict motif, first evident in the womb of Rebekah, continues through the delivery of the twins, as the second child to be born is already attempting to gain an advantage over his brother, by grasping his heel (v. 26). Conflict is also shown in the respective professions of the brothers (v. 27: Esau the hunter living in the wild, Jacob the tent-dwelling farmer) and in the opposing preferences of their parents (v. 28: Isaac's love for the firstborn Esau, Rebekah's love for Jacob).

The beginning of the fulfillment of the divine oracle proclaiming the divine choice of Jacob is recorded in the story of Esau's sale of his birthright to Jacob (vv. 27-34). The characters of the two brothers are well portrayed here—the impulsive Esau, thoughtless about the future in the face of present need, who sells his birthright to "stuff himself" (v. 30; the verb Esau uses means to stuff an animal with food), and the shrewd, calculating Jacob, leaving nothing to chance ("First sell . . . first swear" in vv. 31, 33). The concluding line in the birthright episode emphasizes Esau's carelessness in the assertion that "Esau despised [i.e., treated as worthless, contemptible] his birthright" (v. 34). In two other instances of the use of this verb, "despising Yahweh" (1 Sam. 2:30; 2 Sam. 12:9) brings upon the person guilty of this sin the divine curse. If that nuance is present here, there is a sharp contrast between Esau cursed and Jacob blessed.

26:1-11, Isaac, Rebekah, and Abimelech.

This is the third version of the wife-sister story that has already appeared in chaps. 12 and 20. The inclusion of this version here refocuses attention on Isaac and Rebekah, the dominant actors in the following story of Isaac's blessing. The mention of a famine in 26:1 recalls the J version in chap. 12; Abimelech, king of the Philistines in Gerar, recalls the E version in chap. 20. As in both previous tellings, a deception is involved in Isaac's statement that his wife Rebekah is his sister. The J account in 26:1-11, however, departs from the two previous versions in that the patriarch's wife is not taken into the harem of the foreign king.

Abimelech accidentally discovers the deception by his own powers of observation (v. 8). When the three versions of this story are compared synchronically, one can see that Gen. 12:10-20 is a proleptic summary of the Torah story in which Abram departs from Canaan because of famine and goes to Egypt where his family is oppressed by the Pharaoh and liberated by a series of plagues. The second story in chap. 20 designates Abraham a prophet in his intercession for Abimelech; also characteristic of prophetic material is the divine communication to Abimelech (20:3). Finally, Gen. 26:1-11 has a wisdom cast in that the means by which Abimelech uncovered the deception was not divine revelation (as in chaps. 12 and 20) but the use of his human powers of observation (→ Wisdom). Seen synchronically, then, the three accounts recall the division of the Jewish Scriptures into Torah, Prophets, and Writings (wherein is found the wisdom literature with its emphasis on human understanding and insight).

The presence of wisdom elements in the two J versions of this episode (the proverbial contrast between Abram's plan and Yahweh's plan in chap. 12; the nonrevelatory discovery of the truth in chap. 26) is not surprising. The composition of J as a national epic is effected in the tenth-century court of David and Solomon, a milieu where the wisdom influence would have been inescapable (see 2 Sam. 16:15-17:14; 1 Kings 10:1-9).

The theophany in Gen. 26:2-5 relates the transmission of the promise to Abraham of blessing, land, and numerous descendants (Gen. 12:1-3; 15; 17; 22:17-18) to his son Isaac. The divine blessing of Isaac is mentioned as well in 26:12, 24, and 29. The theophany introduces an important theme in Genesis: the divine presence abides with this patriarch (vv. 3, 24, 28) as it did with Abraham (Gen. 21:22) and will with Jacob (Gen. 28:15), Joseph (39:2, 21, 23), and Moses (Exod. 3:12). That elusive presence attains permanence in Israel when, under Moses' guidance at Sinai, Israel fulfills the divine command to "make me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them" (Exod. 25:8).

26:12-35, A Dispute over Water Rights.

This story begins by noting Isaac's success and increasing wealth because of the divine blessing. The enriching of the patriarch in a foreign land was present in Gen. 12:16 and 20:14-16; one is reminded of the tradition of the "despoiling of the Egyptians" in Exod. 3:21; 11:2; 12:35-36; and Ps. 105:37. The related motif of the success of an Israelite in a foreign court is a major factor in the Joseph story and in two late OT works, Esther and Daniel.

This J version of a dispute over water rights and its settlement by a pact between Isaac and Abimelech is a doublet of the E account in 21:22-34, and it has connections with Gen. 13:5-7 as well; the departure of Isaac from Abimelech means the departure of the source of divine blessing for the Gentiles, which is association with a blessed descendant of Abraham (as in the Abram-Lot story in chap. 13). The covenant is concluded by a meal, as in Gen. 31:43-54 and Exod. 24:9-11 (→ Meals). Between the dispute and the pact is a second theophany to Isaac (Gen. 26:24). It begins with "Fear not!" a stereotypical introduction to an appearance of the Deity (cf. Gen. 15:1; 46:3), and repeats the assurance of divine presence, blessing, and numerous descendants. Like Abram in 12:8, Isaac responds by building an altar and calling upon the name of Yahweh. Gen. 26:34-35, a P addition about the marriage of Esau to a Hittite woman, forms a frame with 27:46 (also P) around the story of Esau's loss of his father's blessing.

27:1-46, The Deception of Isaac. In the J account of Isaac's deception, the patriarch, characteristically passive (as he was in the accounts of his sacrifice in chap. 22 and of his marriage in chap. 24), is managed by his determined wife. When Rebekah overhears that Isaac intends to give his blessing to Esau (as Sarah overheard the heavenly visitor's promise of a child in 18:10), she quickly works out a plan to assure that her beloved Jacob gains his father's blessing. The element of calculation in Jacob's character surfaces in his objection that, should the deception be discovered, he would receive not a blessing but a curse from his father (27:11-12). Rebekah's response ("On me be the curse, my son!") clears the way for Jacob to play his role in the deception, a passive role like his father's in the same story.

The disguise of Jacob involves his wearing his brother Esau's clothing; as will be seen, deception involving clothing is an important motif in the narrative about Jacob's beloved son Joseph (Gen. 37:31-33). Twice Isaac asks whether it is truly his son Esau, when Jacob presents himself dressed as his brother and with the food prepared for Isaac by Rebekah (27:18, 24), and twice Jacob answers affirmatively. When Isaac has conferred the blessing on Jacob, Esau appears; and Isaac's dialogue with his elder son (vv. 31-32) is an almost exact repetition of Isaac's dialogue with Jacob in vv. 18-19. There is one striking difference, however, between the two conversations of Jacob and of Esau with their father. In speaking to Jacob, Isaac calls him "my son" seven times (vv. 18, 20, 21 [twice], 24, 26, 27; also "his son" in v. 20) while only once (v. 37) does Isaac use "my son" to Esau, who speaks twice of himself as "your son" in vv. 31-32.

Isaac's blessing of Jacob involves fertility (vv.

27-28) and dominion (v. 29). The gift of "dew of heaven" (rain) and "oil of earth" echoes a Ugaritic expression used of the Canaanite goddess Anat, who is associated with fertility. The blessing of rain produces the abundance of grain and wine, two of the principal foodstuffs of the ancient Near East. The third of these basic foodstuffs, oil, may be suggested in the ambiguous "oil of the earth" that precedes the reference to grain and wine. The sequence of the fall rains followed by the grain harvest of the spring and the grape harvest of late summer (and the olive harvest of the fall) depicts a full agricultural year (cf. Deut. 11:14; 33:28; Joel 2:23-24; Ps. 104:13-15).

Isaac's blessing of Jacob includes dominion as well as fertility. In its emphasis on the superiority of the blessed son (Gen. 27:29, 40), the blessing echoes the oracle Rebekah received from Yahweh before the birth of the twins (25:23). The reference to the prenatal oracle declaring Jacob's preeminence over Esau reminds readers that it is Yahweh who is in control of the action in chap. 27.

This story of an energetic and resourceful woman who acts on behalf of her son and thus serves the hidden purposes of God reminds careful readers of the similar story of the mother of Moses in Exod. 2:1-10. Also worthy of note is the story of the wise woman of Tekoa who uses deception to assure the continued life of a son (2 Sam. 14:1-20).

The encounter of Esau with Isaac (Gen. 27:30-40) contains several interesting features. First, as Westermann has pointed out, the cry of Esau in v. 34 (at his discovery that Jacob has gained the blessing by deception) is a cry of lament ("he cried out a great and bitter cry") leading directly to petition ("bless me!"). The same verb for "cry out" is used in such laments as Pss. 77:1; 88:1; and 107:6, 28; its parallelism with "weep" in Isa. 33:7 and Jer. 48:5 prepares for Esau's weeping in Gen. 27:38. Isaac's reply to Esau repeats the two elements of the blessing (fertility and dominion) but in reverse order (v. 37: "I have made him your master . . . I have enriched him with grain and wine"). Chiasmus is also present in the reversal of v. 28 in v. 39 ("from the oil of the earth . . . from the dew of the heavens"). These reversals in form are probably meant to underline the reversal of expectations experienced by Esau. In being denied the blessing, Esau will reexperience the curses imposed upon the primal pair: dominion by a family member and separation from the productive earth (Gen. 3:16-19). As at the beginning of the story, Rebekah is once again the active party; when she learns of Esau's intention to kill his brother (cf. Gen. 4:8) after his father's death, she sends him to her relatives in Haran (Gen. 27:43). The chapter thus ends on the note of family strife leading to separation.

28:1-9, Jacob's Departure. In these verses Jacob's departure is described by P, as indicated by such characteristics as the divine name El Shaddai (Gen. 17:1; 35:11) and the divine command to increase and multiply (Gen. 1:28; 9:1, 7). In this account, Jacob gains his father's blessing on his father's initiative and without deception (v. 6). He goes to his mother's family not to escape Esau's murderous wrath but to seek a wife from Rebekah's family and to prevent a marriage with an inhabitant of Canaan (a "Hittite"), like Esau's (26:34; 27:46). To traditional source criticism, these differences with chap. 27 have led to the conclusion that P must have known of a different story of the blessing of Jacob by Isaac. To be noted, however, is the different point of the P blessing in 28:3-4—not rainfall sufficient for agriculture and fertility, and dominion over his brother but numerous descendants and land (cf. Gen. 17:5-8; 35:11-12). This difference made possible the meaningful integration of this P material into the larger account.

A focus on the fundamental human realities of birth, death, and marriage underlies all three blocks of P material in the patriarchal narratives (chaps. 17 and 23 and the passage under discussion). In chap. 17, God announces that Abraham and Sarah will be the parents of a child and through that birth the progenitors of a great people. Chap. 23 recounts the death of Sarah and her burial in a grave purchased from an inhabitant of Canaan (Ephron "the Hittite"). And Gen. 28:1-9 involves Jacob's journey to Mesopotamia to avoid intermarriage.

28:10-22, Jacob's Dream at Bethel. Jacob's night at Bethel on his flight to Haran serves as a point of transition from his home and family to an uncertain future in Haran. On his return to Canaan, there will be another night encounter with the Deity before his reentry into the land (32:22-32). After his return and reconciliation with Esau, he will again go to Bethel (35:1-15); in both accounts Jacob experiences a theophany (28:13, 35:9; cf. 48:3).

While source criticism has attempted to divide the account of Jacob's dream into its constituent J and E material (J: 28:10-11a, 13-16, 19a; E: 28:11b-12, 17-18, 20-21a, 22), tradition-historical analysis may point in a better direction by seeing the basic narrative in vv. 10-12 and 16-19, with expansions of this core in vv. 13-15 and 20-22. In the dream at a site sacred since the time of Abraham (Gen. 12:8), Jacob sees "messengers of God," members of the heavenly assembly in service of the Deity, ascending and descending a staircase between heaven and earth (for earthly tasks performed by such divine messengers cf. Gen. 19; 1 Kings 22:22).

Not only does Jacob see the divine messengers, he sees Yahweh as well, who reiterates the promises of possession of the land of Canaan, numerous descendants, and divine presence (Gen. 28:13-15). The conclusion of the promise is the blessing that will come upon the nations of the earth through contact with Jacob and his descendants; the accomplishment of this divine promise will be seen in the story of the prosperity of Laban through association with Jacob (30:27-30). Upon awaking, Jacob expresses his awe by word (28:17: "This is none other than the house of God; this is the gate of heaven!") and action (his consecration and renaming of the sacred site as Bethel [Heb., "house of God"; → Bethel]).

The original function of this story was probably to explain the founding of the sanctuary at Bethel. Bethel was an important site of worship after the secession of the northern tribes from the tribal union achieved by David and preserved by Solomon and their establishment of a kingdom that bore the name of the patriarch Israel. In designating Bethel as the site for one of the northern temples, the new kingdom reached back beyond the "innovation" of Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem to a site sacred to the ancestors (Gen. 12:8; 1 Kings 12:26-33; Amos 7:1-13). Genesis 14, with its account of Abraham at Jerusalem (vv. 18-20), may be a southern answer by Judah to the claim of ancestral antiquity for the northern temple at Bethel.

29:1-31:54

Jacob in Haran and the Return to Canaan

The story of Jacob's years in Mesopotamia with his uncle Laban is one of the narrative gems of the OT. Although there is evidence of more than one source, the narrative has been fashioned into a unity that makes source criticism difficult for this material. Form-critically, the narrative has been described as a novella, like that other masterpiece of Hebrew literary art, the Joseph story.

The family unity that welcomed Jacob to his mother's relatives is soon broken by Laban's duplicity in the arrangements made for Jacob's service to Laban and his marriages to Leah and Rachel. Laban's continuing sharp practice in the determination of Jacob's wages in livestock is overcome by Jacob's superior cleverness (30:35-43); a story that began with a reference to Laban's prosperity (30:27) ends with a reference to Jacob's wealth (30:43). Jacob's departure from Laban concludes with the making of a mutual nonaggression pact (31:44-54).

There are a number of obscurities in chaps. 30-31 (e.g., 30:27, 37-43; 31:29), some of which are probably due to the presence of technical lore about shepherding. That such lore was common to the pastoralists of the ancient Near East is demonstrated by the number of opaque and unusual expressions in the narrative that can be illuminated by parallel Akkadian material, as several scholars have shown.

It has been claimed that the material is arranged in a chiastic pattern, whose center is the birth of Jacob's children: A Jacob's arrival in Haran, 29:1-4; B contract with Laban, 29:15-20; C Laban's deception of Jacob, 29:21-30; D the birth of Jacob's children, 29:31-30:24; C' Jacob's trickery of Laban, 30:25-43; B' dispute with Laban, 31:17-42; A' departure from Laban, 30:43-54. This reversal in form mirrors the reversal of situation for Laban and Jacob. And note how the story is framed by Laban's kiss of welcome to Jacob (29:13) and Laban's parting kiss to his daughters and grandchildren in 31:55 (pointedly omitting a parting kiss for Jacob).

29:1-14, Jacob's Arrival in Haran. Arriving in his uncle's territory, Jacob makes inquiries about Laban of shepherds gathered at a well, waiting for the arrival of others to remove the stone from the mouth of the well, since its size and weight needed the concerted efforts of all. In v. 6 Jacob inquires about the well-being of his uncle (lit., "Is there peace to him?") and the shepherds answer affirmatively ("There is peace"). This shalom is soon to be lost in the contest in which Laban and Jacob are pitted against one another. When Jacob sees Rachel, he performs a heroic, superhuman feat of strength by moving the stone from the well alone and watering Laban's flocks. One is reminded of the earlier meeting of Abraham's steward and Jacob's mother Rebekah at a well (24:11-27). When Laban learns from his daughter of Jacob's presence, he goes quickly to meet him with an embrace and a kiss (29:13; 33:4; 45:14-15). The family bonds that are the basis of Laban's welcome of Jacob are expressed idiomatically in Laban's words (29:14), "You are my bone and my flesh" (cf. Gen. 2:23; Judg. 9:2; 2 Sam. 5:1 [= 1 Chron. 11:1]; 2 Sam. 19:13).

29:15-30, Laban's Deception and Jacob's Marriages. After a month's stay, the question of Jacob's working for Laban is brought up. The discussion about wages for such service begins in amicable fashion. Because of his love for Laban's younger daughter Rachel, Jacob proposes to work for Laban for seven years to earn the right to marry her; at the end of the years of service, he claims his right, and Laban celebrates the wedding with a feast (significantly, mishteh, the Heb. word for feast, means "drinking party"). At nightfall Laban brings his older daughter Leah to Jacob, who, after long feasting, unknowingly consummates his marriage with her.

There is a strong sense of irony in Jacob's indignant accusation of duplicity on the part of Laban. When he asks rhetorically "What is this that you have done to me?" his words recall the same question addressed to his forebears Abraham (Gen. 20:9) and Isaac (26:10) when their deceptions involving their wives are uncovered. After agreeing to another seven-year period of work for Laban, Jacob finishes the bridal week (cf. Judg. 14:8-18) with Leah and then immediately marries his beloved Rachel.

While the principal ironic reversal in the story is how Jacob the deceiver, in gaining his brother Esau's blessing, becomes Jacob the deceived, there are other ironic echoes of the Jacob-Esau story in the account of Jacob's marriages and the ensuing rivalry of his wives. The reference to Leah's "weak" eyes (v. 17) reminds us of Isaac's failing eyesight, which made Jacob's deception possible. While the differing parental preferences of Isaac and Rebekah were the source of family discord and separation, so Jacob's preference for Rachel over Leah brings about continuing family strife. As Jacob the younger son was helped by his mother, Leah the older daughter was helped by her father Laban. And in 30:16, Rachel will sell her marriage right to her older sister, as Esau sold his birthright to his younger brother. All these notes of irony are summed up in Laban's words to Jacob, "It is not done in our area to give in marriage the younger woman before the firstborn" (v. 26), words that must have recalled to Jacob his deceptive acquisition of the blessing of the firstborn.

29:31-30:24, Jacob's Children. The strife between the wives of Jacob is introduced in 29:30 with the observation that "Jacob loved Rachel more than Leah." It is continued in v. 31, where the fact that Leah was unloved (more vividly in Heb., "hated") leads to divine compassion and Leah's fertility, as she bears Jacob four sons (Reuben, Levi, Simeon, and Judah). In naming her firstborn Reuben, Leah says "Yahweh has looked on my misery" (v. 32), words that recall Hagar's naming of Ishmael (16:11: "Yahweh has listened to your [cry of] misery") and anticipate Jacob's statement that "God saw my misery" (31:42).

Gen. 30:1-2 introduces another recurrent theme, the matriarch's barrenness. There is an effective contrast between 29:31, where "Yahweh saw that Leah was hated and so opened her womb," and 30:1, where "Rachel saw that she had not borne sons to Jacob." Like Sarai in chap. 16, Rachel gives her maid Bilhah to Jacob; the children born of this union (Dan and Naphtali) are considered Rachel's. Rachel's words in 30:3 recall those of Sarai in 16:2 ("Perhaps I shall be given sons through her"). Leah also engages in this substitute childbearing by giving Jacob her maid Zilpah, who bears Gad and Asher (30:9-13).

In 30:14-16, Leah gives the fertility-inducing mandrakes (cf. Song of Sg. 7:13), found by her son Reuben, to Rachel for marriage rights with Jacob, after which Leah bears Issachar and Zebulun and a daughter Dinah (30:17-21). Just as God had seen Leah's misery and opened her womb (29:31) and heard her (in 29:33), so (in 30:22) "God remembered Rachel and listened to her and opened her womb." God's remembrance of Rachel parallels his remembering Noah (Gen. 8:1) and Abraham (19:29). As a consequence, she bears Joseph (vv. 23-24).

One concluding observation can be made on the echoes of Genesis 3 in 29:15-30:24. First, in his answer to the divine charge that they had sinned by attempting to be "like God" (Gen. 3:5), the man blames his wife (3:12: "She gave me some of the fruit, and I ate"). In 30:1-2 Rachel blames her husband for her childlessness ("Give me sons or I'll die!"), to which Jacob retorts angrily, "Am I in the place of God?" Second, the sequence of Jacob's years of hard labor for Laban and the birth of his children to his wives brings to mind the curses imposed on the first humans in Gen. 3:16-19, woman's pain in childbearing and man's hard labor in food production.

30:25-43, Jacob's Trickery of Laban. As Jacob begins to plan his return to Canaan, he engages in a lengthy proceeding with Laban, since he is a dependent in Laban's household. Laban admits that his wealth is the result of divine blessing because of his association with Jacob (30:27, 30). Laban's wish is that Jacob should remain in his service as a generously paid employee, while Jacob responds that he wants to work for his family. The meaning of the negotiations between Jacob and Laban is not completely clear, but apparently Jacob's inferior position as a dependent in Laban's employ does not allow him to return to his own land without Laban's agreement. At least Laban seems to have the right to retain Jacob's family and property should Jacob depart without his permission (31:43). In the end, Jacob accedes to Laban's wishes and proposes a way to be remunerated by taking for himself only the dark sheep and spotted and speckled goats. Laban's duplicity is seen in 30:35-36; after agreeing to Jacob's wages, he proceeds to take for himself all the unusually marked animals and to remove them several days' journey from Jacob. Since Jacob knows how to influence the breeding habits of the sheep and goats in his care so that they produce a large number of unusually colored offspring, he is able to outwit Laban. The means by which Jacob influences the fertility of the flocks are switches he takes from poplar trees; one is reminded of the fertility-inducing plants in 30:14. The story ends with a description of Jacob's great wealth (v. 43; cf. Gen. 12:16; 20:14; 26:12-13).

31:1-54, Jacob's Flight. The growing hostility of Laban and his sons toward Jacob, because of his increasing wealth, continues the theme of family strife that began in the account of Jacob's marriages (29:21-27). The charge of Laban's sons that Jacob "has taken all that belonged to our father" (31:1) echoes Esau's complaint in 27:36. The divine command to leave is communicated to Jacob in parallel accounts (by Yahweh in 31:3; by "the messenger of Elohim" in a dream in vv. 10-13); in source-critical terms, the first of these accounts is J, the second E.

When Jacob informs Rachel and Leah of his decision to depart, they overcome their mutual animosity to support this plan (a detail that may forecast the movement toward family reconciliation that Jacob will initiate in Gen. 33). Leaving with his family and goods in haste and stealth, Jacob is pursued by Laban, who is warned in a dream to do no harm to Jacob (31:24, 29). Laban is particularly angered by the theft of idols of his family deities that Rachel had taken without Jacob's knowledge (v. 19), perhaps as partial compensation for her father's dissipation of her bride price (→ Teraphim). In the search that Laban makes for these idols, there is an effective echo of the Jacob-Esau story. When Jacob gives Laban permission to search his party, Laban "feels through" what was in Rachel's tent. The Hebrew verb "feel through" (mashash) in vv. 34 and 37 is the same verb employed in 27:22 to describe Isaac's "feeling" of Jacob. As in chap. 27, a younger child (Rachel) deceives her father to gain what belonged to the father. Rachel's hiding of the idols in the camel cushion on which she sat and her excuse to her father for not rising from it (menstruation) may involve some broad humor at the powerlessness of Laban's sought-for gods. The episode ends with Jacob's upbraiding Laban and reminding him of his long and faithful service. Twice in this section (31:42, 53) Jacob's deity is identified as "the fear of Isaac" (i.e., "the Awesome One of Isaac," as the NAB renders it).

The chapter ends with the making of a covenant, a mutual nonaggression pact between Jacob and Laban (vv. 44-54). The different objects that serve as witnesses to this covenant (a stele in v. 45, ■ cairn of stones in v. 46), the different names given to the objects (Jegar-sahadutha and Galeed in v. 47, Mizpah in v. 49), and the two references to the covenant meal (vv. 46, 54) probably indicate the use of different versions of the treaty in the composition of this episode. While there is evidence of J and E material in this chapter, more recent traditio-historical criticism has tended to see in vv. 44-54 a basic J narrative with expansions and additions, rather than an interweaving of two distinct sources.

31:55-36:43

The End of the Jacob-Esau Cycle

31:55-32:23, Jacob's Embassy to Esau. In sharp contrast to Laban's greeting of Jacob (29:13), Laban kisses his daughters and grandchildren goodbye, but pointedly no kiss is given to Jacob (31:55). There follows a theophany (vv. 1-2), somewhat like the Bethel vision (28:12-17), in which Jacob encounters "messengers of God" (28:12; 31:11) and names the site Mahanaim ("two camps") after exclaiming "This is God's encampment!" (cf. "This is the house of God . . . the gate of heaven" in 28:17). The sequence in Gen. 28:1-22 of vision, naming, and erection of a monument is recalled in the vision and naming in 32:1-2, preceded by the setting up of a stele in 31:45, 51-53.

Jacob sends word of his return ahead to Esau, hoping to placate his brother. When he learns that Esau is coming with a large force, Jacob prays for divine aid (vv. 9-12). Several features of this petitionary prayer ought to be noted. Its essential features are the address to the Deity (v. 9), the petition (v. 11), and the motivation, reasons brought forward to persuade God to grant the petition (v. 12). The petition itself has parallels in Pss. 31:15 and 144:11. And the divine chesed (Heb., "steadfast love") and 'emet ("fidelity") of which Jacob declares himself unworthy are associated with Abraham in 24:27. With characteristic practicality, Jacob follows the prayer with the division of his goods into two parts, in the hope of saving at least one if he is attacked by Esau. His dispatch of gifts to Esau (32:13-21) serves both to appease him and to act as a buffer between them.

Noteworthy in this section is the repeated reference to "face": in v. 16 ("Pass before my face"), v. 17 ("To whom belong these before your face?"), four times in v. 20 ("I may appease his face with the gift going before his face; afterwards I will see his face and perhaps he will lift up my face" [i.e., be gracious to me; cf. the same idiom in 19:21]), and in v. 21 ("The gift passed before his face"). These seven uses of "face" are clearly meant to bind this story with Jacob's following encounter with the Deity, in which he sees God face to face (32:30; cf. 33:10).

32:24-32, Jacob and His Mysterious Adversary.

This story has provoked extended commentary (the earliest being Hos. 12:3-4 and Wisd. of Sol. 10:10-12). It is rich with motifs from myth and folklore—e.g., the trial of heroes, the loss by nocturnal demons of supernatural power at sunrise (vampires), the prohibition against fording a river by its protective deity, and the power gained by the knowledge of the adversary's mysterious and hidden name (cf. Rumpelstiltskin). While the story is complex, no attempt to divide it into J and E elements has won assent; as in other cases, expansions and development of a core in the tradition history of the story may be closer to the mark.

The chief difficulty with the story is the identification of Jacob's adversary with God. The standard pattern for the kind of tale found in 32:24-32, as analyzed by structuralism, is a hero (Jacob) on a quest (return to Canaan and reconciliation with Esau); the originator of the quest is God (31:3, 13), and the adversary with whom Jacob struggles is the opponent, whose task is to prevent Jacob from bringing the mission to a successful conclusion. At some earlier level of the story, the opponent may have been some Canaanite god attempting to keep Jacob from entering the land. But the point that makes the story so enigmatic in its final crystallization is the identification of both originator and opponent as God. This break with the conventional folktale pattern is the effect of Israelite monotheism, which cannot tolerate the possible dualism that might be implied by a powerful supernatural adversary to Yahweh.

Two etiologies, or accounts of origins, conclude the story. The first of these, involving the naming of the site, connects the story with Gen. 28:10-19 and 32:1-2 and suggests that at one point in its history the account may have been a story about the founding of a shrine at this place (→ Penueel). Any such etiology has, however, become almost invisible, as the story has been used to serve other functions. The second etiology here concerns a dietary taboo unwitnessed elsewhere in the OT.

In its present context, Gen. 32:24-32 is chiefly concerned with the blessing that Jacob receives (v. 26) and the change of his name to Israel (cf. Gen. 17:5, 15; 35:10), signaling a change of personality and destiny. The etymology offered for "Israel" in 34:28 involves contention; while it is not a philologically defensible etymology, it does fit in well with the theme of strife that runs through much of Genesis.

33:1-20, Jacob's Meeting with Esau.

The confrontation of Jacob and his family with Esau and his four hundred retainers begins in tension, with Jacob dividing his family into three groups. In the ordering of these divisions (the slave women and their children first, Leah and her children second, and finally Rachel and Joseph), Jacob continues to demonstrate his affection for Rachel, which was one of the causes of discord in the family. The tension is resolved when Esau generously takes the initiative and runs to meet Jacob, humbly bowing, with embraces and kisses (v. 4; cf. 45:14-15). Esau's movement toward reconciliation is underlined by his address to Jacob in 33:9 as "my brother." Jacob responds by asking Esau, "Take, please, my blessing," thus restoring to his brother the blessing he had gained and reversing Esau's words in 27:36 ("Now he has taken my blessing").

Jacob's words to Esau in 33:10 ("Seeing your face is like seeing the face of God") link this scene to that preceding mysterious confrontation with the "face of God" in 32:30.

Up to this point in the chapter, both brothers have made gestures that signal the beginning of reconciliation: Esau's affectionate greeting of Jacob and his address to him as "my brother" and Jacob's restoration to Esau of the blessing. Gen. 33:12-17, however, show that reconciliation is only partial and incomplete. Despite Esau's efforts, the cautious Jacob finds excuses for parting with his brother, eventually settling not with Esau in Seir but in Succoth, in the environs of Shechem (→ Shechem). Shechem was visited by Abram after his arrival in Canaan (12:6); like his ancestor (chap. 23), Jacob purchases a piece of land from the local residents.

34:1-31, The Rape of Dinah. The story of the rape of Dinah is connected with its context by its concern with a child of Jacob, his only daughter; the twelve sons of Jacob, listed in 35:23-25, will be the chief concern in the Joseph story in chaps. 37-50. The introduction of Hamor and Shechem in 34:18-19 connects Genesis 34 to its setting by catchwords. The brief and laconic account of the rape is amplified by an exposition of the feelings of Shechem (v. 3: "He was deeply attracted to Jacob's daughter Dinah, and was in love with her, and spoke to her heart"). While the elders Jacob and Hamor try to negotiate a peaceful solution to the difficulty, Jacob's sons answer violence with violence, avenging the wrong done their sister by deceptively agreeing to intermarriage only after the circumcision of the Shechemite males (v. 15). The deception is completed when two of Dinah's full brothers, Simeon and Levi (29:33-34; 30:21), gain their revenge by the slaughter of the incapacitated males. This violent behavior of Simeon and Levi is an ominous prelude to the brothers' act of violence against Joseph (Gen. 37:20-27) and is recalled in Jacob's farewell discourse (Gen. 49:5-7) to his sons.

The story of the rape of Dinah has a number of connections with the similar story of Amnon's rape of Tamar (2 Sam. 13). These connections include the formulaic language in which the rape is described (Gen. 34:2: "He saw her . . . he took her . . . he lay with her and violated her"; 2 Sam. 13:6, 8: "in my sight"; 13:14: "he violated her and lay with her"). Also formulaically expressed is the reaction of Dinah's brothers (Gen. 34:7: "[Shechem] performed an act of folly in Israel; such a thing was not done") and Tamar's protest to her implacable half-brother (2 Sam. 13:12: "Such a thing is not done in Israel; do not perform this act of folly"). Murderous revenge by full brothers concludes both stories (Gen. 34:25; 2 Sam. 13:28-29).

35:1-29, Jacob's Return to Bethel. This chapter contains quite diverse material drawn from J and P. If the core of Jacob's Bethel experience in Gen. 28:10-22 is E, then 35:1-7 may be the J version of the Bethel sanctuary founding, including the rite of purification from foreign gods (cf. Josh. 24:14, 23; Judg. 10:16) and Jacob's instructions about a pilgrimage to Bethel (Gen. 35:1) in language reminiscent of Ps. 122:1 and Isa. 2:3, 5.

Gen. 35:8 is the first of three death reports in the chapter: the deaths of Rebekah's nurse Deborah, of Rachel in childbirth (vv. 16-20), and of Isaac in peaceful old age (vv. 28-29). The theophany and oracle in vv. 9-12 come from P, as indicated by the divine name El Shaddai (Gen. 17:1), the command to increase and multiply (1:28, 9:1), and the promise of royal descendants (17:6). Gen. 35:10 is the P account of the name change of Jacob to Israel; in the larger context of Genesis, it is a confirmation of the name change announced in 32:28.

There is some dispute about the source of 35:13-15. If they are from P, then vv. 9-15 may be the P version of the founding of the Bethel sanctuary. The genealogy in vv. 23-29 is also from P. It is prefaced by the curious story of Reuben's violation of his father's concubine Bilhah (v. 22). Such an act by an eldest son is not only a sexual offense; it is a challenge to the authority of the head of the family. Such a flouting of legitimate authority occurred twice in the early history of the Israelite monarchy, in uncertain situations where there was some doubt about who was the legitimate ruler (2 Sam. 3:7) or where rebellion was in progress (2 Sam. 16:21). In Jacob's farewell testament, this act of Reuben provides the reason for his loss of the authority normally held by the firstborn (Gen. 49:3-4). Finally, not only does Reuben's act recall the violation of Dinah (34:2, 5), it is another instance of strife in the family, especially of the discord between father and son(s) that is a dominant theme in the Jacob-Esau cycle, appearing most recently at the end of the story of the rape of Dinah (34:30-31), and that will appear again in the Joseph story.

36:1-43, The Genealogy of Esau. This chapter is a loose collection of material relevant to Esau, chiefly lists and genealogies of his descendants, placed here to complement the list of Jacob's sons in 35:23-26. Another possible connection between chaps. 35 and 36 is the descent of kings from both Jacob (35:11) and Esau (36:31–39).

The separation of Jacob and Esau in vv. 6–8 recalls the parting of Abram and Lot in chap. 13 and the unwillingness of Jacob to move too closely to Esau in 33:12–17. This division also prepares for the strife and separation of brothers in the Joseph novella.

Jacob and Esau, Israel and Edom

The lives and careers of the great figures of the OT, such as the liberator Moses or the ancestors from whom tribes or nations took their names, are not simply stories of individuals; rather such figures are sometimes portrayed as living out proleptically the later historical experiences of the people whose progenitors and saviors they are.

It has already been pointed out that the ancestor Abram anticipated in his life later experiences of his descendants: descent into Egypt because of famine, oppression by the Pharaoh (when Sarai is brought into the monarch's harem), the enriching of the ancestor in Egypt, divine intervention (described as "plagues"), and release. Similarly Moses underwent in his early life a kind of proleptic exodus: endangered by the Pharaoh, he was saved by a passage through water (Exod. 1:22; 2:1–10) and encountered God at Horeb after guiding his flock through the desert (Exod. 3:1–3).

What is true for Abraham and Moses is equally so for Jacob and his descendants (Israel) and Esau and his descendants (Edom). The brotherhood and strife between Jacob and Esau that mark the Genesis narratives are both reflected elsewhere in the OT. The relationship between the Jacob-Esau narratives in Genesis 25–36 and the texts dealing with the political interaction of Israel and Edom is complex; while the Jacob-Esau stories in Genesis include material drawn from ancient sources, at the same time they reflect later national-ethnic issues between the kingdoms of Israel (and later Judah) and Edom in the tenth century B.C. The influence can move in the opposite direction as well: i.e., it is likely that the Jacob-Esau cycle in Genesis had some influence on the literary shaping of OT texts dealing with the relationship of Israel and Edom in world affairs.

In the analysis of texts in which the eponymous ancestor's fate anticipates the historical fortunes of the people, a good starting point would be the annunciation of the birth of Esau and Jacob. In the oracle of Gen. 25:23 Rebekah is told that, of the twins to be born of her, "the older will serve the younger." The origin of this statement of Jacob's superiority over Esau is probably the subjugation of Edom by Israel in the reign of David (2 Sam. 8:14; 1 Kings 11:15–16). Similarly, when Isaac promises Esau that he will "throw off his [Jacob's] yoke from your neck" (Gen. 27:40), the reference is probably to Edom's several attempts at independence from Israel (1 Kings 11:14–22, 25; 2 Kings 8:20–22; 14:7, 22).

The "brotherhood" of Israel and Edom is referred to in a number of OT texts. Such language reflects not only ethnic relationship but political alliance. In Deut. 23:7, the Israelites are instructed, "Do not abhor the Edomite, for he is your brother." The language of fraternity also appears in Num. 20:14. In Deut. 2:4, Moses is commanded by God to announce to the Israelites, "You are about to cross into the territory of your brothers the sons of Esau, dwelling in Seir." Brotherhood language appears as well in Amos 1:11 and Obad. 10, 12; in these texts, the theme of strife is heard in the description of Israel and Edom as warring, hostile brothers. In Amos 1:11, Edom is castigated for "pursuing his brother with a sword and destroying his treaty-partner." While the particular moment and events are not immediately clear, the "brother" referred to here is obviously Israel. In Obadiah 10, Edom's "violence to his brother Jacob" is specified as their standing by when Jerusalem was under attack.

Israel's hostility toward Edom reached a high point in the exilic period; Obadiah is certainly exilic, and many commentators consider Amos 1:11–12 to be an exilic addition to the book. The reason for this hostility and hatred is probably to be found in 1 Esd. 4:45, where Edom is said to have burned the Jerusalem Temple during the Babylonian attack in 587 B.C.; the same charge is probably the point of Lam. 4:21–22 and Ps. 137:7. Other anti-Edomite material from the exilic period includes Jer. 49:7–22 (a text with significant similarities to Obadiah); Isa. 34:5–6 (in which the destruction of Edom is described in almost apocalyptic terms); Isa. 63:1–6; Ezek. 25:12–14; 35; Joel 3:19; Mal. 1:2–5; and Lam. 1:2–5.

37:1–50:26

The Joseph Narrative

The Joseph narrative is one of the masterpieces of Hebrew narrative art, indeed one of the acknowledged masterpieces of world literature. It is a product of what Gerhard von Rad has called the Solomonic enlightenment, like another superb OT narrative, the court history of David (2 Sam. 9–20; 1 Kings 1–2). Beside being products of the court of Solomon (tenth century B.C.), both narratives share significant theological perspectives. For instance, both have been described as influenced to some extent by wisdom thought and literature. In a famous study, von Rad describes the Joseph narrative as a didactic wisdom story, and R. N. Whybray and others have made similar claims for the court history. Both narratives share a view of the Deity acting providentially rather than by direct intervention or theophany. Both show remarkable human characters surviving and prospering by their own wits, controlling their destiny by their natural gifts and superior ability.

Several questions are involved in discussing the relationship of the Joseph narrative to the rest of Genesis and to the Pentateuch. First, it is clear that the Joseph story is a bridge between Genesis and Exodus; the Joseph story begins with Jacob in Canaan (37:1) and ends with Israel in Egypt (47:27). The settlement of Jacob and his family in Egypt at the invitation of a Pharaoh well disposed toward them sets the stage for the appearance in Exodus of a Pharaoh "who knew not Joseph" and his oppression of Israel (Exod. 1:8–10). Second, the relationship of the Joseph narrative to what precedes it in Genesis, and particularly to the Jacob cycle, will be discussed below, but at least several obvious links may be mentioned here: both stories begin with a deception of a father by his offspring through an article of clothing; this deception leads to a separation of the brothers for twenty years; and the climax of both stories is the reconciliation of the estranged brothers and the abatement of family strife.

A more complex question is the relationship of the Joseph narrative to the pentateuchal sources: is it, like the preceding ancestral narratives, made up of individual narratives taken from different sources and then editorially woven together? Traditional critical scholarship answered this question positively, arguing that the sources identified in the prior material (J, E, P) are visible and can be isolated in the Joseph narrative as well. Evidence for this view included such doublets as the different patriarchal names: Jacob in 37:1 (identified as P) and 34 (identified as E); Israel in 37:3, 13 (both J); the attempts to save Joseph's life by Reuben (attributed to E) or by Judah (J); and the two versions of Joseph's fate, his sale to an Ishmaelite caravan (ascribed to J) and his kidnap by Midianite traders (in E). Such source analysis seemed to lead to the conclusion that the author/editor responsible for the final form of the Joseph narrative had at his disposal sources with variant tellings of the Joseph story. On the basis of such source-critical assumptions, some scholars felt confident in assigning Gen. 37:1–2 to P, 3a to J, and 3b to E.

More recent scholarship has been impressed rather by the unity of the Joseph story. From such a unitarian perspective, the Joseph narrative is described as a short story or a novella; those scholars who have argued for a wisdom cast to the Joseph narrative describe it more specifically as a "historicized wisdom tale" or a "didactic wisdom story" (other examples of which will be mentioned below). The coherence of the Joseph narrative seems to point not to a joining or interweaving of originally disparate variants, but rather to composition by a literary artist of exceptional skill. From this perspective, the use of different patriarchal names, Jacob and Israel, does not indicate several sources but rather different emphases in a single literary work, for whom the patriarch is both an individual and, as progenitor of the nation, a kind of "corporate personality." Nor is there a real contradiction in two brothers working in different ways to prevent the murder of Joseph. Reuben's words in Gen. 37:30 seem to indicate that he knew nothing of Judah's plan (worked out in Reuben's absence?) and the brothers' agreement to it. The Ishmaelite/Midianite accounts of Joseph's passage to Egypt are more of a problem; but, in the absence of clear evidence for sources elsewhere in the Joseph narrative, it can be resolved by understanding the Midianite account as a gloss, an expansion of a single source rather than a doublet from another source.

While Genesis 37–50 has been labeled for convenience as the Joseph narrative, a more precise description and delimitation of the extent of the Joseph novella would be Genesis 37 and 39–45. Chaps. 37 and 42–45 are a family story concerned with Joseph's rise to a position of prominence and superiority over his brothers. Chaps. 39–41 are a story within a story, a political tale of Joseph's career, with chaps. 40–41 stressing his divine gift of administrative and other wisdom.

Genesis 38 is a digression from the Joseph narrative; its position, as will be seen, is the result of the similarity of themes and motifs between it and the Joseph narrative. Chaps. 46–50 belong more properly to the Jacob cycle of stories. In Genesis 46 we find a theophany to Jacob, followed by an itinerary and a genealogy (the same sequence as in chap. 35); in chap. 47, Jacob's presentation to the Pharaoh; in chap. 48, his blessing of Joseph's sons Ephraim and Manasseh; in chap. 49, his farewell to his sons and his death; and in chap. 50, his funeral and burial.

The Egyptian locale of chaps. 39–50 of the Joseph story has led to attempts to relate the story of Joseph to what is known of Egyptian history. For a time, the intermittent presence of Asiatic slaves in Egypt and particularly the dominance of Egypt in the mid-second millennium B.C. by Asiatic Semites seemed to provide appropriate and reasonable historical background to the Joseph narrative (→ Hyksos). Support for this hypothesis was drawn from instances of Egyptian "local color" (Egyptian names in 37:36; 39:1; and 41:45; Egyptian customs in 50:2-3; 26; and the like). More recent scholarship has tended to question this view; it finds a more likely background in the Solomonic era for the knowledge of Egypt displayed in the Joseph narrative. Solomon's marriage to a daughter of the Pharaoh (1 Kings 9:16; 11:1) points to an era of amicable political and commercial relations between Egypt and Israel and would explain the positive and benign attitude of the Joseph narrative to Egypt, its ruler, and its people.

We can conclude this introduction to the Joseph narrative by listing the themes that appear in it and that will be discussed in greater detail in the commentary: divine providence, i.e., the divine governance of the world and the divine conduct of human affairs by a hidden providence rather than by revelation or extraordinary divine intervention ("Yahweh was with Joseph"); the success of the unpromising ("rags to riches") and the related theme of Yahweh's mysterious choice of the younger son; strife and discord in the family; Joseph's wisdom and the associated theme of the tolerance and openness of wisdom to the non-Israelite world; the blessing of the Gentiles through contact with the descendants of Abraham (39:5, 21; 41:44-57); Yahweh's hidden plan prevailing over human plans ("Man proposes, but God disposes"; cf. Prov. 16:9). The appearance of a number of these themes in prior material in Genesis, particularly in J, raises the question of the relationship of the Joseph narrative to the Yahwist. From the perspective of source criticism, the presence of such themes in both Joseph and J indicated that here as elsewhere, the basic narrative strand in the Joseph narrative was J, with supplements from E and P. The view taken here is that the Joseph narrative is not part of the Yahwist's work but an independent and distinct literary work. The shared themes may point to some connection between J and the Joseph story: for instance, are both writers members of a group of like-minded religious thinkers, a "Yahwist school"? The common view that the composition of both J and the Joseph narrative was associated with the court of Solomon may be explanation enough for the coincidence of themes that they reveal.

Several recurrent motifs in the Joseph narrative deserve mention as well. Dreams and famine each appear several times in the preceding ancestral narratives (dreams in 20:3; 28:12; and 31:10-11, 24; famine in 12:10 and 26:1). Further, the motif of clothing, which appears in Gen. 27:15-16, plays a major role in the Joseph narrative as a symbol of the changing situations of Joseph and the other participants in the story.

Let us bring the introduction to the Joseph narrative to an end with a word on method. It is, of course, a truism that the object of study (in this case the Joseph story) determines to a considerable extent appropriate methods of interpretation. This seems to be clearly the case here in dealing with a literary work of a kind different from the patriarchal narratives of chaps. 12-36. Most of those texts were composite, often artfully achieved; and while the focus of study there was on the final form of the text, historical and genetic examinations of the development of the text contributed to our understanding of the text. As the work of an individual artistic imagination, the Joseph narrative is different, as several scholars have demonstrated. And so the method best suited to the Joseph narrative would seem to be the exercise of "close reading" in which particular attention is paid to the subtleties and delicacies of the text under examination and to the recurrent themes and motifs as they are played out in different circumstances and contexts. Dialogue plays an important role in the Joseph story as a revealer of character and of the never static relationships between protagonists. Therefore the speeches and dialogue of the characters should be carefully heard, with particular attention to the changes that mark even repeated speeches (42:9-20, 30-34). In the close reading of the Joseph novella, an extended analysis of chap. 37 will be undertaken, since this chapter introduces themes and literary motifs that will reappear at important points throughout the story.

37:1-36

Joseph's Descent from Canaan to Egypt

37:1-4, Joseph with His Father and Brothers. The twelve sons of Jacob, whose birth notices were recorded in Gen. 29:31-30:24 and 35:16-18, were brought together in the list of Gen. 35:23-26. They include Leah's six sons, the four of the slaves Bilhah and Zilpah, and the two sons of Jacob's beloved Rachel, Joseph and Benjamin. Gen. 37:1-2 introduce by way of exposition the principal characters of the Joseph story, in the following order of appearance: first, Jacob (vv. 1-2: "Jacob dwelt . . . these are the generations of Jacob"); then, Joseph (v. 2: "Joseph was seventeen years old"); and, finally, the other sons of Jacob (v. 2: "He was a shepherd with his brothers"). The rise of a shepherd to be a "shepherd of his people," their ruler and provisioner, is a motif that will reappear in the call of Moses (Exod. 3:1-10) and in the divine choice of David (1 Sam. 16:11-12; Ps. 78:71-72). In Gen. 37:3, we encounter the same order of precedence as in vv. 1-2 ("Israel . . . Joseph . . . all his sons").

The introduction twice of Joseph before his older brothers forecasts the impending crisis that will soon engage this family. Already subordinate to Joseph in their father's affection, Joseph's brothers are grammatically subordinate as well by their placement in prepositional phrases (v. 3: "with his brothers . . . with the sons of his father's wives . . . more than all his other sons"). Jacob's preferential treatment of Joseph and the discord and ill will that this favoritism engenders in the family are thus visible in incipient form in the first verses of the story.

The narrative goes on to note that Joseph brought his father bad reports about the four sons of Bilhah and Zilpah; in this detail Joseph is portrayed as an agent of familial discord, and we are reminded of the strife between the wives of Jacob (partly fought out through their slaves), strife now mirrored in the growing estrangement of the sons.

Only in v. 4 do the brothers appear as the subject of a sentence, when they see their father's greater love for Joseph, symbolized by the special garment that Jacob presents to Joseph. Jacob's love for his son Joseph is mentioned twice in vv. 3-4: "Israel loved Joseph more than all his sons . . . their father loved him more than all his brothers." While such doubling has sometimes been taken as evidence of two sources, we are dealing rather with a skillful escalation and intensification intentionally effected by this repetition; whether designated as sons of the patriarch or as brothers of Joseph, they still take second place in the affection of their father. Realizing this, "they hated him," and their hatred led to an inability to communicate ("They couldn't even greet him [by saying 'Shalom!' to him]").

Several concluding observations can be made about these opening verses of the Joseph story. First, the bitter hatred of the brothers of Joseph is played out against a background of relational and familial language: "son(s)" occurs five times, "father" four times, and "brothers" three times. The notable abundance of these terms highlights the poignancy of the estrangement and disintegration of this family. Second, the psychological acuteness of the author is evident in the manner in which these opening verses deal with the question of responsibility for the crisis in the family. All are implicated in this family drama: Jacob, because of his publicly displayed preference for Joseph; Joseph, because of the discord he stirs up by his bad reports about his brothers to his father; and the brothers, because of their hatred. All are implicated in this tragedy; no one is declared innocent. Finally, visible perception is a noteworthy feature of chap. 37 that is first alluded to in v. 4 ("The brothers saw that their father loved him more than all his sons").

Three times more in this chapter will the brothers' "seeing" be mentioned: in v. 18 they see Joseph at a distance; in v. 20 they conclude their plotting with the bitter words "Let's see then what becomes of his dreams!"; and in v. 25 the brothers see a caravan of Ishmaelites that they make part of their plot. This emphasis on visual perception stands in counterpoint to and powerfully reinforces the severing of fraternal bonds signaled by the inability of the brothers to speak to Joseph because of their intense hatred, further provoked by Joseph's talk about his dreams (vv. 5, 8). The accent on seeing is taken up in Joseph's mission to his brothers (v. 13): Jacob's command to Joseph in v. 14 ("See to the welfare of your brothers") will be fulfilled when Joseph becomes the provider for his family in Egypt (45:5-8; 50:20-21). The last instance of visual perception in chap. 37 is Jacob's recognition of his son's bloody tunic (v. 33). As will be shown below, in the brothers' next encounter with Joseph (chap. 42), "seeing" will give way to speaking and hearing.

37:5-11, Joseph's Dreams. The dreams of Joseph and the growing hatred of his brothers are coordinated in v. 5. His are the first of a series of dreams by the major characters in the Joseph narrative. Joseph is quick to relate to his brothers the dream of the sheaves in which Joseph's sheaf is surrounded by those of his brothers, which pay homage to him by bowing. It is noteworthy that the sheaves are of grain; this symbolism of sheaves of grain for Joseph and his brothers neatly points forward both to Joseph's management of Egypt's grain supplies (chap. 41) and to the grain-buying expeditions of his brothers (chaps. 42-43). In these expeditions the brothers will assume the posture of obeisance predicted in the dream (42:6; 43:26, 28). Now, however, the fulfillment of the dream is uncertain, for Joseph and his dream (in which he is surrounded by his brothers) are now "surrounded" by the hatred of his brothers: the hatred of Joseph's brothers mentioned in vv. 5 and 8 forms a frame around Joseph's recounting of the dream in vv. 6 and 7. The author closes the story of the first dream with the observation that the brothers hated Joseph as much for his talk about the dreams as for the dreams themselves.

Joseph relates more briefly the second dream of the sun, moon, and eleven stars bowing before him. Significantly, no retort from his angry brothers is recorded; this absence of response is an ominous sign of the breakdown in communication between Joseph and his brothers introduced in v. 4. Joseph does earn a rebuke from his father because of his second dream, which included prostration by parents as well as by siblings. By this rebuke, Jacob allies himself with his other sons ("I and your mother and your brothers") for the first time.

This alliance is underlined in v. 11, which concludes the scene with two sentences: in the first, the subject is "his brothers" (with Joseph unnamed in a prepositional phrase, "against him"—a grammatical reversal of the situation in vv. 1-3); in the second, we are told that "his father pondered the matter." Where Joseph had stood between his father and his brothers twice in vv. 1-3 (as implied in the order of their appearance in those verses), now in v. 11 "his brothers" and "his father" are placed in direct contact; the word order of the Hebrew is "Envious of him were his brothers, and his father pondered the matter."

37:12-20, Joseph Between His Father and Brothers. In this scene, the brothers have departed to tend Jacob's flocks, and the patriarch decides to send Joseph to them. Israel's instructions to Joseph in v. 14 ("See to the welfare [shalom, lit., 'peace'] of your brothers") recall the inability of Jacob's other sons to greet their brother with "Shalom!" (v. 4).

In vv. 14-17 is recounted the curious scene of Joseph's wandering about during his journey to his brothers. The function of this scene is probably twofold: to build tension by delaying the eventual encounter of Joseph and his brothers and, more importantly, to show Joseph suspended between two worlds. Behind him is his reproachful father, before him his envious and hate-filled brothers. Joseph, his father's favorite and the "master of dreams" (v. 19), is here shown to be lost and dangerously vulnerable. In v. 18 the brothers spot Joseph at a distance (because of his distinctive garment?), and their smoldering anger finally boils over into violence. In plotting murder, the brothers of Joseph speak with unconscious accuracy when they say, "Let's see what will become of his dreams," a comment that will be ironically realized when they meet him again in Egypt.

37:21-36, Joseph Apart from His Father and Brothers. We now come to the final act of separation and estrangement that has been building throughout this chapter. In this final scene, Joseph is a powerless and passive victim; this is shown particularly by the fact that Joseph is the object of thirteen of the verbs from vv. 23-35, most of which describe acts of violence. The active parties are Joseph's oldest brother Reuben, who tries to save Joseph by dissuading his brothers from their thoughts of murder, and Judah, who proposes an alternative to killing out of enlightened self-interest (selling him as a slave). Reuben and Judah will again appear as spokesmen for their brothers (42:37; 44:16-34).

In 37:23, their first act is to strip Joseph of his garment, that hated symbol and constant reminder of Jacob's special affection for Joseph. After throwing him into a cistern, they callously sit down to their meal. There will be another meal later in the story at which the roles of powerful and powerless will be reversed (43:31-34).

Several motifs are employed in 37:23-25 that will recur elsewhere in the Joseph narrative. Already mentioned is the motif of the meal. More significant is the garment motif (v. 23), which appears at crucial points in the story (39:12-19; 41:14, 42; 45:22). Also prominent is the motif of Joseph's descent into the cistern (37:24); into Egypt (v. 25; 39:1); and into prison (39:20). The reference to the Egyptian prison in 40:15 and 41:14 with the same word used of the cistern in 37:22, 24, 28, and 29 ("pit") connects these three events as moments in the one downward movement of Joseph. Reuben's discovery that his plan to rescue Joseph has failed leads him to tear his garments (v. 29), a traditional gesture of grief that will be repeated by the other innocent party, Jacob (v. 34). Along with Jacob's donning of sackcloth, the gestures of Reuben and Jacob are an effective reprise of the garment motif.

As suggested above, the two variant explanations of Joseph's departure for Egypt (sold to Ishmaelites; kidnapped by Midianites) are evidence not of sources but of expansion. And taken together, these two variant explanations of Joseph's journey to Egypt preview subtly the whole Joseph story. In the first account, Joseph is sold by his brothers to Ishmaelite caravaneers who will bring Joseph down to Egypt along with their other goods (vv. 25-27). In the second account, passing Midianites bring Joseph up from the pit (v. 28). Thus at the moment of greatest danger and least hope for Joseph, the narrative in its final form alludes to the movement of Joseph both down to Egypt (39:1) and up from the pit (41:14).

To avoid an outright lie, the brothers stain Joseph's garment with the blood of a slaughtered goat and have the bloody garment brought to their father with the words, "We found this; see [lit., 'recognize'] whether it is the garment of your son [significantly, not 'our brother'] or not" (v. 32). When Jacob recognizes the garment, he assumes, as the brothers had intended, that Joseph has been killed by wild beasts. Jacob, who deceived his father, Isaac, with his brother's garments (27:15), is himself deceived by his sons with Joseph's bloodied garment. This example of punishment fitting the crime is further underlined by the slaughtered goat used in both acts of deception (27:9, 16; 37:31). The verb "recognize" that occurs twice in vv. 32-33 has a Janus-like function: it both looks back to 27:23 where Isaac "did not recognize" his disguised son Jacob, and it looks ahead to the tense and dramatic moment of the brothers' first meeting with Joseph, who recognizes them (42:7-8).

Jacob's lament for Joseph (37:35) is another instance of a character unconsciously speaking more truly than he knows (as in v. 20). At the end of the story, Jacob will go down (the descent motif) to his son, not to Sheol, the world of the dead, but to Egypt (46:3-4). Reuben's exclamation of dismay (37:30: "The boy is no more!") and Jacob's expression of grief (v. 35: "He refused to be consoled . . . thus did his father weep") remind one of the similar language in Rachel's mourning in Jer. 31:15 ("Rachel, weeping for her sons, refuses to be consoled . . . because they are no more"). The expression will be used again of Joseph by the brothers, in Egypt (42:13) and in their rehearsal to their father of the events of the trip (42:32). Jacob also uses it twice, in his responding lament (42:36: "Joseph is no more, and Simeon is no more!").

In his refusal to be consoled by "all his sons and daughters" Jacob rejects intimacy with his living children, preferring communion with his son Joseph, presumed dead. The chapter thus ends as it began, with Joseph, even absent, still a barrier preventing communication between family members. A family hostile and divided has become a family shattered by envy and hatred, treachery and deception, all culminating in a cruel act of violence.

38:1-30

Judah and Tamar

Gen. 37:36 brings the story of the breakdown of Jacob's family to an end, with Joseph in Egypt, sold (by Midianites) as a slave to a high official in Pharaoh's court. The story is continued in 39:1 in which Joseph is brought down to Egypt and is purchased (from Ishmaelites) by Potiphar. This narrative is interrupted by the self-contained story of Judah and Tamar. While its interposition between 37:36 and 39:1 of the Joseph narrative has long been a puzzle, the suggestion that it has been placed here because of the themes and motifs it shares with the Joseph narrative merits consideration.

38:1-11, Judah's Sons and Tamar's Marriages. The interpolated story begins with Judah's marriage and the birth of his three sons (vv. 1-5). Judah arranges a marriage for his oldest son, Er, with Tamar. Er's early death, the result of some unspecified offense against Yahweh, leads Judah to invoke the levirate custom in which the second son marries his dead brother's widow to provide offspring that will legally be recognized as his brother's, not his own (Deut. 25:5-10; Ruth 4:10; → Marriage). Onan's resistance to this customary law is expressed in his practice of coitus interruptus with Tamar, and for this offense his life is taken as well.

Judah has now only one son left. Fearful of endangering his third son's life and thus denying himself descendants, Judah temporizes, asking his daughter-in-law to return to her father's house (cf. Lev. 22:13) until his youngest son has reached adulthood. Tamar is thus confronted with the possibility of living as a childless widow, an extremely precarious situation for a woman in the ancient Near East.

38:12-30, Tamar's Plan and Its Discovery. The second part of the story begins with two acts of perception: Tamar sees that although Judah's third son Shelah has grown to adulthood, no marriage has been arranged (v. 14). Tamar takes the initiative by disguising herself as a prostitute and positioning herself where she will encounter her father-in-law. When Judah sees her (v. 15), he proposes intercourse, promising payment of a kid; at her request he leaves his seal and staff as a pledge of payment (→ Seal).

After the intercourse but before Judah can send the agreed payment, Tamar, whose identity is still unknown to Judah, departs with his pledge. When she is discovered to be pregnant three months later, it is reported to her father-in-law, who calls for her death (cf. Deut. 22:22-24). But when Tamar triumphantly presents Judah's identifiable seal and staff, he admits his offense in not providing for her a husband who would give her a child. The story ends with the birth to Tamar of the twins Zerah (the first born) and Perez. As Num. 26:19-22 and 1 Chron. 2:3-4 indicate, Judah's three surviving sons (Shelah, Zerah, and Perez) become the progenitors of the most important clans of the tribe of Judah.

The descent of David from Tamar's younger son Perez is recorded in the genealogy in Ruth 4:18-22. In the NT, Perez makes an appearance in both genealogies of Jesus (Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33). More surprising is the appearance of Tamar in the Matthean genealogy, along with three other OT women: Rahab, Ruth, and "Uriah's wife" (Matt. 1:3-6). Not only is the presence of women in a genealogical list unexpected; in each case there is something unusual or irregular in their marital unions. In Matthew's view, each of these women becomes a part of the divine plan in continuing the line in which the Messiah will be born of Mary, whose pregnancy could be viewed as irregular or scandalous because she had not yet come to live with her husband (Matt. 1:18). Tamar is one of the many women in the OT who show initiative within a patriarchal world.

The connections of the Judah-Tamar story with its context are multiple. First, there are several noteworthy contacts with the Jacob cycle: the birth of twins who struggle during delivery for the status of being the first born (Gen. 25:19-26); the choice of the younger twin to play an important part in the divine plan; a deception by disguise that involves a kid (27:9-16); Isaac's nonrecognition of Jacob, using the same verb in 27:23 that occurs in 37:32-33 and 38:25-26.

With the Joseph narrative, the Judah-Tamar story shares such elements as the failure to recognize a family member (38:15; 42:8); a deception involving a kid and a means of identification (37:31; 38:17-18); the words of Jacob's sons ("recognize this garment") in 37:32 paralleled by Tamar's ("recognize to whom these belong") in 38:25. And Judah's recognition of his seal and staff (v. 26) recalls Jacob's recognition of Joseph's garment (37:33). In view of such links, one can conclude that while chap. 38 does interrupt the Joseph narrative, its multiple contextual connections nicely explain its placement.

39:1-41:57

Joseph in Egypt

This story-within-a-story deals with Joseph's career in Egypt from his descent as a slave in the power of others to his rise to a position of authority and power second only to Pharaoh's. The narrative that begins with Joseph being brought down to Egypt (39:1) will end with the whole world going down to Egypt (41:57), a movement that will include Joseph's brothers as well (42:2-3).

39:1-23, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife. The narrative skill that was evident in chap. 37 continues in the superbly told story of Joseph in Potiphar's house. The beginning of the story in v. 1 recalls 37:28, 36. The descent motif is mentioned twice in 39:1 ("Joseph was brought down to Egypt . . . the Ishmaelites who brought him down there"). Verses 2-3 introduce two of the major themes of the Joseph narrative: divine providence ("Yahweh was with Joseph"—vv. 2, 3, 21, 23) and the success of the unpromising (vv. 2-3, 23). The divine presence and Joseph's success in vv. 2-3 and 21-23 form an envelope around the chapter. But in both instances these assertions stand in contrast to Joseph's actual situation: he is a slave in Potiphar's house and a prisoner in Pharaoh's jail. Another important theme of both J and the Joseph story is the blessing that comes upon Gentiles through association with a descendant of Abraham (cf. 30:27-30), a theme that will be heard again in chap. 41 when Joseph's administration of Egypt's grain supplies brings prosperity and abundance.

Attention should be paid to a motif that will be employed throughout chap. 39. It occurs first in v. 1, where we learn that "Potiphar . . . bought [Joseph] from the hand of the Ishmaelites." From this neutral beginning, the motif of the hand is developed both positively (as a benefit to Joseph) and negatively (as a danger to him). In its positive development, when Joseph's master saw that whatever Joseph did prospered "in his hand" (v. 3), he put all his possessions "in his/Joseph's hand" (vv. 4, 6). The motif takes a negative turn in the story of the attempted seduction of Joseph, the handsome young slave, by Potiphar's wife (vv. 7-20). Her invitation is peremptory and blunt: "Lie with me!" (vv. 7, 12). In his refusal, Joseph speaks of the trust of his master who put everything "in my hand" (v. 8) and steadfastly refuses to commit this sin. In the present form of the text, which includes chap. 38, there is an effective contrast between Judah's questionable liaison with Tamar and Joseph's refusal of such with Potiphar's wife. There is also a contrast between the woman whose boldness preserves family continuity (Tamar) and the woman whose boldness betrays her marriage (Potiphar's wife).

When Joseph continues to rebuff her advances, Potiphar's wife abruptly replaces words with action, taking hold of Joseph by grabbing his cloak, which he leaves behind as he flees. Having failed to seduce him, she vindictively charges Joseph with attempted rape. Evidence of the crime will be the garment of Joseph, which she has "in her hand" (vv. 12, 13). In her accusation made first to the servants (vv. 14-15), the spurned seductress is careful to place the blame for the trouble on her husband ("He brought to us a Hebrew slave"). The reference to Joseph as a Hebrew may be a clever attempt to stir up xenophobic animosity on the part of the other servants toward the foreigner to whom the master had entrusted the management of his house. In repeating the charge to her husband (vv. 17-18), she places the blame squarely on Joseph ("The Hebrew slave whom you brought here broke in"). In both versions of the charge, there is a subtle but telling change. As she tells her story to servants and husband, she does not speak of Joseph's garment as "in her hand" but as "beside her" (vv. 15, 16, 18). In this way she directs suspicion away from herself by suggesting that Joseph disrobed, in preparation for rape. The story ends as it began. After being imprisoned by the deceived and angry Potiphar, Joseph is still blessed with the divine presence and with success. He finds favor in the eyes of the chief jailer (v. 21), who puts all the prisoners and all the activity of the prison "in the hand of Joseph" (v. 22).

In the introductory remarks to the Joseph narrative, we considered the suggestion by several scholars that wisdom thought had considerable impact on the narrative about and the characterization of Joseph. Such influence is not unlikely, given the setting in which wisdom flourished and in which the Joseph novella may have been composed—Solomon's court, in the tenth century. Indeed the parallels between Joseph and Solomon, the patron of wisdom, are several: both were sons of a best-loved wife who was not the father's first; both had older brothers; for both, dreams were important; and both married wives given them by Pharaoh. While wisdom influence is strongest in Genesis 40–41, Joseph's refusal to cuckold Potiphar by dalliance with his wife is in keeping with the warnings against adultery in such wisdom literature as Proverbs 5–7, ascribed to Solomon.

Attentive readers of Genesis 39 may have heard in it echoes of chap. 37. Both involve preferential treatment of a youth by a superior that leads to trouble; in both, an act of deception is accomplished by means of a garment. As in chap. 37, the language of visual perception is frequent in chap. 39. In v. 3, Joseph's master saw that Yahweh was with him, and in v. 4 Joseph finds favor in his master's eyes. Verse 6 describes Joseph as good looking; and in v. 7, Potiphar's wife raises her eyes to Joseph. In v. 13 she sees that Joseph has left behind his garment in her hand, and in v. 14 her first word to the other servants is "See!" Finally, Joseph's management of affairs in the prison meant that the jailer did not have to attend to ("see") whatever was in his charge.

Genesis 39 points not only back to chap. 37, but forward to chap. 42. Like Genesis 39, chap. 42 involves a deception (42:7), vilification, and a false charge by someone in a position of power (42:9–17) that lead to imprisonment (42:16, 29). This last connection is reinforced by the verbal link of "prisoners" (lit., "the ones who are bound") in 39:20, 22, and the verbal forms of the same root in 42:16 ("You will be imprisoned") and 42:24 ("He bound Simeon before their eyes").

---

Women in Genesis

Since Genesis 39 contains the last extended narrative about a woman in Genesis, this is an appropriate place to survey the treatment of women in the book. Interest in the women of the Bible and in their roles and status has been advanced by the recent advent of feminist biblical interpretation.

Women and Men. The starting point for any survey of women in Genesis is the recognition that the OT does not think primarily in terms of atomized individuals, but in terms of families, tribes, and clans. Lifelong celibacy seems to have been unknown, childlessness was, for men as for women, a grievous burden, and among the chief glories of God was his provision of family structures for those lacking these (e.g., Pss. 68:6; 113:9). As wife and mother, a woman played an important economic role and could earn great honor (see Prov. 31:10–31). A man, on the other hand, could play a role in the important public realm, in the public worship, for example, or the army or the government, and it was through the father that the key tribal and familial identities were transmitted.

A woman in biblical society passed from the authority of her father to that of her husband; women were thus dependent on their fathers before marriage and on their husbands after. A married woman's sexuality was the exclusive property of her husband, and therefore adultery by the wife was considered in the OT a crime of the greatest magnitude, an offense against the husband, and a challenge to the authority he exercised over his property. The double standard is evident in the fact that polygamy and concubinage were permissible, allowing the male more than one sexual partner.

Women and Children. As mother, the woman was to be chiefly involved in childbearing and childrearing. The greatest threat to the security of a woman was sterility, her inability to fulfill her conjugal obligation of providing her husband with children, especially with sons. A childless woman was cut off, as well, from the only position of honor and status generally available to women and the only legitimate authority that could be exercised by a woman over another person (her child). Divorce was the prerogative of the husband; barrenness as well as adultery were probably both considered sufficient reasons for divorce. The situation of a woman divorced by her husband for childlessness was desperate in the extreme, since no source of security from husband or male offspring was available to her. Against this background one can begin to understand the anguish and urgency of the barren women in Genesis (Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel). In this context, the action of God in removing barrenness and giving sons to a woman can be seen as preserving not only the family line but the life and security of the woman.

While the OT literature, including Genesis, may today suggest the secondary and inferior status of women, there is another avenue that can lead to greater understanding of the elusive female roles and experience in Israel. Sophisticated archaeological research and the interpretation of the new data derived from archaeology by analytical tools from the social sciences provide this new avenue behind and through the literature to the society that produced it.

In premonarchical Israel of the settlement period, as in all human society, there was a basic division of labor between the specifically male role of protection (defense and warfare) and the female role of procreation (childbearing and childrearing). The third essential task of production (such subsistence activities as land clearing, home building, the production of food and clothing) was a role that could be shared by men and women. In pioneer or frontier societies, the greater the contribution of women to subsistence and production activities, the higher her status. An approximately equal share by women in such tasks gives them a position approaching equality.

While in normal circumstances an increase in the participation of women in production was accompanied by a decrease in reproduction, such was not possible in early Israel given the demographic crisis of underpopulation in Syro-Palestine at the end of the Late Bronze Age (1500–1200 B.C.); hence, the emphasis on reproduction, confirmed in the divine command in Genesis to “increase and multiply” (1:28; 9:1). The threats to this imperative were several: a high rate of infant mortality; a mortality rate for childbearing females higher than that for males of similar age (Gen. 35:16–19); losses by death and captivity in warfare; and epidemic disease, which took its greatest toll in the preadult population and in the oldest adults.

According to one interpreter, the role of women in both childbearing and in subsistence tasks is reflected in Gen. 3:16, properly understood. Modern translations typically obscure this (e.g., RSV: “I shall multiply your pain in childbearing; in pain you shall bring forth children”). The word translated “pain” means in every other occurrence “toil, hard work, physical labor”; nowhere does it refer to the “labor” of childbirth. Accordingly, a more accurate translation would be: “I will greatly increase your toil [i.e., the participation of women in production and subsistence tasks] and your pregnancies [reproduction]. Along with your toil you shall bring forth children.” In this view, Gen. 3:16 reflects an era and a society in which women had a high degree of participation in subsistence activities (particularly hoe agriculture), with no diminution of their reproductive roles (Gen. 1:28), because of the need for large families to repopulate and thus claim an area and to produce more workers for the tasks of food production and the like. If this analysis is correct, Gen. 3:16 may have its point of origin in the settlement period of the end of the Late Bronze Age and the beginning of the Early Iron Age.

The Primal Woman. Having provided this background on the roles and status of women in the OT, we can turn now to a discussion of the women who appear in Genesis. The first to be encountered is the woman created in the P account in Genesis 1. While Gen. 1:27–28 has been understood by some as a basis for the equality of the sexes, a more recent analysis has questioned this as inappropriate for P, which elsewhere presumes the patriarchal structures that 1:27–28 has been taken to question (e.g., the P genealogies that trace the descent through the male, circumcision as the sign of the divine covenant with humanity, etc.). Rather, Gen. 1:27–28 speaks of sexual differentiation as part of the created order in which God has placed the power of fertility, of replenishment and continuation. It is true that the task of the human species is dominion over the rest of the creation; but the representative of the species is the male, typically described in terms of such male concerns as dominion and rule. The second creation account (J) speaks of the creation of woman as one party in a partnership of equals, an equality suggested by the description of the man’s need for a “helping counterpart” (2:20) and by the assertion that the woman is of the same stuff as the man (2:21–23). The creation of the man at the beginning of the J creation story and of the woman at its end is an example of the literary device of inclusion and not a basis for the subordination of woman. It is only after the sin of Genesis 3 that the divinely intended relationship of a partnership of equals is disrupted.

The roles that the primal woman experiences are typically wife (2:23–24) and mother (4:1–2, 25). Some have understood her as seductress as well, in her giving her husband the forbidden fruit (3:6); it is more likely that this gesture is not seduction but the woman’s role of meal preparation in which the man accepts the food presented to him by his wife.

The Family Stories. Stories in which women play an important part occur with some frequency in the family stories that make up the bulk of Genesis 12–50. The first of these stories (12:10–20, with its parallels in chaps. 20 and 26) is a good illustration of the OT view of the woman as subject to her husband. Only divine intervention protects the ancestress and with her the promise of offspring, a promise endangered by the patriarch. The situation is reversed in chap. 16, where it is Sarai who manages the situation by proposing a plan for offspring, while Abram is the passive figure. This is the first of a number of stories in Genesis (and elsewhere in the OT) that deal with resourceful women. Even in this story the androcentric bias prevails; the emphasis on male issue is an indication of the power of androcentrism even in stories in which women are the main actors.

We meet another impressive woman, Hagar, the Egyptian maid of Sarah, in chaps. 16 and 21, stories of family discord. Perceived as a threat to Sarah’s status as primary wife, Hagar is abused by her mistress and flees. Hagar is the first person in the Bible to be confronted by “the messenger of Yahweh” (16:7) and the only woman to whom the Deity promises numerous progeny (16:10). She is driven out in chap. 21 when her son Ishmael is perceived as a threat to Sarah’s son Isaac; again she is addressed by “the messenger of Elohim” (21:17). The strife between wives will recur in chap. 30 and as part of the larger theme of strife within the family. Sarah and Hagar are both victims of a patriarchal system that gives a woman honor and status only if she can give her husband male offspring.

The stories interposed between chaps. 16 and 21 relate the promise of a son to Sarah (chaps. 17-18) and Lot's hospitality to his angelic visitors (chap. 19). A father's authority over his children is the unstated assumption of Lot's exposure of his daughters to danger. But the tables are turned when the inebriated Lot is himself made a sexual object by his daughters, two more of the resourceful women in Genesis. Twice in these stories of Abraham and Sarah and of Lot and his family, there are revealing details that speak indirectly of the inferior status of women. First of all, note the different divine reactions to the laughter of the ancestors: in 17:17 Abraham's laughter, provoked by the promise of a child to an old couple, is passed over in silence, while in 18:12-15 Sarah's laughter at the same divine promise earns her a sharp rebuke from the Deity. Second, Lot's indecision about leaving the doomed Sodom provokes the compassion of Yahweh (19:16), while his wife's similar indecision brings upon her divine judgment (19:26).

In the stories that feature Rebekah (chaps. 24-27), the ancestress will replicate the journey of Abraham to Canaan; she too will leave her kin and her father's house (24:39-40) to become the mother of Jacob. Significantly, her call comes not from God (12:1) but from Abraham. Genesis 26 and 27 neatly balance one another; in chap. 26 Isaac is the deceiver in a deception involving his wife, while in chap. 27 Isaac is deceived by a plan devised by his resourceful wife.

Like Genesis 16 and 21, chaps. 29-33 are stories of strife in the family, the discord between Jacob's wives, the unloved and fertile Leah and the beloved and barren Rachel. As in the Sarah-Hagar stories, both Rachel and Leah give their maids to Jacob for substitute child-bearing (note the parallelism of 16:2 and 30:3). Rachel and Leah are important in these stories not as individuals but as maternal links in the patriarchal chain, intent on providing sons for their husband and survival for the clan.

In the story of the rape of Dinah (chap. 34), the narrative focuses on the negotiations between Abraham and the rapist's father, Hamor, and the vengeance of Dinah's brothers on Shechem and Hamor. Dinah's voice is never heard amid all these male activities. In chap. 38, Tamar the childless widow acts with initiative and resourcefulness to assure children for herself and, once more, continuation for the family. Hers is a story about the precarious situation of a woman with neither husband nor sons and about the double standard that allows a man more than one sexual partner without negative judgment. The final story in which a woman figures as a principal character is chap. 39, the attempted seduction of Joseph by Potiphar's wife. These final three stories about women in Genesis act as a counterpoint to the stories of the patriarchs' mothers and wives; they are stories of sexuality (rape, assumed prostitution, seduction) not in the service of procreation in obedience to the divine command to "increase and multiply" in Gen. 1:28 (→ Women).

40:1-23, Joseph the Interpreter of Dreams. In chaps. 40-41, our attention is directed to Joseph's divinely given knowledge of the future, as he decodes the dreams of his fellow captives. In chaps. 42-43, when the sons of Jacob are before their unrecognized brother Joseph, the focus is shifted to Joseph's experiential knowledge of the past. The two dreams of Pharaoh's officials remind readers of the dreams of Joseph in chap. 37 that brought about his move to Egypt; they also prepare for the two dreams of Pharaoh in Genesis 41. In chaps. 40-41 it is not Joseph the dreamer but Joseph the interpreter of dreams who is the narrator's concern.

Gen. 40:1-4 introduces the characters involved in the story: the royal cupbearer and chief baker, imprisoned for some unspecified offense; Pharaoh; and Joseph. In v. 3 Joseph is described as "imprisoned" (lit., "the one who is bound"); the same word is used to describe the situation of the two royal officials and to link chap. 40 to chap. 39, where "bound" appears in vv. 20 and 22. In 40:7 Joseph asks his fellow prisoners, "Why are your faces gloomy?" (the same question occurs in Neh. 2:2, a passage that also deals with a royal cupbearer). When he learns of their dreams and of their inability to understand, he announces that "interpretation belongs to God" (Gen. 40:8), an assertion that he will repeat to the Pharaoh in 41:16.

Because of their obscurity, the dreams of the two officials differ from those of Joseph with their more transparent symbolism. After the recounting of the dreams, Joseph tells the royal officials what they mean: in both cases they predict that "Pharaoh will lift up your head" (vv. 13, 19). In the case of the cupbearer, the expression means that Pharaoh will pardon him. The more normal expression for such an act of mercy is to "lift up the face" (of one prostrate before the king), which occurs, for instance, in 19:21 and 32:20. The variant and unusual expression "lift up the head" is used to produce the parallelism of the interpretation. In the case of the baker too, Pharaoh will lift up his head in an act not of pardon, but of decapitation.

In v. 14, Joseph appeals to the soon-to-be-released cupbearer that he remember Joseph and try to gain his release; but at the end of chap. 40, Joseph is still imprisoned, forgotten by the court official whose release he had predicted. At this low point in the story, Joseph's ability to interpret dreams reminds the reader that Yahweh is still with Joseph. And hope begins to dawn in the realization that dreams can become reality and that the Egyptian monarch can act mercifully toward Joseph as he did toward his cupbearer.

The motifs that occur in the Joseph story (descent, being forgotten, and the hope for ultimate restoration) appear in several of the lament and thanksgiving psalms. Psalm 30 is particularly interesting for the number of thematic and verbal associations it has with the Joseph story. Compare Ps. 30:8 ("to you, Yahweh, I cry out; you, O Lord, I beg for mercy") and Gen. 42:21 ("when he [Joseph] begged for mercy"); Ps. 30:9 ("What profit is there in my blood, in my going down into the pit?") and Gen. 37:26 ("What profit is there in killing my brother and concealing his blood?"). Ps. 30:3 ("O Yahweh, you brought my soul up from the nether world; you preserved my life from among those going down into the pit") could stand as a summary of the descent-ascent movement of the whole Joseph story. Such parallels remind readers that Joseph's descent into Egypt is like a descent into Sheol; and similarly, Israel's departure from Egypt in Exodus is its emergence from the world of the dead.

41:1-57, Joseph and Pharaoh's Dreams.

Chap. 40 ended with Joseph still in prison. Despite his success in interpreting the cupbearer's dream and his appeal ("remember me . . . and mention me to Pharaoh"), the chapter ends with the note that the cupbearer "did not remember Joseph but forgot him" (v. 23). Joseph's situation will begin to change when Pharaoh's dreams cause the released courtier to remember him. Genesis 37-40 traced the descent of Joseph into cistern, Egypt, and finally prison. That these are three stages of a single downward movement is implied not only by the use of the same word (Heb. bor, "pit") for cistern (Gen. 37:20, 22, 28, 29) and dungeon (40:15; 41:14) but also by the use of the same verb to describe the brothers "throwing" Joseph into the cistern (37:20, 22, 24) and Potiphar "throwing" Joseph into prison (39:20). Chap. 41 begins the account of his ascent to a position of power and preeminence in Egypt. The event that brings about this reversal is Pharaoh's two troubling dreams, in which seven healthy cows are devoured by seven others, scrawny and ugly in appearance, and in which seven healthy ears of grain are swallowed up by seven others, thin and blasted by the east wind (vv. 1-7).

Pharaoh's dreams recall Joseph's in chap. 37 in several ways. First of all, the Pharaoh has two dreams that, like Joseph's, make the same point. Further, the underlying meaning of the dreams of Joseph and of the Pharaoh is the same: the weaker and inferior (Joseph, the gaunt cattle, and thin ears of grain) will dominate the stronger (Joseph's brothers, healthy cattle, and the good ears of grain). When Pharaoh's magicians and sages are unable to interpret the dreams, the royal cupbearer remembers Joseph and his skill in dream interpretation and speaks of him to Pharaoh (41:8-13). The failure of the king's counselors to interpret the dreams may involve an implicit critique of the gods of Egypt; neither they nor their devotees can interpret dreams that predict the future (cf. Isa. 41:22-23). This critique will become explicit in Exodus 7-8: in 7:11 the Pharaoh summons his "sages and sorcerers . . . magicians of Egypt," and, while in 7:12, 22, and 8:7 they can replicate the signs that Moses and Aaron perform, they are defeated in 8:18.

The summoning of Joseph to Pharaoh in Gen. 41:14 is the first step of the change of his status and fortunes, symbolized by the change of his prison clothing (cf. 2 Kings 25:29). As in 40:8, Joseph attributes his success in dream interpretation to God (41:16). The double recounting of the dreams in third-person narrative in vv. 1-7 and again in first person in vv. 17-24 is typical of Hebrew narrative art (Gen. 42:9-20, 30-34). Joseph not only interprets the dreams as predictions of seven years of abundance followed by seven years of famine (41:28-32); he also suggests a policy to deal with the future (vv. 33-36). Impressed by his sagacity, Pharaoh appoints him prime minister (vv. 39-40), and Joseph's wisdom is shown in his effective management of Egypt's food supplies (vv. 46-50).

Just as Joseph was stripped of his distinctive garment at the beginning of his descent (37:23), so his elevation is symbolized by an investiture with a fine linen garment (41:42). This is the fourth reference to the unifying theme of Joseph's garments, two of which are connected to his descent (37:23-33; 39:13-18) and two with his elevation (41:14, 42).

Joseph, like Solomon, marries a wife given him by Pharaoh (41:45). The birth and naming of his two sons are reported in vv. 51-53. These names summarize the whole Joseph story: the name Manasseh (understood by a folk etymology to be connected to Heb. nashah, "forget"), points back to the beginning of the Joseph story ("God has made me forget my trouble and the house of my father"); and the name Ephraim (linked to Heb. parah, "be fruitful") points forward to the end of the Joseph story ("God has made me fruitful in the land of my oppression"). In Exod. 1:7, 11-12, it is Israel's prolific fruitfulness that brings upon them oppression by the Pharaoh "who knew not Joseph."

There are several noteworthy features shared by Genesis 40-41 and Daniel. In Gen. 40:12, 18, Joseph begins his explanation of the two dreams of his fellow prisoners with the words "This is its interpretation," a statement echoed in Dan. 2:36; 4:2. The God-given ability to interpret dreams that Joseph demonstrates (40:8; 41:16) is characteristic as well of Daniel, who is also portrayed as an Israelite serving in a foreign court (Dan. 1:3–6; 2:23, 28, 47; 4:8–9, 18; 5:13–14). The inability of the monarch's magicians to explain the dream (Gen. 41:8) appears as well in Dan. 2:7–13; 4:6–7; 5:8. The reference in Gen. 41:8 to Pharaoh's agitation and troubled mind uses a rare Hebrew verb (only five occurrences in the OT) that appears twice in a similar context, the disturbance of Nebuchadnezzar because of a dream (Dan. 2:1, 3). Finally, in both the Joseph story and Daniel, the dream interpreter is honored by the king, who recognizes the God of the interpreter (Gen. 41:38–39; Dan. 2:46–49). That the book of Daniel drew on the Joseph story for the portrayal of its hero is significant, given the identification of Daniel as a wisdom figure in Ezek. 28:3. Apparently even in antiquity the wisdom character of the Joseph novella was recognized by the authors of Daniel; modern scholarship has only rediscovered it.

---

Dreams in Genesis

The dreams in Genesis, and in the OT generally, are understood as modes of divine communication to humans and are of two types: message dreams, in which the divine communication is auditory and understood with no need for an interpreter (as in chap. 20), and symbolic dreams, in which the divine communication is visual in symbols not immediately clear in meaning and which therefore need interpretation by the dreamer, the Deity, or by a "specialist" (as in chaps. 40–41).

The dreams in Genesis are sent to the patriarchs (including Joseph) and to several other characters in the narrative. Although there is no specific reference to a dream, chap. 15 has been understood by some interpreters as a report of a dream. The designation of the experience as a "vision" (15:1) taking place at night and involving sleep (15:5, 12) may point in that direction. If this understanding is correct, then Genesis 15 would be a symbolic dream, the interpretation of which is given by God. Gen. 26:24 may also be an abbreviated report of a message dream of Isaac, involving, as it does, a theophany at night.

The first explicit reference to a patriarchal dream in Genesis is that of Jacob in 28:1–15. It is clearly a symbolic dream that is, again, interpreted by the Deity. Some interpreters have understood this episode to concern an incubation rite in which one sleeps in a shrine in the hope of receiving a divine communication in a dream (Gen. 28:16–19; 1 Kings 3:5–15). In the Jacob-Laban novella, the patriarch relates to his wives a symbolic dream he received (Gen. 31:10–13). And the final divine communication to Jacob in 46:2–4 may also be a dream, given the reference to a vision at night. The two dreams of Joseph (37:5–11) are visual, but their point is so clear that no interpreter is needed.

Besides these patriarchal dreams, four other instances should be considered in which divine communications by dreams come to non-Hebrews: Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gen. 20:3–7), and Laban, Jacob's Aramean relative (31:24), both receive message dreams in which they are instructed not to harm the patriarch or his family. The other two pairs of dreams to non-Hebrew characters are those of the imprisoned cupbearer and baker (40:5–19) and those of the Pharaoh (41:1–7, 15–24). These are all symbolic dreams for whom Joseph serves as the interpreting specialist.

In classical source criticism, dreams were considered to be a characteristic of the Elohist source (E). According to this hypothesis, this northern source from the ninth century B.C. focused on the transcendence of the Deity and thus viewed dreams as the appropriate means of divine communication to humans in contrast to the anthropomorphic divine messages in J. The frequency and ubiquity of dreams in the OT and in the ancient Near East, however, have cast some doubt on whether this traditional association of dreams with E can be sustained (→ Magic and Divination).

---

42:1–45:28

From Enmity to Reconciliation

The angry question of Joseph's brothers in 37:8 ("Will you be king over us and rule us?") begins to be answered in chap. 41 with the elevation of Joseph to the position of vizier. First introduced in the narrative as a shepherd (37:2), Joseph has been raised to a position second only to that of Pharaoh. The dreams that become reality in chaps. 40–41 prepare readers for the realization of Joseph's dreams in regard to his brothers. Their arrival in Egypt is forecast in 41:57 ("All the world came to Egypt, to Joseph, to purchase grain, so severe was the famine in the whole world").

42:1–38, Joseph's First Meeting with His Brothers. Genesis 42 is the dramatic high-point of the Joseph story in its portrayal of the initial meeting of Joseph and his brothers after their long separation. In this account, the brothers remain unaware that the Egyptian official is Joseph, the brother they presume to be dead, just as they are unaware of the deeper meaning of some of the statements they make. As mentioned above, 41:57 sets the scene by noting that famine had brought "the whole world" to Egypt, and among those who journey there to procure food is the family of Jacob. For the first time since 37:1-4 we meet in 42:1-5 all the principals, described in both filial and fraternal terms. In 42:1-3 the order of appearance is "Jacob . . . his sons . . . the brothers of Joseph"; in vv. 4-5, the sequence (in the Heb. text) is "Benjamin the brother of Joseph . . . Jacob . . . his brothers . . . sons of Israel." Several observations can be made about this sequence. First of all, vv. 1-3 reverse the order of appearance of the characters in 37:1-2 ("Jacob . . . Joseph . . . his brothers") and 37:3 ("Israel . . . Joseph . . . his sons"). Gen. 42:4-5, on the other hand, begins with "Benjamin the brother of Joseph," so that even the word order focuses attention on the special relationship between the favored youngest son and Jacob his father. Finally, we are reminded of the first of Joseph's dreams, in which his brothers' sheaves surround him; in 42:1-5 the order of appearance of the characters is "Benjamin the brother of Joseph" (v. 4) in the center of a frame formed by "his [Jacob's] sons" and "the brothers of Joseph" in vv. 1-3 and by "his brothers" and "the sons of Israel" in vv. 4-5. This "surrounding" of the full brother of Joseph may allude to the fulfillment of the first dream, a fulfillment made explicit in v. 6, when "the brothers of Jacob came and prostrated before him" (as predicted in 37:7).

In noting that Jacob did not send his youngest son, Benjamin, on the dangerous journey to Egypt, 42:4 portrays Jacob as repeating with Benjamin the same mistake that led to the division of his family. In vv. 6-17, when Joseph recognizes his brothers as they prostrate before him (as they will again in 43:26, 28; 44:14; 50:18), the narrator tells readers in an aside that "Joseph remembered the dreams" (v. 9). Joseph's concealment of his identity and the nonrecognition of him by his brothers vividly suggest the gulf separating them, a distance reinforced by Joseph's harsh questions and accusations. The brothers who hated Joseph "because of his dreams and his words" (37:8) now have reason to fear the realized dreams and the threatening words of their angry, unrecognized brother. In the discussion of chap. 39, it was pointed out that Joseph's experience of being falsely accused and imprisoned is now to be his brothers'; with roles reversed, they too will come to know what it means to be helpless and threatened with death by someone hostile and more powerful.

The brothers' response to this unexpected turn of events is appropriately couched in the language of court style and diplomacy ("my lord" in 42:10, "your servants" in vv. 10, 11, 13). On a deeper level, in their use of the diplomatic master-servant language, Joseph's brothers are brought unconsciously to an admission of the truth of Joseph's dreams of superiority. One part of the response of the brothers to the charge of spying seems at first to be irrelevant (v. 13: "We are twelve brothers, sons of the same man"). While their answer may suggest their bewilderment and confusion at the unexpected charge, it has as well an ironic function, in that their words to Joseph ("we . . . all of us") unwittingly include him among the sons of Jacob; this reference to "twelve brothers" raises the possibility of a restoration of fraternal bonds.

The brothers' first reference to Joseph is the neutral "and one is no more" (v. 13), echoing Reuben's cry of dismay in 37:30 and pointing ahead to Jacob's words in 42:36. At their mention of the youngest son still at home, Joseph demands that he be brought to Egypt by one of the brothers while the rest remain incarcerated. Joseph's demand for Benjamin may be his attempt to discover whether his murderous brothers have again acted against a favored son. In vv. 18-26, Joseph reverses his original threat by imprisoning Simeon and releasing the others to return home with food and to return with Benjamin. Simeon is chosen as a hostage because he is Leah's second son (29:33), who will be imprisoned until the arrival of Rachel's second son (35:18). The brothers do not realize that Joseph can understand them since Joseph had been using an interpreter; along with the harsh questions and accusations, this detail effectively reminds readers of the earlier breakdown in communication between Joseph and his brothers (37:4).

In the incarceration of Simeon, Joseph reconstructs the circumstances of the crime of the brothers against him. The question posed by this first test is: will the brothers abandon Simeon as they did Joseph? Joseph's request that the brothers bring Benjamin to him is the second test; how will the brothers react to the suggestion that Rachel's remaining son follow his older brother into Egypt? As Joseph listens, the brothers relate their fate to their old crime (v. 21: "We are being punished on account of our brother"). And as if by the law of talion ("an eye for an eye"), the remembered anguish of Joseph as he pleaded for mercy brings anguish upon them (→ Retribution). After weeping (as he will in 43:30 when he sees Benjamin and in 45:2 at the reconciliation), Joseph addresses his final words in this chapter to his brothers (42:34: "I will give back your brother to you"). This statement is intentionally ambiguous; while the brothers with their limited awareness understand it to be about Simeon, the brother restored is also Joseph himself.

The return of the brothers to their father, without Simeon but with the money they had brought to pay for grain, recalls Joseph's imprisonment in the cistern and the money paid for him by the Ishmaelites (37:28). The double discovery by the brothers of the money that Joseph has secretly placed in the grain sacks is one of the standard pieces of evidence for sources in the Joseph story. And it is not the only doublet in chap. 42. Others include Jacob's two addresses to his sons in vv. 1-2 ("he said" occurs twice, followed in the first instance by Jacob's question to his sons and in the second by his relating of information: "I have heard"). In vv. 3-5 the arrival of the brothers in Egypt is recounted twice ("They went down . . . they came"). Twice Joseph is said to recognize his brothers (vv. 7-8), and twice he accuses them of spying (vv. 9, 14). Most strikingly, in the instance under discussion, one brother discovers the money in his grain sack on the return journey (vv. 27-28), and all the brothers make the same discovery after they return home (v. 35). All but this last instance can be explained without recourse to sources as repetitions for emphasis; and, if this is so, then the remaining instance of the double discovery of the money is probably to be explained as an expansion (similar to the Midianite expansion in 37:28, 36).

The two adjacent scenes of the brothers before Joseph (vv. 6-20) and before Jacob (vv. 29-38) are similarly structured: the brothers appear before a relative (Joseph; Jacob) with an expected brother (Benjamin; Simeon) missing. Jacob responds to the news of this second missing son with a lament similar to that over Joseph in 37:33-35. Jacob's words form an inclusion with the beginning of the chapter: the descent of the brothers to Egypt (42:2-3) will bring about the descent of Jacob to the nether world (v. 38); and as Jacob refused to send Benjamin to Egypt (v. 4), so now he vehemently repeats that refusal (v. 38), giving the remarkably insensitive reason that, since Joseph is gone, Benjamin alone is left, as if the sons of Leah simply didn't matter! Reuben's words in v. 37 ("Put him [Benjamin] in my hands, and I will bring him back") recall 37:22, where Reuben intended to save Joseph "from their hands and bring him to his father."

Like Genesis 37, chap. 42 uses with frequency the language of seeing. In v. 1, Jacob sees his sons, who look at one another; in v. 7, Joseph sees his brothers and charges them, in vv. 9 and 12, with coming to see the land. In v. 21, the brothers remember how they saw the anguish of Joseph; in v. 24, Simeon is bound "before their eyes." And in vv. 27 and 35, they see the money in their sacks.

43:1-34, The Second Trip to Egypt. The pattern of pairs in the Joseph story (the dreams of Joseph, his fellow prisoners, and Pharaoh; Joseph's being thrown into cistern and dungeon [both Heb. bor]) is complemented by a pair of journeys by the brothers to Egypt. In Genesis 43-44, Judah replaces Reuben as spokesman to Jacob and to the Pharaoh for his brothers—not a surprising change after the foolish speech of Reuben in 42:37 in which he says that Jacob can kill Reuben's two sons if Benjamin does not return safely! In 43:3, Judah reminds his father of the necessity of bringing Benjamin if they are to return to Egypt for more food. In answering Jacob's question about why they told the Egyptian about Benjamin (v. 6), Judah's version of the interrogation is somewhat different from the dialogue in chap. 42 in which they volunteered the information about a brother still at home. Judah's claim (43:7) that the Egyptian official asked them about Benjamin is another instance of the deception of Jacob by his sons (37:31-32).

The instructions of Jacob in vv. 11-12 are meant to remind readers of the description of the Ishmaelite caravan to whom Joseph was sold (37:25-28). Joseph's brothers are themselves to repeat that caravan journey, bringing with them the same gifts (gum, balm, resin) and Benjamin, the other son of Rachel. In chap. 37, a brother (Joseph) leaves home to join his brothers and ends up in a caravan to Egypt; in chap. 43, the brothers leave home in a caravan to rescue a brother (Simeon) in Egypt and find Joseph as well when he reveals himself to them (45:3-4).

Upon their arrival in Egypt, the brothers are brought to Joseph's house, fearful that they will be taken as slaves (as Joseph was) because of the money they discovered in their sacks. Joseph's steward stills their apprehension and releases Simeon to them. In their meeting with Joseph, they repeat the prostration (vv. 26, 28). Joseph "inquired after their peace" (v. 27), just as Jacob had instructed Joseph to do in 37:14. As Joseph wept at the first meeting with his brothers (42:24), he does so again upon seeing Benjamin (43:30). At the meal that follows, the apprehensive brothers are surprised at Joseph's knowledge of their ages, in his seating arrangements for the feast. The meal effectively recalls the meal at which the brothers callously discussed Joseph's fate (37:25); the meal served separately to Joseph (43:32) is not only an Egyptian custom, but a reminder that reconciliation has not yet been effected. The reference to the brothers seated "before Joseph's face" (v. 33) and his sending of portions of food to them "from his face" (v. 34) forms an inclusion with the references to Joseph's face in vv. 3 and 5 ("You shall not see my face unless your brother is with you").

44:1-34, The Final Test and Judah's Speech. Two scenes make up chap. 44. The first (vv. 1-13) comprises the brothers' departure with Joseph's goblet, their pursuit and accusation by Joseph's steward, and their discovery of the goblet. The second scene includes their return to Joseph's house and Judah's great speech.

As in Genesis 42, Joseph instructs his majordomo to hide the brothers' money in their sacks, adding to Benjamin's sack Joseph's diviner cup. This silver vessel, used in foretelling the future, recalls Joseph's predictive dreams about the future, dreams that provoked his brothers into selling him for silver. Also recalled is the theft and concealment by Rachel of Laban's household gods without Jacob's knowledge (31:19-35); now it is her son Benjamin who is similarly accused of stealing and concealing a sacred object. The brothers respond to this new and unsettling development with protestations of their innocence (44:6-8) and an oath that condemns to death anyone guilty of this theft (v. 9). Their aggrieved response to the steward is similar to Jacob's oath to Laban that if anyone in his party has Laban's gods "that one shall not live" (31:32; cf. 35:17-19). At the discovery of the cup in Benjamin's sack, the brothers express their anguish by tearing their garments (as the innocent Reuben and Jacob did in 37:29, 34). Benjamin, singled out for special honor in 43:34, is now singled out for death. Judah's words to Joseph in v. 16 ("God has discovered the guilt of your servant") is not only a confession of their crime against Joseph, but also a reminiscence of similar statements by the brothers in 42:28 and by the steward in 43:23. The truth of these three statements, which confess the mysterious involvement of God in the affairs of the brothers, is confirmed by Joseph in 45:5-8.

Joseph insists that only the guilty Benjamin will be punished by enslavement (44:17) while the others are free to "return in peace to your father" (an ironic reminder of the dispatch of Joseph by his father to "see to the peace of your brothers" in 37:14).

This decision provokes the great speech of Judah (44:18-34), a person changed from the one who suggests making a profit from the sale of an envied brother to one who can without rancor or resentment rehearse the sad history of his unhappy and divided family. Several features of this remarkable speech deserve special attention. First of all, it is filled with master-servant language: four times Judah refers to himself as "your servant" (vv. 18 [twice], 32, 33), three times to his brothers as "your servants" (vv. 21, 23, 31), and once to all of them as "his servants" (v. 19). With such language Judah unconsciously testifies to the truth and actualization of Joseph's two dreams. The second dream (37:9-10), in which the parents of Joseph join his brothers in doing him homage, is specifically referred to when Judah speaks of Jacob as "your servant my father" (44:27, 30). Second, Judah replaces jealousy with compassion as he speaks of his father's preferential love first for Joseph, whom he believes to be dead (v. 20), and then for Benjamin. Judah's claim in v. 22 ("If he leaves his father, he will die") may involve an intentional ambiguity, since the subject of "he will die" could refer to the death either of Jacob or of Benjamin because of their separation. Judah even recalls in vv. 27-29 Jacob's painful use of paternal and filial language only of Rachel's sons (42:36, 38). The change of Judah's character is most dramatically illustrated in 44:32: the brother who initiated the sale into slavery of the first favorite now will himself endure slavery to secure the freedom of the second favorite. Judah's transformation is complete, from hatred, violence, and deception to a noble gesture of self-sacrifice for one more loved by Jacob than himself. Judah's offer prepares for the reconciliation, which he unknowingly forecasts when in v. 31 he speaks to Joseph of Jacob as "your servant our father," a designation that suggests the possibility of the restoration of paternal and filial bonds.

Like Genesis 43, the second scene in chap. 44 employs the frequently appearing motif of "face": in v. 14 the brothers fall before Joseph's face; in vv. 23 and 26 Judah mentions the impossibility of seeing Joseph's face without Benjamin; and in v. 29 Judah recalls Jacob's warning of his death "if you take this one from before my face." The motif of "seeing" in vv. 23 and 26 (Joseph's face) is taken up negatively by Jacob in v. 28 ("I have not seen him [Joseph] since then") and by Judah in vv. 30-31 ("when he sees that the boy [Benjamin] is no more"). The expression "he is no more" in v. 30 was previously met in 37:30 and 42:13, 32, 36.

45:1-28, Recognition and Reconciliation.

The transformation of Judah is matched by a transformation of Joseph, who answers the impassioned plea of Judah with a long speech of his own. For the third time in the story Joseph weeps, as he did without the brothers' knowledge in 42:24 and 43:30. His first instance of unconcealed weeping in 45:2 prepares for the revelation of his concealed identity. In v. 3, the unexpected revelation ("I am Joseph; is my father still alive?") terrifies the brothers, given Joseph's previous harsh treatment of them. And their fears are not allayed when Joseph has them draw nearer, repeats "I am Joseph" and reminds them of their crime by adding "your brother whom you sold into Egypt" (v. 4).

Joseph continues his address to his brothers with words that form the theological center and focal point of the Joseph story (45:5-8): "It was for saving life that God sent me ahead of you" (v. 5). This assertion of the providential guidance and governance of Joseph and his family by God is repeated (as was Joseph's self-revelation) and expanded in v. 7: "God sent me ahead of you to ensure for you a remnant in the land and to preserve you alive as a great band of survivors." The association here of "remnant" and "survivors" occurs as well in 32:8 where Jacob divides his property so that, if Esau attacks, "the camp remaining may survive." In 45:8 Joseph insists for the third time that "it was not you who sent me here, but God"; and, in describing himself as "ruler of all the land of Egypt," Joseph uses a word from his brothers' angry question in 37:8 ("Will you really rule over us?"). The brothers will use the word again in their report to their father ("Joseph is alive, and he is ruler over all the land of Egypt!"). Joseph concludes by sending his brothers to invite Jacob and all his family to settle in Egypt and share its bounty (45:9-11). The weeping of Joseph and Benjamin in v. 14 and Joseph's weeping over his brothers in v. 15 form an inclusion with v. 2, and echo their father Jacob's earlier reconciliation with his brother Esau (Gen. 33:4). Joseph signals the reconciliation and the restoration of fraternal bonds by embracing and kissing his brothers; and the brothers, for their part, end the estrangement that made even communication with Joseph impossible (37:4) by speaking with him (45:15).

Twice in the preceding material from chap. 45 the narrator uses effectively a technique of reversal of meaning of the same words uttered by different characters at different points in the story. Jacob's lamenting response in 42:38 to the news about the imprisoned Simeon ("Only one remains" [Heb. nish'ar]) is recalled when Joseph speaks of the survival of a "remnant" (Heb. she'erit) in 45:7. By using these two related words, both derived from the same root, the narrator shows God's providence active in transforming lament into joy. Similarly Joseph's invitation to Jacob ("Come down to me," v. 9; cf. v. 13) recalls Jacob's lament in 37:35 ("I will go down to my son"). Since Jacob's descent will be not to his dead son in the nether world but to Joseph alive in Egypt, his lament has now been transformed into Joseph's joyful invitation to share in the bounty of Egypt.

In 45:16-20, the Pharaoh confirms Joseph's invitation and supplies his brothers with wagons in which they can bring their father and families back to Egypt. Before their departure, Joseph gives to each of his ten older brothers a gift of new clothing and to Benjamin, his full brother, three hundred silver shekels and five sets of new festal garments. In this last appearance of the garment motif, a symbol of favoritism and discord (37:3, 23) becomes a symbol of renewed relationship with the brothers and of Benjamin's special place (43:34). Joseph sends them off with gifts for his father and a warning against any further discord (45:23-24).

When the brothers return to Canaan and report to their father all that had happened and the invitation of Joseph and the Pharaoh to settle in Egypt, Jacob, who had grieved that he would be with Joseph only in the nether world, rejoices that he will see him alive (45:28).

46:1-47:27

Israel in Egypt

The climax of the Joseph story was reached in chap. 45, followed by its denouement and conclusion. The story that began with Jacob in the land of Canaan (37:1) ends with the patriarch settled in Egypt (47:27).

46:1-7, Jacob's Itinerary and Vision. The focus of chap. 46 moves from Joseph to Jacob. The itinerary of the patriarch's move from Canaan to Egypt that begins in v. 1 and continues in v. 5 brackets the theophany (in a dream?) experienced by Jacob. After arriving at Beersheba and sacrificing to "the God of his father Isaac," Jacob receives a divine oracle that begins with a self-identification formula ("I am God, the God of your father") and an admonition ("Fear not!"). It continues with God's confirmation of the invitation of Joseph and the Pharaoh to Egypt and concludes with the promises of numerous progeny (v. 3) and divine presence (v. 4; cf. Gen. 28:12-15). There is a sharp contrast between God's guidance of the patriarch Jacob by oracle and appearance and of Joseph by hidden divine providence (39:2, 3, 21; 40:8; 41:16; 45:5-8; 50:20).

Gen. 46:1-4 is closer in style and content to the ancestral narratives in chaps. 12-36 than it is to its immediate context in the Joseph story. The itinerary formula is similar to Gen. 13:1, 3; 20:1; and 28:10 and the double divine call of Jacob and his one-word answer in 46:2 are exactly parallel to Gen. 22:11. The reference in the oracle to the God of the fathers (cf. 26:24; 28:13) and the patriarchal promise of a "great nation" (cf. 12:2) also bring us back to the world of divine visitations to the ancestors (12:7; 15:1; 18:9-15; 26:2-5) at sacred sites (28:10-15; 32:23-32).

46:8-30, The Descendants of Jacob and the Reunion with Joseph. The name list of Jacob's descendants begins with a stereotyped formula ("These are the names of the sons of Israel who came to Egypt") that is repeated exactly in Exod. 1:1. This repetition links the Joseph narrative with its theme of Israel blessed, prolific, and prosperous in Egypt (Gen. 47:27; Exod. 1:6–7) to the story of Israel redeemed in the book of Exodus. Gen. 46:8 also forms an inclusion with the end of the Joseph story in 47:27. If the name list is traditional and preexisted the Joseph narrative into which it has been inserted, it has been adapted to its new context by the reference in 46:12 to Genesis 38. The list begins with the children of the sons of Leah (vv. 8–15) and continues with the children of Leah's maid Zilpah (vv. 16–18). A striking departure from the formulaic monotony of the list is the heading of the list of the offspring of Joseph and Benjamin (vv. 19–22): "The sons of Jacob's wife Rachel" (set against the normal pattern established in v. 9 of listing the sons of the eponymous ancestors of the twelve tribes). After listing the sons of Dan and Naphtali, Bilhah's children (vv. 23–25), the list concludes with a notice that the family of Jacob who entered Egypt numbered sixty-six (v. 26), a number brought to seventy with the addition of Jacob himself, Joseph, and Joseph's two sons Manasseh and Ephraim (v. 27).

Opposite: A group of western Asiatics (third row from bottom) seeks permission from an Egyptian dignitary to enter Egypt; copy of a wall painting from a tomb at Beni-Hasan, Egypt, nineteenth century B.C. In the book of Genesis, Abraham and Sarai (chap. 12) and later Jacob and his large family (chaps. 45-47) move to Egypt in time of famine.

Joseph's reunion with his father Jacob (vv. 28–30) closes this section with Jacob's family fully reconciled. The reunion is described in the same way as Joseph's reconciliation with his brothers in 45:14–15; it ends (46:30) with Jacob repeating his words in 45:28.

46:31–47:12, Audiences with Pharaoh.

After Joseph's reunion with his father, he goes to notify the Pharaoh of the arrival of his family and to obtain the monarch's permission to settle in Goshen. In preparing his brothers for their audience with the Pharaoh, Joseph instructs them to mention their desire to continue in their profession of pastoralism; perhaps the purpose of these instructions is to make clear that Joseph's family has no ambition to advance to positions of prominence in Egypt because of his power. The "abhorrence" of Egyptians for shepherds mentioned in 46:34 may refer to the Egyptian view of non-Egyptian Asiatic nomads (43:32).

Pharaoh's generous offer in 47:6 ("The land of Egypt is before you") recalls Abram's generosity in 13:9 ("Is not the whole land before you?") to Lot, who chooses territory that is "like the land of Egypt" (13:10) and Abimelech's similar offer to Abraham (20:15).

After the meeting of the Pharaoh with five of Joseph's brothers (47:1–6), Joseph brings his father to Pharaoh (vv. 7–10). At both the beginning and end of this section readers are informed that "Jacob blessed Pharaoh." The point made of Jacob's age (vv. 8–9) probably reflects the belief that an old man near the end of his life is in the most advantageous position to give a blessing (cf. chaps. 27, 48). Jacob's blessing of the Pharaoh is another instance of the realization of the promise that Abraham's descendants would be a source of blessing for the Gentiles (30:27–30)—a theme announced by J (12:3; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14) and employed by the composer of the Joseph narrative (39:5). The concluding verses, 47:11–12, relate Joseph's keeping of the promise to care for his family that he made in 45:1–11.

47:13–26, Joseph's Administration. This section, only loosely related to its context, is the conclusion of the description of Joseph the wise and successful administrator of 41:46–57. These two passages bracket the story of Joseph and his family in 42:1–47:12. The story provides some Egyptian "local color" by attributing to Joseph's administrative skill the royal ownership of all Egyptian land and the Egyptian tax system. The phrase "to this day" in v. 26 indicates that this passage served to explain the origins of a practice current in the author's time.

While some commentators have suggested that 47:13–26 originally followed immediately after 41:57, one factor that might explain its present position is its function as an example of Joseph's claim that "God sent me ahead of you to save lives" (45:5). Joseph's saving of the lives of the Egyptian populace is mentioned twice, in 47:19 and 25; and note that Joseph's saving of the lives of Gentiles follows immediately a passage (47:7–12) that recalls the blessing that comes to Gentiles by association with the blessed descendants of Abraham.

47:27, The End of the Joseph Story. The Joseph story began with Jacob and his family in Canaan; it ends with Israel in Egypt (46:8–27). The increasing frequency of "Israel" as the patriarch's name indicates not multiple sources but the development of the patriarch from Jacob as an individual character to Israel the eponymous progenitor of the twelve tribes. The movement of the story from Canaan to Egypt is enclosed by the two similarly constructed sentences that begin and end the Joseph story: "Jacob dwelt in the land of his father's sojournings, in the land of Canaan" (37:1); "Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the land of Goshen" (47:27). But Gen. 47:27 is Janus-like. If its first half points back to the beginning of the Joseph story, its second half ("There they acquired property, were fruitful and multiplied greatly") points forward to the book of Exodus, where "the descendants of Israel" will be described as "fruitful and prolific" (Exod. 1:7).

47:28–50:26

Supplementary Material to the Joseph Story

If 47:27 marks the literarily effective end of the Joseph story, the added material is concerned chiefly with Jacob and recounts his blessing of Joseph's sons, his farewell testament, his death and burial in Canaan (47:28-50:14). Only in the final verses of the book of Genesis (50:15-26) does the focus return to Jacob's sons, moving from fear on the part of Joseph's brothers of revenge by Joseph after their father's death to Joseph's reassurance and his own death.

47:28-31, Jacob's Preparations for Death.

This section begins with a summary reference to the span of Jacob's life (similar to the genealogical notices in Genesis 5), 130 years in Canaan (47:9) and 17 more in Egypt. As the time of his death approaches, he asks Joseph to swear that he will bury his father in Canaan. The oath and the accompanying gesture is the same as in 24:2, also part of the patriarch Abraham's preparations for death. The concluding words of this section, in which his father does obeisance to Joseph ("Israel bowed") may indicate the fulfillment of Joseph's second dream (37:9-10) where the obeisance of his parents is described with the same verb as in 47:31 (and cf. 42:6; 43:26).

48:1-22, Jacob's Blessing of Joseph's Sons.

Jacob's second act of preparation for death is the blessing of Manasseh and Ephraim (cf. chap. 27). Jacob begins by recalling the divine promise at Luz (Bethel; 28:14, 19; 35:7) of numerous descendants and of the land of Canaan as a permanent possession. The divine name that Jacob uses in 48:3 is "El Shaddai," a name that occurs in Gen. 17:1; 35:11; Exod. 6:3 (as a divine self-designation); Gen. 28:3 (Isaac's blessing of Jacob); and 43:14 (Jacob's blessing of his sons). With the exception of this last occurrence from the Joseph story, all the occurrences are P (→ El Shaddai).

Jacob's blessing of Joseph's sons in 48:5-6 involves an adoption that elevates them to a status equal to that of Jacob's first sons Reuben and Simeon (cf. 1 Chron. 5:1); this adoption is another instance of Jacob's special predilection for Rachel (Gen. 48:7) and those born of her. Joseph brings his two sons before the dying patriarch, who rejoices that God has allowed him to see not only Joseph's face again, but his sons as well (v. 11). The motif of Jacob seeing someone's face has appeared before (32:30; 33:10), as has the theme of God's providential direction of the affairs of Jacob and his family. When Israel places his right hand on the head of the younger Ephraim and his left on the firstborn Manasseh, Joseph assumes a mistake because of Jacob's poor vision (48:13-17); but Jacob insists (vv. 19-20) that it is no accident but rather God's intention that "his younger brother [Ephraim] shall be greater than he [Manasseh]." The reference to Jacob's failing eyesight and the divine election of the younger son are clearly meant to recall the beginning of the Jacob story (cf. 25:19-23 and chap. 27). As Jacob blessed Joseph's sons with the promise of many descendants (vv. 16, 19), so in vv. 21-22 he reiterates to Joseph the divine promise of occupation of "the land of your fathers."

49:1-27, Jacob's Testament. Jacob's last words to his sons are cast in the form of a farewell discourse, a fairly common biblical genre in which a dying elder gives instructions, exhortations, predictions, or blessings to his children or followers. The closest parallel to 49:2-27 is Deut. 33:6-25, Moses' blessings on the tribes of Israel before his death; the poem in Deuteronomy 33 forms the conclusion of the book of Deuteronomy, the whole of which is the Mosaic final discourse (→ Testament).

While the poetry of Gen. 49:2-27 contains many obscurities and unsolved puzzles, at least a few general observations are in order. First, the sayings to the tribal ancestors often involve wordplays that are impossible to render in translation. For instance, "Dan shall judge" in v. 16 is in Hebrew dan yadin; in v. 19, the Hebrew translated "As for Gad, raiders will raid him" is gad gedud yegudennu. The poem begins with the six sons of Leah (vv. 2-15), who are followed by the sons of the two maidservants in an order different from that of 30:5-13. In 49:16-21 the order is Dan (Bilhah's first son), Gad and Asher (Zilpah's sons), and Naphtali (Bilhah's second son). Rachel's sons, Joseph and Benjamin, end the list.

In the discourse, Reuben the firstborn is passed over as leader of his brothers because of his intercourse with Bilhah (Gen. 35:22), and the words addressed to Simeon and Levi recall their revenge for the rape of Dinah (chap. 34). The long section devoted to Judah (49:8-12) notes his preeminence among his brothers (a point made in the Joseph story by his replacement of Reuben as spokesman for the brothers); for the metaphor of the lion, cf. Num. 23:24; 24:9. Gen. 49:10-12, one of the most obscure passages in the poem, is a promise to Judah of dominion and royal sovereignty among the tribes because of Judah's military prowess.

The Joseph saying (vv. 22-26) is amplified with a blessing that promises fertility (cf. the similar blessing of Joseph in Deut. 33:13-16). The promised fertility includes agricultural bounty because of abundant rains, along with human and animal fertility ("the blessings of breasts and womb"). It may be no coincidence that agricultural plenty and human fertility are connected in Genesis 41, which recounts both Joseph's management of Egypt's grain production and the birth of his two sons. The number of divine names in 49:24-25 (Bull of Jacob, Shepherd, Rock of Israel, God of your father, El Shaddai) is striking.

Like the sayings about Judah, Issachar, Dan, and Naphtali (and perhaps Joseph, although the text is unclear), the Benjamin saying is based on an animal metaphor. Finally, the poem has incorporated a gloss in v. 18 (cf. Ps. 119:166).

49:28-33, Jacob's Death and Burial. Gen. 49:28 is a prose conclusion to the poem, in which the sayings are interpreted as blessings ("He blessed each of them; with a blessing appropriate to each he blessed them"). In vv. 29-32 are Jacob's instructions regarding his burial in the family burial plot in Canaan (cf. chap. 23) where are already buried the ancestors Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, and Leah (for Rachel's burial in Bethlehem, cf. Gen. 35:19-20). This section closes with the narration of Jacob's death in 49:33. The idiom used twice in this death report ("he was gathered to his kinsfolk") has appeared before, of Abraham (25:8) and Isaac (35:29). While the idiom may simply refer to interment in the family grave, it has also been suggested that the expression refers to the practice of secondary burial, the gathering and reburial of the bones of the deceased after decomposition of the body (→ Burial).

50:1-14, Jacob's Funeral. Joseph weeps as he mourns his father's death, in language reminiscent of Esau's reconciliation with Jacob in Gen. 33:4 and of Joseph with his brothers in 45:14-15. The embalming of Jacob (and of Joseph in 50:26) in preparation for the funeral procession to Canaan is another instance of Egyptian "local color" in material connected with Joseph. The reference to "the Canaanites who were dwelling in the land" in 50:11 recalls the same observation in Gen. 12:6 and 13:7. We are reminded that while the promise of numerous descendants is on the way toward fulfillment, the promise of the land is still unrealized (except for the burial ground purchased by Abraham in chap. 23, where Jacob is to be buried; and cf. 33:19). Gen. 12:6 and 50:11 form an inclusion around the ancestral narratives from the call of Abram to the death of Jacob.

50:15-26, Joseph's Final Reconciliation with His Brothers. After Jacob's death, former patterns of behavior reassert themselves. Fearful that Joseph might now revenge himself after their father's death (as Esau intended in 27:41), the brothers engage in a final act of deception when they bring to Joseph the fictitious dying request of Jacob that Joseph forgive his brothers. Once more, Joseph weeps, and his brothers prostrate before him with the words "Let us be slaves to you!" (as in 44:16, 33). In his reassurance to his brothers Joseph sums up again the meaning of the whole narrative: "You planned evil for me, but God meant it for good

... to preserve the life of many people" (50:20; cf. 45:5-8).

Joseph's adoption of the children of Manasseh's son Machir, expressed idiomatically (v. 23: "born on Joseph's knees," as in Gen. 30:3), recalls Jacob's adoption of his grandchildren (48:5, 13-20). Both adoptions reflect tribal history in which Ephraim, Manasseh, and Machir are counted among the tribes of Israel (Judg. 5:14). For another instance of longevity expressed by recording several generations of descendants born in one's lifetime, cf. Job 42:16. In his dying words (Gen. 50:24-25) Joseph repeats the promise of the land, the realization of which will be described in the narrative that extends from Exodus to Joshua.

God's intention to preserve life (45:5; 50:20) is not only meant to refer to the preservation of Jacob's family alone during the famine but has a wider scope. Because of Joseph's wise administration, all Egypt and indeed the whole world (Gen. 41:57) is blessed with abundant food. Seen in the context of the book of Genesis, the Joseph story, played out not in the land of promise but in the wider world, is linked to chaps. 2-4, a story of alienation and division of husband and wife that led to the expulsion from Eden and the tree of life, unremitting hard work to produce food, and murderous violence between brothers. In the Joseph story that concludes Genesis, these ancient curses are reversed and cancelled as Joseph lives with his reconciled family in a land of abundant food. The words of the wise serpent in Gen. 3:4-5 ("You shall not die! You shall be like gods, knowing good and evil") are transformed by the wise Joseph in his final theological summation in 50:19-20: "Am I in the place of God? Though you planned evil against me, God meant it for good, to keep alive a numerous people."

Bibliography

Brueggemann, W. Genesis. Interpretation: The Bible Commentary for Preaching and Teaching. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1982.

Coats, G. W. Genesis; with an Introduction to Narrative Literature. The Forms of the Old Testament Literature, 1. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983.

Gunkel, H. The Legends of Genesis. New York: Schocken, 1964.

Sarna, N. M. Understanding Genesis. New York: Schocken, 1970.

Speiser, E. A. Genesis. Anchor Bible, 1. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977.

Vawter, B. On Genesis: A New Reading. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977.

von Rad, G. Genesis. Old Testament Library. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1972.

Westermann, C. Genesis: A Commentary. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1984-86.

EXODUS

P. KYLE McCARTER, J. R.

INTRODUCTION

The book of Exodus has two contrasting geographical settings. The first is pharaonic Egypt. The events described in chaps. 1–12 take place in royal building projects, along the banks of the Nile, or within the palace itself. The second setting is Mount Sinai. The background of chaps. 19–40 is a desert encampment at the foot of the sacred mountain. The change of locale from Egypt to Sinai is achieved by a trek through the wilderness (12:37–19:2).

The two principal topics of the book correspond to these two geographical settings. The first is Yahweh's deliverance of Israel from slavery in Egypt. The second is the institution of a system of worshipping Yahweh at Sinai. The two are linked by Yahweh's miraculous guidance of the people Israel on the march through the desert.

The account of the captivity in Egypt is a continuation of the story of the family of Jacob begun in Genesis. The immediate background is the family's departure from Canaan during a famine and settlement in Egypt on land granted to them by the king (Gen. 46–47). The canonical division between Genesis and Exodus corresponds to a major transition in the story. Jacob and his sons have died, and their descendants, the Israelites, have been enslaved by the Egyptians. The Exodus narrative tells how Yahweh keeps faith with his promises to the patriarchs and rescues their descendants from slavery.

The account of the institution of the system of worship is the first part of the long Sinai section (or, "pericope") which begins in Exod. 19:2, where the people encamp at Sinai, and extends to Num. 10:10, after which they set out on the march again. This pericope is the principal biblical repository of the regulations of the forms of service of Yahweh. The materials in Exodus describe the erection of the tabernacle or wilderness sanctuary and the inauguration of the system of worship. The materials in Leviticus prescribe the rules for the ongoing operation of this system, together with the requirements of ritual purity. The materials in Numbers include the regulations for the camp in the wilderness.

The account of the wilderness trek continues with the departure from Sinai in Num. 10:11 and the journey to the border of the promised land. Thus it provides a narrative connection between the exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan. The principal themes of the wilderness story are Yahweh's miraculous sustenance of the people under inhospitable conditions and the people's anxious ingratitude.

Literary History

The literary character of the book of Exodus corresponds to its twofold division of setting and topic. The story of the captivity and escape from Egypt is told almost entirely in prose narrative. The account of the institution of the divinely ordained system of worship at Sinai is also presented as part of a narrative. Though it does include a few passages of true narrative, it is predominantly a mixture of nonnarrative materials—including laws, ritual regulations, and prescriptions for proper worship—presented in several long passages of divine discourse.

The narrative portions of the book are composed of the pentateuchal source documents conventionally called J, E, D, and P (→ Sources of the Pentateuch).

The Yahwistic Account (J). The basic thread to which the rest has been attached is the J account. The original form of this old story remains generally visible despite its reworking by subsequent editors. It presents the departure from Egypt as a continuation of the theme of the double promise made by Yahweh to the patriarchs. Israel is to become a great nation living in a productive land. The first part of this promise, the growth into a great nation, seems already very near fulfillment at the beginning of the Exodus story. The Israelites have become a strong and numerous people, a sign of the power of the blessing that accompanied the promise (Gen. 12:2–3). But the captivity in Egypt is a hindrance to the realization of the second part of the promise, the occupation of the land, and the king of Egypt, in his determination to reduce the numbers of the Israelites, poses a direct threat to the first part. Thus in the J narrative it is to safeguard his promise to the patriarchs that Yahweh commissions Moses to lead the people to freedom. Knowing that this can be achieved only by force (3:19–20), Yahweh strikes Egypt with repeated plagues until Pharaoh agrees to let the people go. In the end, the king who tried to thwart the blessing of Israel asks Israel for a blessing for himself (12:32). Note that for J the goal of the Exodus is clearly the promised land (3:8, 17). Sinai is only a stop—albeit the most important stop—along the way. J's version of the proclamation of the covenant, which is preserved in chap. 34, links the covenant very closely to the conquest of the land (cf. 34:11). The covenant stipulations are largely concerned with agricultural festivals; thus the mandated mode of worship is also linked to the land (34:18–26).

The Elohist Account (E). The J account seems to be supplemented at many points by materials drawn from E, but it is often very difficult to distinguish E from J in Exodus. The criterion of divine names, according to which J is characterized by the use of "Yahweh" ("the LORD") and E by the use of "God," ceases to be reliable after the E account of the disclosure of the name "Yahweh" in chap. 3. The E narrative begins to refer to the deity as "Yahweh" as well as "God," so that the use of "Yahweh" is no longer a reliable indicator of J. E can still be recognized, however, by its formal, otherworldly tone. Yahweh does not act through natural agents in E as he does in J. Thus, for example, the agency of the east wind in J's account of the plague of locusts is lacking in E's account of the same plague (cf. 10:12–20). Similarly, in J's account of the apparition at Sinai Yahweh descends upon the mountain (19:18) and addresses the people, whereas in E's account he speaks from the sky (19:19; cf. 20:21). If Israel is to be joined to Yahweh in a covenant relationship, it will have to be "a people dwelling alone, not reckoned among the nations" (Num. 23:9). For E, then, the goal of the Exodus is Sinai itself (Exod. 3:12), and the meaning of the covenant is that Israel becomes "a realm of priests and a holy nation" (19:6).

Priestly Materials (P). The basic JE narrative was substantially reworked to reflect the point of view of the Jerusalem priesthood, according to which the later Temple cult, with its various rituals and regulations, originated in the time of Moses and derived its authority from the Sinai revelation. In particular, the old JE account of the Passover (12:21–23, 27b, 29–39) was enlarged and revised to reflect the fully developed Passover celebration of later times (12:1–20, 28, 40–50). Other distinctive contributions from P include the enhancement of the role of Aaron, from whom the Jerusalem priesthood traced its descent, the furnishing of genealogical information, and the annotation of individual episodes to conform to P's chronological system and wilderness itinerary. In all, a significant amount of material was introduced from the P source, and the Sinai pericope was greatly expanded to accommodate cultic and legal documents preserved in Priestly tradition.

The Priestly History. In its present form, therefore, our book of Exodus is a part of the Priestly history that extends from Genesis to Numbers. According to this history, the world was created by Yahweh as a perfect and sacred system in which men and women had an important and well-defined role. It proved impossible for them to live safely in the divinely created world, however, so that Yahweh was obliged to make special provisions for their safety and welfare. The first such provisions were included in the covenant made with Noah and his descendants in Genesis 9. Then, when Yahweh chose to enter into a closer relationship with one human family, the covenant with Abraham was concluded (Gen. 17). The events narrated in Exodus provide the context for the next and most important stage of this covenantal history. This stage is marked by two special divine acts of disclosure. The first, described in 6:2–4, is the revelation of the name "Yahweh," which, as in the E account, was unknown to the patriarchs. For P, the events surrounding the Exodus derive their meaning from this revelation. The purpose of the rescue from Egypt is to demonstrate to the Israelites the awesome power associated with the name Yahweh ("and you will know that it is I, Yahweh your god, who brought you out," 6:7). The purpose of the "signs and wonders" is to demonstrate the same thing to the Egyptians (7:5). The second act of disclosure is the promulgation of the Sinaitic legislation, the rules by which human beings can live safely in a divinely ordered world. This revelation accompanies the covenant Yahweh makes with Israel, the third covenant in the Priestly scheme.

Deuteronomistic Influence. The Exodus narrative has been expanded or rearranged at several points to represent ideas scholars call "Deuteronomistic" because they are based on the teachings of the book of Deuteronomy. This aspect of the text of Exodus is part of a larger phenomenon. Much of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers is paralleled in Deuteronomy, and there was a tendency during the last phase of the composition of these books to expand or revise the text to reflect Deuteronomistic materials and ideas.

The Exodus Tradition

Underlying our present book of Exodus are early traditions, probably first transmitted in oral form, about the Exodus, the wilderness sojourn, and the revelation at Sinai. These are part of a larger complex of traditions that also includes the patriarchal sojourn in Canaan and the conquest. This complex was the basic myth, or sacred story, through which the ancient Israelite community expressed its identity. Modern scholarship has tended to separate these traditions and seek diverse origins for them, stressing in particular the original isolation of the tradition of the law-giving at Sinai from the others (→ Hexateuch). The meaning of the story does not derive from its individual components, however, but from their relationship to each other. Thus, though many of the details may have changed during its transmission, we must assume that the tradition had its present, complex form from the beginning, that is, from the time the Israelite community began its definitive period of formation in twelfth-century B.C. Canaan.

The meaning of the story has to do with the possession of the land. It involves three periods of preparation: a period of temporary residence in the land (the patriarchal sojourn), a period of exclusion from the land (the residence and captivity in Egypt), and a period of sanctification for return to the land (the wilderness). This preparation is followed by a triumphal reentry into the land and its conquest and settlement. The events described in Exodus belong to the end of the period of exclusion and the beginning of the period of sanctification. They should be understood in terms of the larger theme of the possession of the land. The hard labor at the end of the exclusion period is the opposite of the life that lies ahead in Canaan. The service of Pharaoh, who exploits the people's labor for himself, is the opposite of the service of Yahweh, who ensures that the people's labor in the land will produce crops that sustain them. The importance of the deliverance from Egypt is that it puts an end to the period of exclusion and looks ahead to the occupation of the land. The importance of the covenant made at Sinai is that it joins the people to the proprietor of the land and provides the rules by which they can prosper within the seasonal cycle of the land. As noted above, the Exodus and covenant retain approximately this significance in the earliest written version of the story (J). The wilderness sojourn, of which the revelation at Sinai is a part, corresponds to the period of sanctification in the larger story. It is the time of final preparation, when the people Israel learn to live in complete dependence upon Yahweh and receive the divine instructions by which they can live in the land.

Significance for the Ancient Community

As noted above, the events described in the book of Exodus were part of the basic story through which the ancient community expressed its identity. The God who rescued them from slavery in Egypt and brought them to himself in the wilderness was the God they now served (cf. Hos. 13:4–5). The “signs and wonders” in Egypt and the miracles in the wilderness, especially the deliverance at the sea, were paradigmatic illustrations of both the power of the God of Israel and the favor in which he held his people. These events were recited in worship both to praise Yahweh for his goodness in the past and to appeal for his help in present troubles. Examples of such liturgical materials have survived. Note, for example, the large role played by the plagues and the desert miracles in the so-called historical psalms (Pss. 78:12–16, 44–51; 105:23–43; 106:7–33; 135:8–9; 136:10–16). According to Deuteronomic law, and probably earlier, the story of the Exodus was to be recited during the celebration of the Passover (cf. Exod. 12:26–27), the Feast of Unleavened Bread (13:8), and the consecration of firstborn (13:14–15), thus preserving an understanding of the historical meaning of those ceremonies.

The Pre-exilic Community. For those who lived in pre-exilic Judah and knew the story as it was told in the J narrative, the Exodus was clear evidence of Yahweh's faithfulness to his double promise of land and progeny. As such, the story of the escape provided assurance not only of security but also of prosperity. The goal of the Exodus was the promised land, where the people now lived as heirs to the blessing that had permitted them to thrive even under the hardships imposed by Pharaoh. At the same time, the covenant bond established at Sinai formalized and clarified the people's relationship to their God, who guaranteed them possession of their land and who required them to make contributions from their flocks and fields and to assemble for worship at the major festivals of the agricultural year.

The Postexilic Community. For the community living in the time of the Second Temple (after 515 B.C.), the Exodus story was a part of the Priestly history. The plagues and the parting of the sea demonstrated the universal sovereignty of the God of Israel. The institution of the Passover service in Egypt and the tabernacle cult at Sinai demonstrated the continuity of the religion practiced by the postexilic community with the Mosaic period, from which the various institutions of worship derived their authority. For P, the revelation at Sinai was the fountainhead of the rules and practices that governed the life of the community. Laws, customs, and institutions that were accorded authoritative status, therefore, tended to be traced to this event. As noted above, the literary consequence of this tendency was the inclusion of a large body of diverse materials within the larger Sinai pericope (Exod. 19:1–Num. 10:10) of the Priestly history. Ultimately, this tendency accounts for the belief of the Talmudic rabbis that rabbinic law derives from the same great revelation to Moses on Mount Sinai (→ Halakah).

Historical Context

The general background of the story of Israel's enslavement by Pharaoh is the historical phenomenon of Asiatic laborers in Egypt. Slaves with Semitic names are known to have been working in Egypt at least as early as the eighteenth century B.C. and for about fifteen hundred years thereafter. The use of Asiatic slave labor was especially common during the New Kingdom (ca. 1550–1070 B.C.), and there are many references in the records of that time to the participation of foreign laborers, including Syrians and Canaanites, in building projects. The memory of a period of this kind of slavery in Egypt was an early component of Israelite tradition. It must have been based on the historical experience of some group of the ancestors of the later community. In the long process of the development of the tradition, however, the details needed for modern historians to date and explain this experience were lost. "The land of Rameses," in which the family of Jacob settled (Gen. 47:11), was in northeastern Egypt, where a royal residence was maintained from about 1300 B.C. onward. The region took its name from Ramesses II (ca. 1279–1212 B.C.), who sponsored building projects at several sites in the region, including Per-Ramessu and Per-Atum, the "Pithom and Rameses" of Exod. 1:11 (→ Pithom; Raamses, Rameses). For these reasons most modern historians have assigned the events of Exodus 1–15 to the New Kingdom, often specifically to the reign of Ramesses II. Thus Sety I (ca. 1291–1279 B.C.) would be the new king of 1:8 and Ramesses himself the Pharaoh of the Exodus. There is reason for great caution on this point, however. Despite the antiquity of the sites, the names Pithom and Rameses were not widely used as designations of cities before the seventh century, and the term "store cities" does not occur elsewhere in early biblical materials. Thus the second half of 1:11, the only specific link to extrabiblical evidence offered in the story, may be a late interpolation based on uncertain authority and, in any case, provides no basis for dating the Exodus to the Ramessid period. Thus many modern historians prefer to say nothing about the date of the events related in Exodus, except that, as basic components of the story that defined Israel, they must have taken place before the final formation of the Israelite community in twelfth-century Canaan.

1:1–7:7

Israel in Egypt

The first section of Exodus describes the enslavement of the Israelites in Egypt and Yahweh's preparations for their escape. Thus it sets the stage for the story of the plagues and the flight into the wilderness that follow. Yahweh's decision to act, however, is based not only on compassion but also on his past relationship with Israel's ancestors (2:23–25; 3:7–10), so that it is clear from the beginning that what he has in mind is not only a rescue but the reestablishment of his relationship with Israel on a new basis. When the people escape, they will "serve God" at his mountain sanctuary (3:12 [E]). Yahweh will renew his covenant with them (cf. 6:7 [P]) and lead them into the promised land (3:8, 17 [J]; 6:8 [P]). Thus the preparations made here are not only for the Exodus itself, but also for the revelations to be made at Sinai and the wilderness journey to Canaan. The most important part of these preparations is the commissioning of an individual who will serve as an intermediary between the people and their God throughout this long process. Thus by virtue of his commission here in chaps. 3–4 and 6, Moses will serve as the agent of Yahweh's punishment of the Egyptians and the leader of the march from the border of Egypt to the border of Canaan. This means that he is the dominant human figure not only of Exodus but of Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy as well.

1:1–22

The Oppression in Egypt

The opening of Exodus provides a transition from the stories about the patriarchs to the stories about the captivity in Egypt. At the end of Genesis, the sons of Jacob and their families were living as honored guests in the best land of Egypt (Gen. 45:17–20), which Pharaoh had granted them in gratitude for Joseph's service at the Egyptian court. Now, however, Joseph and his brothers have died. The land is filled with their descendants, but the Israelites of this new generation are no longer welcome in Egypt. The new Pharaoh recognizes no obligation to them. Their number and strength alarm him, and he begins to devise ways to control them. He presses them into the service of the state, and when this hard labor fails to check their vigor, he contrives the death of their male children.

There is an emphasis throughout this opening section on the increase in the number of Israelites. This is, in the first place, a part of an ancient and widespread literary pattern that is most easily seen in the well-known Mesopotamian story of Atrahasis. That story, like this one, begins with hard labor. At first the laborers are the younger gods, but they are replaced early in the story by ■ human labor force. The people work hard for centuries excavating canals. At the same time they multiply, until the land is crowded and noisy, and the gods become alarmed. In particular, the great god Enlil is disturbed by the clamor and cannot sleep. He orders that supplies be withheld from the people and that the land be afflicted with a drought. The people are decimated, but Atrahasis, the human hero of the story, eventually manages to end the drought with the help of Enki, a favorably inclined god. The people again multiply, and the land again becomes crowded. Enlil afflicts the people a second time, but Atrahasis and Enki fend off this disaster too. Finally Enlil instigates a great flood. All human life is in danger of being destroyed. Acting on Enki's instructions, however, Atrahasis constructs a large boat and saves his family, thus preserving human life. This story is often compared (and rightly so) with the biblical story of Noah and the Flood. Its literary pattern, however, is closer to the story of the affliction of the Israelites in Egypt. The people are working very hard, but they are nonetheless multiplying and filling the land. Pharaoh is alarmed, and, like Enlil, attempts to reduce their number by a series of afflictions, first imposing hard labor on them, then directing the midwives to kill their sons, and finally ordering their sons to be cast into the Nile. One of these sons, Moses, is saved by being placed in the Nile in an "ark" (the term is the same as that used for Noah's boat). The arks of Atrahasis and Noah preserve human life, while the ark of Moses preserves the life of the man who will eventually liberate his people from bondage.

Though the increase in the number of the people is part of an ancient literary pattern, however, it is also a thematic component of both the P and J narrative sources. The language used in 1:7 to describe the increase connects this story with a series of other passages in which a motif of divine blessing is expressed in terms of human fertility. The development of this motif began with the blessing of creation in Gen. 1:28, according to which the newly created men and women were to "be fruitful, multiply, and fill the earth." This blessing was articulated again after the Flood (Gen. 9:7) and then narrowed and conferred especially upon the family of Abraham (Gen. 12:3). The subsequent stories about the patriarchs show that the divine blessing continued to be effective for Abraham's descendants, and the references to the large number of Israelites in our passage represent a continuation of the motif, which will receive its climactic expression in the oracles of Balaam in Numbers 23 and 24. In its clearest form, this motif is a thematic component of the latest or Priestly redaction (edition) of the larger story, to which Gen. 1:28 and 9:7 as well as Exod. 1:1-7 and 13-14 are usually assigned. Thus the language of the blessing of creation is echoed precisely in v. 7, where we are told that the Israelites in Egypt "were fruitful . . . multiplied . . . and the land was filled with them." Note, moreover, that the theme of the blessing of Israel was already present in the older J narrative. The language used to describe Israel's increase in v. 12, for example, recalls Gen. 30:30, which characterizes the prosperity of Laban's household during Jacob's residence there. Both of these passages derive from the J narrative, in which the blessing of Israel was a major theme.

1:1-7, The New Generation of Israelites.

The opening passage describes the transition of Israel's ancestors from a single family to a multitude of families. Thus the twelve sons of Jacob are listed in vv. 2-4 both to review the names of the individual members of the family that came to Egypt and to identify the ancestors of the tribes.

1:8-14, Hard Labor. As the story begins, Pharaoh declares his fear of the people of Israel. They are, he says, dangerously numerous. His solution is to put them to work building the store cities of Pithom and Rameses. Many commentators have questioned the suitability of this solution. Would it have been an effective way to reduce the population? Would the king have willingly diminished his own labor force? Some critics doubt that the themes of population increase and hard labor, though joined in the earliest written sources, were originally related. Note further that the story of Israel's hard labor finds its natural intensification not in the episode of the Hebrew midwives that follows immediately in vv. 15-22 but in the story of the deprivation of straw for brick making in 5:6-18. Thus this episode stands rather isolated in its present context.

1:15-22, The Hebrew Midwives. Pharaoh commands two midwives to kill all male children born to the Israelites, but the midwives will not cooperate and, in desperation, Pharaoh orders his soldiers to cast the male children of the Israelites into the Nile. The midwives refuse because they "fear God," that is, because they are women of moral scruples. The use of this general expression, rather than "fear Yahweh" (→ Fear of the Lord), raises the possibility that the women are not Israelites, but their names, Shiphrah and Puah, are Semitic, not Egyptian.

According to the present form of the story, the atrocities described here are to be understood as intensification of the hard labor just described. As noted above, however, the midwives episode is not a natural continuation of the hard labor episode. Instead, it represents an introduction to the story of Moses, the central figure of the story, who appears first as an infant endangered by Pharaoh's decree.

2:1-4:31

The Story of Moses

Only three human figures have prominent roles in the story of Israel's escape from slavery in Egypt. Of these, Aaron is little more than an extension of Moses himself, and Pharaoh is his antagonist. Moses is overwhelmingly the dominant figure. The keen interest the tradition took in him has influenced the growth of the narrative, which now contains considerable material about his early career. As just noted, the expected continuation of the story of Israel's hard labor in 1:8-14 is the story of the deprivation of straw for brick making in chap. 5. But the natural flow of the narrative is diverted at this point to make room for an account of Moses' childhood and sojourn in Midian. Though the story of Moses' infancy seems to have been known only to E, the tradition of the flight to Midian and sojourn there is represented in both of the early narrative sources (J and E), so that it must have entered the tradition at an early date.

2:1-10, Moses' Birth and Childhood.

Moses is introduced as an infant hidden by his mother in the reeds of the Nile to protect him from Pharaoh's decree. Pharaoh's own daughter finds him, takes pity on him, and adopts him. With the help of his sister, who was secretly watching over him, the Egyptian princess arranges for the infant to be suckled by a Hebrew wet nurse, who is none other than the baby's mother. Thus the child Moses is rescued from death, nursed by his own mother, and raised in the Egyptian palace.

The infant who escapes mortal peril to grow up and become the leader of his people is a common motif in world folklore. In one group of such stories, the child's fate is foretold by an oracle, so that the king he is destined to replace exposes him at birth. Accordingly, some scholars have speculated that in an earlier version of our story Moses' role as liberator of the Israelites was foretold and Pharaoh's true purpose in drowning the sons of the Israelites was to eliminate the promised child. But no trace of such an oracle is preserved in our sources. Note, moreover, that the infant Moses is not exposed or cast into the water; he is placed among the reeds for protection. A closer parallel, therefore, is the so-called Legend of Sargon, an Akkadian text describing the birth and rise to power of the third-millennium B.C. Mesopotamian ruler Sargon the Great. In this document, Sargon says that shortly after his birth his mother, a high priestess, put him in a basket of rushes caulked with bitumen and set him adrift in the river, where he was found and raised by an irrigation worker.

The Legend of Sargon is pseudepigraphal, having been composed long after the reign of Sargon the Great. Similarly, the story of Moses' birth, which seems to have been lacking in the J source, is legendary rather than historical in character (→ Moses). No individual but Moses himself is identified by name, not even his parents (cf. 6:20). Moses' own name (moshe) is explained in v. 10 as if it were derived from Hebrew masha, "draw out"; but in fact it was a common element in Egyptian names, often used by itself with the meaning "child" (cf. King "Thutmose"). Thus Moses was one of several Egyptian names in the early levitical genealogy, including Hophni, Phinehas, and Merari. This does not mean that Moses or any of the others was an Egyptian, but it does suggest that a portion of the tribe of Levi may have lived in Egypt at some time.

2:11-25, Moses' Flight from Egypt.

Moses' Egyptian upbringing does not extinguish his identification with his people, and when he sees an Egyptian beating a Hebrew, he slays the assailant. Now sought by Pharaoh as a criminal, he flees eastward into the desert and comes to the land of Midian, east of the Gulf of Aqabah or Elath in northwestern Arabia.

The region south and east of Israel, which included Paran, Teman, and southern Edom or Seir, was regarded as sacred by the Israelites throughout the early biblical period. Horeb, the mountain of God, was here (3:1), and from here the God of Israel was said to march on behalf of his people (cf. Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:4; Hab. 3:3, 7). Many scholars believe that the origins of Yahwism are to be sought in the vicinity of Midian, and it may be noteworthy in this regard that Moses' father-in-law is a "priest of Midian" (v. 16; cf. 3:1; 18:1) who in chap. 18 invokes, praises, and sacrifices to Yahweh. A distinctive culture, which archaeologists have tentatively designated Midianite, flourished in this region at the end of the second millennium B.C. Elsewhere in the Bible, the Midianites, though said in Gen. 25:2 to be descended from Abraham, are depicted as foreigners, sometimes regarded with hostility by the Israelites (e.g., Num. 31). In the Gideon story (Judg. 6-8) they are presented as camel-riding nomads, but the "Midianite" culture known from the archaeological record was largely sedentary.

Having rescued seven sisters from a group of hostile shepherds, Moses is befriended by their father, who takes him into his home and gives him Zipporah, one of his daughters, as a wife. She bears Moses a son, Gershom, whose name provides an occasion for wordplay involving the Hebrew term ger, "sojourner."

In this passage Moses' father-in-law is called Reuel. In Exod. 4:18, however, his name is Jethro (cf. chap. 18). The situation is further complicated by Judg. 4:11, where Moses' father-in-law is called Hobab and is said to have been a Kenite rather than a Midianite. Finally, Num. 10:29 speaks of "Hobab the son of Reuel, the father-in-law of Moses." Apparently there were at least two variants in this part of the tradition about Moses. According to the first, which was probably older, Moses' father-in-law was the Midianite Jethro. According to the second, which may have developed later in Judah, his father-in-law was Hobab the Kenite. Unless the name Reuel represents yet a third traditional variant, it must have arisen as an error based, perhaps, on the name of the father of Hobab or Jethro.

This account is followed by an editorial passage (Exod. 2:23-25) in which we are informed of two important events that have taken place offstage. The king of Egypt has died, so that it is now possible for Moses to return to Egypt (cf. 4:19). Yahweh, in the meantime, has taken note of the suffering of his people. The reference to the covenant with the patriarchs in v. 24 has the effect of incorporating the present events into the larger covenantal scheme of the Priestly history.

3:1-6, The Burning Bush. Moses leads his father-in-law's sheep to Mount Horeb, where he is astonished to see a bush that is burning but not consumed. He does not realize that what he has encountered is a messenger or angel of Yahweh in the form of a flame until, approaching the bush, he hears a divine voice speaking in the fire. Knowing that it is fatal for a human being to see a god (cf. 33:20), he covers his face and listens.

Horeb is another name for Sinai, the mountain at which the Israelites will assemble after their departure from Egypt (cf. v. 12). The name Sinai is probably hinted at by the designation of the burning bush in Hebrew as sene, as if Sinai meant "the mountain of the sene-bush" (cf. the designation of Yahweh as "the one who dwells in the sene-bush" in Deut. 33:16). The names Horeb and Sinai may derive from originally distinct traditions about the mountain of Yahweh, but in the present form of the story they are identical. The exact location of Mount Horeb is unknown; indeed, it had probably been forgotten by the time of the composition of most of the biblical literature. The present episode argues strongly for locating it in northwestern Arabia. The alternatives are discussed below in connection with the wilderness itinerary (see 15:22-18:27, "The Journey to Sinai").

3:7-4:17, The Commissioning of Moses. Next is the Bible's most detailed account of the reception of a divine commission. It seems also to have been the paradigmatic account, having influenced the stories of the commissioning of Gideon (Judg. 6:11-24), Samuel (1 Sam. 3:2-14), and others. It is, moreover, a composite account, produced by the combination of two versions of the events. Thus Moses' charge is reported twice, in a short version that derives from E (Exod. 3:9-10) and in a much longer version taken from J (3:7-8, 16-22). The P version of Moses' commissioning is preserved in 6:5-13. In both of the present versions the message Moses receives includes an announcement and a commission. Yahweh has taken notice of the affliction of the Israelites in Egypt, and he is sending Moses to bring them out of the land. In the J version, he is told to lead them into a new land, which, according to v. 8, will be "good" and, in contrast to the confinement the Israelites have experienced in Egypt, "broad," i.e., open and free. It is described as "a land flowing with milk and honey," a stereotyped phrase referring to the raising of livestock and beekeeping, staple economies of the central Israelite hills. The land is identified by its present inhabitants, listed in the usual formulaic way. At the conclusion of the J version, Moses is told to instruct the people to despoil the Egyptians when they leave (cf. 11:2-3; 12:35-36).

In each version the commission is followed by two questions raised by Moses in objection to Yahweh's plan. His first question in the E version (3:11-12) regards his own ability to accomplish the task. God assures him that "I will be with you," but the "sign" offered—that Moses will lead the people to this very mountain, where they will "serve God"—is puzzling. We expect some kind of reassurance before the fact (cf. Judg. 6:15-21). Moses' second objection in the E version (3:13-15) is that the Israelites will demand to know the name of the God who has commissioned him. According to Elohistic tradition, then, the Israelites had forgotten or did not yet know Yahweh's name. It is now revealed in a mysterious way. God identifies himself as "I am who I am" (v. 14). The Hebrew word 'ehye, "I am," is thus associated with the name Yahweh, and Moses is to tell the people that "I am" sent him. "I am who I am" belongs to a category of expressions designated idem per idem, used in biblical Hebrew and related languages to refer to gods. In one way or another, they stress divine freedom, majesty, and mystery. Compare "I show favor to whom I show favor, and I show compassion to whom I show compassion" in 33:19, and "I say what I say" in Ezek. 12:25.

Moses' first objection in the J version (4:1-9) is that, despite Yahweh's statement to the contrary (3:18), the people will not believe him. Yahweh responds by giving him three magical transformations to perform to authenticate himself (cf. Deut. 13:1-2); he will be able to turn his rod into a snake and back into a rod again, to make the skin of his hand diseased and healthy again, and to turn the water of the Nile into blood. All three of these tricks suggest the deadly character of the power Moses will wield, and the last adumbrates the first plague (7:14-24). Moses' second objection in the J version (4:10-16) is that he is inarticulate and "heavy of mouth and tongue," an expression that may mean he has a speech impediment. Yahweh's solution is to assign Moses' brother Aaron to be his spokesman. In depicting the leadership of Moses and Aaron in this way, the J narrative prefigures the rule of the Davidic king and Aaronic high priest in its own day. Note that at this point Aaron is called "the Levite" (v. 14), a title that could equally well be applied to Moses (cf. 2:1) but that here looks ahead to Aaron's role as ancestor of the levitical priests who presided in Jerusalem. Just as it was their responsibility to transmit the Mosaic law (cf. Lev. 10:11), so it was the responsibility of their ancestor to transmit the words of Moses himself.

At the end of the passage (v. 17) Moses is reminded to take along his rod, "with which you will perform the signs." The rod, then, is to be used not just for the serpent miracle (vv. 2-5) but to execute all the signs. This interpretation of the rod is characteristic of the E source, from which this notice derives.

4:18-31, Moses' Return to Egypt. The next passage combines a variety of narrative fragments under the general heading of Moses' return from Midian. It presents a number of interpretive difficulties. Without revealing his divine commission, Moses obtains permission from Jethro to return to Egypt. We are told that he prepares his wife and sons for the journey (v. 20), but we know only of Gershom (2:22), and 18:4 suggests that Eliezer was born after the Israelites left Egypt. Yahweh's orders in vv. 19 and 21-23 seem superfluous after the elaborate instructions Moses has already been given. Note, however, that vv. 22-23 introduce a new element, anticipating the final plague and giving it a clear rationale, which is lacking in chap. 11. Israel is Yahweh's firstborn (cf. Hos. 11:1; Jer. 31:9), and if Pharaoh refuses to release him, Pharaoh's firstborn will die.

The most difficult part of this passage is the enigmatic incident recorded in vv. 24-26. No motive is given for the attack. Presumably the attacker is some minor divinity, like the "man" who wrestled with Jacob at the ford of the Jab-bok (Gen. 32:24-30). Thus the episode shows that the blood of circumcision, like pascal blood (12:13), was thought of as having the power to fend off demonic assaults. If this is the case, however, it is surprising that the attacker is called "Yahweh" (the Septuagint understandably modifies this to "an angel of Yahweh"). Nor are we told who is attacked or to whose "feet" (probably meaning genitals) Zipporah touches her son's prepuce, but the majority of commentators assume that Moses is intended in both cases. The simplest interpretation is probably that Moses became gravely ill on the journey and, thanks to the quick thinking of his wife, was restored to health by a healing ritual. As it stands, the story has become a vehicle for explaining the expression "bridegroom of blood" or "son-in-law of blood," which was current in the time of the writer but is obscure to us.

In any case, Moses arrives safely at Mount Horeb, where Yahweh has instructed Aaron to meet him. As they make their way back to Egypt Moses reports to his brother all that has happened, and when they arrive, they inform the people of Yahweh's plans.

5:1-6:1

The First Audience with Pharaoh

The confrontation between Moses and the Egyptian king in this passage establishes the pattern for the contest with Pharaoh in 7:8-15:21. Moses and Aaron ask permission for the people to go into the wilderness and celebrate a feast to their God. Modern scholars cite this as evidence that the Passover or some antecedent festival was celebrated by the Israelites before the official institution of the Passover described in chap. 12. Moses and Aaron make their request first as a demand in Yahweh's name, but Pharaoh retorts that he does not acknowledge Yahweh's authority. They then attempt to reason with the king, arguing that Yahweh might become angry at their failure to celebrate the feast and punish them. The language used at this point is that of the theophany at the burning bush (5:3; cf. 3:18), and, as predicted at that time (3:19), Pharaoh refuses, making it necessary for Yahweh to strike Egypt with plagues (6:1; cf. 3:20).

Pharaoh concludes from the request that the Israelites are idle, i.e., in need of harder work. He therefore commands that the straw needed for brick making be withheld from them. Clay without straw produces very brittle bricks, so that the Israelites are obliged to forage for stubble, and the result is much more work. When the Israelite foremen complain to Pharaoh, they learn the cause of the new policy. They go out to Moses and Aaron and chide them for their loss of favor with Pharaoh. When Moses in turn complains to Yahweh, however, he is assured that everything is proceeding according to plan.

As we have seen, the episode of the bricks without straw continues the theme of hard labor introduced in 1:8-14. In discussing that passage, we noted an incompatibility between it and the stories leading up to Moses' birth. In light of that incompatibility the absence of Moses from 5:6-18 is striking. It is also noteworthy that, unlike other elements of the larger passage, the intensification of the labor of the Israelites is not anticipated in the theophany of the bush. Such considerations have led at least one modern commentator to the conclusion that there was an early tradition about the Exodus in which Moses played no part. A more moderate conclusion holds that both episodes (1:8-14 and 5:6-18) derive ultimately from an account of Israel's enslavement in Egypt that was related apart from or prior to Moses' appearance in the story. The first episode remains in such a position; the second has been incorporated into the larger narrative in the present position to link Pharaoh's intensification of the labor to the first request of Moses and Aaron.

6:2-7:7

The Mission of Moses and Aaron

The language of this passage connects it securely with the Priestly editorial remarks in 2:23-25. Yahweh has "heard the groaning" of the people and "remembered his covenant" (6:2; cf. 2:24), and he instructs Moses to announce his intention to deliver them from "their bondage" (v. 6; cf. 2:23). This, then, is the Priestly version of materials that have already been presented in their older (JE) form. The divine self-disclosure in 6:2-4 corresponds to the E account of the revelation of the divine name in 3:13-15. The commissioning of Moses and Aaron has its JE counterpart in chaps. 3 and 4. Within the context of the story as it is currently constituted, therefore, this passage must be understood as reiteration or confirmation of things already accomplished. Viewed as an independent unit, however, it is a new account of the same events. Its purpose is to incorporate the revelation to Moses and the work of Moses and Aaron into the larger Priestly history. The events now taking place in Egypt are interpreted as developments in the larger covenantal history that began with Noah and Abraham.

6:2-4, The Divine Self-Assertion. Yahweh speaks to Moses and identifies himself with the God who entered into a covenant with the patriarchs. He was known to them, he says, as El Shaddai (often rendered "God Almighty"). This epithet calls our attention to a series of thematic passages in the Priestly history having to do with Yahweh's beneficence toward Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and the covenant he made with them. In the most important of these, he appears to Abraham (Gen. 17:1) and Jacob (Gen. 35:11-12; cf. 48:3-4) and introduces himself with the words "I am El Shaddai." Now he begins his speech with the words "I am Yahweh." We know from the study of other ancient Near Eastern religious texts that the purpose of this kind of divine self-assertion is not simply identification; it also asserts the authority and power of the god who speaks. The primary purpose of the divine speech in our passage, then, is a reassertion of Yahweh's ancient authority, linking present deeds to past promises and stressing the identity of the God who will perform the wonderful deeds that are about to begin.

In the process of this reassertion, however, certain especially interesting details are mentioned. The patriarchs, we are told, did not know the God of the fathers by his name, Yahweh. They knew him instead as El Shaddai. Though contradicted by the Yahwistic tradition (e.g., Gen. 13:4), this position is consistently maintained in Priestly materials. Knowledge of the divine name was reserved for those who would enter into the Sinaitic covenant and follow the rules of the sacred life. The disclosure of the name at this point, then, shows that the time has come for this holy relationship to be solemnized.

The meaning of "El Shaddai" is obscure. The prevailing scholarly opinion is that it is an archaic divine epithet, which may originally have meant "El (God), the One of the Mountain." In an eighth-century B.C. text from Deir Alla, Jordan, the Shaddayim (plural of Shaddai) are the gods who meet in council to make decisions regarding the governance of the world. Thus Shaddayim may mean "mountain gods," i.e., those who meet on the mountain of the divine assembly (cf. the Olympians). If this is correct, the singular designation Shaddai or El Shaddai may have originally referred to a member of this group or, perhaps, to the presiding god of the assembly (cf. Zeus Olympios). The biblical evidence shows that this particular term was regarded as an ancient designation of Yahweh, known to those to whom his name had not been revealed, and this explains its thematic use in the Priestly history. The patriarchs were not beneficiaries of the final revelation, which begins only at this point.

6:5-13, The Commissioning of Moses. The P account of Moses' commissioning corresponds fairly closely to the composite JE account in 3:7-4:17. It includes the same two parts, an announcement and a commission. In keeping with the covenantal theology of the Priestly history, the announcement that Yahweh has taken notice of the affliction of the Israelites in Egypt is expanded to indicate that he has remembered his covenant with the patriarchs (v. 5). The commission has two parts: Yahweh sends Moses to the Israelites (vv. 6–8) and to Pharaoh (v. 10). Note again the emphasis placed on the identity of the God who is about to rescue Israel from bondage. The formula “I am Yahweh,” used first in v. 2 and discussed above, is repeated three times in the announcement of deliverance that Moses is to repeat to the people (vv. 6–8). The people are to be told that after their rescue they will know “that I am Yahweh.” In the Priestly history (as in the book of Ezekiel) a primary reason for Yahweh’s redemptive acts is that his name will be known and his power recognized. Thus it is important that he should accomplish the rescue not secretly or quietly but “with an outstretched arm and with great deeds” (v. 6). The objection Moses raises in v. 12 corresponds to his two objections in the Yahwistic version in chap. 4. He is a man of “uncircumcised lips” (cf. 4:10; →Circumcision). His own people have refused to listen to him (cf. 4:1). How then can Pharaoh be expected to listen? Yahweh’s response will be to commission Aaron to serve as Moses’ spokesman (cf. 4:14–16), but this next commissioning is delayed until chap. 7. The narrative is interrupted now for the insertion of a levitical genealogy to which the editorial summary in v. 13 provides a transition.

6:14–27, The Aaronid Genealogy. The purpose of this genealogy is to legitimate the authority of the Aaronidic line of Levites through whom the Jerusalem priesthood traced its ancestry. Thus it is finally a genealogy of Aaron and Moses (note the order). Though it begins like a standard tribal roster, it changes after Levi and his two older brothers have been listed and Levi’s position among the sons of Jacob has been established. Only Levi’s family is traced beyond the second generation. The primary interest is in the line from which Aaron and Moses descended: Levi, Kohath, and Amram. Life spans are given only for these three, a detail that has the effect of linking Aaron and Moses with the early fathers in the Priestly scheme of history. The keenest genealogical interest centers on Aaron himself, so that the names of his wife and those of his father and one of his sons, Eleazar, are given. This reflects a special interest in Eleazar’s son Phinehas, the only grandson of Aaron who is named. Phinehas is granted a “perpetual covenant” of priesthood in Num. 25:10–13, and the later high priests of Jerusalem traced their ancestry through him (cf. 1 Chron. 6:1–15). Note, finally, that in addition to Aaron and Moses there is a secondary interest here in Korah, the Levite who leads a rebellion against the authority of Moses and Aaron in Numbers 16. The details in Exod. 6:21 and 24 show the genealogical subordination of Korah (the eldest son of Kohath’s second son) to Aaron (the eldest son of Kohath’s firstborn).

6:28–7:7, The Commissioning of Aaron.

The next passage is a continuation of the account of Moses’ commissioning in 6:5–13. The two opening verses (6:28–29) provide an editorial recapitulation of the earlier passage, thus returning the narrative to the point at which it was interrupted for the insertion of the Aaronidic genealogy. Moses is then told that Aaron will be his spokesman. The image used is that of a god and his prophet: Moses’ words will have the equivalent of divine authority for Pharaoh, and Aaron will serve as the messenger who transmits them. The theology of the earlier passage is also resumed here. The rescue from Egypt will not be achieved in secret but by “signs and wonders” (7:3) and “great deeds” (v. 4). “I shall lay my hand upon Egypt,” says Yahweh (v. 4), an allusion to the plagues. All this will be done so that “the Egyptians will know that I am Yahweh” (v. 5). Again, the rescue must be performed in a spectacular and public fashion, because its purpose is not only to gain freedom for the people of Israel but also to demonstrate the power of the God of Israel. This point of view also explains the otherwise troubling phenomenon of the hardening of Pharaoh’s heart, already alluded to once before (4:21). Even as he is demanding that Pharaoh release his Hebrew slaves, Yahweh is also causing him to be obstinate and refuse. Later on, we shall come to instances in which Pharaoh agrees to the departure of the Israelites, only to change his mind when Yahweh intervenes and hardens his heart (9:12; 10:20, 27). If the only objective in Yahweh’s dealings with Pharaoh were to obtain the release of the Israelites, this hardening of the heart would seem capricious or self-defeating. Its necessity only becomes clear when we take account of the second objective, namely, the public demonstration of Yahweh’s power.

7:8–13:16

The Plague Narrative

Yahweh, through the agency of Moses and Aaron, strikes Egypt with a series of afflictions of increasing severity, until Pharaoh finally agrees to release the Israelites. The report of the final plague, the slaying of the firstborn, is accompanied by an elaborate account of the Passover celebration. One widely accepted theory holds that the plague narrative originated as a “cult legend,” that is, a story composed to explain a ceremony, in this case the celebration of the Passover, and to give the ceremony a historical basis. According to this theory, the original story said that the Israelites escaped from Egypt secretly at night, only to be overtaken by the Egyptian army at the Red Sea. An alternative view holds that a casual or coincidental reference to the Passover blood rite in the original account attracted the ritual materials into the story. In fact, most of the ritual elaborations in chaps. 12-13 derive from the latest of the pentateuchal sources (D and P). In the earliest of the pentateuchal sources (J), the people perform the Passover blood rite for protection against Yahweh's "destroyer" (12:21-23) and carry unleavened bread with them as they go (12:34, 39), but there are no further ritual details.

7:8-10:29

The First Nine Plagues

Plague is a weapon the God of Israel wields against the unjust and the enemies of his people. When the divine warrior marches, plague and pestilence go at his heels (Hab. 3:5). When the Philistines rout the Israelites and take home the holy Ark as plunder, a plague of mice and tumors breaks out in their cities (1 Sam. 4-6). When David angers Yahweh by taking a census of Israel, a plague decimates the country (2 Sam. 24). And in this account, whenever Pharaoh refuses to release the Israelites, a scourge of some kind strikes his land.

The plagues that afflict Egypt include diseases, infestations, and disasters of all kinds. Most of them correspond in some near or remote way to natural phenomena that were known in ancient Egypt. Noting this fact, many commentators have concluded that the memory of some historical natural disaster or series of such disasters was the basis for the story. Some have even attempted to reconstruct the event by combining the details of the biblical account with information derived from studies of the natural history of the Nile basin. The difficulty with such studies is that they do not take into account the complexity of the biblical plague tradition or its history. Although it is very likely, perhaps certain, that a knowledge of natural phenomena in Egypt lies behind many of the individual plague episodes, it is very unlikely that a single, historical chain of events gave rise to the complex of tradition as a whole.

The tradition of the plagues against Egypt is mentioned elsewhere in the Bible, notably in Pss. 78:44-51 and 105:28-36. Both of these psalms were probably composed in pre-exilic times (i.e., before the sixth century B.C.), thus earlier than the present form of the Exodus story. In both, the number of plagues is seven, not ten as in our account. Moreover, the psalms differ in the order of the plagues, both from each other and from our account, as the accompanying table shows.

The Plagues Against Egypt: Their Number and Order in Exodus and Two Psalms

EXODUS	PSALM 78	PSALM 105
1. blood	1. blood	1. darkness
2. frogs	2. flies	2. blood
3. gnats	3. frogs	3. frogs
4. flies	4. caterpillars/ locusts	4. flies/ gnats
5. cattle	5. hail/frost	5. hail
6. boils	6. cattle	6. locusts
7. hail	7. firstborn	7. firstborn
8. locusts
9. darkness
10. firstborn

Our Exodus plague narrative is composite, a combination of a Priestly (P) account with an older Yahwistic (J) account. The latter can be reconstructed with some confidence. It almost certainly had not ten but seven plagues. The third (gnats), sixth (boils), and ninth (darkness) plagues were not included. The following list illustrates the form of this original Yahwistic plague narrative.

1. blood (7:14-15a, 16-18, 21a, 23-24)
2. frogs (7:25-8:15)
3. flies (8:20-32)
4. cattle (9:1-7)
5. hail (9:13-18, 23b-24, 25b-34)
6. locusts (10:1a, 3-11, 13b, 14b-20, 24-26, 28-29)
7. firstborn (11:4-8)

There is also Elohist (E) material here, but its extent is difficult to determine. Many scholars doubt that there was an independent E account of the plagues and regard the scant E material they find in these chapters as a series of glosses on J. Others believe there was a complete E account but that much of it has been lost. Too little survives, in any case, to permit us to reconstruct its original form. Moses' rod, which is considered indicative of E (see the commentary above on 4:17), figures prominently in most of the materials assigned to E in the plague narrative. These include the following: the references to Moses' rod in vv. 15, 17, and 20 of the account of the first plague (7:14-24); accounts of the plagues of hail (9:22-23a, 25a, 35a) and locusts (10:12-13a, 14a) inserted into the J accounts of the same plagues; and the full account of the plague of darkness (10:21-23), which lacks any reference to Moses' rod and is sometimes assigned to P. As for the Priestly materials, there is general agreement among scholars about those portions of the narrative that describe the first six plagues (7:14-9:12). P accounts of the first two plagues, blood (7:19-20a, 21b-22) and frogs (8:5-7, 15b), have been incorporated into the J(E) account. The reports of the plagues of gnats (8:16-19) and boils

(9:8-12) derive exclusively from P. Aaron figures prominently in all of these episodes. In the reports of the later plagues (9:13-11:10), however, he recedes into the background, and it becomes much more difficult to detect P material. Only the addition of the Priestly formula of affirmation ("as Yahweh had spoken through Moses") in 9:35b and the final summary in 11:9-10 can be identified with certainty.

The underlying Yahwistic narrative was carefully organized, and its structure, though partly obscured by the editorial combination with the Priestly account, is still visible in the story. In the seven-stage J version the plagues escalated from three that were nuisances (blood, frogs, and flies) to three that destroyed property (cattle, hail, and locusts) to one that took human life (firstborn). Thus we can still observe a general intensification of the plagues from lesser annoyances to more serious afflictions. In the J version the scene of the confrontation between Moses and Pharaoh alternated strictly between an early morning outdoor setting (J's first, third, and fifth plagues) and a setting within the palace (J's second, fourth, and sixth plagues). In the present form of the story the outdoor setting introduces the first, fourth, and seventh plagues, while the palace is the setting for the second, fifth, and eighth. The third, sixth, and ninth plagues, which derive from other versions, mention no audience with Pharaoh. In the J version, Yahweh acted directly to execute the plagues, without first instructing Aaron to wield his rod or Moses to raise his hand. In the P version, however, some such agent seems always to have been used. In the present, composite narrative, the first three plagues are initiated by Aaron's rod and the last four by Moses' hand or rod; the fourth and fifth are executed directly by Yahweh himself.

7:8-13, Aaron's Rod. At the beginning of the episode of Aaron's rod (vv. 8-9) instructions for its use are given to Moses and Aaron. This is the P equivalent of 4:1-5, a J passage in which such a rod was given to Moses alone. When the divine instructions are carried out and the miracle is performed (v. 10), it is Aaron who wields the rod. The term for the creature into which the rod turns is not the same here as in 4:3. It may mean "snake," like the earlier word, but it is also possible that it means "crocodile." The Egyptian magicians turn their rods into crocodiles too, but Aaron's crocodile devours theirs. This contest sets the pattern for the first three plagues, which will be initiated by agency of Aaron's rod. The point is simply that, though the power of the Egyptian magicians is great, it is far surpassed by that of the servants of Yahweh.

7:14-24, The Plague of Blood. A well-known Egyptian text contains a complaint that the Nile has turned to blood and those who drink from it thirst for water. The natural phenomenon to which both this Egyptian text and the biblical story of the plague of blood point is probably the presence of red particles in the water of the Nile at the time of the annual inundation, which carried silt from the tropical red earth of the basin of the Blue Nile in Ethiopia and the Sudan. The presence of red microorganisms may sometimes have intensified the effect. According to our text, however, the water is turned to blood, not to the color of blood. It is thus undrinkable, and the Egyptians are obliged to dig wells (v. 24). Note also the additional details in the P portions of this composite account (vv. 19-20a, 21b-22). It is not only the Nile that is affected, but all natural bodies of water and even water stored in artificial containers. This effect is achieved through the agency of Aaron's rod, but the Egyptian magicians are able to duplicate it, and Pharaoh is unmoved.

7:25-8:15, The Plague of Frogs. The next is also a composite account. In the J version the frogs were brought up directly by Yahweh himself. The P materials in 8:5-7 introduce Aaron's rod as the agent. Again, the Egyptian magicians are equal to the task and produce their own frogs.

8:16-19, The Plague of Gnats. Other translations that have been proposed for the plague of gnats are "lice" and "mosquitoes." This plague has no equivalent in the lists in Psalms 78 and 105. Nor did it appear in the original Yahwistic narrative. This account derives strictly from Priestly tradition. Moreover, since there is no P account of the plague of flies that follows, it is safe to conclude that the plague of gnats arose as a variant of the plague of flies. Like the two previous plagues, this one is initiated by Aaron's rod. In this case, however, the Egyptian magicians are unable to duplicate the feat. Still, Pharaoh remains adamant.

8:20-32, The Plague of Flies. Some kind of biting flies is intended in the account of the plague of flies, such as gadflies or stable flies. Yahweh brings them up himself in this strictly Yahwistic account. There is no Priestly material here, and nothing is said of Aaron's rod or the Egyptian magicians. A new motif is introduced, however. This plague discriminates between the Egyptians and the Israelites. There are no flies in Goshen, where the Israelites dwell. There is also a change in Pharaoh's attitude at this point. He seeks a compromise with Moses, granting the Israelites permission to sacrifice to their God within the land. This, however, is not in keeping with Moses' charge, and he declines, offering the excuse that Israelite offerings might be religious abominations to the Egyptians. Pharaoh then agrees to let the Israelites journey a short distance into the wilderness, but when the flies are gone, he hardens his heart again.

9:1–7, The Plague on the Cattle. This next passage is another strictly Yahwistic account. Aaron and the Egyptian magicians are not mentioned, and the livestock disease, which may be anthrax, is inflicted directly by Yahweh. Again a distinction is made between the Egyptians and the Israelites, whose cattle are not affected. Pharaoh is again unmoved.

9:8–12, The Plague of Boils. The sixth plague, like the third (gnats), has no equivalent in the lists in Psalms 78 and 105, and it was not included in the original Yahwistic plague narrative. This account derives entirely from Priestly tradition. It probably arose as a variant of the cattle plague, the boils “on man and beast” (9:9) referring to the carbuncles that appear on the skin at the onset of anthrax, a disease that afflicts humans as well as animals. Unlike the other plagues, which are initiated either directly by Yahweh or by agency of the hand or rod of one of his servants, this one begins in a unique way: Moses hurls ashes into the air. Aaron has returned, however, and so have the Egyptian magicians, though only as victims of the boils. Note that here for the first time Yahweh hardens Pharaoh’s heart (see the commentary above on 7:8–10:29, “The First Nine Plagues”).

9:13–35, The Plague of Hail. The destruction of the Egyptian crops by a hailstorm is described in a long, composite narrative. An Elohist account (22–23a, 25a, 35) has been combined with the older Yahwistic version. There is no discernible Priestly narrative here, but note the standard Priestly formula of affirmation at the end of v. 35 (cf. 7:22; 8:15, 19; 9:12). The information given in vv. 19–21 and 31–32 is generally regarded as deriving from late, interpretive expansions, not one of the pentateuchal sources. The storm begins when Moses waves his rod toward the sky, though in the original J account Yahweh hurled down the hailstones himself (v. 23b). Again, the destruction does not extend to Goshen. As in the fourth plague (flies), Pharaoh agrees to release the Israelites, this time even admitting the justice of Yahweh’s cause, but when the storm is over he reneges.

10:1–20, The Plague of Locusts. The next is another extended account, combining a short E version (12–13a, 14a) with the much longer J narrative. There is also a late expansion in vv. 1b–2, but no P material can be detected. In the J version the locusts were brought by the east wind, which was summoned by Yahweh himself (v. 13b; cf. 19). In the combined form of the story, however, the locusts come when Moses waves his rod over the land. As was the case after the preceding plague, Pharaoh admits his guilt and begs Moses to entreat Yahweh. When the locusts are gone, however, Yahweh hardens Pharaoh’s heart (cf. 9:12).

10:21–29, The Plague of Thick Darkness. The ninth plague is a palpable darkness (cf. v. 21), associated by some commentators with a hot, dust-laden wind that blows into Egypt from the Sahara. Pharaoh is again inclined to negotiate. He offers to let the Israelites depart without their livestock, but Moses explains that all the animals must go, since it will be impossible to tell which will be needed for sacrifice before arriving in the wilderness. Yahweh again hardens Pharaoh’s heart, and the king sends Moses away, threatening him with death if he returns. Negotiations have broken down. Note that the darkness is summoned by a wave of Moses’ hand, like the seventh and eighth plagues in their E versions (9:22; 10:12). Like the third and sixth plagues, which are known only from a P account, it lacks any opening audience with Pharaoh. Thus it is sometimes assigned to E, sometimes to P. The account of the negotiations with Pharaoh in vv. 24–29 probably followed v. 20 directly in the original J narrative, but there was no plague of thick darkness in that narrative, and although darkness does appear in the list in Psalm 105 (as the first plague!), it is absent from Psalm 78. It is possible, therefore, that it arose as a variant of the plague of locusts, which “covered the eye of the land, so that the land became dark” (10:15).

11:1–13:16 The Final Plague

The next section describes the final plague and consequent departure of the Israelites from Egypt. Despite the drama and excitement inherent in this story, the narrative that contains it is very slow-moving. The reason for the slow pace is the presence in the account of substantial ritual material. The events related here were of such religious importance to the ancient community that they were celebrated regularly in the cult, and the form the celebration took has in turn influenced the description of the events. The departure from Egypt was memorialized by the rites of the Passover, and a full account of these rites as stipulated in Priestly tradition has been incorporated into our story. Accounts of the Feast of Unleavened Bread and the consecration of the firstborn are also included here. Though they seem to be diverse in origin, these observances are implicitly associated with the Passover by their inclusion here, and they are described in language that explicitly identifies them with the tenth plague and the events of the departure from Egypt.

11:1-10, The Announcement of the Tenth Plague. Chap. 11 looks back at the plague story and ahead toward the account of the Passover. In the original Yahwistic narrative the slaying of the firstborn was the climactic seventh plague. As a result of the compilation of this composite narrative, the death of the Egyptian firstborn, now the tenth plague, has become a part of (and indeed the introduction to) the story of the institution of the Passover. The opening section of this passage (vv. 1-3), however, is concerned with neither the first-born plague nor the Passover. It looks ahead to the account of the spoliation of the Egyptians in 12:35-36. It is the E equivalent of the J passage in 3:21-22, and its editorial insertion at this point has created a serious narrative difficulty. When he begins to prophesy in v. 4, Moses seems to be speaking to Yahweh! But this makes no sense, and the end of the speech shows that he is addressing Pharaoh. Verses 4-8, then, were originally attached directly to the end of chap. 10. They represent a continuation of Moses' angry speech in 10:29.

The announcement of the death of the Egyptian firstborn is presented in a matter-of-fact way. No rationale of the kind we noted in 4:22-23 is offered. The purpose seems to be to afflict Egypt so dreadfully that, despite Pharaoh's obstinacy, his people will come humbly to Moses and ask him to leave (v. 8). The theme of discrimination that we have seen before is here too: the Israelite firstborn are to be spared (v. 7). We know from the law in chap. 13, however, that when the Israelites are living in the promised land, Yahweh will also claim their firstborn. As explained in the discussion of 13:1-16, the point of the rule requiring the consecration of the firstborn is that, as guarantor of the increase of family, flock, and field, Yahweh is entitled to the first fruits of each. The first-born offering, in other words, is made in recognition of Yahweh's sovereignty over all life in the promised land. Thus the plague tradition, in stating that Yahweh finally took the firstborn of the Egyptians, implies that he has sovereignty over life in Egypt too and by implication life everywhere.

12:1-28, The Institution of the Passover. Chap. 12 opens with a long speech of Yahweh instituting the Passover celebration (vv. 1-20), followed by a speech of Moses to the elders of Israel describing the blood rite of Passover (vv. 21-27a). Much of Moses' speech (vv. 21-23) derives from J's account of the institution of Passover and thus represents a Yahwistic parallel to the Priestly account in vv. 1-20. According to the present form of the text, however, Moses' speech is to be read as an abbreviated report to the people of the instructions given by Yahweh.

The instructions for the Passover ritual begin with the inauguration of a new calendar (vv. 1-2). "This month," which we know from 13:4 to be Abib (March-April), is now to be the beginning of the year, an arrangement that reflects the perspective of the Priestly author of this part of the passage. During the time of the Israelite monarchy, the end of the year (and thus the beginning too) came at time of harvest in the fall (cf. 23:16; 34:22). Beginning in the sixth century B.C., however, the Babylonian calendar was adopted, so that the month in the Jewish calendar corresponding to Abib has the Babylonian name of Nisan and is regarded as the first month of the year (→ New Year Festival).

The J account of the blood rite in vv. 21-23 makes no reference to the Passover meal described in the preceding P account. The blood rite is apotropaic, i.e., designed to avert evil, in this case a demon called "the destroyer" (v. 23) who has been sent by Yahweh to slay the firstborn of Egypt. Studies of similar festivals known to have been celebrated in pre-Islamic Arabia suggest that the purpose of such a rite was to ensure the safety of the flock by the sacrifice of one of the newborns at the time of lambing in the spring. In all probability, then, the Passover blood rite was already being celebrated annually by the Israelites prior to its association with the particular event of the slaying of the firstborn in Egypt. This, indeed, may be the sacrifice repeatedly referred to by Moses in his petitions to Pharaoh (e.g., 3:18). In our earliest source (J), however, the rite has already become associated with the tenth plague. The blood of the victim is understood as a sign to Yahweh (v. 23), and "the destroyer" is the agent of his wrath against the Egyptians. Verses 24-27a, in which the connection between the Passover sacrifice and the tenth plague is made even more explicit, are discussed below in connection with 13:1-16.

The details of the Passover meal described in the P material in vv. 1-20 show that it is a feast for beginning a new year and leaving the old one behind and, similarly, for setting out on the journey into the wilderness and leaving the life in Egypt behind. Symbolically, then, the clothes worn are the clothes of travelers (v. 11). The common factor in the stipulated foods is that none makes use of any product of the culture—or the year—being left behind. The lamb must be roasted, i.e., cooked directly in the fire without the use of any cooking pot or even water—thus it cannot be boiled (v. 9). The bread must be baked without leaven, a product of the previous year's harvest. We cannot identify the other food, "bitter herbs," with certainty, but it was probably some kind of uncultivated vegetable. Note too that because these foods have not been transformed by human culture (as by boiling or fermenting with leaven), they are suitable for sacrificial use. The pascal lamb is to be an unblemished male (v. 5), roasted whole (v. 9) like the burnt offering of Leviticus 1, and the bread is to be free of leaven, which, along with honey (another agent of fermentation), is excluded from all cereal offerings (Lev. 2:11). Thus the meal has the effect of purifying the Israelites for the life to come under Yahweh's guidance in the wilderness (or in the new year).

A well-known theory contends that the Passover meal, like the Passover blood rite, originated as part of an annual ritual that was secondarily combined with the tradition of the tenth plague. In particular, the meal is said to have originated as a nomadic ritual. Thus it requires no temple or sanctuary of any kind. The pascal lamb is taken from the flock and eaten along with unleavened bread (the usual bread of nomads). The participants wear nomadic dress (Exod. 12:11). In the biblical Passover tradition, according to this theory, this annual festival has been reinterpreted as a commemoration of the departure from Egypt and the escape from the plague on the firstborn. The Passover feast is now understood as a memorial meal. The bread is eaten unleavened because the people are in a hurry (cf. vv. 34, 39). The pastoral clothes are the clothes of travelers about to set out. The name of the ritual in Hebrew, pesach, whatever it originally meant, is now understood in reference to the sparing of the Israelite firstborn (v. 27): it is called "Pass-over" because Yahweh "passed over" (Heb. pasach) the houses of the Israelites (the meaning of the verb has also been explained in other ways, including "have compassion on," "leave out," and "protect").

In vv. 15-20 the Feast of Unleavened Bread is ordained (cf. 13:3-10). This arrangement has the effect of combining this feast with the unleavened bread rite in the Passover celebration (cf. Ezek. 45:21-24). Lev. 23:5-6, however, shows that the two were originally separate: Passover was a one-day feast celebrated on the fourteenth of the month, and Unleavened Bread was a seven-day feast that began on the fifteenth. Unleavened Bread was originally a festival celebrating the spring harvest, but, like Passover, it was partly reinterpreted as a commemoration of the departure from Egypt in both Priestly and Deuteronomistic tradition (cf. Deut. 16:1-8).

12:29-36, The Death of the Firstborn. The next part of the narrative describes the events elaborately prepared for in the preceding passages. The threat in 11:4-8 is now carried out. Despite his own warning in 10:28, Pharaoh summons Moses and Aaron and addresses them in terms of complete capitulation. He no longer seeks a compromise or attempts to negotiate, so that, in contrast to his most recent offer (10:24), he willingly releases the livestock. The Egyptian people are even more urgent, actually driving the Israelites away and willingly granting the gifts anticipated in 3:21-22 and 11:2. The verb used here in v. 36b, as well as 3:22, is a verb of plunder (cf. 2 Chron. 20:25), indicating that these valuables are to be understood as spoils of war. The Israelites leave Egypt not as escaped slaves but as conquerors.

12:37-42, The Departure from Egypt. The first stage of Israel's journey is from Rameses to Succoth, probably another name for Pithom (1:11). The "mixed multitude" that join the march are non-Israelites (the same term is used in Neh. 13:3); the early exegetical tradition associated them with "the rabble who were among" the Israelites in Num. 11:4. Even without this group, however, the total number who participated is said to have been six hundred thousand men in addition to women, children, and livestock (cf. Num. 11:21). The total, which derives from Num. 1:46, is impossibly large in terms of ancient demographics, and, even if we adopt the common expedient of understanding six hundred "thousands" as six hundred (military) contingents, it remains implausible. The other number given in this passage is also problematic. In a Priestly epilogue to the Egyptian period in Israel's history (vv. 40-42), we are told that the Israelites had been in Egypt for 430 years, a period forecast as 400 years in Gen. 15:13. In Gen. 15:16, however, it was stated that the Israelites would return in the fourth generation (cf. the four generations from Jacob to Aaron in Exod. 6:14-27 above). Numbers of this kind cannot be used as historical resources. They originated in the ancient interpretive tradition, having been calculated from information not available to us and on the basis of criteria that would not be acceptable to most modern historians.

12:43-51, The Ordinance of the Passover. The purpose of the next short Priestly passage is to stipulate who may participate in the celebration of Passover. In particular, the issue of non-Israelite participation is addressed, and it may be that the reference to the presence of "a mixed multitude" among the Israelites in v. 38 prompted an editor to place this passage at this point. Foreigners are excluded from the ritual meal, as are hired resident servants (the term is obscure). On the other hand, "sojourners," that is, legally resident foreigners, may participate if the males are circumcised, and this rule applies also to slaves. Since circumcision is also required of the Israelite males themselves, there is one law for both the native-born (the term anticipates the Israelites' residency in Canaan) and the resident foreigner.

13:1-16, The Consecration of the Firstborn. Early Israelite tradition held that Yahweh, as proprietor of the land and guarantor of life and fertility, was entitled to the first fruits of the harvest and the firstborn of both animals and humans (cf. 22:29-30). Every firstborn male, therefore, was subject to sacrifice to Yahweh. The rules stated here in vv. 12-13 require that such a sacrifice be carried out for all clean livestock. But for the firstborn of the ass, which is unclean, and for human firstborn, the substitution of a lamb is to be made.

Apart, perhaps, from vv. 1-2 this passage does not seem to have been a part of the Priestly history. It is a Deuteronomistic addition intended to connect both the Feast of Unleavened Bread (vv. 3-10) and the rule of the firstborn (vv. 11-16) to events during the departure from Egypt. Exod. 12:24-27a above, another Deuteronomistic expansion, does the same for the Passover. As noted in the discussion of 12:15-20, the Feast of Unleavened Bread was originally an independent festival, but here, as in chap. 12, it is related to the Exodus (cf. Deut. 16:1-4). Similarly, the consecration of the firstborn was an ancient practice deriving from pre-Israelite times and originally having nothing to do with the Exodus. Here, however, it is related to Yahweh's slaughter of the Egyptian firstborn. Note the clear structural parallels between these two units (vv. 3-10, 11-16). Both look ahead to the time when the Israelites are living in Canaan (vv. 5, 11; cf. 12:25); both prescribe answers to questions sons will ask their fathers (vv. 8 and 14-15; cf. 12:26-27a); and both require that the words be worn as signs on the hand and frontlets between the eyes (vv. 9, 16). The original meaning of the last requirement, which gave rise to the wearing of tefillin (phylacteries) in postbiblical Judaism, is uncertain (→ Phylacteries).

13:17-18:27

The Sojourn in the Wilderness

The period spent in the wilderness was remembered as a distinct and important time in Israelite tradition. It was a time of transition between Egypt and Canaan, slavery and freedom. It was also a time of isolation, helplessness, and total dependence on divine sustenance. The biblical account of the period is found in two widely separated sections, the first describing the events that took place on the way from Egypt to Sinai (Exod. 13:17-18:27) and the second tracing the journey from Sinai to the plains of Moab on the border of the promised land (Num. 10:11-36:13). The separation was caused by the insertion of the legal materials now included in the Sinai pericope (Exod. 19:1-Num. 10:10). One of the results of the separation was the creation of duplicate accounts of certain episodes, such as the manna and quails (Exod. 16, Num. 11) and the water from the rock (Exod. 17, Num. 20). Both parts of the account are characterized by two dominant motifs, one positive and one negative. The positive motif is that of the miraculous provisions by which Yahweh ensures Israel's welfare. These include the water from the rock, the manna, and the quails; but the first and greatest is the miracle at the sea. The negative motif is that of the "murmuring" of the people. Oblivious to the miraculous things being done for them in the desert and heedless of the promises of the prosperity that lies ahead in the land, the people become anxious, complaining against Moses and longing to return to Egypt. Thus the wilderness period was remembered as a time of divine solicitude and miraculous protection but also of human ingratitude, discontent, and even rebellion.

13:17-15:21

The Crossing of the Red Sea

The familiar story of the crossing of the Red Sea is the result of a long and complex literary history, much of which can be reconstructed from a close examination of Exodus 14 and 15. Scholars agree that the old poem in 15:1-19 is the earliest account of the event at the sea. The prose account in 14:5-31 is composite, having been compiled from at least two different versions of the event, those of J and P, with occasional additions from E. A comparison of the descriptions of the events in these three sources reveals the development of the story in Israelite tradition.

According to the Song of the Sea, Yahweh hurled Pharaoh and his army into the waters and they sank (15:4-5). Yahweh's agent was evidently a raging ocean, whipped up by a violent windstorm, which the poet identifies as the divine breath ("the blast of your nostrils," v. 8). Pharaoh's army pursued the Israelites relentlessly (v. 9), but the divine wind continued to blow, and the Egyptians sank "like lead" (v. 10). Since they were hurled into the waters, we must assume that the Egyptians were traveling in boats or, less likely, along a cliff overlooking the sea. We are not told where the Israelites were or what they were doing while these events took place.

In the earlier of the two prose accounts in chap. 14 (J), the event is described as follows: Pharaoh pursued the Israelites and overtook them encamped by the sea (14:9a). The pillar of cloud moved between the two armies and kept them apart for the night (vv. 19b-20). Yahweh drove back the sea all night long with a strong east wind (cf. 10:13), so that the floor of the sea became dry (v. 21a). In the morning the pillar of cloud panicked the Egyptians (v. 24), locking up the wheels of their chariots (v. 25a, sometimes assigned to E), and they fled in terror (v. 25b). The sea returned to its normal flow just as the Egyptians were rushing toward it (v. 27a). Yahweh "shook off" the Egyptians in the sea (v. 27b)—meaning, perhaps, that he scattered and drowned them—and the awestruck Israelites watched the bodies of their enemies wash up on the shore (v. 30). The differences between this account and that in chap. 15 are subtle but clear. The wind is Yahweh's weapon in both. In the old poem the wind causes the sea to rage and casts the Egyptians into the waters. In the J account the wind causes the waters to back up, and the Egyptians, fleeing across the dried ocean floor, are drowned when the wind stops and the waters return. This version may have arisen in part from an interpretation of parts of the Song of the Sea, where we are told first that the wind caused the waters to stand up "like a heap" (v. 8) and then that the wind caused the waters to cover the Egyptians (v. 10). Though their original meaning was that the Egyptians were cast into a violent, wind-tossed sea, these verses were understood to mean that the wind blew the waters away from the seabed and then back again, trapping the Egyptians. Another factor that may have favored this change was the influence of a ritual in which the escape at the sea was memorialized and linked with the crossing of the Jordan into the promised land. This possibility is suggested by the ritual character of the account in Joshua 3, where we are told that the waters of the Jordan were stopped and stood up in "a single heap" (Josh. 3:16; cf. Exod. 15:8) while the people crossed over on dry land.

The later account in chap. 14 (P) tells the story very differently. Pharaoh pursued the Israelites with his entire army and overtook them at Pi-hahiroth (vv. 8, 9b). Yahweh told Moses to stretch out his hand over the sea (vv. 15-16), and when he did so, the waters divided. The Israelites crossed through the sea on dry land with walls of water on both sides (vv. 21-22, 29). When the Egyptians followed (v. 23), Moses was told to stretch out his hand again (vv. 26-27a), and the waters returned, covering the chariots, the horsemen, and the entire Egyptian army (v. 28). The most striking change that took place in the story between the composition of the J and P accounts was the addition of the motif of the parting of the sea. In the earlier version, the waters were not parted but driven back by the wind. It has been suggested that this change was influenced by the mythological tradition of the slaying and splitting of the sea dragon, to which we have allusions in several biblical passages (Ps. 74:13-14; cf. Isa. 27:1; Job 9:8; 26:12; Ps.

89:9-10). We know that by the sixth century B.C., the date to which P is usually assigned, the traditions of the slaying of the dragon and the escape at the sea had become associated, as Isa. 51:9-11 shows.

13:17-14:4, The Journey to the Sea. The Israelites set out from Succoth (12:37) and journey to Etham, "on the edge of the wilderness" (13:20; cf. Num. 33:6), the Wilderness of Etham being another name for the Wilderness of Shur (15:22). They are then told to turn back and encamp "in front of Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, in front of Baal-zephon" (14:2; cf. Num. 33:7). Though these places must all lie somewhere in the eastern delta of the Nile, their exact location is uncertain (→ Pi-hahiroth; Migdol; Baal-zephon). What is clear is that the exodus will not follow the Way of the Sea ("the Way of the Philistines," 13:17), the direct route from Goshen to Canaan through the northern part of the Sinai peninsula (→ Trade and Transportation). Two reasons for this, deriving from two literary sources, are given. First, the Israelites would too quickly encounter armed resistance that way (13:17 [E]), a judgment affirmed by modern historians, who point to Egyptian military control of the Via Maris. Second, if the Israelites enter the wilderness, Pharaoh will assume they are trapped there and be lured into pursuing them, thus offering Yahweh an opportunity to "gain glory from Pharaoh and all his forces" (14:1-4 [P]). So the journey begins in a southerly direction, toward the desert and the Gulf of Suez (cf. 13:18). According to the J portion of this episode (13:21-22) the march is led by Yahweh himself manifested as a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, a mode of theophany that anticipates the storm cloud imagery of chap. 19. The Israelites make camp "at the sea" (14:2), evidently the Red Sea (cf. 13:18; 15:4). Hebrew yam suph seems to mean "Sea of Reeds," however, and it has become a commonplace of modern scholarship to point out that the ancient interpretive tradition associating this body of water with the Red Sea is incorrect. Recent research has argued that yam suph probably means "Sea of the End." It was used to designate any remote ocean or sea, but especially the Red Sea, including the gulfs of Suez and Aqabah or Elath (1 Kings 9:26; Jer. 49:21). Thus the sea involved in the episode that follows is probably the Red Sea after all.

14:5-31, The Escape at the Sea. Though the crossing of the Red Sea is often thought of in connection with the departure from Egypt, it is more correctly associated with the sojourn in the wilderness. The account of the wilderness period began in 13:17-18, where we were told that Israel entered the wilderness. The pillar of cloud and fire, the mode of theophany that characterizes the wilderness stories, appeared first in 13:21-22. The murmuring motif begins here in 14:10-14, and the salvation at the sea is the first and greatest of the miraculous provisions.

As explained above, the narrative in chap. 14 was produced by combining parallel accounts from J and P. A few details, such as the designation of the pillar of cloud as an "angel of God" in v. 19a, also derive from E. In the J narrative, Pharaoh changes his mind again, regrets the loss of his labor force (v. 5), and pursues the Israelites. Thus the events at the sea, which we have already described above, represent God's definitive solution to the threat of the vacillating Egyptian king. In the P account, however, these events are carefully orchestrated by Yahweh from the beginning (cf. v. 4). Pharaoh pursues the Israelites because Yahweh hardens his heart (v. 8), and the Egyptian soldiers follow them into the sea because he hardens their hearts (v. 17). Note, finally, the new motif introduced in vv. 10-14. When the Israelites see the Egyptian army following them, they become fearful, regret their decision to leave Egypt, and complain to Moses. This is the beginning of the "murmuring" theme, which will develop further in the account of the sojourn in the wilderness below.

15:1-19, The Song of the Sea. Many scholars think that the Song of the Sea is one of the oldest surviving specimens of Hebrew poetry. The language and poetic style are consistently archaic. Many also regard the poem as an eyewitness account that was accorded a position of special honor when the escape at the sea came to be memorialized in the liturgy of early Israel. Often called a victory song or hymn of thanksgiving, it has features characteristic of many literary types, but, taken as a whole, it cannot be identified with any one of the fixed genres of biblical or extrabiblical poetry. Though it may not have been included in any of the continuous narrative sources, it antedates all of them and was cited by incipit (opening lines) in at least one of them (v. 21, probably J). It has a two-part thematic structure. The first part (vv. 1b-12) is an account of the Red Sea event with perorations on the propriety of praising Yahweh (v. 2) and his incomparability (v. 11). As explained above, this account describes the event at the sea as a terrific windstorm during which the Egyptians were hurled into the waters. The second part (vv. 13-18) describes the conduct of the Israelites to Yahweh's "mountain of heritage" (v. 17), that is, to Canaan. Yahweh guides the people first to his "holy encampment" (v. 13), causing grave concern to the peoples living in or near the promised land (the Philistines, Canaanites, Edomites, and Moabites). This encampment might be Sinai, Kadesh, or Shittim (→ Kadesh; Shittim).

15:20-21, The Song of Miriam. Before the insertion of the entire Song of the Sea into the narrative, it was cited by its incipit in one of the prose sources (probably J), where it is ascribed to Miriam, the sister of Aaron and Moses. The attribution to Moses himself in v. 1a, therefore, is secondary.

15:22-18:27

The Journey to Sinai

The names of the "stages" along the way from Rameses to the Wilderness of Sinai are systematically reported in the biblical narrative, and the list is recorded in even greater detail in Numbers 33. Such thoroughness is extraordinary in a story from which a detail as important as the name of the pharaoh was omitted. It is difficult to account for the precision with which the names of these places were preserved, unless we assume that the route continued to be known and followed in later times, perhaps by Israelite and Judean pilgrims to Sinai. Unfortunately, few of the stages can be identified today, and the location of Mount Horeb or Sinai has itself been forgotten, so that the itinerary of Israel's journey there can be traced only tentatively (→ Exodus). If the well-known tradition that identifies Mount Sinai with Jebel Musa in the southern part of the Sinai Peninsula is correct, then the route described here must proceed south along the eastern shore of the Gulf of Suez. The location of "Horeb, the mountain of God" near Midian in chap. 3, however, favors a route through central Sinai. The most direct road to Midian, north and east of the Gulf of Aqabah, is the Darb el-Hajj, or "Pilgrim's Road," which is still followed to Mecca, and it would not be surprising to find continuity between ancient and modern pilgrim roads.

15:22-27, The Waters of Marah. Yahweh sweetens the waters of "Bitterness" (Heb. marā), showing himself to be Israel's "healer" and promising to afflict Israel with none of the plagues of Egypt. He turned the waters of the Nile to blood, but he makes the waters of Marah sweet. He destroyed the grain crops of Egypt with hail, but he will rain bread on the Israelites (16:4). He sent a wind filled with locusts into Egypt, but his wind will bring quail in Num. 11:31. The awkwardness of Exod. 15:25-26 is a result of the insertion of Deuteronomic clichés about obedience. The reference to testing or proving in v. 25b reflects the Deuteronomic conception of the wilderness period as a time of teaching and testing (Deut. 8:3, 16).

16:1-36, Manna. Their thirst quenched, the people next complain of hunger, and Yahweh obliges them with a miraculous rain of bread from the sky (v. 4). The people marvel at the frostlike wafers, asking each other "What (Heb. man) is this?" Thus they name the bread man, "manna." This tradition stems from a natural phenomenon of the desert. The tamarisk bush, which grows in parts of the Sinai Peninsula, is infested with scale insects that suck its sap, some of which is excreted in the form of globules that crystallize in the sun and fall to the ground. This sticky substance is rich in carbohydrates and sugars and can support the life of a starving wanderer (→ Manna). It is still called mann by the modern inhabitants of the Sinai, who regard it as a gift from God.

The sequence of events in vv. 1–12 is confusing because of the combination of narrative sources. In the P version (vv. 1–3, 6–13a, 22–26, parts of which may, alternatively, derive from E) the story is designed as another instance of Israel's "murmuring" (v. 2) and Yahweh's indulgence. The murmuring motif seems to have been lacking in the J version (vv. 4–5, 13b–15, 27–30), however, and the initiative for the gift of the manna comes from Yahweh. (Note, however, that, according to a Deuteronomistic addition to v. 4b, Yahweh's purpose from the beginning is to test the people and teach them obedience [cf. 15:26] with regard to the special Sabbath provisions.) The P version also mentions a gift of quail (vv. 8, 12–13a), but in J the quail will come much later, when the people tire of the manna and crave meat (Num. 11).

17:1–7, The Water from the Rock. The site at which the miracle of the water from the rock takes place has two names, Massah and Meribah, understood in the story to mean "Testing" and "Contention." Meribah appears alone in Num. 20:13 (cf. Deut. 32:51; Pss. 81:7; 106:32), and it is possible that Massah was added secondarily. An association between the two is already present, however, in early poetry (Deut. 33:8), and it has been suggested they were the names of two different springs at the same oasis (Kadesh, according to Num. 20). A duplicate or parallel account appearing in Num. 20:1–13 explains why Moses and Aaron did not enter the promised land (cf. v. 12).

17:8–16, The Battle with the Amalekites. The Amalekites, nomads inhabiting the desert south of Judah, most often appear in the Bible as brigands (→ Amalekites). Their attack on the Israelites in this passage is thwarted by Joshua when Moses stands atop a nearby hill and, with the help of Aaron and Hur (→ Hur), raises his hands aloft. Divine images served as battle standards for other ancient Near Eastern peoples, and it may be that Moses is acting in lieu of such a standard, representing Yahweh "with outstretched arm" (6:6)—hence the altar name

"Yahweh is my standard" in v. 15. Verse 14 is probably a Deuteronomistic addition, conforming our passage to the reference to these events in Deut. 25:17–19 (cf. 1 Sam. 15:2), which implies that the attack had a less favorable outcome for Israel.

18:1–27, Jethro's Visit. Moses is reunited with his wife and sons and confers with his father-in-law. Jethro advises Moses to share the burden of his counseling responsibilities. Note that the office of Moses under discussion is that of mediating between the people and Yahweh. Thus it is a prophetic office. Numbers 11 treats the same theme in terms of the distribution of Moses' "spirit" to seventy elders. It is surprising, then, to find a Midianite giving advice on religious matters to Moses, even if it is fatherly advice. It is true that Jethro praises Yahweh as the greatest of the gods (v. 11) and offers a sacrifice to him. Still, Jethro is a foreigner and not, we assume, a Yahwist, so that his praise of Yahweh must be like that of Balaam. As noted earlier in our discussion of 2:11–25, however, the religious affinity between Israel and Midian was very ancient, so that the advice recorded here may have a strong base in the tradition.

19:1–24:11

The Sinaitic Covenant

The next five chapters constitute the covenant pericope in Exodus. Chap. 19 is an introductory narrative describing the preparation of the people to receive Yahweh's proclamation of the covenant. Chap. 24 is a concluding narrative describing the ceremony of covenant ratification. The covenant proper, including the Decalogue and the laws of the so-called Covenant Code, is found in chaps. 20–23. The form of the covenant is especially significant. Yahweh speaks in the first person, identifying himself as the God who rescued Israel from slavery, enjoining upon the people a large body of law, and promising them a life of prosperity in the land in return for their strict loyalty to him. Scholars have detected in this covenant formula an ancient Near Eastern literary pattern used in diplomatic documents known as suzerainty treaties. The purpose of such a document was to establish a relationship between a suzerain (that is, a king or lord) and a vassal. Speaking in the first person, the suzerain would identify himself, review his beneficent treatment of the vassal in the past, and call upon the vassal to obey a series of stipulations, promising to reward obedience and punish disloyalty. It seems clear that this pattern has influenced the formulation of the Sinaitic covenant. Yahweh is presented as a suzerain who is owed allegiance because of what he has done and will do for his vassal Israel.

19:1–23:33

The Encampment at Sinai

Scholars do not agree about the literary history of 19:1–20:21. As in the preceding sections, the narrative in chap. 19 includes materials from J, E, and P. The dominance of the covenant-making theme seems to reflect the influence of the E version. The form of the Decalogue included here (20:1–17) is probably that of E. The motif of the people's fear and Moses' intermediary role (20:18–19) is in keeping with E's view of the role of the prophet, as is the statement that Yahweh spoke "from the sky" (20:22). On the other hand, the people's request in 20:19 seems to imply that God has not yet spoken. This suggests the possibility that the Decalogue is secondary or that it has been transposed with vv. 18–21. The present arrangement, according to which Yahweh proclaims the Decalogue directly to the people but mediates the other law through Moses, reflects the pattern stressed in Deut. 4:13–14. Some Deuteronomistic influence may be suspected here, therefore, and the suspicion is strengthened by the presence of the Deuteronomistic testing motif in 20:20 (cf. 15:25; 16:4). This does not mean that the Decalogue was originally absent from the story before it was inserted by a Deuteronomistic editor, though some scholars believe this to be the case. It seems more likely that an editor transposed the E version of the Decalogue with vv. 18–21 to reflect the Deuteronomistic arrangement.

19:1–25, The Sinai Theophany. Yahweh appears to the people as a prelude to the proclamation of his covenant with them. The theophany experienced by Moses alone in chap. 3 is now shared by the entire community. In place of the fire in the bush, however, is a much greater fire enshrouded in dark clouds, so that the entire mountain seems to be burning. The imagery is that of a thunderstorm (vv. 16, 19 [E]), though some commentators detect volcanic language in v. 18 (J). Carefully drawn boundaries protect the sacredness of the precinct where the deity manifests himself (vv. 12–13; cf. 21–25), and the people are in a state of cultic purity, having washed their clothes and abstained from sexual activity (v. 15). The theophany itself is described somewhat differently in J (9–15, 18) and E (16–17, 19). In J, Yahweh descends onto the mountain in a smoking envelope of fire, out of which he addresses Moses. In E, however, his voice is in the thunder; that is, he speaks from the sky (cf. 20:22). The covenant is mentioned only in v. 5 in a passage that has the structure of the covenant formulary described above. This "covenant in miniature" (vv. 3–8a) is quasi-poetical in character and, though it has some affinities with Deuteronomistic thought, it probably derives from an independent source incorporated into the E narrative. In it Israel is called a "realm of priests," that is, a nation uniquely close to Yahweh and, therefore, holy (vv. 5–6).

20:1–17, The Decalogue. The rules of conduct grouped together here are called the Ten Commandments (lit. "ten utterances") on the basis of 34:28 (cf. Deut. 4:13; 10:4). The ten have been reckoned in different ways (→ Ten Commandments, The). The traditional Jewish division views the divine self-proclamation in Exod. 20:2 as the first "utterance" and the prohibitions of other gods and graven images (vv. 2–3) as the second. Most other traditions understand v. 2 as a preamble. Thus the prohibition of other gods is the first commandment and the prohibition of images the second in the most common Christian enumeration. The third commandment prohibits false swearing (v. 7). The fourth requires observance of the Sabbath (vv. 8–11), and the fifth calls for respect for parents (v. 12). The final five prohibit murder (v. 13), adultery (v. 14), theft (v. 15), false witness (v. 16), and coveting things belonging to another member of the community (v. 17). Most of these laws are prohibitions. All are apodictic, i.e., absolute and applicable in any situation. The first four pertain to the Israelites' relationship with Yahweh, the final six to their relationships with each other. Together they constitute the basic requirements of the covenant being established between Yahweh and Israel. The violation of any one of them would represent a breach of the covenant relationship, thus threatening the integrity of the community that is based on the covenant.

The narrative source drawn on here is probably E, but many scholars believe the Decalogue existed as an independent document before its incorporation into the E account. Deuteronomy 5 contains an almost identical version, which has been slightly reworked to reflect Deuteronomistic ideas, just as the present account has been expanded to reflect the Priestly understanding of the Sabbath (v. 11). The form shared by Elohist, Deuteronomistic, and Priestly tradition seems to have been known to Hosea (Hos. 4:2; 12:9; 13:4). It is sometimes called the "Ethical Decalogue" to distinguish it from the so-called "Ritual Decalogue" preserved in Yahwistic tradition (34:11–26). According to the present arrangement of the narrative, the latter was given at the time of the renewal of the covenant, but it probably corresponds closely to J's version of the original covenant stipulations, which have not otherwise survived.

20:18–21, Moses the Mediator. The people are afraid of listening directly to the voice of God, and they ask Moses to mediate the commandments to them. As our text now stands, then, the Decalogue is the only part of the Sinaitic legislation communicated directly by Yahweh. The rest will be mediated through Moses. The literary-historical problem of this passage is noted in the introduction to this section (19:1–24:11).

20:22–23:33, The Covenant Code. According to 24:3, the covenant was concluded on the basis of both “the words” and “the ordinances.” The former refers to the Ten Commandments, and the latter to the Covenant Code or, as it is often called on the basis of the reference in 24:7, “the Book of the Covenant.” Formal considerations show that this collection is a combination of two bodies of law. The first begins in 20:22–26 and continues in 22:18–23:19. It consists of instructions for both cultic and social behavior expressed largely in the apodictic form we noted in the Decalogue. As we have noted, such rules are intended to define and sanction the sacred community. The second body of law was inserted into the middle of the first, so that it is now found in 21:2–22:17. It consists of rules or ordinances (21:1) of civil law expressed in casuistic, or case law, form (“if . . . then . . .”). Its purpose is to regulate the life of the community living in the promised land.

20:22–26, The Altar Law. Verses 22–23 are usually taken together to mean that images are prohibited because Yahweh is a heavenly, incorporeal god (cf. Deut. 4:15–40, which is a long interpretive reflection on these two verses). The altar law proper (Exod. 20:24–26) permits sacrifice at any sacred place (cf. Deut. 12:13) and thus antedates the reforms of the late Judean monarchs who destroyed the local altars (“high places”) and restricted sacrifice to the Solomonic Temple (→ Josiah). An altar must be constructed of earth or unhewn stones without steps. As we noted in connection with the Passover ritual (12:1–28), natural materials not modified by implements of human culture are regarded as most suitable for sacred uses.

21:1–22:17, The Book of Ordinances. The beginning of this inserted document is clearly marked by 21:1. Case law of this kind is the predominant form in the great law codes of the ancient Near East (→ Law). The codes were not normative tabulations of currently practiced laws. They were royal proclamations expressing the king’s responsibility for justice in his land and his commitment to the improvement of social conditions. The ordinances in Exodus 21–22 constitute a code that should be understood in the same way. It represents a series of improvements in the governance of the community proclaimed by Israel’s new divine sovereign. Thus many of the laws listed are specifically designed to make the enforcement of justice more equitable by limiting penalties or protecting the rights of powerless members of the community. For example, the purpose of the so-called lex talionis, or law of retaliation (vv. 23–25) is not to require vengeance but to restrict it. The laws are grouped roughly as follows: (1) laws pertaining to slavery, requiring a seventh-year manumission of Hebrew slaves and restricting the sale of daughters (21:2–11); (2) laws of capital crimes (21:12–17), exempting unintentional homicide but including murder (21:12–14), kidnapping (21:16), and crimes against parents (21:15, 17); (3) laws pertaining to personal injuries, including injuries to slaves, inflicted by other human beings (21:18–27) and by livestock (21:28–32); (4) laws pertaining to damages to property (21:33–22:16), including livestock (21:33–36, 22:3) and real estate (22:5–6); (5) laws involving contracts (22:7–15); and (6) laws regarding the payment of the bride-price (22:16–17; → Marriage).

22:18–23:19, Rules of Conduct. The next material concludes the document begun in 20:22–26. It is a diverse list of rules of conduct for the covenant community, expressed predominantly in the apodictic, second-person form. It has much in common with the “Ritual Decalogue” in 34:11–26. In contrast to the preceding book of ordinances, the arrangement of these rules seems to be random. There are some general groupings by subject matter, such as the rules pertaining to the administration of justice in 23:1–3, 6–9, and the rules for the liturgical calendar in 23:10–19, but even these are intertwined with unrelated rules (23:4–5, 13, 19b). Nevertheless, certain general themes seem to be present throughout. A conspicuous humanitarian concern is expressed in rules pertaining to the treatment of sojourners (resident aliens; → Stranger), widows and orphans, debtors, and the poor, and the rules of the fallow year (→ Sabbatical Year) and the Sabbath and other holidays are given a humanitarian interpretation (23:11–12). Most of the subjects touched on are religious. There are also a few general religious rules, including prohibitions of sacrificing or swearing to other gods (22:20; 23:13) and cursing God (22:28), and a few purity laws, including prohibitions upon bestiality (22:19), carrion eating (22:31), and boiling a kid in its mother’s milk (23:19b), thus employing a nourishing agent of life to cause death. The dedication of a portion of the harvest, the firstborn of the herds and flocks, and the firstborn son are insisted upon (22:29–30; cf. 13:11–13). The concluding liturgical calendar stipulates three principal festivals (23:14–17): Unleavened Bread in the spring (cf. 12:15–20; 13:3–10), Harvest or Firstfruits at the time of the wheat harvest (later Weeks), and Ingathering (later Succoth or Booths) in the fall (→ Feasts, Festivals, and Fasts).

23:20-33, Epilogue. Yahweh will send his messenger or angel to lead Israel safely to the promised land. He enjoins the people to serve no other gods in the land, and promises them in return prosperity together with victory over their enemies. Though this section now stands as an epilogue to the Book of the Covenant, its connection with the preceding material is tenuous. It is very different in style and subject matter, and it makes no reference to the ordinances just proclaimed. Though it seems to be based on an old narrative source, probably E (vv. 20-22, 25b-31a), it has been strongly colored by Deuteronomic ideas (cf. Deut. 7). It may have been an independent Deuteronomistic sermon on the conquest of Canaan, which was inserted at this point because of the prominence of the promised land and its produce in the cultic calendar at the end of the Book of the Covenant (23:10-19).

24:1-11
The Covenant Ceremony

The subject of the next section is covenant ratification. This is accomplished by two ceremonies, described in parallel accounts from two sources. In one of these accounts (vv. 1a, 9-11), which may derive from J or an independent early source, the central event is a covenantal meal. Moses is summoned to the mountain, along with Aaron and his two oldest sons, Nadab and Abihu (6:23; cf. Lev. 10:1-3), and seventy elders. They eat and drink, gazing upon the God of Israel. The vision is described in language similar to that of Ezekiel 1. It is unparalleled in its directness (cf. Exod. 33:18-23). This, then, is a unique moment, signaling a unique bond between Yahweh and Israel. Israel's leader, its priests, and representatives of its people are permitted to see its God. Ordinarily it would be fatal for a human being to look at a divine being (cf. Exod. 3:6), but the narrator explains that on this occasion Yahweh "did not raise his hand against the chief officers of the Israelites" (v. 11). In the other account (vv. 3-8), which derives from E, the central event is a rite involving "the blood of the covenant." Moses reads the law, the people assent to it, and the blood rite is performed. Many scholars think this pattern was influenced by a regularly celebrated ceremony of covenant renewal.

24:12-31:18

The Authorization for Divine Worship

Now that the covenantal relationship has been established, it is necessary that an apparatus be set up by which the Israelites can interrelate with their God. This will require the manufacture of certain special objects (the Ark, the altar, etc.) that will make human-divine contact possible and the designation of a special group of people (the Aaronidic priests) who will be able to manipulate the objects. Above all, a shrine or sanctuary must be erected (the tabernacle), where Yahweh will be present among his people. It is stressed that all these things are to be constructed exactly "according to the pattern of the tabernacle and according to the pattern of its furnishings" that Moses sees on the mountain (25:9, 40; cf. 26:30). This may indicate that Moses has a vision of the celestial sanctuary of which the earthly tabernacle is to be a replica (cf. Ezek. 40:1-2). Yahweh himself authorizes the preparation of each item and gives its specifications in Exod. 25-31. The carrying out of his instructions—the actual inauguration of the system of divine service—is described in chaps. 35-40 and Leviticus 8-9. Thus a pattern of command and execution determines the shape of the rest of the book, as the accompanying table shows. (On the sevenfold structure of 24:12-31:18, see commentary below on 31:12-18, "The Institution of the Sabbath.")

The Tabernacle and Its Furnishings

	COMMAND EXECUTION
the contribution	25:1-9	35:4-29
the Ark	25:10-22	37:1-9
the table	25:23-30	37:10-16
the lampstand	25:31-40	37:17-24
the tabernacle	26:1-37	36:8-38
the sacrificial altar	27:1-8	38:1-7
the tabernacle court	27:9-19	38:9-20
the lamp	27:20-21	Num. 8:1-4
the priestly garments	28:1-43	39:1-31
the ordination ritual	29:1-46	Lev. 8:1-9:24
the incense altar	30:1-10	37:25-28
the bronze laver	30:17-21	38:8
the anointing oil	30:22-33	37:29
the incense	30:34-38	37:29
the craftsmen	31:1-11	35:30-36:7
the Sabbath	31:12-17	35:1-3

24:12-18, Introduction. Yahweh summons Moses to the mountain to receive the tablets of the covenant (24:12), and, as Moses ascends, the theophanic cloud enshrouds the mountain, with Yahweh's "glory," that is, the refulgent envelope that surrounds the divine person, in its midst. Thus the objects and institutions about to be established will provide a suitable repository for the safekeeping of the covenant documents (25:16, 21) and a shrine in which Yahweh's glory can "tent" within the Israelite camp (25:8) and accompany them on their journey. The basis of this introduction is a continuation of E's Sinai narrative (vv. 12-15a, 18b), into which has been inserted a Priestly notice about the descent of the glory (vv. 15b-18a).

25:1-27:21, The Instructions for the Tabernacle.

The tabernacle is the sacred dwelling where Yahweh's glory manifests itself among the people in the wilderness. In the older narrative sources it is presented as the tent of meeting, a simple tent-shrine, where the glory was intermittently present and oracles were received (Exod. 33:7-11; cf. Num. 11:16-30; 12:4-10). The prototype of this Israelite tent-shrine seems to have been a religious object of a type used by nomads over a very long period of time in the Near East. The qubba of pre-Islamic Arabian tribes was a small, dome-shaped tent constructed of reddened leather stretched over a frame of desert acacia. It was a portable sanctuary, often transported on camelback, that accompanied the community both on its seasonal journeys and on marches into battle. The tribal idols were kept within it. Other portable tent-shrines, antecedents of the qubba, are known from the ancient Near East. There are clear parallels between the qubba and the Israelite tabernacle, which, as it is described in Exodus 26, has a covering of reddened leather (26:14) and a frame of desert acacia (26:15). In the present shape of the biblical tradition, which is dominated by P's perspective, however, the character and significance of the tabernacle are somewhat more complex. The tabernacle is the site of Yahweh's abiding (not transitory) presence among the people. Thus the glory will take possession of the tabernacle in 40:34 and subsequently lead the community on its journeys, effectively subsuming the role played by the pillar of cloud and fire in the older sources. In the present section, moreover, and generally in materials deriving from Priestly circles, the term "tabernacle" refers to the entire elaborate shrine described in chaps. 25-27. The tabernacle proper is only a part of this larger structure (cf. 26:1) and is itself covered by a tent (26:7). In addition to the design of the earlier tent-shrine, the architecture of Solomon's Temple seems to have influenced the description of the tabernacle. The division into a "holy place" and a "Holy of Holies" (26:33), the outer and inner sanctums, is characteristic of Phoenician temple architecture, as are the sacred enclosure or court (27:9) in which the sacrificial altar stood (cf. 40:6-8) and the general use of curtain-draped frames and pillars to effect divisions (→ Temple, The).

25:1-9, The Contribution. The raw materials for the tabernacle come from gifts freely given by the people. The "contribution" or "offering" (RSV) referred to here is a rite that serves to set apart personal property for sacred use (→ Heave Offering).

25:10-22, The Ark. The Ark is a wooden box or chest in which "the testimony," i.e., the two tablets of the law, are deposited (v. 16). This "Ark of the testimony" will be stationed within the Holy of Holies of the tabernacle (26:34). It is covered with a golden "mercy seat" (RSV; → Ark), above which Yahweh speaks with the people, flanked by a golden pair of protective genii called cherubim (→ Cherub) and fitted with golden rings and acacia poles for conveyance like a royal palanquin. The details show that two conceptualizations have been combined in the Priestly understanding of the Ark. On the one hand, it is a covenant repository, and it will be routinely called "the Ark of the covenant" in Deuteronomistic literature. On the other hand, it is a cherub throne, the locus of Yahweh's invisible presence in the midst of Israel and an essential component of both the tabernacle and the battle camp.

25:23-30, The Table. The table held the "Bread of the Presence" (cf. Lev. 24:5-9; → Showbread). It was stationed in the holy place of the tabernacle, separated from the Holy of Holies by a curtain.

25:31-40, The Lampstand. The menorah also stood in the holy place. The botanical terms used to describe it suggest that its branched form originated in a concept of a sacred tree (→ Lampstand).

26:1-37, The Tabernacle Proper. The tabernacle proper is the structure that contains the holy place and the Holy of Holies. It consists of a wooden frame about 30 feet long, 30 feet high, and 15 feet wide, constructed of acacia planks (vv. 15-30) and draped with decorated curtains (vv. 1-6). This structure is covered with a goats' hair tent (vv. 7-14), which is covered in turn with tanned or reddened rams' skin and the skin of another animal, perhaps the dugong. The Holy of Holies is separated from the holy place by a veil or curtain suspended on four acacia posts (vv. 31-35), and the holy place is separated from the court by a screen supported by five acacia posts (vv. 36-37). The Ark is placed behind the veil in the Holy of Holies (v. 33), and the table and the lampstand are placed in the holy place, between the screen and the veil (v. 35). The incense altar, which was also located in the holy place, is described in 30:1-10.

27:1-8, The Altar. The sacrificial altar is a 7½-foot square, about 4½ feet high. The "horns" are protrusions from the corners, also known from archaeological discoveries. The excavated examples, however, are stone, whereas this one is wooden. It is difficult to understand how an acacia altar, even when laminated with bronze (v. 2), could withstand the sacrificial fires.

27:9-19, The Court. The altar of sacrifice stood outside the tabernacle proper in the court of the tabernacle, a rectangular enclosure measuring about 150 by 75 feet. It also contained the laver, which is described in 30:17-21.

27:20-21, The Lamp. Verses 20-21 seem to authorize the making of another cultic object. Lev.

24:2-4 shows, however, that the lamp mentioned here is the same as the lampstand of 25:31-40. Also note Num. 8:1-4, which is the passage corresponding to this one in the command and execution pattern. Thus the point of the present directive is not the authorization of a new lamp but the provision for the regular (not "perpetual") kindling of the lampstand.

28:1-43, The Instructions for the Priestly Vestments.

Because Aaron and his sons are to be set apart as priests, they must wear garments designed "for dignity and splendor" (vv. 2, 40), appropriate to their office. All are provided with tunics, turbans, and sashes (vv. 39-43), as well as loincloths that permit them to enter the sacred precincts (cf. 20:26). The more specific instructions pertain almost entirely to the clothing of Aaron, i.e., the high priest. His principal garment, the ephod, is a belted loincloth with two shoulder straps (vv. 6-14). In contrast to the simple linen breechcloth called by the same name elsewhere in the Bible (1 Sam. 2:18; 2 Sam. 6:14), Aaron's ephod has ornate decorations, including a pair of lapis stones attached to the shoulder straps and engraved with the names of the twelve sons of Israel. Also attached to the straps is a pouched breastpiece (Exod. 28:15-30), covered with precious stones and containing the divining instruments called Urim and Thummim and thus designated "the breastpiece of decision" or "judgment" (→ Urim and Thummim). The ephod is worn over a blue robe hemmed with bells (vv. 31-35). The noise of the bells identifies the high priest as he crosses the boundaries between the zones of sacredness in the tabernacle, so that he will not be mistaken for an unconsecrated person and die (v. 35). A gold headpiece attached to the turban (vv. 36-38) is engraved "Holy to Yahweh," thus permitting the high priest to sanctify offerings brought by the people.

29:1-46, Instructions for the Consecration of the Priests.

The consecration sets Aaron and his sons apart from the rest of the community as a sanctified group eligible to serve in the sacred precincts of the sanctuary and to provide a liaison between Yahweh and the people. In the preparatory first part of the ritual (vv. 1-9a), the initiates are bathed and dressed in the garments described in the preceding chapter. The sacrifice of ordination (vv. 9b-37) has three parts. The first animal is a young bull, which is offered as a "sin offering" (v. 14, RSV), or better, a purgation offering (see the commentary on Lev. 4). The sacrifice is not performed for the initiates, but on their behalf for the sanctuary, which it purges of ritual pollution. Some of the blood is smeared on the horns of the altar, drawing off the impurity and thus preparing the altar to receive the next sacrifice

(cf. 30:10). The second animal is a ram, which is immolated as a whole burnt offering (v. 18). Its purpose is expiatory. It atones for the sins of the initiates, thus making them eligible for the sanctification of the third sacrifice. The third animal is another ram, "the ram of ordination." Just as the blood of the bull was smeared on the horns of the altar, the blood of the second ram is daubed on the right earlobe, the right thumb, and the right big toe of the initiates. The blood again draws off the impurities, and the new priests are sanctified. Blood is also spattered on the priestly vestments, so that they, along with the men who wear them, become holy (v. 21). In vv. 22-28, provision is made for the future setting apart of the breast and the right thigh of sacrificial animals as reserved portions for the priests. When brought to the sanctuary, these will be presented to Yahweh (the "wave offering," → Worship), then given to the priests. The account concludes with the prescription of the regular sacrifices to be performed at the altar (vv. 38-42). This is evidently a charter for the daily Temple service of later times.

30:1-38, Further Instructions. Additional directives pertain to things that are needed by the priests for the safe and proper operation of ritual service to God. Thus, as we shall see, the incense safeguards the high priest against the danger of the holiness of the divine presence; the census payment forbids plague; the laver permits the removal of personal impurities; and the anointing oil sanctifies both the priests and the holy objects.

30:1-10, The Altar of Incense. Burning incense has both olfactory and visual properties (→ Incense). The function of the incense altar of the tabernacle is probably to be explained in terms of the latter. It is stationed directly in front of the veil at the entrance to the Holy of Holies (v. 6). It is lighted in the morning and evening when the high priest enters the holy place to tend the lampstand. The smoke covers the mercy seat, thus creating a boundary between the priest and the divine presence and protecting the priest's life (Lev. 16:13).

30:11-16, The Census Payment. Though later interpreted as a tax to support the operation of the Temple (→ Tribute, Tax, Toll), the stated purpose of the half-shekel payment is to prevent plague. Thus it is a ransom (RSV: "atonement money") paid as a precaution in case of ritual impurity. The reason this was required when a census was taken may have been that the chief purpose of a census was to determine manpower and enroll men for military duty, an activity to which much stricter purity rules applied. Note that the plague of 2 Samuel 24 broke out after David conducted a census that determined the number of "men who drew the sword" (v. 9).

30:17-21, The Bronze Laver. To perform certain ritual tasks in a state of uncleanness would be fatal (v. 20), so that it is necessary for the priests to wash before approaching the sacrificial altar or entering the tabernacle proper. Thus a bronze washbasin or laver is stationed between the two.

30:22-33, The Anointing Oil. Everything being set apart as holy, from the tabernacle to the priests, is to be anointed (→ Anoint). Moreover, the anointing oil itself is holy. It is to be compounded according to a precise recipe, a variety of spices and resins suspended in an olive oil base, which is not to be altered, and it is not to be applied to any profane person or object.

30:34-38, The Incense. The rules for the incense to be burned on the altar are similar to those for the anointing oil. The special blend is holy and must not be put to profane use.

31:1-11, The Appointment of Craftsmen. The artisans who are to manufacture the stipulated items have been divinely chosen and inspired (vv. 2-3). The chief craftsman is Bezalel son of Uri, the grandson of Hur (cf. 17:10; 24:14). He is a member of the tribe of Judah and, according to 1 Chron. 2:18-20, a Calebite (→ Caleb). His first assistant is an otherwise unknown Danite by the name of Oholiab son of Ahisamach.

31:12-18, The Institution of the Sabbath. The day of solemn rest foreshadowed in the account of the manna in the wilderness (16:22-26) and stipulated by the fourth commandment (20:8-11) is formally instituted in vv. 12-18. The opening words of the speech addressed to the Israelites can be understood to imply a connection to the preceding account of the appointment of the craftsman, as if, "(You shall do all this work.) Nonetheless, you must keep my Sabbaths!" But the meaning is probably ceremonial and emphatic: "Above all, you must keep my Sabbaths!" There is, however, another kind of connection with the preceding passage and, indeed, with the entire account of the authorization of the system of divine service (24:12-31:18). Editorially, the long passage that extends from 25:1 to 30:10 is presented as a single speech. It is introduced with the simple formula, "And Yahweh spoke to Moses" (25:1). The same formula, or another almost identical to it, occurs six other times in the larger passage (30:11, 17, 22, 34; 31:1, 12). The effect is to divide Yahweh's instructions into seven utterances, of which the institution of the Sabbath is the climactic seventh. Note, finally, the designation in vv. 13 and 17 of the Sabbath as a "sign" between Yahweh and Israel. In Priestly theology each of the historical covenants was ratified by a visible token or sign. The rainbow was the sign of the universal covenant made with Noah (Gen. 9:12-13), and circumcision was the sign of the patriarchal covenant made with Abraham (Gen. 17:11). The Sabbath is now proclaimed as the sign of the Sinaitic covenant. The cosmic significance of this sign—and thus of the covenant as a whole—is disclosed by a link to the Priestly account of creation (v. 17).

32:1-34:35

The Breaking and Renewal of the Covenant

The next three chapters stand between the two parts of the account of the wilderness sanctuary. The instructions for the erection of the tabernacle were given in the preceding seven chapters (25-31), and their implementation will be described in the succeeding six chapters (35-40). In between is a story of covenant breaking and renewal drawn primarily from the early narrative sources (JE). The story line broken off at the end of the covenant pericope in chaps. 19-24 is now resumed, and the covenantal relationship established in those chapters is completely and abruptly dissolved, then restored. The pattern is that of the "murmuring" motif, which was introduced as soon as the Israelites entered the wilderness (14:10-18). Oblivious to the divine provisions made for their welfare, the people become anxious and abandon their trust in Yahweh and Moses. As in the previous instances, the rift that is created is eventually healed through the mediation of Moses. At first, however, he is absent, and the mischief done is serious. The editorial links between this section and the tabernacle account are established by reference to the two tablets of the covenant. Yahweh summoned Moses to receive them in 24:12, and he gave them to him at the conclusion of his long speech about the tabernacle (31:18). In the course of this section Moses descends with the tablets (32:15-16) and breaks them in anger (32:19). He then cuts new tablets (34:1), and when the covenant has been renewed, Yahweh writes the words on them again (34:28). This brings the story back to the point when things went wrong: Moses again descends the mountain with the two tablets (34:29).

32:1-35

The Incident of the Golden Calf

The people's demand is for "gods who will go before us"; that is, they want palpable assurance of the divine presence among them on their march. This, however, is precisely what the tabernacle will provide. Thus the irony in the situation is that the thing the people are demanding is exactly what is being prepared for them on the mountain. Seen in this light, the manufacture of the golden calf is a travesty of the construction of the tabernacle just authorized. The image is fabricated from materials contributed by the people (vv. 2-4), just as the tabernacle is supposed to be (25:1-9). An altar is placed in front of it (v. 5), just as an altar is supposed to be placed in front of the tabernacle (cf. 40:29). The conflict, then, is one of modes and symbols of worship. The action taken by the people is not intended as a rejection of Yahweh. On the contrary, Aaron proclaims "a feast to Yahweh" as soon as the altar is in place (v. 5). The locus of Yahweh's presence, however, is not a tent-shrine but a calf, or rather a young bull. The biblical writers depict the worship of Yahweh with bull iconography as the standard error of the form of worship of the Northern Kingdom during the monarchical period. Jeroboam, the first northern king, introduced golden bulls into the sanctuaries of Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 12:26-28), and "the young bull of Samaria" (Hos. 8:5-6) seems to have been the chief icon in the sanctuary of the subsequent northern capital. Thus, like a very large number of ancient Near Eastern gods, Yahweh was worshiped in the form of a strong and virile young bull. Scholars disagree whether the bull was understood as an image of Yahweh himself or as a pedestal upon which he was believed to be invisibly present. In either case, however, the bull iconography was repudiated by one stream of Israelite tradition in favor of the iconography of the tabernacle and the Ark. It is this stream of tradition that is represented in the story of the golden calf, as in the Bible generally. Note that the people's utterance, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up from the land of Egypt!" (Exod. 32:4, 8), seems inappropriate, since there is only one bull (cf. the correction in Neh. 9:18). The narrator is alluding to the two bulls at Dan and Bethel, which Jeroboam dedicated using identical words (1 Kings 12:28).

The unfavorable depiction of Aaron in this chapter contrasts sharply with his portrayal elsewhere in Exodus. The instructions in chap. 29 stipulated that only he and his sons would be ordained, a reflection of the actual situation in the highest rank of the Jerusalem priesthood, from which all Levites were eventually excluded except one family of Aaronids (→ Priests). Here in vv. 26-29, however, the Levites are said to have ordained themselves by their staunch behavior. We are not told which Levites these are, but they are certainly not Aaron's group. In earlier chapters Moses' inability to perform his duties without Aaron's help was emphasized, again a reflection of the views of the later Jerusalem priesthood. Here, however, Aaron's weaknesses are accentuated by comparison with Moses, who is exonerated from blame by his absence. These things suggest that the story originated in circles hostile to the Aaronids at a time when there was a serious rift in the tribe of Levi.

Mesopotamian parallels to the smashing of legal tablets show that Moses' action is not just an expression of anger but a formal repudiation of the covenant. Moses' destruction of the bull, however, is not so easy to understand. It may be that burning it, grinding it up, dissolving its dust in water, and requiring the people to drink it is a way of obliterating it. The final stage is appropriate, because it was out of the mouths of the people that it came in the first place (v. 1). Some scholars draw a connection to the plague in v. 35, interpreting the drinking as an ordeal that identifies the guilty by making them sick (cf. Num. 5:16-28).

33:1-23

Yahweh's Presence Among the People

When the Israelites depart from Mount Horeb, will Yahweh go with them? Even though he led the march from Egypt personally in the pillar of cloud and fire (13:21), the incident of the golden calf has created doubts. A holy presence in the midst of such "a stiff-necked people" would endanger their lives (v. 5). As usual, the problem is solved by Moses' intercession. The scrap of early narrative in vv. 7-11 serves to highlight the intimacy of his relationship with Yahweh. In these verses the tent of meeting does not have the elaborated form of P's tabernacle. It is a simple shrine located outside the camp and attended by Joshua, who is identified as though for the first time (v. 11), even though he has appeared before without introduction (17:9; 24:13; 32:17). Verses 7-11, then, seem to be out of place here. Nevertheless, they are included to stress that "Yahweh would speak to Moses face to face, as one man speaks to another" (v. 11). It is on the basis of this special relationship that Moses makes his appeal for Yahweh to accompany the march, and Yahweh agrees (vv. 12-16). In a curious sequel, Moses makes another request. He asks to see Yahweh's "glory," but he seems to want to look directly upon the divine person. Yahweh's reply is, "You cannot see my face" (v. 20), and an arrangement is made whereby Moses is permitted a glimpse of Yahweh's back.

34:1-35

The Renewal of the Covenant

The issues raised by the golden calf incident have now been resolved, if not forgotten, and the broken covenant relationship can be formally restored. When this has been achieved, it will be possible to implement the instructions for the tabernacle.

34:1–28, The Proclamation of the Covenant. Having instructed Moses to prepare two new tablets, Yahweh again descends upon Sinai (v. 5; cf. 19:20) and proclaims his covenant with Israel. The relationship is renewed with reference to the future conquest of Canaan rather than the past escape from Egypt. Moreover, the covenant stipulations are not the same as those in chaps. 20–23. This is surprising, because it is the clear implication of v. 1 that the new tablets are to have the same thing on them that the broken tablets had, and v. 28 states flatly that Moses writes “the ten utterances” on the tablets. In the text of the chapter, however, there is a different list of apodictic laws (vv. 17–24) in place of the Decalogue. These difficulties have led scholars to the conclusion that chap. 34 preserves a part of the account of the making of the first covenant in the original J narrative, a parallel to the E and P account in chap. 20, even though it now stands as an account of the making of a second covenant, or rather a renewal of the first. The commandments in vv. 17–24 are sometimes called the “Ritual Decalogue” to distinguish them from the “Ethical Decalogue” that occupies the same position in the account of the broken covenant (20:3–17). But there is no Decalogue in vv. 17–24, a passage that stands much closer in tone and content to the apodictic rules of conduct in portions of the Book of the Covenant (20:22–26, 22:18–23:19).

34:29–35, The Shining of Moses’ Face. In consequence of Moses’ face-to-face dialogues with Yahweh, “the skin of his face radiated” with light. The Hebrew verb also permits the erroneous translation “was horned,” giving rise to the curious notion, eternalized in Michelangelo’s statue, that Moses had horns. In fact, however, Moses has been touched with the refulgent “glory” that, according to a belief widespread in antiquity, envelops the person of a deity. Compare the shining of Jesus’ face in Matthew’s account of the transfiguration (Matt. 17:2). The veil Moses uses in subsequent dealings with the Israelites is designated by a noun that occurs nowhere else in the Bible. Some scholars have supposed this tradition to have arisen from the use of a ritual mask, but it is precisely when he is involved in ritual activities that Moses’ “mask” is set aside (v. 34).

35:1–40:38

The Inauguration of the Cult

The various tasks authorized in 24:12–31:18 are now carried out, and the divine service in the tabernacle is inaugurated. The account of the implementation follows that of the instructions very closely. The only significant difference is the order of events. It was necessary for reasons explained below to implement the Sabbath law, collect the contribution, and appoint the craftsmen at the beginning of the work. This accounts for the only major variation in order, although there are certain minor variations having to do with the sequence in which various articles are made. Note, however, that there are several differences in arrangement between the received Hebrew text and the Greek text of chaps. 36–39. The most substantial of these differences are noted below. It is difficult to determine which arrangement is original.

35:1–3, The Rule of the Sabbath. The Sabbath law, which was given after the rest of the instructions (31:12–17), is put into effect before the actual construction begins, so that it can restrict the work.

35:4–29, The Contribution. The contribution is also shifted to the beginning. Though authorized at the end of the instructions, it must be collected before the work can begin.

35:30–36:7, The Appointment of Craftsmen. The appointment of Bezalel and the other craftsmen, though authorized at the end of the instructions, must be made in advance of the actual work.

36:8–38:20, The Construction of the Tabernacle. The order in which the tabernacle and its furnishings are made is not exactly the same as the order in which they were authorized. The tabernacle proper was authorized in chap. 26, after the articles to be stationed in it (25:10–40). It is built in 36:8–38, however, before the Ark, table, and lampstand (37:1–24). On the other hand, the sacrificial altar is built before the tabernacle court (38:1–20), just as in the instructions (27:1–19). (In the Gk. text of chaps. 36–38, the entire sanctuary, including both the tabernacle proper and the court, is constructed before any of the furnishings are made.) The incense altar, the anointing oil, the incense, and the bronze laver were authorized together in a collection of additional instructions (30:1–38). In the Hebrew text of chaps. 37–38, however, their manufacture is described in the natural positions—the incense altar, anointing oil, and incense in 37:25–29, in connection with the other furnishings of the tabernacle proper (37:1–24), and the laver in 38:8, in connection with the court (38:9–20). To the account of the making of the laver is appended the curious anecdote that the bronze with which it is made is taken “from the mirrors of the women who served at the entrance of the tent of meeting.” The only other biblical reference to these women (1 Sam. 2:22) sheds no light on their identity or function.

38:21-31, The Record of Contributions.

This tally of the gold, silver, and bronze contributed for the tabernacle contains at least two striking anachronisms. First, the supervisory role of Aaron's son Ithamar (v. 21) assumes that the disqualification of Nadab and Abihu described in Leviticus 10 has already taken place (Num. 3:4; cf. Num. 4:33). Second, the census reported in Numbers 1 seems to be one of the bases on which the contributions have been made.

39:1-31, The Preparation of the Priestly Garments.

According to the arrangement of the received Hebrew text, the priestly vestments are the last things made. In the Greek text, however, they are the first.

39:32-43, Completion of the Work.

The completed work is inspected by Moses, who finds it to be perfect and blesses the people. This passage stands as an epilogue to the account of the manufacture of the tabernacle in chaps. 35-39. It gives final reinforcement to the command and execution scheme, repeating three times that "according to all that Yahweh had commanded Moses, thus they had done" (vv. 32, 42, 43).

40:1-38, The Erection of the Tabernacle.

The account of the actual erection of the tabernacle follows the command and execution pattern of chaps. 25-31 and 35-39. The instructions are given in vv. 1-15 and carried out in vv. 16-33. The final passage (vv. 34-38) records the divine response. The theophanic cloud covers the tabernacle, and Yahweh, clothed in his blazing "glory" enters the tabernacle proper. Thus the two theophanic traditions of Exodus, that of the pillar of cloud and fire and that of the tabernacle, are fused at the end. The tabernacle now assumes the bellwether role played by the pillar on the march to Sinai.

Bibliography

Childs, B. S. The Book of Exodus: A Critical, Theological Commentary. Old Testament Library. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1974.

Clements, R. E. Exodus. Cambridge Bible Commentary on the New English Bible. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972.

Greenberg, M. Understanding Exodus. Melton Research Center Series. New York: Behrman House, 1969.

Plaut, W. G. The Torah: A Modern Commentary. New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1981.

Sarna, N. M. Exploring Exodus. New York: Schocken, 1986.

LEVITICUS

JOHN H. HAYES

INTRODUCTION

Leviticus, the third book of the Torah (or Pentateuch), derives its English title from the Latin Vulgate, which in turn is dependent on the name assigned the book in ancient Greek translations. In Hebrew, the work is generally referred to by its opening word, wayyiqra, "And He called." In early Judaism, the rabbis sometimes designated the book Torah Kohanim ("the Torah of the Priests"), a title very similar to the term "Leviticus."

The expression "Leviticus" implies that the work is concerned with priestly or levitical matters, although only 6:9-7:19; 8:1-10:19; 16:1-28; and 21:1-22:16 are matters strictly concerned with priests, and the Levites are mentioned only in 25:32-34. The book is actually a collection of matters on diverse subjects including laws and regulations concerning sacrifice, priestly ordination, dietary matters, purity and impurity, sexual relations, festivals, ethical concerns, the Sabbatical and Jubilee years, and a host of other issues.

Leviticus forms an integral part of the Pentateuch or Torah and, in fact, is the heart of the first five books of the Bible. In the book of Exodus, God reveals Torah (law) to Moses at Mount Sinai (Exod. 20-40). Included in these laws are directions for constructing the tabernacle (Exod. 25-31), which are carried out under Moses' direction (Exod. 35-39). In Exodus 40, Moses erects the tabernacle, making possible Israelite life and worship according to the commands of God. Leviticus picks up at this point.

The tabernacle was the place where God was present with his people (Exod. 25:8) and where he met and communicated with the community through Moses (Exod. 25:22; 29:43-46). The book of Leviticus details the manner of life and worship required of the community by God for the divine presence symbolized in the tabernacle to continue abiding in its midst (→ Tabernacle; Temple, the).

Leviticus interweaves narrative and legislation. The three narratives in Leviticus (8:1-10:20; 16:1-34; 24:10-23) continue the story line of Exodus. A similar pattern of interweaving narratives and blocks of legal materials follows in the book of Numbers. This suggests that the material throughout Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers was put together by the same editor or editors.

The book of Leviticus itself now contains twelve major sections with each section marked off by a summarizing statement. These major summary statements appear in 7:37-38; 10:20; 11:46-47; 12:7b-8; 14:54-57; 15:32-33; 16:34b; 21:24; 23:44; 24:23b; 26:46; and 27:34. (Some sections also have minor internal summaries; see 13:59; 14:32). This division into twelve sections no doubt reflects the use of twelve as a symbolic number both indicating completeness and pointing to the twelve tribes of Israel. Before this material was edited into its final form, some of the twelve sections may have existed as separate and independent collections. For example, chaps. 1-7 or a shorter version of this material could have constituted a document serving as a small handbook on sacrifice.

In addition to the division into twelve sections, the book has been edited so that it contains thirty-six ( $3 \times 12$ ) divine speeches. Again there is the use of special numbers, three and twelve. Of these thirty-six speeches, introduced by "The Lord said," thirty-one are addressed to Moses, four to Moses and Aaron (his brother and high priest), and one to Aaron. These speeches primarily contain information in the form of laws and ordinances to the people at large, although a few are special and specific communications or directives.

COMMENTARY

1:1-7:38

Laws of Sacrifice

The sacrifices discussed in this section were unscheduled sacrifices offered to meet the religious and emotional needs of people and to fulfill the ordinances of God as circumstances demanded or opportunities presented themselves. The voluntary and unscheduled sacrifices discussed in chaps. 1-7 were in nature similar to those offered on a regular basis; only the particular occasions and motivations varied.

The material in these opening chapters of Leviticus falls into four natural divisions following the introduction in 1:1-2 and excluding the summary in 7:37-38. The first section, 1:3-3:17, discusses spontaneously motivated sacrifices and describes these with the donor's point of view in mind. The second section, 4:1-6:7, discusses mandatory sacrifices required after the infraction of divinely ordained norms. Again these are described from the viewpoint of the donor. Both of these sections are presented as divine speeches addressed to Moses that he is then to communicate to the people of Israel as a whole since the information in these speeches concerns the community at large. In the third section, 6:8-7:21, the sacrifices previously described in 1:3-6:7 are regrouped and discussed primarily from the viewpoint of the priests who officiated at the sacrificial services of worship. Thus 6:8-7:21 contains divine speeches to Moses to be communicated to the priests (Aaron and his sons). Since the material in 7:22-36, the fourth section, concerns regulations relating to laypersons, the speeches here are to be communicated to the people of Israel, the community as a whole.

The Bible provides no theoretical discussion of the nature and function of sacrifice (→ Worship). Throughout the ancient world, sacrifice was a common phenomenon probably having its origin in the perceived need to provide food for the gods, a view still reflected (21:8, 22) but sometimes repudiated in the Bible (see Ps. 50:7-15).

In ancient Israel, sacrifice was understood as one of the means of sustaining and restoring the divinely created order. It was part of the ongoing process of human life and a means of contact and relationship with the divine. When normal personal and social life, the ordained orders of existence, or divine-human relationships were seriously disturbed, sacrifice functioned as part of the divinely ordained means to return life to normal.

Sin, or the disruption of divinely ordained order, was considered to have numerous consequences. First of all, it provoked the wrath of God (Lev. 10:6), even though he was slow to anger (Exod. 34:6-8), because it was contrary to divine will. Second, it polluted and defiled the sanctuary (Lev. 15:31) and the land (18:25). Third, it could pollute and defile the sinner, the agent of sin (Lev. 11:44). Fourth, sin disrupted and threatened the orders of society and creation (Lev. 26:14-39). The sacrificial system was a means of averting the consequences of sin and restoring harmonious relations.

Two other factors should be noted about sacrifice in ancient Israel. First of all, the ancients did not speak about "sacrifice" in general but about specific types of sacrifice. Second, the laws of sacrifice in Leviticus merely outline the technical aspects of rituals. The various sacrifices always belonged to larger contexts of worship in which prayer, hymns, and other forms of liturgy were integral parts. The various types of divine service were not thought to be mutually exclusive.

1:1-2

Introduction

The opening of Leviticus indicates the association of this book with the book of Exodus. In Exodus 40, Moses had erected the tabernacle on the first day of the first month of the second year after the Exodus. Lev. 1:1 now continues the narrative and reports on divine communications made to Moses to be addressed to the people. The location of the revelation was the tabernacle (or tent of meeting) from which God had promised he would speak to Moses (Exod. 25:22; Num. 7:89). The tent of meeting was still situated at Mount Sinai.

The Israelite theologians and editors of the biblical texts made three assumptions about the people's laws and customs, and all are reflected in Lev. 1:1 and its context. First, all laws and customs regulating the people's life and order were divinely given and not the product of human promulgation. Second, Moses served as the mediator of these laws. Third, the laws and ordinances by which Israel was to live in the land of promise were given outside the land, and thus were not the product of normal social and political life in the land. Thus the laws presuppose a unique origin (God), a unique mediator (Moses), and a unique context (outside the land).

Although the stipulations regarding sacrifice are to be addressed to the Israelites (v. 2), the use of the word 'adam (Heb., "person") in the verse was understood to include non-Israelite sojourners and even foreigners (see 17:8). The formulation—"when any one of you brings an offering"—indicates the voluntary nature of some sacrifices and the importance of the worshiper's volition.

1:3-3:17

Voluntary Sacrifices

1:3-17, The Burnt Offering/The 'Olah. The 'olah (Heb.), "that which goes up [in smoke]," was completely burned on the altar except for the animal's hide, which would have presented problems in burning and was given to the officiating priest (7:8). Sheep, goats, cattle, and birds could be offered as whole burnt offerings. Animals were to be males without blemish, that is, normal healthy animals (see Mal. 1:8). The sacrificial system was not a place for one's discards, since the place of worship and the animals offered were related to divine perfection.

The slaughter and burning on the altar involved a number of steps. (Although the details are not spelled out identically in vv. 3-9 and 10-13, this is probably coincidental and the same procedures were used with goats and sheep as with cattle.) (1) The worshiper willingly brought the animal to the door of the tent of meeting (the entry to the sanctuary courtyard), probably to be approved by the priest as acceptable as a proper sacrificial specimen (v. 3b; see 22:18-19). (2) The worshiper laid a hand on the head of the animal, probably to attest ownership and to designate the animal as that particular worshiper's sacrifice (v. 4). (3) The animal was slaughtered on the north side of the altar (v. 11). Who killed the animal is not stated, although one would assume this and the further preparations were performed by the worshiper. (Only the priests, however, could perform the blood ritual and approach the altar that was off limits to laypersons.) (4) The blood of the animal was caught and thrown against the altar (v. 5). Blood from all animal sacrifices was brought into contact with the altar, thus returning "the life" to God so as to avert the wrath of God for having killed. (5) The animal was flayed, cut into pieces, and its entrails and legs washed to remove any blood and fecal material. (6) The cut-up animal was then placed on the altar by the priests and burned (vv. 6-9, 12-13).

Birds (pigeons and turtledoves), because of their size, were killed by the priest, who pinched off the head, drained the blood against the side of the altar, and burned the bird unplucked on the altar (vv. 14-17). The crop of the bird (with its feathers or contents, perhaps entrails) was removed before burning and cast aside. The removal of the crop with its food contents may have been comparable to washing an animal's entrails. Allowing birds to be sacrificed made it possible for even the poor to offer a burnt offering to God.

The function of the burnt offering is not spelled out in the text. At the end of vv. 9, 13, and 17, the burning on the altar is described as a "gift [not "an offering by fire" as in most translations], a pleasing odor to the Lord." Both "gift" and "pleasing odor" suggest that the burnt offering could be understood as a present offered to the Deity and thus should be considered as a thanksgiving sacrifice. The last phrase of v. 4, "to expiate on one's behalf" (rather than "to make atonement for him"), implies that this sacrifice was employed to make amends in some fashion. Lev. 1:4 and 16:24 are the only texts in the Bible, however, that explicitly relate the burnt offering to expiation (but see Job 1:5; 42:8). The burnt offering in general, and in the daily ritual especially (Num. 28:3-8), was probably presented to God to avert his wrath or to thank him for withholding wrath.

In other texts, the burnt offering is mentioned in connection with making petitions (1

Sam. 13:12), fulfilling a vow, or offering thanksgiving (Lev. 22:17-19). Probably, the unscheduled burnt offering was a general sacrifice used either to implore or to thank in circumstances where the worshiper wished to express extravagance, since the entire offering (minus the hide) was burned on the altar and no human party received benefit from the animal's flesh.

2:1-16, The Cereal Offering/The Minchah. Grain products from cultivated crops could be presented to God as an offering. They could be presented uncooked as flour (v. 1); or cooked in an oven, on a griddle, or in a pan (vv. 4-5, 7); or roasted (v. 14). Flour and roasted grain were presented with frankincense (vv. 1, 15), an aromatic gum derived from the Boswellia trees of Arabia. Oil was either used in the preparation of the offering or poured upon it (vv. 1, 4-6, 15).

Only a part, "the memorial portion" of the cereal offering, was burned on the altar (vv. 2, 9, 16). This portion served to bring the giver to the attention of God. The remainder of the offering went to the priests. In presenting the offering to God, the giver transferred the cereal offering to the realm of the holy, that is, from human to divine ownership. It then fell into the category of the "most holy" (vv. 3, 10), which meant that only the priests, being holy, could eat it and then only in the Temple precincts, near the altar.

Two stipulations regarding the cereal offering are given in vv. 11-14. First, no leavening agent (generally sour dough) was to be used in preparing the cereal offering or mixed with it. Fermentation was considered a form of putrefaction and thus associated with decomposition and death. Second, salt, as a curing and preserving agent and thus a sign of permanence, was to be part of every cereal offering. Grain harvested early in the season and not yet fully dried and cured could be dried by heat or roasted and offered to the Deity (vv. 14-16).

The cereal offering when offered alone was understood as a freewill, voluntary gift on behalf of the worshiper. Along with wine it was offered to the Deity as part of the daily offering accompanying the meat sacrifice (Num. 28:3-8; see Num. 15:1-10), since the altar was to God as the table was to humans.

3:1-17, The Sacrifice of Well-Being/The Zebach Shelamim. Unlike the burnt offering and the cereal offering, the third type of voluntary sacrifice, the zebach shelamim, was eaten primarily by the donor in a festive meal.

The name for this sacrifice is variously rendered in modern translations "peace offering," "communion sacrifice," "shared offering," and so on. More important than the name in understanding the sacrifice are its nature and function. It could be offered in thanksgiving, to fulfill a vow, or as a freewill offering for no specific purpose (7:11-18). It was offered when life was proceeding normally and the worshiper was in a state of normal well-being or when some special occasion called for celebration. At one time all slaughter of animals in Israel may have been considered sacrifice and thus may have had to be performed at a sanctuary (see Lev. 17:1-7; Deut. 12:10-15). If this was the case, then all slaughter for food in those days would have fallen into the category of sacrifice of well-being.

Cattle, sheep, and goats could be sacrificed in this category without regard for the age or sex of the animals. The procedure for slaughter of the animal was similar to that for burnt offerings (Lev. 1), except in this case the animal could be slaughtered anywhere in the courtyard. Only certain parts of the animal were burned on the altar as a gift and pleasing odor to God: the suet and fat on the entrails and inside the body cavity, the two kidneys with their fat, and the appendage of the liver (1:3-4, 9-10, 14-15). The meaning of "the appendage to the liver" is uncertain; it may have been the diaphragm, the gall bladder, or merely the protruding lobe of the liver. In the case of sheep, the fat tail was also burned (v. 9a). According to one ancient source, the tail of the fat-tail sheep sometimes grew so heavy it had to be supported by a little cart pulled around by the animal.

This section concludes with a specific ruling at the end of v. 16 that declares that all the animal's fat (the suet, not normal body fat) belonged to the Lord, that is, was to be burned on the altar. A more general ruling occurs in v. 17 prohibiting the eating of suet and blood (see below 17:10-14).

4:1-6:7

Mandatory Sacrifices

That a new section begins and a change in subject occurs at 4:1 is indicated by the formula "And the Lord said to Moses." Even though this formula appears also in 5:14 and 6:1, these latter two occurrences mark off subunits within the larger section, since the addressee is the same as in the preceding material. All of 4:2 to 6:7 was to be circulated as public information as "Say to the people of Israel" (4:2a) indicates. Special concerns to be addressed to the priests begin a new section at 6:8.

Two types of mandatory sacrifices are discussed in 4:1-6:7. These are the "purgation offering" (generally rendered "sin offering") in 4:1-5:13 and the "reparation offering" (generally translated the "guilt offering") in 5:14-6:7. Both were related to wrongdoing committed unintentionally or inadvertently ("unwittingly") rather than brazen wrongs committed defiantly with no sense of contrition or confessional sorrow (see Num. 15:30).

According to Priestly theology, of which Leviticus is an expression, God had established the order and structures of life beginning with creation (Gen. 1:1-2:3). These orders included not only human-human and human-divine relationships but also human relationships with the world of nature. Appropriate actions and associations in all spheres of life constituted proper order. Within the human and natural orders, boundaries were set that structured life in terms of polar opposites. Such divisions included the following pairs: divine-human, holy-profane, life-death, human-animal, male-female, pure-impure, clean-unclean, kinship group-outsiders, and proper-improper ethical behavior. Actions that seriously transgressed these boundaries constituted wrongdoing or sin whether the action concerned ethical relations between humans or human relationships with the natural world. Thus an action that transgressed the division between clean and unclean was a refraction of order just as much as improper behavior toward another human being. Both constituted "sin," but, of course, some were obviously more serious than others. Some infractions, for example, threatened neither the health or well-being of society nor the divine-human relationship and thus only temporarily rendered unclean the person(s) involved.

4:1-5:13, The Purgation Sacrifice/The Chattat. Serious transgressions of the divine orders—the breaking of prohibitive commandments—were believed not only to offend God but also to produce an invisible contaminant that was attracted to and adhered to parts of the sanctuary. The contaminants thus polluted and defiled the sanctuary and threatened the Lord's presence there (15:31). At the same time, the Deity, like a human parent, was subjected to the consequences of his children's actions: he had to live with the pollution produced by their behavior. Elements in the sacrificial system functioned to hold the people accountable for their actions—thus taking sin and wrongdoing seriously—but also made possible the cleansing and purgation of the sanctuary and the placation of God—thus stressing divine forbearance and forgiveness. Blood placed on the altar purged the contaminants and the burning of part of the sacrifice as a gift, a pleasant odor, served to appease God.

First we read of the purgation sacrifice of the high priest (4:3-12). Since he was the supreme religious representative of the people, his inadvertencies brought liability on the whole congregation (4:3). High priestly inadvertent sins created a high level of impurity that penetrated into the holy place of the sanctuary. Thus the blood ritual that purged the impurity was performed inside the sanctuary proper (but not in the Holy of Holies, which was contaminated only by sins committed flagrantly or by wrongdoings not explicitly acknowledged). Blood was sprinkled seven times before the veil to the Holy of Holies (4:5-6) and then smeared on the horns of the altar of incense that stood in front of the veil (4:7a). The blood absorbed and cleansed away the impurity that had defiled the altar in the inner shrine. As in all purgation sacrifice rituals, the remainder of the blood was poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering in the courtyard of the sanctuary (4:7b), reconsecrating the altar (see 8:15b).

Because of the prominence of the high priest and the fact that the purgation sacrifices were scaled according to the social standing of the wrongdoer, he was required to present a significant animal, a young bull without blemish (4:3). Only specific portions of the animal were burned on the altar (4:8-10; see 3:3-4). The remainder of the animal was taken to an uninhabited area ("outside the camp"), to the place where ashes from the altar were poured out, and there burned on a wood fire (4:11-12). Since the sin of the high priest representatively involved the entire community, including not only laypersons but also the priests, this purgation sacrifice could not be eaten by the priests. To have done so would have allowed them to benefit from an offering presented for their own guilt.

The requirements of the congregational purgation sacrifice (4:13-21) paralleled those for the high priest, since both involved the whole of the people. The conditions making the sacrifice both mandatory and possible were that the community committed some unintentional wrong and then, when the wrong was made known, became repentant (4:13-14a). Since the sin involved the whole community, the elders of the congregation laid their hands on the head of the bull (4:15). The function of the sacrifice and the blood ritual is stated in 4:20b: "the priest shall expiate on their behalf and it [the wrongdoing] shall be excused them."

In line with the socioeconomical scaling of the sacrifices, the purgation sacrifice of a ruler (4:22-26) was a he-goat. Since the impurity and contamination caused by an individual's inadvertent wrong (even that of a leader) did not penetrate the inner shrine but only contaminated the outer altar, the blood was smeared only on the horns of the altar of burnt offering in the courtyard (4:25). The flesh of an individual's purgation sacrifice became the revenue of the priest who officiated at the altar when it was offered (see below 7:24-30).

Last, we read of the purgation sacrifice of an ordinary layperson (4:27-35). This could be either a goat or a sheep, in both cases a female without blemish (4:28, 32). The same features of the ritual applied in this case as in that for the ruler. A slightly fuller statement is made in 4:35b concerning the function of the ritual: "The priest shall expiate on the person's behalf with regard to the sin one sinned and the sin will be excused one." Repentant worshipers could leave the service of the purgation sacrifice knowing that their sins had been taken seriously, dealt with thoroughly, and purged conclusively.

There follows a section that presents four examples that necessitated the offering of a purgation sacrifice (5:1-6). It is uncertain whether these cases are presented as illustration or whether they were questionable and marginal cases about which there was uncertainty. The purgation sacrifice was required only in cases in which a negative or prohibitive commandment was broken. Thus acts of commission were always involved, not the failure to observe a positive or performative command.

The first case concerns one who failed to testify and to provide evidence in a case (5:1). Perhaps the public adjuration or curse was stipulated negatively—"Do not withhold evidence" (see 19:16b). Withholding evidence, even unintentionally, was a serious offense, since failure to testify could jeopardize justice and endanger proper social order.

The second and third cases (5:2-3) involve personal contamination through contact with uncleanness. Here the wrong seems to have been that the person forgot the uncleanness and did nothing to correct matters, thus prolonging purification beyond a week's time. Only impurities lasting at least seven days were considered serious enough to defile the sanctuary (see Num. 19:11-13, 20; Lev. 17:16).

The fourth case involves a rash oath (probably not to do some particular thing), which through forgetfulness the person broke (5:4).

Three stages are recognized in the process for offering a purgation sacrifice and thus being released from the responsibility of having polluted the sanctuary and affronted God. First, the person had to accept responsibility and show remorse. Second, the penitent had to confess the wrong (5:5). To whom confession was made is not stated, but it would certainly have involved a priest, since officials at the sanctuary had to understand the circumstances before determining the nature of and participating in the ritual. The priests thus performed pastoral roles and looked after the care of souls in such situations, dimensions of their work frequently ignored. Third, the person's penalty in the form of a purgation sacrifice was offered at the sanctuary (5:6).

This section ends with special considerations given the poor with regard to sacrifices (5:7-13). In fact, the priestly material shows more sympathy and consideration for the poor than any other body of literature in the Hebrew Scriptures. Persons who could not afford a goat or a sheep were allowed to offer less expensive animals, birds, as a sacrifice (5:7), and those who could not afford two birds were allowed to bring a cereal offering in the form of uncooked flour (5:11). Thus, in the case of the purgation offering, persons were allowed access to the cult regardless of their socioeconomical status. ("Cult" here means the system of worship of the religious community).

Two further aspects about these offerings of the poor are worthy of note. The person making an offering of fowl rather than of animals was required to bring two birds, one as a purgation sacrifice and another as a burnt offering (5:7). The reason is that a bird did not provide fat and internal matter to be burned on the altar. Thus an entire bird was incinerated on the altar serving as the gift, a pleasing odor for God to placate divine anger (5:10). The other bird, after some of its blood was put on the altar (5:8-9), became the property of the officiating priest, as was the case with all purgation offerings. In the case of the grain offering, no oil or frankincense was used, as was normally done (2:1). The oil and frankincense were associated with festivity, which was not a characteristic of the sacrificial ritual of purgation.

5:14-6:7, The Reparation Sacrifice/The 'Asham. Sacrifices in this category were penalties or indemnities imposed for trespassing on the holy things of God (5:14-16). Items, both animate and inanimate, that had been consecrated by being presented or vowed to God—such as sacrifices, tithes, gifts, utensils of the sanctuary, and so on—could be contaminated or desecralized. For example, a layperson might accidentally consume the flesh of a sacrificial animal that had been presented to God as a reparation or purgation offering and had thus become holy and the perquisite of priests alone. When such holy items were wrongly used or desecrated, the trespasser was required to make restitution by paying the value of the desecrated thing plus 20 percent (but see 22:14). In addition, a fine in the form of a ram with a value relative to the desecrated thing was required. The priest calculated the value according to the weight of the shekel employed by the sanctuary, which might have differed from that used in ordinary business (5:15). (See chap. 27 for the legitimate desanctification of holy things.)

According to 5:17-19, persons who believed themselves to have trespassed on a holy thing were to be treated as if liable, although no actual wrongdoing was discoverable. Only the 'asham penalty was required in this case, since the real or imagined desecrated thing remained unknown and restitution incalculable. This provision was obviously intended to meet the psychological needs of a person who understood life's treatment as indicating divine displeasure for trespass on a holy thing. Pastoral discussion and counseling by a priest would be assumed to reach such an opinion. Lev. 5:19b states the general principle involved: "[The one feeling liable] is [and is to be treated as] liable to the Lord."

In addition to direct trespass on a known holy thing (5:14-16) and suspected trespass (5:17-19), false oaths in the name of God also required a reparation sacrifice (6:1-7). The cases in 6:1-7 all involve acquisition through deceit followed by an oath in the name of Yahweh asserting innocence. In v. 2, the act of acquisition was deliberate and the deceit preceded the act. In v. 3a, the deceit followed the acquisition. One found something and lied about having found it (see Exod. 23:4; Deut. 22:1-4). One suspected of such illegal acquisition could be made to swear innocence by oath before God (see Exod. 22:7-13). A guilty party swearing innocence in the name of God made God an accessory to the crime and thus trespassed on his holy name.

When persons became remorseful and repentant about such wrongdoings and illegal acquisitions before apprehension, they could voluntarily take action to make amends. The process involved confession of the crime (noted in Num. 5:5-10, which closely parallels Lev. 6:1-7), restoration of the illegal acquisition plus a 20 percent penalty paid to the victim, and the presentation of a ram to God as a reparation sacrifice. In cases such as those in 6:1-7, no doubt a purgation sacrifice was also required in addition to the reparation sacrifice.

General principles in Israel's law are evident in these texts. First, in criminal justice, the focus of concern was the victim, not the perpetrator of the wrongdoing. Second, restitution rather than retribution and revenge predominates. Third, voluntary confession of a wrongdoing before apprehension and repentance over the sin reduced deliberate and premeditated wrongs to inadvertencies eligible for expiation. In addition, through confession malefactors righted matters with themselves by accepting the identity involved in the confession, through restitution they restored proper social relations, and through the 'asham payment they repaired their relationship with God.

6:8-7:21

Special Sacrificial Instructions to the Priests

A new subunit begins in 6:8-9 with the command to Moses to address the following stipulations to Aaron and his sons, the priests. The sacrifices previously described in 1:3-6:7, plus the priestly cereal offering (6:19-23), are discussed again with particular features highlighted.

6:8-13, The Burnt Offering/The 'Olah.

The regulations here are primarily concerned with the fire on the altar and the disposal of the ashes. Fire was to be kept burning on the altar continuously and burnt offerings left thereon all night. The priest responsible for cleaning away the ashes in the morning wore priestly dress (Exod. 28:42-43) while removing the ashes but changed clothes before carrying the ashes outside the sanctuary area. Working inside the sanctuary area, the priest was in the realm of the holy; moving outside, he crossed the boundary of the holy into the realm of the normal.

6:14-18, The Cereal Offering/The Minchah.

The supplementary material on the cereal offering has to do with the preparation and consumption of the flour minchah. It was to be prepared without leaven and eaten in the sanctuary precincts since it belonged to the category of the "most holy." The offering was divided among the priests and any priest could eat of it, since priests belonged to the category of the holy. Anything that touched the flour became holy and thus the property of the sanctuary.

6:19-23, The Priestly Cereal Offering. The daily cereal offering presented along with the daily burnt offerings (Num. 28:2-8) was offered by the anointed priests, that is, the high priests, Aaron and his successors. This cereal offering was distinctive because, presented by the high priest, it was to be totally burned on the altar. The summary statement in Lev. 7:37-38 designates this cereal offering "an ordination offering," thus suggesting that it was to be the first offering by priests undergoing ordination. A general rule is stated in 6:23: every cereal offering presented by a priest must be totally incinerated on the altar.

6:24-30, The Purgation Offering/The Chattat.

The purgation offering, because it absorbed the pollution of the wrong committed, was surrounded by special precautions spelled out in this section. First, the location of its slaughter is identified as north of the altar (see 1:11), where the burnt offering was killed; this was thus a space carefully guarded by the priests against contamination (v. 25b). Second, the priest who officiated received the flesh of the offering as revenue and had to eat a portion of it (v. 26a), since the consumption by the officiating priest was part of the purgation process. The officiating priest was able to observe the purgation offering carefully throughout its handling lest it become mixed with other offerings. Third, since the purgation offering was most holy (v. 25b) and prone to contaminate anything it touched, it was eaten in a special place in the sanctuary courtyard (v. 26b). Fourth, whatever it touched became holy and any spattered blood had to be washed away within the sanctuary precincts before the garment was taken from the sanctuary (v. 27). Pottery vessels in which it was cooked had to be broken, since their porosity meant they absorbed contaminants, and metal cookers had to be thoroughly scoured (v. 28). Verse 30 reminds the priest that any offering whose blood was taken into the shrine, as was the case with the high priestly and communal purgation sacrifices, could not be eaten by the priests, since such offerings were made on behalf of the whole community (1:3-7; see 10:16-18) including all the priests (see 10:17-18). A priest could not eat the purgation offering made on his behalf.

7:1-10, The Reparation Offering/The 'Asham.

Little was said earlier about the sacrificial procedure and the disposition of the reparation sacrifice (5:14-6:7). That is rectified in this section. The laying of a hand on the reparation offering by the donor was not required, since the procedure involved in presenting a reparation offering left no doubt about the animal's ownership. The donor may not even have had to be present when the ram was sacrificed. No smearing of the blood was involved in the reparation sacrifice (v. 2) as with a purgation sacrifice (4:4-7), probably because a purgation sacrifice was generally also required. The wrong requiring a reparation sacrifice as penalty was directed immediately against God himself. The usual parts were burned on the altar (vv. 3-5) and the officiating priest became the owner of the flesh (v. 7) but could share portions with his fellow priests or sell them to them (v. 6a). The flesh had to be eaten in a holy place, i.e., in the sanctuary precincts (v. 6b).

The writer takes the occasion at this point to clarify matters not mentioned earlier but unrelated to the reparation sacrifice. Noted are the fact that the officiating priest received the hide of the burnt offering (v. 8), all cooked cereal offerings became the property of the officiating priest (v. 9), but uncooked cereal offerings presented as flour were shared by the priests in general without specific property rights (v. 10).

7:11-21, The Sacrifice of Well-Being/The Zebach Shelamim.

The motivation and occasion for sacrifices of well-being are described as threefold: thanksgiving, fulfillment of a vow, and spontaneous impulse. The thanksgiving offering included various forms of bread, both leavened and unleavened, with a sample of each going to the priest but not burned on the altar (vv. 12-14). The flesh of the thanksgiving offering had to be consumed during the night after the animal's slaughter (v. 15). This encouraged conspicuous consumption in keeping with the festival atmosphere of the occasion. The time was for celebration with family and friends and for rejoicing before the Lord (Deut. 27:7). Offerings in fulfillment of a vow and spontaneous offerings could be eaten over two days, but what remained on the third day rendered the offering null and void (v. 18).

Even sacrifices of well-being had to be preserved from contact with uncleanness—both unclean objects and material and unclean humans (Lev. 7:19-21). One who ate while in a state of known uncleanness either from some personal source or from contact with an unclean substance committed sacrilege and was threatened with being "cut off from one's people." (Uncleanness, like holiness [6:18], was transmitted by physical contact.) Since this penalty was for transgression of a religious law, the punishment was to be meted out by God. Neither excommunication nor execution is meant! The threat appears to be the opposite of the ideal condition after death, namely, "to be gathered to one's people" (Gen. 25:8). To be cut off from one's people was to not be buried in the family tomb and thus to not join one's ancestors in the world of the dead.

7:22-36

Special Sacrificial Instructions to the People

Two small collections conclude the sacrificial regulations, both to be addressed by Moses to the people. The first (vv. 22-27) has to do with the prohibition against eating suet and blood. No animal suet was to be consumed; normal animal fat and the fat of fowl and game were not prohibited. The suet of an animal that died on its own or was killed by beasts could be utilized, probably in making soap or lubricating compounds, but not eaten (v. 24). All suet of a sacrificial animal was burned on the altar (3:16b). No blood of any animal was permitted as food (vv. 26-27).

The second collection (vv. 28-36) concerns the priests' share of the sacrifice of well-being. The worshiper personally brought to the priest the suet and the breast of the animal as a gift to the Lord. In presenting these to the priest, one elevated them in handing them over, thus transferring them from the realm of the normal and the ownership of the donor to the realm of the holy and the ownership of God. The fat was burned and the breast became the general possession of the priests (v. 31). The right thigh (the right foreleg) was ritually presented to the officiating priest as a perquisite (vv. 32-33).

Verses 34-36 affirm that this was to be a binding regulation for all times (see Num. 18:18; cf. Deut. 18:3).

8:1-10:20

The Ordination of Aaron and His Sons and the Consecration of the Sanctuary

In Exodus 25-31, God revealed to Moses directions for constructing the tabernacle sanctuary and its associated materials, for preparing priestly clothing for Aaron and his sons, for ordaining Aaron and his sons, and for consecrating the sanctuary. The directions for the first two are carried out in Exod. 35-40. The execution of the last two, namely, the ordination of Aaron and his sons (Exod. 29) and the consecration of the sanctuary (Exod. 30:26-30; 40:9-15), is the topic of Leviticus 8. A special convocation on the eighth day that provided the occasion for the initial service of Aaron and his sons is the subject of 9:1-24 and 10:12-20. The narrative about Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu in 10:1-11 provides the setting for additional regulations on the priesthood (→ Priests).

8:1-36

The Ordination and Consecration Ritual

This chapter describes a ritual of initiation. With the completion and erection of the sanctuary (Exod. 35-40) and the revelation of the laws of sacrifice (Lev. 1-7), the scene was set for inaugurating the ritual of the sanctuary. A priesthood had to be set aside and ordained and the sanctuary consecrated. These two events were conducted as parts of a complex ritual process.

Just as Moses functioned as the mediator through whom divine revelation was made known, so did he function as the inaugurator of the cult. In such a role, Moses stood outside and above any normal office. He was the divine representative whom God assigned the task of establishing on earth the divinely ordained cultic institutions.

As v. 2 makes clear, only Aaron and his descendants were to be consecrated for service at the altar. At this point in the biblical narrative, Aaron's descendants were his four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Exod. 6:23). Their ordination constituted a rite of passage through which they moved from the status of ordinary human beings to that of holy priests of the Lord.

Along with Aaron and his sons, Moses assembled the congregation to the front of the tent of meeting (Lev. 8:3-4) and explained to the people that the rituals they would witness were performed in fulfillment of God's earlier commands (v. 5). Thus the people participated, as witnesses, in the ritual.

Beside the general preparations (vv. 2-5), ten steps can be seen in the ordination ritual.

(1) The Presentation (v. 6a). Aaron and his sons were brought near, thus separating them from the general population and placing them in the area near the altar where their service would be performed.

(2) The Washing of the Candidates (v. 6b). Moses' washing of Aaron and his sons clearly identified them as the persons chosen and began the process of initiating them into "perpetual priesthood" (Exod. 40:15).

(3) The Investiture of Aaron (vv. 7-9). The garments symbolic of the high priestly office were placed on Aaron.

(4) The Anointment of the Tabernacle and Aaron (vv. 10-12). The anointment with oil set apart ("consecrated, made holy") the sanctuary, its furnishings, and the high priest, transferring them to the realm of the holy.

(5) The Investiture of Aaron's Sons (v. 13). The sons were dressed in the garb of their office.

(6) The Sacrifice of the Bull (vv. 14-17). The purification offering of Aaron and his sons was treated in the same manner as the purification sacrifice of a common person (4:27-35), with the blood placed on the altar of burnt offering and not carried into the shrine itself. Aaron and his sons were not yet fully priests (contrast 4:5-7), but since the sacrifice was of would-be priests, the flesh and hide of the animal were burned outside the camp. Ordination took place in the liminal margin between two states, partaking of both. The smearing of the blood on the altar cleansed it and the pouring of blood at the base of the altar served to reconsecrate it.

(7) The Sacrifice of the Ram Burnt Offering (vv. 18-21).

(8) The Sacrifice of the Ram of Ordination (vv. 22-29). This offering was treated as a sacrifice of well-being (see above on chap. 3). Moses as officiant received the breast (v. 29; cf. 7:31-32); although he was not a priest, as a relative of one he could eat of the sacrifice of well-being (see 10:14). The application of the blood of the ram to the right ears, the right thumbs, and the right big toes of Aaron and his sons (vv. 23-24) is to be understood as follows. These body extremities represented the whole person and the blood symbolized life (see 17:14). The smearing with blood indicated that Aaron and his sons had now passed safely across the boundary between the common and the holy. They now possessed new life, but life as members of the holy priesthood, having died as commoners (see below on 14:14-19).

(9) The Sprinkling with Blood and Oil (v. 30). This act represented the final phase of the transference of Aaron and his sons to the realm of the holy; the use of oil and blood from the altar bound the priests to the place of their fundamental service, the service of the sanctuary and the altar.

(10) The Ordination Meal (vv. 31-36). The sacrifice of well-being of the ram of ordination was offered, cooked, and eaten inside the sacred precincts.

Seven days were required before the ordination was complete and the priests could begin their duties. The text leaves unclear whether the same rituals were repeated daily over this period of a week during which the priests were to remain inside the sanctuary guarding the consecrated holy place. This seems highly unlikely. Seven days was the period of time required for persons to move in passage from one state of being to another (see 12:2; 14:8)—in this case from the realm of the common to the realm of the holy.

9:1-24; 10:12-18

The Convocation on the Eighth Day

On the eighth day, with Aaron and his sons fully ordained, the cult became operational. The cult, like creation, began normal operation on the eighth day. The convocation included the full participation of the community, and a series of sacrifices were offered. Two differences between the regulations of Leviticus 1-7 and the practices depicted here are noticeable. First, the blood of the priestly and communal purification sacrifices was not taken into the inner shrine (see 4:5-7, 16-18). Second, the communal purification sacrifice was a goat (9:15), whereas 4:14 requires a young bull (but see 16:5). No explanation is offered for these deviations. A possible explanation for the differences in the animal is that the book of Leviticus is composite, made up from sources of different dates. The practices in chap. 9 may be older than the regulations of chaps. 1-7.

After burning the sacrifices, Aaron, while still standing upon the elevated altar, blessed the people (9:22; see Num. 6:22-27). Aaron and Moses together then entered the tent of meeting, thus authenticating the right of Aaron to do so. They then exited and blessed the people (Lev. 9:23). Divine authentication of the service of the altar and of the priesthood of Aaron was given when divine fire instantly consumed the offerings on the altar, climaxing the service and indicating the presence and blessing of the Lord and his acceptance and approval of the sacrifices (9:24).

The instruction of the priests by Moses in 10:12-18 now appears to summarize 6:16, 26, and 7:28-34. If chaps. 1-7 did not exist, this teaching would have constituted the primary rules on priestly consumption of their perquisites from the sacrifices. In agreement with 6:14–18 and 7:28–34, the cereal offering is declared “most holy” and thus to be eaten by males of priestly descent and only in the sanctuary precincts beside the altar (10:12–13). The officiating priest’s share of the sacrifice of well-being (here said to be both the breast and right thigh; cf. 7:31–32, where the breast goes to the priests collectively) was “holy,” not “most holy,” and could be eaten by the priests and their entire families, even away from the sanctuary but in a clean place (10:14–15).

The enigmatic events and the statements of Moses in 10:16–18, which have been integrated with the story of Nadab and Abihu (vv. 1–11) in v. 19, provide a setting for the general ruling in v. 18. The purgation sacrifice of a communal goat goes unmentioned after 9:15, but suddenly in 10:16 it is said to have been burned (not on the altar [v. 17] but outside the camp [see 4:21]). Moses castigates the sons of Aaron (and presumably Aaron himself) for not having eaten the purgation sacrifice on the principle that a purgation sacrifice whose blood is not taken inside the shrine must be eaten by the priests (v. 18). As noted earlier, the blood of a communal purgation sacrifice should have been utilized ritually inside the tent of meeting, according to 4:16–18. Apparently in older practice, represented in chaps. 9–10, whether the blood of the communal purgation sacrifice was taken into the shrine probably depended on the circumstances of its offering. Lev. 4:13–21 made it mandatory.

10:1–11, 19

The Nadab-Abihu Incident

Like the story of the golden calf constructed under Aaron’s supervision (Exod. 32), the account of Nadab and Abihu is used as a negative example to highlight the importance of the preceding material and to stress the necessity of vigilant observance. In Exodus, as soon as the plans for constructing the tabernacle were revealed to Moses (Exod. 25–31), the people constructed the golden calf, thus endangering the life of the community. In Leviticus 8–9, the proper sanctuary had just been consecrated when two sons of Aaron took actions that threatened the sanctity of the Temple.

The sons’ sin was using fire that should not have been in the Temple precincts. The word used to describe this fire (v. 1) is a Hebrew term that refers to something or somebody that is where it should not be (see Exod. 29:33; 30:33; Isa. 1:7). For their wrong, the sons are struck dead by fire from the Lord (v. 2). The point and moral of the story is summarized in v. 3: God declares, “By the ones approaching me [the priests], I must be shown holy; and in the presence of the people, I must be glorified.” The cult and its personnel must manifest the nature of God.

After the removal of the bodies of Nadab and Abihu by their kinsmen, the narrative occasion is used for five special instructions to the priests. Moses transmits two prohibitions (vv. 6–7) and God directly reveals one prohibitive and two performative commands to Aaron (vv. 9–11). First, priests are not to display signs of mourning—disheveled hair and torn clothes—while on duty; such mourning can be done by the people. For officiating priests to mourn risked the outbreak of God’s wrath (v. 6). Mourning would not only preoccupy the priests’ attention but also would be the introduction of the abnormal into the cultic ritual oriented to perfection. Second, once on duty and functioning in the Temple, the priests are not to leave their duty under any conditions (v. 7). (In later times, when an invading army stormed the Temple, priests were killed while faithfully continuing the performance of their duties.) Third, priests on duty are not to drink any intoxicant (wine or strong drink) that would interfere with their thinking and acting (v. 9). Fourth, distinguishing (separating) between the clean and unclean, that is, serving as the authorities in matters regarding purity and impurity, the holy and the common, is delegated to the priests (v. 10). Fifth, the priests are assigned the task of teaching the people all the statutes of God revealed through Moses. The priests are thus the custodians and transmitters of the Torah.

Probably some connection exists between this story of a Nadab and Abihu whose father, Aaron, built a golden calf (Exod. 32:35) and who were later slaughtered by God, and the accounts about King Jeroboam I (king in the north after the death of Solomon), who built golden calves (1 Kings 12:28–32) and whose sons Nadab and Abijah (= Abihu) were killed or died according to God’s command (1 Kings 14:1–18; 15:25–30). Circles opposed to the Aaronite priesthood and to the employment of a golden calf in worship were probably responsible for the shape and content of some of the stories about Aaron and Jeroboam I.

11:1–47

Dietary Regulations and Defilement

Certain forms of food are permanently forbidden in the Hebrew Scriptures: suet and blood at all times and leavened bread during the Passover festival (3:17; Exod. 12:14–15). Certain animals and fowl were permitted and others prohibited as food. No vegetables or plants are described as taboo.

Leviticus 11 contains regulations on permitted and prohibited foods. (Deut. 14:3-20 contains very similar statements on the subject.) Lev. 11:2-8 describes the permitted and prohibited land animals (quadrupeds). The general principle in this area is stated in v. 3. Permitted animals must have cloven hoofs and ruminates (chew the cud). Eating anything prohibited defiled a person, rendering a person unclean. Mere contact with animals falling into the prohibited category did not defile a person as long as they were alive; thus horses, donkeys, and camels were usable as work animals. Only their carcasses defiled (v. 8). Nothing is said about the degree of defilement resulting from eating prohibited animals. One would assume therefore that uncleanness resulting from eating was covered by the regulations about carcass contact (see vv. 24, 28, 31, 40 and 17:15).

Verses 9-12 describe permitted and prohibited water creatures. In the permitted class were those with both fins and scales (v. 9). All others, such as shellfish and eels, were prohibited (vv. 10-12).

Because fowl did not lend themselves to such schematic classification, the writer provided a list of prohibited birds (vv. 13-19).

Winged insects (vv. 20-23) were forbidden except for certain types of hoppers (locusts, bald locusts, crickets, and grasshoppers).

Prohibited animals, water creatures, and insects were considered defiling agents when dead (vv. 24-28). Contact with their carcasses rendered a person unclean until the evening and their contact with one's clothing rendered the person unclean and required laundering of the garments. With the mere passage of time till the evening, a person's uncleanness dissipated.

All scurrying animals (vermin) and crawling insects and all reptiles were unclean and their carcasses defiled (vv. 29-31, 41-44). Items on which their carcasses fell had to be dipped in water and were unclean until the evening (v. 32). Their carcasses in a pottery item, vessels, small stoves and ovens, rendered unclean both the food within and the container itself, which had to be broken (vv. 33-35; see 6:28). Porous pottery absorbed, thus making thorough cleansing by scouring impossible. Water sources and seed for sowing were not rendered unclean by the carcasses (vv. 36-37).

The carcasses of edible animals that died on their own rather than being slaughtered also were contaminated (v. 39). Eating the flesh of such an animal rendered one and one's clothes unclean until the evening and required that the clothes be laundered (v. 40; see 22:8).

Verses 44-45 offer an appeal and rationale for avoiding the realm of the unclean. Avoiding contamination was to sanctify oneself and to strive after holiness. Since God was holy, striving for holiness was to imitate God. Since God had brought the people Israel up out of the land of Egypt, they were his in a special way and thus obligated to his demands. Verse 45b does not declare the people to be holy, as does Deuteronomy (see Deut. 14:2); it holds up holiness (the complete avoidance of the unclean) as an ideal goal.

Various attempts have been made over the centuries to explain the reasoning behind the material on the prohibited and permitted and the consequent defilement. This has especially been the case with the distinction between the clean and unclean foods, which has been explained as a means to disciplined obedience, an aid to good health, or as an avoidance of pagan practices. The clues to understanding the thinking behind the regulations actually lie in the worldview of the ancient Israelites, especially the priestly system.

The world was constituted into three realms and consequent states of being. These were the holy (Heb. qodesh), the common or normal (Heb. tahor), and the unclean or abnormal (Heb. tame'). Varying degrees existed in the realms of the holy and the unclean. The realm of the holy was that most closely related to the Deity and reached its strongest intensity in the innermost shrine of the sanctuary where God was uniquely present. Here also was concentrated the highest order and perfection. Persons and things could be transferred to the realm of the holy through ordination, consecration, gift, or vow. The realm of the unclean was the arena farthest from God and perfection. It was the realm of death, chaos, and the irregular. Geographically, it was associated with the wilderness, the uninhabited and the uninhabitable. The realm of the normal was the area of ordinary, everyday life.

Persons could move back and forth across the boundaries between the realms. The carcasses of animals, uncleanness, swarming and crawling things, and unclean animals with confused traits and uncharacteristic features belonged to the world of tame' with its uncleanness, unorthodoxy, and impurity. Contact with the world of the unclean moved one across the boundary out of the world of the normal, and time and sometimes rituals were required to move one back from the world of the abnormal. The degree of the uncleanness determined the nature of the transition back to tahor.

The normal person could make contact with but not fully enter the realm of the holy—the realm of God, the priesthood, and the sanctuary. Rituals of preparation like bathing, abstinence from sex, and laundering of clothes were required before approaching the holy (see Exod. 19:10-11). Contact with the world of the holy was mediated to the ordinary person by the sanctuary, its ritual, and its priesthood. Property such as sacrifices and tithes could be and were transferred to the divine arena in Temple ritual or personal vow. Some things so transferred (such as sacrifices) could be de-sanctified only through error and with penalty (the reparation sacrifice).

Just as the realm of the unclean could invade normal life, so could also the holy. As touching the unclean contaminated with uncleanness, so contact with the holy communicated holiness. Contact between the holy and the unclean was to be avoided at all cost and its consequences were considered enormous, as the case of Nadab and Abihu illustrated.

Dietary laws and defilement regulations were instituted and functioned to preserve the boundaries of the divinely created order. What God had put asunder, no one should join together.

12:1-8

Childbirth and Defilement

The subject of defilement, begun in the last section, continues in this new unit marked off with an introduction (v. 1) and a conclusion (vv. 7b-8).

Childbirth was a transitional period for mothers marked by a time of withdrawal from normal life and a three-staged readmission process. If the offspring was a male, the mother went through a seven-day period of uncleanness (v. 2a), probably characterized by isolation from the home and family. (Note that the father was apparently not present at the birth but had to be given the news; Jer. 20:14-15.) On the eighth day, perhaps following a ritual bath, she (along with the baby) would have resumed normal family life, except with regard to religious rituals. Thirty-three additional days had to pass before the mother could offer the sacrifices reintegrating her fully into the community and making normal participation in religious rituals possible (v. 4). The woman's uncleanness was associated with her bleeding at and following childbirth as v. 2b makes clear in its comparison with menstrual uncleanness (see 15:19-23). The time of uncleanness was double, fourteen and sixty-six days, if the child was female (v. 5), probably because in giving birth to a female the mother had a child who would also someday pollute with her blood flow.

Sacrifices required of the new mother, not for giving birth but for blood pollution, were a lamb as a burnt offering and a pigeon or dove as a purgation offering (v. 6). The latter was probably offered first to placate the Deity and purge the sanctuary (see 5:8). The burnt offering was probably understood as a thanksgiving presentation. The priest is described as handling all acts in the process, since the woman, still unclean, would not have access to the place of animal slaughter. The poor could substitute a second bird for the lamb (v. 2).

Only incidental reference is made in the text to the circumcision of the male child (v. 3), since this topic had already been covered in Genesis 17. Circumcision on the eighth day marked the transition of the male infant from being merely a human being to being a member of the chosen people.

13:1-14:57

Tsara'at Defilement and Cleansing

These chapters deal with what came to be called leprosy in the Middle Ages. The Hebrew expression applied to the ailments throughout the section is tsara'at. That the ailment does not refer to leprosy proper (Hansen's disease, known in antiquity as "elephantiasis") is indicated by a number of factors. First, the afflicted was expected to heal, even quickly, which is not the case with Hansen's disease. Second, houses and fabrics could be afflicted. Third, skeletal remains from biblical times in Palestine do not show evidence of Hansen's disease.

13:2-44

Diagnosis of the Ailment

This section discusses various characteristics of skin and head diseases, all suspected of fitting into the category of tsara'at. From the symptoms noted, it is impossible to determine the diseases involved and to label the troubles with modern names.

Persons suspected of or suspecting themselves to have "leprosy" were brought to a priest for examination (v. 2). An individual priest was "off duty" most of the time and thus among and available to the people.

If the person examined was clearly clean or unclean, the priest could rule on the case immediately. In other cases, various periods of confinement or quarantine were used: examination, seven-day quarantine, second examination, second seven-day quarantine, third examination, and bathing if the person had been declared unclean (vv. 3-6). Scalp and facial diseases could require shaving (vv. 33).

13:45-46

The Status of One Afflicted with Tsara'at

A person declared unclean was excluded from religious rituals and normal social relations. The person was deinstitutionalized both religiously and socially. Such a one moved completely into the realm of unclean. Clothing (torn), physical appearance (hair disheveled), mannerisms (covered lip and warning cry), and living space (alone outside the camp) all testify to the ostracism. The afflicted had to warn passersby of the danger of contacting defilement.

The diseased person was treated in this manner not only because of the real or assumed fear of contagion but also because of a theological motive, to protect the wholeness and well-being of society and to demonstrate the true status of the afflicted. Being without known cause, tsara'at was considered a punishment from God. As such, the person's presence in society was a threat to the community. Throughout the material describing the disease, it is called a "touch" or "stroke" implying an affliction from God. The disease was connected with death, since it gave the skin the appearance of a deceased person. The "leprosy" placed on Pharaoh (Exod. 4:6) and Miriam (Num. 12:10) is described as "flaky [not "white"] like snow." In the case of Miriam, the disease is described in terms of a stillborn child, "the flesh is half consumed when it comes out of the mother's womb" (Num. 12:12; see below on 14:14).

13:47-59

Garments with Tsara'at

Fabrics could have the affliction, in this case no doubt some fungus or mildew growth. If after two examinations and the passage of seven days, the disease had spread, the fabric was burned (vv. 47-52). If the disease had not spread after seven days, it was washed and if the color did not fade, it was burned (vv. 53-55). If the spot had not spread and had lightened in color, it alone was cut out and the fabric washed again (vv. 56, 58). Reappearance of the discoloration required burning of the entire cloth (v. 57).

14:1-32

Rituals of Cleansing and Reintegration of the Afflicted

When the afflicted was healed of the disease, a complex ritual process was employed, first, to effect the cleansing of the one afflicted and, second, to reintegrate the person into full standing in the normal life of the people. The transition involved both spatial and temporal dimensions.

14:1-7, The Cleansing Outside the Camp.

The ritual of the day of cleansing took place "outside the camp" in the world of the unclean. The ritual involved the use of two living, small birds without defects, cedarwood, scarlet string, hyssop (an herb), and an earthen vessel (vv. 4-5). One bird was killed in the earthen vessel over running water and the blood was caught in the vessel. (Running water symbolized the intent of the ritual, the removal of the contamination of the disease.)

At this point, the priest became the primary actor in the ritual. Using the bunch of hyssop and cedarwood (bound with the string along with the live bird) as a sprinkler, the priest sprinkled the afflicted person seven times with the slaughtered bird's blood. The diseased person was then pronounced clean and the live bird bearing blood was released into an open field (vv. 6-7). The blood sprinkled on the afflicted served as a ritual detergent to absorb and purge the person's contamination. The release of the live bird bearing blood was probably the means of offering back to God the life of the slaughtered bird in a ritual conducted away from the sanctuary proper. There is no indication in the text that the person's impurities had been transferred to the live bird.

14:8-32, The Ritual of Social and Religious Reintegration of the Afflicted.

Although the afflicted was now pronounced clean and thus freed from the realm of the unclean, the person was not yet returned fully to the clean and the possibility of contact with the realm of the holy. This was effected through an eight-day process in three stages. First, the clothes of the afflicted were laundered, the person shaved of all body hair (becoming like a hairless infant), and bathed (v. 8a). These features of the ritual, like the washing of the priests in the ordination ritual (8:6), marked the transition of the afflicted into the marginal area between the boundaries of unclean and clean. Second, reentering the camp, the person spent seven days in the camp living outside the family abode (v. 8b). Seven days were thus spent in marginal life between the boundaries of the unclean and the clean just as the priests lived seven days on the boundary between the clean and the holy (8:33). On the seventh day, the body was again shaved and bathed and clothes laundered (v. 9), to prepare for the transition back into normal life. Third, on the eighth day, the afflicted offered the sacrificial requirements at the sanctuary, completing the transition to social and religious normality. The person's offerings and ritual material included a male lamb as a reparation sacrifice, a ewe lamb as a purgative sacrifice, and a second male lamb as a burnt offering, a cereal offering of flour and oil, and a separate measurement of oil (vv. 10, 12, 19, 20). Some of the sacrificial blood was placed on the person's right ear, thumb, and big toe (v. 14). Some of the oil, poured into the hand of the priest, was sprinkled seven times before the Lord to consecrate the remainder (vv. 15-16). Part of the oil was then placed on the right ear, thumb, and big toe and the remainder rubbed on the person's head (vv. 17-18). The application of the blood to the afflicted who had already been declared clean (see v. 6) symbolized the movement back to life from the realm of the dead and the application of oil confirmed that new status.

With the person now fully integrated back into the world of the living, the realm of the clean, the remainder of the sacrificial service was performed to purge the person's pollution from the sanctuary and to placate and thank God (vv. 19–20). The afflicted then could return home in full social and religious standing.

For the person too poor to provide the full retinue of animals, less expensive sacrifices could be substituted for the animals except for the reparation sacrifice, which was always a male sheep (vv. 21–32).

14:33–53

The Defilement and Cleansing of a House

Like humans and fabrics, houses could also be infected with tsara'at. This section outlines the procedures of diagnosis (vv. 35–38), remedial actions (vv. 39–42), and the determination of whether the case was irreversible (vv. 43–47) or reversible (vv. 48–55).

A house with suspicious growth on the walls was examined by a priest; the priest ordered removal of the household goods before inspection because, if a house were declared unclean, so were all its contents (vv. 35–36). If a preliminary examination confirmed the suspicion, the house was declared "off limits" for seven days (vv. 37–38). Both entering and living in the house during the period defiled one (vv. 46–47).

Upon second examination, if the growth had spread, the affected stones were replaced and the house's inside plaster scraped off and replaced. The contaminated stones and plaster were disposed of in a known place of uncleanness (vv. 39–42). If contamination reappeared, the entire house was pulled down and properly discarded (vv. 43–45).

If the house infection cleared after remedial actions, then the house was cleansed along the same lines as those used to cleanse the infected individual in 14:2–7 (vv. 48–53). Verses 54–57 summarize the chapter.

15:1–33

Genital Discharges and Defilement

A new unit begins with the speech formula of v. 1 and concludes with the summary statement in vv. 32–33. This section concerns the defilement produced by pathological male genital discharges probably resulting from gonorrhea (vv. 2–15), by normal ejaculation of semen (vv. 16– 18), by normal menstruation (vv. 19–24), and by pathological female discharges (vv. 25–30). All four cases are concerned with body fluids out of place, that is, with unusual discharges that moved beyond the normal body confines and thus transgressed boundaries.

The person with gonorrhea contaminated both directly, through contact and spittle (vv. 7–8, 11), and indirectly, through secondary contact with items on which the person lay or sat. Contact with the afflicted's bed or chair required laundering of clothes, bathing, and passage of a day to effect cleanness. Defiled inanimate objects had to be washed and pottery containers broken. After healing, the afflicted had to wait seven days (to confirm a cure), launder his clothes, bathe in running water, and offer two birds as a purgation sacrifice and a burnt offering (vv. 13–15). Although contaminated, the person with gonorrhea was never assigned the full status of total uncleanness like one suffering from "leprosy."

Semen contaminated both the person, and in intercourse both male and female, and any cloth or leather on which it fell (vv. 16–17). Bathing and washing were required. Couples after intercourse were required to bathe and were unclean until the evening because of semen. They were thus incapable of participation in religious rituals or attendance at the sanctuary (v. 18; see Exod. 19:15).

During the seven days of her menstrual period, a woman rendered unclean through direct contact or through secondary contact with that on which she lay or sat. Direct contact rendered one unclean until the evening (v. 19) and contact with her bed or chair required laundering, bathing, and passage of the day (vv. 20–23). Sexual relations with a menstruating female rendered the male unclean for seven days, and he became a contaminant (v. 20).

Females with pathological discharges were treated the same as menstruants (vv. 25–27) except that, like the person with gonorrhea, extension of the impurity beyond seven days required sacrificial expiation (vv. 28–30).

Verse 31 summarizes much of the system of thought lying behind the laws on defilement. Regulations and ordinances were revealed and taught so that the Israelites would be on guard against uncleanness that polluted the sanctuary (God's residence in their midst) and thereby avoid incurring the lethal anger of God.

16:1–34

The Ritual of Yom Kippur: The Day of Atonement

The stipulations regarding Yom Kippur have been given a narrative context so that 16:1 picks up where 10:20 broke off. This narrative context thus presents the ritual as the response to the episode of Nadab and Abihu, who had polluted the sanctuary with their sins and their corpses. The concluding paragraph (vv. 29–34a) makes clear, however, that what is being described had become and was limited to an annual event. The goals of the ritual were twofold; first, to cleanse the entire sanctuary of the defiling pollution produced by the priests' and people's wrongdoings (v. 33) and, second, to cleanse the people from their sins (v. 30).

16:1–10, The Sacrifices. The animals used in the ritual included the following: for the priests, a bull for a purgation sacrifice and a ram for a burnt offering, and for the people, two goats for a purgation sacrifice and a ram for a burnt offering (vv. 3, 5). Only one of the community's goats was slain, the other was "for Azazel" with the selection between the two being made by lot (vv. 7–10).

16:11–19, The Cleansing of the Sanctuary. Before conducting the ritual, Aaron, the high priest, bathed and donned simple linen garments (v. 5). The main portion of the ritual was thus performed without his wearing the elaborate regalia of the high priestly office (see 8:7–9). The bathing marked the high priest's temporary surrender of the exaltation of his office and the linen garments signified his identity with the people and their sin.

The priests' purgation offering was slaughtered and its blood caught (v. 11). Aaron then took a fire pan with coals from the altar and incense and, alone (v. 17), entered the tent of meeting penetrating into the Holy of Holies behind the veil. He placed the incense on the coals to make a cloud to cover the mercy seat atop the Ark, thus shrouding his direct confrontation with the Deity and his view of the mercy seat (vv. 12–13; → Ark). He then took blood from the slain bull (apparently exiting and reentering the Holy of Holies but leaving the burning incense before the mercy seat) and with his finger sprinkled blood once on the front of the mercy seat and then seven times on the ground before the mercy seat (v. 14), both cleansing and reconsecrating the Holy of Holies.

Then acting as a member of the community, he killed the goat for the people's purgation offering and repeated the ritual in the Holy of Holies (v. 15). Similar blood rituals were performed in the remainder of the tent of meeting (v. 16b) and on the altar of burnt offering in the courtyard (vv. 18–19). These blood rituals purged the Holy of Holies of defilement produced by the people's deliberate or inadvertent transgressions and purified and reconsecrated the altar.

16:20–22, The Cleansing of the People.

The cleansing of the people was performed through the use of the live goat designated by lot "for Azazel" (v. 10). The high priest placed both his hands upon the head of the goat and confessed over it the iniquities, transgressions, and sins of the people, probably in generalized confessional formulas (v. 21b). Placing both hands on the sacrificial animal symbolized transference; the use of only one hand was to express ownership. The wrongs of the people were thus transferred to the goat and with the goat were sent into the wilderness, a place cut off from habitation (vv. 21b–22). The goat went "to Azazel" (vv. 10, 26). Whether Azazel was a place, a demon, or the personification of the "unclean" wilderness cannot be determined.

16:23–28, The Remainder of the Ritual.

In the remainder of the ritual, the high priest reverted to his role as supreme representative of God, signified by a second bathing and the donning of the full high priestly regalia (vv. 23–24). Both the one who led the goat to the wilderness and the one who burned the remains of the sin offerings had to bathe to remove the defilement contracted in depositing of these sin-laden objects (vv. 26–28).

16:29–34a, Regulations on Yom Kippur.

The concluding remarks specify details about Yom Kippur. Observed on the tenth day of the seventh month, the day was to be marked by abstinence from work (for both the native and the sojourner) and humiliation indicating penitence. The role of repentance in the observance is succinctly affirmed in the Mishnah: "If one said, 'I will sin and Yom Kippur will effect expiation,' then Yom Kippur effects no expiation. For transgressions between humans and God, Yom Kippur effects expiation, but for transgressions that are between persons, Yom Kippur effects expiation only if a person has settled affairs with one's fellow human being" (M. Yoma 8:9).

17:1–21:24

The Holiness of Life

This block of material is introduced by the speech formula in 17:1 (following the summary statement in 16:34b) and concluded by the summary statement in 21:24. Its central topic is the life of holiness lived in imitation of God. The material is structured into six speeches of the Lord to Moses (see 17:1; 18:1; 19:1; 20:1; 21:1; 21:16). Like the six days in which God established the orders of creation, so these six speeches outline the orders for the people's life of holiness. This block of material may once have existed as a separate collection as a booklet or code on holiness.

17:1-16

Sacrifice and Blood

The theme running through this entire chapter is the association of blood with life and of life with God. The first section (vv. 1-9) argues that all sacrifices, since they involve the taking of life and the shedding of blood, must be brought to the sanctuary where the blood can be properly disposed of. The second section (vv. 10-16) prohibits the eating of blood.

17:1-9, Sacrifices and the Sanctuary. This section mandates that all sacrifices must be made at the sanctuary, and since all slaughter of domestic animals is here considered sacrifice, then all animals must be slaughtered at the sanctuary.

The standard Hebrew text of v. 4 has suffered the loss of several words in scribal copying but these have been preserved in the ancient Greek and Samaritan versions. Verse 4 should read: "And does not bring it to the door of the tent of meeting so as to make it a burnt offering or a sacrifice of well-being to the Lord for its acceptance and for a pleasing odor, but slaughters it outside and does not bring it to the door of the tent of meeting to present it as a presentation to the Lord before the sanctuary of the Lord; blood-guilt shall be reckoned to that one; the person has shed blood and that person shall be cut off from the midst of his people." The requirement that all sacrifices and thus all slaughter of animals had to be done at the sanctuary was an effort to eliminate secular slaughter of animals for food. Secular slaughter of animals had been sanctioned by Deuteronomy (12:15-18); apparently Lev. 17:1-9 was an attempt to counter this and its attendant practice of pouring out the blood "upon the earth like water" (Deut. 12:16). Such practices were for the Priestly author the equivalent of sacrificing to some "demons" of the field (Lev. 17:7). Verses 8-9 extend the regulation to include non-native sojourners.

According to v. 4, to slaughter an animal without giving the blood (= life) back to God through the means of priestly disposal against the altar (v. 6a; see 3:2, 8) was to be guilty of murder.

17:10-16, Prohibition Against Eating Blood. Throughout the Priestly texts of the Bible, the eating of blood is prohibited and, in fact, is treated as the primeval prohibition given Noah when humans, after the Flood, were allowed to give up a purely vegetarian diet and slaughter animals for food (see Gen. 9:3-4; Lev. 3:17; 7:26). The one eating blood in the land—native or sojourner—is threatened with being "cut off from one's people" (v. 10).

A twofold rationale is given for not eating blood in v. 11. First, "the life of the flesh is in the blood," and the "life" (or "soul," Heb. ne- phesh) that animals, like humans, possess is given by and belongs to God (see v. 14). Second, God declares, "I have given it to you for the altar to expiate on behalf of your lives because it is the blood with the life that expiates." The disposal and application of the blood at the altar is the divinely given means for humans to make amends for having taken life. To refuse to return the blood (life) to God made one a murderer (see v. 4).

The blood of game and fowl, which were killed in hunting for food and thus could not be presented at the sanctuary, was to be poured out and covered with dust (v. 13). With a kill, the hunter must momentarily pause and function like a "priest." Animals that had died on their own or been killed by beasts and thus not properly bled nor their blood treated ritually were unclean and eating their flesh rendered one unclean until evening and required personal bathing and the laundering of one's clothing (v. 15; see 11:39-40). Not to undergo this ritual cleansing rendered one to blame for possibly more serious offenses (v. 16), namely, prolonged uncleanness (see 5:2) or exclusion from ritual occasions and the sanctuary.

18:1-30

Prohibited Sexual Relations

18:1-5, Introduction. The life of holiness prohibited sexual relationships and therefore marriage between certain persons (vv. 6-18) and forbade certain other sexual practices and relationships (vv. 19-23). The regulations on these matters were prefaced with an introduction that designated such relationships as the practice of the inhabitants of the lands of Egypt and Canaan and therefore to be shunned (vv. 3-5). The expulsion of the pre-Israelite occupants of the land of Canaan is attributed to their having defiled the land through such practices, and the Israelites are warned that they too can be vomited out by the land if they follow such abominable customs (vv. 24-30).

18:6-18, Forbidden Marriage and Sexual Relationships. Sexual relationship ("to uncover the nakedness of") and therefore marriage between men and certain women were considered abnormal and prohibited. The two near female relatives that occur to us in this connection but are not mentioned in the list as prohibited sexual partners are a man's own daughter, who was surely prohibited (see Exod. 21:9), and nieces, who appear not to have been prohibited.

Most of the prohibited parties were near blood relatives, but not those in vv. 17-18 who were relatives through marriage. Marriage to any in the group would have produced confusion in human relations and thus introduced disorder. (Note that some of the patriarchs of the nation would have been guilty of unholiness according to these standards [see Gen. 20:12; 29:21-30; Exod. 6:20] and that Israel poked fun at its near neighbors for incestuous origins [Gen. 19:30-38]).

18:19-23, Other Prohibited Sexual Relations.

Five other forms of sexual activity are prohibited in these verses: first, sex with a woman during her menstrual period (v. 19; see 15:24; since menstrual blood was unclean and represented death, such sexual relations involved mixing life [semen] with death); second, sex with another man's wife (v. 20); third, devoting one's offspring, the product of sex, to Molech (v. 21; see below on 20:1-5); fourth, homosexual sex, with another male (v. 22; the Hebrew Scriptures do not comment on lesbianism); and fifth, sex with animals (v. 23). All of these acts were considered abnormal, crossing the boundaries ordained by God.

18:24-30, Concluding Exhortation. The series of prohibitions concludes with a warning that pre-Israelite occupants of the land of Canaan were expelled because they defiled the land with their sexual practices, and the Israelites too can be "vomited" out by the land if they follow such abominable customs.

19:1-37

The Life of Holiness

19:1-2, 37, Holiness in Imitation of God.

This chapter, in spite of its apparently disorganized and eclectic quality, may be viewed as the Priestly parallel to the Ten Commandments. In fact, the basic content of all the Ten Commandments appears here. The expression, "I am the Lord (your God)," occurs fifteen times in the text serving both to stress the origins of the ordinances and to divide the material into subunits. The initial call to the people is to be or become holy as God is holy (v. 2). Holiness is affirmed as a quality inherent in the Deity but also as a goal for the people to strive for. The life of holiness is then illustrated by diverse examples, some based on legal and cultic stipulations and others not. Verses 3-8 concern the life of holiness in relationship to God and vv. 9-37 concern the life of holiness as it is lived out in personal and human relationships. Verse 37 is a summarizing statement repeating the intent of v. 2.

19:3-8, Holiness Toward God. Four examples are used to speak of holiness toward God: first, to fear (or revere) one's mother and father (v. 3a); second, to observe the Sabbath days (v. 3b; the seventh day but also the "Sabbaths" of the festivals; see 16:31); third, neither to turn idols nor to manufacture molten images (perhaps of the Lord, v. 4); and fourth, to observe cultic regulations, for example, in the eating of the sacrifice of well-being offered to fulfill a vow to God (vv. 5-8). Interestingly, respect for parents is parallel to respect for God. This text resembles the Ten Commandments in that honor of parents is placed among the duties to God, i.e., in the first half of the commandments.

19:9-36, Holiness in Human Affairs. The description of human affairs begins with groups most distant from the center of the social order: the poor and resident aliens. For their benefit, some areas in field and vineyard were to be left unharvested and ungathered for their gleanings (vv. 9-10).

Verses 11-12 deal with relationships between business associates and prohibit stealing through stealth, deception, lying, and swearing falsely over such matters in the name of God (see 6:1-7).

Relations with those more available to the person are noted in vv. 13-15. Neighbors should not be oppressed (or deprived) or stolen from. Hired servants must be paid on the day of their labor and the blind and deaf must not be taken advantage of. Adherence to such principles is to fear (revere) God.

In legal matters, justice was to be disinterestedly administered (generally done by a group of the person's peers). Partiality should not be shown to the poor and weak nor deference to the rich and powerful (v. 14). One is admonished to be neither a troublemaking gossip and accuser nor a silent nonparticipant when possessing evidence that could affect a neighbor's capital case (v. 16; see 5:1).

One is admonished not to harbor a grudge and repress feelings of hostility against another. Instead, one is advised to confront directly (reproach and reason) the other (see Isa. 1:18) and have it out. Repression of feelings instead of open interchange and externalization of the hurt are seen as eventually leading to sinful action and certainly to slander and deceit (v. 17; see Prov. 25:9-10; 26:24-26). Harboring hatred in the heart is seen as possibly leading to vengeance (in court or out) and grudge bearing. Over against the latter two sentiments and dispositions, the writer proposed the alternative: "Love your neighbor as (or as one like) yourself" (v. 18). In vv. 17-18, the love commandment (in v. 18) parallels "reproach your neighbor" in v. 17, which would suggest a meaning like "treat others as you would (or should) like to be treated," but without implying any sentimental affection.

With v. 19, the material seems to begin anew. The first portion of v. 19a parallels v. 2 and precedes a sequence beginning with the second portion of v. 19a, which parallels v. 3 and what follows it.

Verses 19, like Deut. 22:9-11, prohibits mixing of species across boundaries. Breeding, planting, and weaving must be done to preserve the independence of plant and animal species "according to their kind" (see Gen. 1:12, 24), thus respecting the divinely established natural boundaries and reflecting wholeness.

Verses 20-22 parallel vv. 5-8 and require, in addition to an indemnity, a reparation sacrifice by a man who has voluntary sex with an unfree woman who is betrothed to another man. Such relations with a free woman would have involved a capital offense (v. 20b). The reason for the payment of a reparation sacrifice in the case of a betrothed slave girl and her lover is that the man was an intrusive figure in a divinely sanctioned arrangement and therefore guilty of trespass against a holy thing (see commentary above on 6:1-7).

Fruit trees were to be considered "uncircumcized" for three years and their produce forbidden; in the fourth year all fruit was holy; only in the fifth year was the owner to eat the produce (vv. 23-25). Such a practice represented a gradual transition process, with the first fruit of trees like those of humans, animals, and grains being dedicated to God. Such gifts of the "first" embodied Israel's sense of being a tenant in God's land. As is clear from this example, the laws beginning in vv. 19 are concerned with the observances and holiness of personal practices rather than interpersonal practices (unlike vv. 9-18). They concern matters relating to life in the land.

Practices prohibited in vv. 26-29—eating blood, practicing sorcery or necromancy with its "contact" with the dead, and disfiguring the hair or the body—either defiled and defaced the person and/or threatened one's relationship with the family after death.

Making one's daughter a prostitute (for the sake of income) profaned the female and threatened the land with defilement (v. 29; see 18:24-30). Sabbath and sanctuary may appear to be oddly associated in v. 30 and reference to them peculiarly placed in this context. Neither is the case. Sabbath and sanctuary go together throughout the Priestly material (note the Sabbath text amidst directions on tabernacle construction [Exod. 35:1-3]). As the Sabbath is the culmination of creation, so the building of the sanctuary is the culmination of the stay in the wilderness. God is described speaking six times in giving directions about building the sanctuary paralleling the six days of creation (Exod. 25:1; 30:11, 17, 22, 34; 31:1). Sabbath and creation are related (see Exod. 20:8-11) and failure to observe the Sabbaths (see Lev. 26:34-35, 43), like defiling the Temple, threatens life in the land. So does prostitution, the topic of v. 29.

One should not be defiled by mediums and wizards who practice necromancy since their contact with the dead brings defilement, which threatens life in the land (v. 31).

Honoring the older generation is to revere God (v. 32) and to claim the promise of long life in the land (see Exod. 20:12).

Sojourners or resident aliens should not be wronged; they should be shown the same love as natives (Lev. 19:18). Their presence among the people is a constant reminder of Israel's time in Egypt—a time without land (vv. 33-34).

The final challenge is a call to personal integrity reflected in honesty and justice in business (vv. 35-36). The Lord can make his demands for holiness not only because he is holy but also because he brought the people out of Egypt and therefore they belong to him in a unique way (v. 36b).

20:1-27

Penalties for Various Infractions

This chapter specifies punishment for some of the wrongs described in the preceding chapters but especially those in chap. 18. Other than the speech formula (v. 1), the unit contains no special introduction. A lengthy admonitory conclusion (vv. 22-26) offers a rationale for obeying the divine ordinances and striving for holiness.

20:2-21, 27, The Penalties. The description of penalties opens with a lengthy statement (vv. 2-5) condemning anyone, native or resident alien, who gives a child to Molech, a matter already mentioned in 18:21. The nature of this wrong has been widely discussed since antiquity without consensus.

Two factors are fundamental in understanding what was involved in this matter. First, the name usually rendered "Molech" (actually hammolek, Heb., "the Molech") is probably a distortion of the title hammelek (Heb.), which means "the king" and would have been a designation for God (→ Molech). Second, the ritual involved was clearly a part of the Judean cult and was carried out in the name of the national god, the God of Israel. That this was the case is demonstrated by the fact that giving one's offspring to Molech defiled the sanctuary and profaned God's holy name. This act was possible only if something was done in the name of God. Thus the Lord, the God of Israel, was "the king" (hammelek; the full title occurs in Isa. 6:5 hammelek yahweh seba'ot) to whom the child was given. Therefore 20:2-5 legislated against an element in the national cult. To understand the Priestly prohibition we must examine the history of the practice.

In early Israel, people were required to consecrate to the Lord ("declare holy") everything that opened the womb among humans and animals (Exod. 13:1-2). The firstborn became the property of the Temple, although it was assumed that firstborn children would generally be redeemed (Exod. 13:13b) according to desanctification rules (see below on Lev. 27). Income from the redemption of firstborns and the sale of the unredeemed was a major source of Temple funds (see 2 Kings 12:4). The verb "pass over" (Heb. 'abar; Exod. 13:12) and this early dedicatory practice may have been the origin of the term "Hebrew" ('ibri; → Hebrews). The "Hebrew slave" in Exod. 21:2-6 and Deut. 15:12-18 would then have been one of the unredeemed that could be purchased from the Temple (note the role of the Temple in Exod. 21:5-6) at good prices (Deut. 15:18).

In the eighth century B.C., apparently during the reign of Ahaz, the ritual of "passing over" the child to God came to be understood in sacrificial terms, and children were actually burned as sacrifices to "(the Lord) the king" (see 2 Kings 16:3; 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 32:35; Mic. 6:6-8), as was the case in contiguous cultures, especially Phoenicia.

Deuteronomy later (probably in the latter part of Hezekiah's reign) prohibited the actual sacrifice and burning of children (Deut. 18:10; see also 12:31). Jeremiah later denied that God had commanded the practice of child sacrifice (Jer. 32:35). Ezekiel held that God had once established the ordinance requiring child sacrifice but now finds it odious (Ezek. 20:25).

The Priestly legislation in Lev. 20:2-5 attempted to eliminate entirely the practice of devoting children to the Lord (hammelek) and, thus, the potential for child sacrifice. In Numbers, the Levites are interpreted as the substitute for the firstborns thereby rendering unnecessary any transference to the holy of the firstborn (Num. 8:16-18). The penalty for devoting a child to hammelek was severe according to Lev. 20:2-5—stoning inflicted by the people of the land and failure to be gathered to one's people after death inflicted by God.

Consultation of wizards and mediums and thus the world of the dead, still apparently accepted as legal even if not reliable in the time of Isaiah (Isa. 8:19-20), was placed under the penalty of God (Lev. 20:6) and treated as a sign of unholiness (v. 7). Verse 8 described the Lord as the one sanctifying the people, that is, giving ordinances by which the people can live holy lives. Cursing father and mother (see Exod. 21:17), an act against divinely established social orders, was placed in the category of a capital crime (Lev. 20:9).

The death penalty is prescribed (or "permitted," depending on whether the verbs are translated "shall be [or may be] put to death") for both parties in seven types of sexual relations: a man and his neighbor's wife (v. 10), a man and his father's wife (v. 11), a man and his daughter-in-law (v. 12), a male with another male (v. 13), a man with a woman and her mother (v. 14), a man with an animal (v. 15), and a female with an animal (v. 16).

Other sexual "misconduct," probably assumed to be protracted, is to receive lesser penalties. Sexual relations, perhaps marriage, between stepchildren results in God's placing them under the threat of an early death (v. 17). Sex with a menstruating female (v. 18; see 15:24), and marriage with an aunt (v. 19) or aunt-in-law (v. 20), or sex with a living brother's (presumably ex-) wife (v. 21) are all condemned, but execution of any penalty is left in the hands of God.

The regulation on mediums and wizards (v. 27) appears to be a misplaced law that perhaps once appeared earlier in the chapter (see v. 6). It prescribes stoning for necromancy. This form of divination involved contact with the dead, a practice considered defiling by Priestly theology for its failure to respect the boundary between life and death.

20:22-26, The Rationale. The reasons offered for obedience to the divine statutes in the conclusion are twofold. Obedience protects against the defilement of the land, which could result in expulsion of the people (vv. 22-24a; see 18:2-5, 24-30). Just as God had separated out and chosen his people from among the nations, so must they separate and choose between the permitted and prohibited, the clean and unclean, and thus imitate the divine.

21:1-24

Regulations for the Priests

This section, to be addressed to the priests, contains regulations regarding priestly holiness in terms of their contact with the dead (vv. 1b-6, 10-12) and whom they may marry (vv. 7-9, 13-15) as well as statements on the status of blemished priests (vv. 17-23).

21:1b-9, Regular Priests. Regular priests were forbidden contact with and being in the presence of a human corpse except for the closest of kin—parents, children, brother, and unmarried sister (vv. 2-3). Being a leader (Heb. ba'al) among his people, the priest (kohen) should not defile himself (v. 4). Signs of mourning—special cutting of the hair, shaping of the beard, and cutting of the body were prohibited (v. 5). Contact with the dead defiled (see Num. 19) and changing the body's appearance was an affront to God's holiness (→ Priests).

Priests were forbidden to marry certain women who had been profaned by other sexual partners (Lev. 21:7). For a priest's daughter to become a prostitute (or engage in sexual infidelity to her husband) reflected on the holiness of the father, since it threatened the purity of the priestly line. She was to be executed through burning (v. 9).

21:10-15, The High Priest. Restrictions were even more rigorous for the high priest; he was forbidden any signs of mourning (see 10:6-7) and prohibited from being in the presence of any corpse even those of his own parents (vv. 10-11). He could not leave the sanctuary during emergencies caused by death of a near relative but had to continue his ritual duties (v. 12).

A high priest was required to marry a native prepubescent female, that is, a girl without experience of sexual intercourse (vv. 13-14). His "seed" or family line must not be profaned (v. 15). Such precautions may have sought to assure that any child born to his wife was his.

21:17-23, Blemished Priests. In the priestly system, any male descendant of the house of Aaron inherited the right to the priesthood, but one with a physical abnormality (vv. 17-21) was prohibited from functioning in the Temple ritual, though he could share in priestly perquisites ("the bread of his God"), both the "most holy" (consumed in the sanctuary) and the "holy" (consumable by priests and their families in any clean place; v. 22). A blemished priest could not approach the altar or enter the sanctuary shrine, for to do so would have profaned the holy things (altar and shrine) of God (v. 23). Abnormality had no place in the ritual service of God.

22:1-23:44

Holy Things and Holy Times

The ninth section of the book, which follows the summary statement in 21:24, contains two divine speeches to Moses: the first, in chap. 22, to be addressed to the priests and the second, in chap. 23, to be addressed to the general population.

22:1-33

The Holy Things and Priestly Responsibility

This entire chapter is devoted to instructions to the priests regarding their custody and care of the "holy things"—gifts and sacrifices—contributed by the people. The priests are warned that they must be scrupulous about such sacred things (v. 2). The remainder of the chapter spells out how this is to be done.

The temporarily unclean priest was warned not to approach a holy thing (vv. 6-7). The placement of the regulation about not eating the flesh of animals that died or were killed in v. 8 could suggest that originally this regulation applied only to priests and was subsequently extended to the general population (see 17:15; and Ezek. 44:31). Priests are warned to be vigilant lest they incur guilt and be struck dead for their profanation (Lev. 22:9; see 10:1-2).

Verses 10-16 spell out who could eat the sacrifices presented to God. Only the priest's share of the sacrifice of well-being is discussed. A priest's entire household, including permanent slaves either purchased or born in his house, could eat of it. Excluded from consuming the sacrificial flesh were all native laypersons, temporary settlers attached to his household, hired servants, and any daughter married to a nonpriest (unless she was a childless divorcee or widow who had fully returned to the household of the father; vv. 10-14.) If an unqualified person accidentally ate of the sacrificial flesh, the uneaten portion had to be returned and a 20 percent penalty on the value of the sacrifice had to be paid (v. 14). Priests are reminded of their duty to avoid situations in which their irresponsibility could bring guilt on others (v. 15).

Verses 17-30 outline some of the criteria by which the priests evaluated the acceptability of sacrifices offered to fulfill vows or as freewill offerings. Burnt offerings so offered had to be males and had to be unblemished (vv. 19-23). Concession is made in the case of freewill offerings; they could have minor defects (v. 23). Genitally injured or castrated animals, even acquired from foreigners, could not be offered as sacrifice (vv. 24-25).

Firstborn animals (see Exod. 22:30) had to remain with their mother for at least seven days before being given to the Temple (Lev. 22:27). A mother and its offspring were not to be sacrificed on the same day (v. 28). This regulation, like Exod. 23:19b; 34:26b; and Deut. 14:21b, which prohibit cooking the young in its mother's milk, expresses horror at the unnecessary abnormality of such a practice (see also Deut. 22:6-7). The priests were held responsible for seeing that the people properly offered and properly consumed their thanksgiving sacrifices, the ones least under the supervision of the priesthood (Lev. 22:29-30).

The conclusion to chap. 22 admonishes the priests to remember that a goal of the cult was to manifest the holiness of God in the midst of the people (vv. 31-32a; see 10:3). As so frequently in this material, the redemption and election of the people of Israel are given as the motivating and obligating factors in obedience to the law (vv. 32b-33).

23:1-44

Holy Times and Sacred Seasons

Israel conceived of not only things (gifts, sacrifices, and "devoted" objects), persons (the priesthood and given and "devoted" individuals), and places (the sanctuary and its precincts), but also times as especially holy, dedicated to God, and belonging to the realm of the holy. These times are discussed in chap. 23 (see also Exod. 23:14-17; 34:18-24; Num. 28-29; Deut. 16:1-17).

23:3-4, The Sabbath. This seventh-day observance is discussed elsewhere in this volume (see Genesis, "Commentary," 2:3; Exodus, "Commentary," 16:22-30; 20:8-11; 23:12; 31:12-17; 35:1-3; Numbers, "Commentary," 15:32-36; Deuteronomy, "Commentary," 5:12-15). The nature of the Sabbath observance became the pattern for the especially sacred days in the calendar, namely, the first and seventh day of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:7-8), the Feast Day of Weeks (v. 21), and the first, tenth, fifteenth, and twenty-second of the seventh month (vv. 24, 27, 34-36).

23:4-8, Passover/Pesach and Unleavened Bread/Matsot. These celebrations are discussed elsewhere in this volume (see Exodus, "Commentary," 12:1-28; Deuteronomy, "Commentary," 16:1-8). Lev. 23:4-8 decrees that both the first (the fifteenth of the first month) and the seventh days (the twenty-first of the first month) would be special days with Sabbath regulations applicable (cf. Deut. 16:8; → Passover, The).

23:9-14, First Sheaf/'Omer Reshit. Priestly legislation required that a sheaf of newly harvested grain (along with a special burnt offering) be presented to God before any of the new crop was eaten by the people. This sheaf was to be presented on "the day after the sabbath" (v. 11). The context would imply that the sheaf was presented on the sixteenth day of the first month, following the "Sabbath" day of no occupational work ("laborious work") on the fifteenth. This meant new grain could be eaten after the presentation.

23:15-21, Feast of Weeks/Shavuot. The day following seven weeks after "the day after the sabbath," or fifty days later, was the Feast of Weeks or Pentecost (cf. Deut. 16:9; → Pentecost).

23:22, Regard for the Poor at Harvest. Reference to reaping gave the Priestly writer occasion to comment on care for the poor (see 19:9-10).

23:23-25, The Day of Trumpet Blasts. The first day of the seventh month, later referred to as New Year's Day (Rosh Hashanah) was a "Sabbath" day. Since several days in the seventh month were sacred, the day the month was begun had to be clearly noted (→ New Year Festival).

23:26-32, Yom Kippur. (See commentary above on chap. 16.) The only new element noted here is the admonition to begin fasting on the ninth day in the evening.

23:33-36, Feast of Booths/Sukkot. This fall festival was the most important of the sacred occasions in early Israel. It concluded the old harvest year, looked forward to the new agricultural season, and marked the turn of the year, the transition from the old to the new. In early Israel, the festival was probably a three-day affair (see Hos. 6:1-3; Amos 4:4) that combined the features of Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, and Booths (→ Tabernacles, Festival of).

23:37-38, Summary Statement. This section was apparently the original summary to the festival calendar of 23:4-36. Verses 1-3 and 39-43 appear to be insertions. The reference to the sacrifices of these holy times are spelled out in detail in Numbers 28-29.

23:39-43, Features of Sukkot. This appendix to the directions for Sukkot concerns the gathering of the hadar fruit (traditionally understood as the citron) and, according to tradition, the making of the lulab, a festive spray (v. 40). Both were used during the festival. A straightforward reading of the text suggests that the branches were collected for building booths (sukkot), impermanent shelters used in the fields at harvest time and then abandoned. Here the booths have been secondarily associated with life in the desert following the Exodus (vv. 42-43).

24:1-23

Oil, Bread, and Blasphemy

Part of this chapter reiterates and expands on material already presented in Exodus; it also contains the third narrative in Leviticus. The rationale for the ordering of the contents of the chapter is not clear.

24:2-4, Oil for the Menorah. A similar passage (Exod. 27:20-21) occurs in the divine directions to Moses for building the Tabernacle and its furniture (→ Lampstand).

24:4-9, Bread for the Table. This unit expands on Exod. 25:23-30 and stipulates the conditions relating to the "showbread" placed on the table in the inner shrine: the number twelve and the size of the loaves, their arrangement on the table, the use of frankincense, the fact that they are gifts to God, the placement of new loaves by the high priest on the Sabbath, and the restriction of the consumption of the old loaves to the priests (→ Showbread).

24:10–23a, Blasphemy in the Camp. Three texts in the Torah in addition to this one report a condition in which Moses is uncertain of what action should be taken and must await divine direction (Num. 9:6–14; 15:32–36; and 27:1–11). All four cases involve the following features: first, an issue arises or an offense is committed; second, Moses is consulted but has no immediate verdict; third, after a time, God reveals to Moses what should be done; and fourth, the divine verdict is carried out or formulated as a binding legislative statement.

In Lev. 24:10–23, a male of mixed parentage (which seems to play no major role in the story) engaged in a fight committed blasphemy. The description of his act in v. 11 should be translated: “He pronounced the name cursing (Yahweh).” His crime thus consisted not just in using the personal name of the nation’s God (Yahweh) but in cursing God with the use of this special name. The verdict decreed was death by public stoning after the witnesses had laid their hands on him, transferring to the culprit the consequence of having heard the curse (see commentary above on 16:21).

The formulation of the ruling in vv. 15b–16 includes the resident alien among those covered by the law against blasphemy (perhaps the reason the culprit is described as of mixed parentage).

In the final editing of this material, vv. 17–22 were incorporated although they are not intrinsically relevant to the case. Verses 17–18 and 21 affirm the death penalty for murder and equal compensation in the case of an animal’s death. The latter ruling limits settlement in property damage totally to compensation.

25:1–26:46

The Land’s Sabbath and the Jubilee—Blessings and Curses

These two chapters focus on the theme of the land, a central concern of the material in chaps. 18–26 (see 18:3–5, 24–30; 19:33–34; 20:22–26).

25:2–7, The Land’s Sabbath. The interests of this text differ remarkably from other statements about the Sabbatical Year (see Exod. 21:1–11; 23:10–11; Deut. 15:1–18). Other texts are concerned primarily with the relationship of sabbatical regulations to the social order (→ Sabbatical Year). Lev. 25:2–7 is primarily concerned not with social ramifications but with the land itself. The land is to have a Sabbath, a period of freedom from human exploitation; it must experience complete rest, a “sabbath of the Lord” (v. 4). Normal agricultural pursuits were to be suspended and what grew of itself was not to be gathered in and treated under normal property regulations (vv. 4–6). Everyone, including slaves, resident aliens, and even beasts of the field, was to have access to what the land produced of its own (vv. 6–7).

25:8–17, The Jubilee. The function of the Jubilee was to redistribute the land to its original owners, so as to prevent the amassing of large estates and to retain the people’s direct association with the land and their ownership of it (→ Jubilee).

The Jubilee was to be proclaimed on Yom Kippur after the passage of forty-nine years (vv. 8–9). Thus the “fiftieth” year was to begin on the tenth day of the seventh month of the forty-ninth year and probably included the remainder of that year. In that case, it was not in reality a fiftieth year. A general release was to be proclaimed in which one’s holding was returned and all slaves and indentured servants were freed (v. 10). Since the period overlapped a Sabbatical Year, the same rules applied about people “eating” the land’s yield directly from the field (vv. 11–12). Since property in such a system could not be sold, but in fact only leased and only for the time until the next Jubilee, transactions were stipulated to be based on this consideration (vv. 13–17).

25:18–24, Theological Underpinning. The theological rationale for these idealistic institutions (which, so far as is known, were never implemented) was that the land belonged to God; the Israelites were only his tenants. The landowner set the terms of tenancy: “the land shall not be sold in perpetuity” (v. 23).

25:25–28, The Poor and Their Property. A person forced to sell one’s landholding had redemption (repurchase) rights if funds became available through a next of kin (a redeemer relative) or through one’s own efforts.

25:29–34, Urban Property. Since the concern of the Jubilee was with farmland as a means of livelihood, only farm and village land was covered by the release (v. 31). Redemption rights on urban property were for only one year; thereafter the dwelling was considered sold in perpetuity (vv. 29–30). The exception to the urban property rule was the levitical cities (see Num. 35:1–8) where any Levite always possessed the right to redeem dwellings and where houses were to be returned in the Jubilee (vv. 32–33). Levites were not to trade the common land that went with their cities (v. 34).

25:35-55, Provisions for the Poor. Persons who became stricken with poverty were to be maintained by the community, although without property they would be like temporary settlers (attached to a native's household) or resident aliens, that is, without full rights (v. 35). Neither advanced nor accrued "shares" were to be taken of goods and materials supplied the poor, money was not to be lent at interest (see Ps. 15:5; Ezek. 18:8; Deut. 23:19-20), and food was not to be sold at a profit (Lev. 25:36-37; →Loan).

The poor who had to sell themselves into slavery to a native to pay debts were not to be treated as slaves, but as hired laborers or temporary residents. At the Jubilee, they and their children (one could not sell a wife) were to be released (vv. 39-40). Israelites were not to be sold as slaves on the open market, since they were all God's servants and ultimately divine property (v. 42). Israelites were allowed to buy non-natives as slaves, from both foreign nations and from non-natives living in their midst (vv. 44-45). These could be bequeathed in perpetuity to one's descendants (v. 46). Israelites who sold themselves to non-natives living in the land were to be sold with rights of full redemption and Jubilee release (vv. 47-55).

26:1-2, Reverence for God. Before the pronouncements of blessings and curses, the writer reports God as summarizing what reverence for him embodies. First, nothing should be constructed and venerated that replaces the Deity or stands between the divine and the people since only he is their God (v. 1). In all the Priestly legislation, only the sanctuary and the priesthood stand between the people and God. Second, the sacred seasons (the Sabbaths) set apart as holy must be observed. The ebb and flow of human time and the temporality of human existence must be intersected by sacred pauses that bear witness to the divine ordering of time and that manifest human submission to that ordering. Third, human life must be lived so as to avoid the impure, the unclean, and the sinful and their resulting contaminating pollutions and thus to show reverence for the divine sanctuary, the sacred space of God's presence (v. 2).

26:3-33, Blessings and Curses. Most treaties and law codes establishing patterns of relationships between parties in the ancient world concluded with the pronouncement of blessings as the reward for obedience and curses as the consequence of disobedience (see Exod. 23:20-33; Deut. 27-29). The blessings and curses in Lev. 26:3-38 once either concluded a covenant document or law code (chaps. 25-26; cf. 25:1; 26:46) or else were conceived along the lines of such a document (→Covenant; Curse and blessing).

26:3-13, The Blessings. It is significant that the blessings occur as a list of ten: (1) "I will grant your rains on schedule" (v. 4); (2) "I will establish peace [Heb. shalom] in the land" (v. 6a); (3) "I will drive away the vicious beasts" (v. 6b); (4) "I will look favorably upon you" (v. 9a); (5) "I will make you fertile" (v. 9a); (6) "I will multiply you" (v. 9a); (7) "I will establish my covenant with [or keep my obligation to] you" (v. 9b); (8) "I will establish my dwelling place in your midst" (v. 11); (9) "I will travel along in your midst" (v. 12a); and (10) "I will be your God" (12a).

The consequences of the blessings are fertility, tranquility, safety, success in battle (even with shalom one still had enemies!), and the abiding, beneficent presence of the God who in bringing the people out of Egypt broke their burdensome yokes of servitude and allowed the people to stand upright and free (vv. 11-13).

26:14-33, The Curses. God's promised hostile action to be taken against his people for disobedience is correlated with the people's unwillingness either to obey the divine commands or to accept the curses as disciplinary and reformative. Both lack of obedience (vv. 14, 18) and deliberate opposition to God (vv. 21, 23, 27) are noted as the bases for divine oppression.

Again, it is significant that the number of first-person references is twenty-four (= 2 × 12). This underscores the severity of the divine response to the people's continuing disobedience and obstinacy. The twenty-four divine actions are: (1) "I will wreak misery upon you" (v. 16a); (2) "I will look with disfavor on you" (v. 17a); (3) "I will chastise you" (v. 18); (4) "I will break your proud glory" (v. 19a); (5) "I will make the skies like iron and the earth like copper" (v. 19b); (6) "I will chastise you sevenfold" (v. 21); (7) "I will let loose wild animals against you" (v. 22); (8) "I will walk contrary to you" (v. 24a); (9) "I will smite you sevenfold" (v. 24b); (10) "I will bring a sword against you" (v. 25a); (11) "I will send pestilence" (v. 25b); (12) "I will shatter your supply of bread" (v. 26); (13) "I will walk in hostility contrary to you" (v. 28a); (14) "I will personally chastise you sevenfold" (v. 28b); (15) "I will destroy your cult places" (v. 30a); (16) "I will cut down your incense stands" (v. 30a); (17) "I will heap up your carcasses on your broken fetishes" (v. 30a); (18) "my soul will abhor you" (v. 30b); (19) "I will lay your cities in ruin" (v. 31a); (20) "I will make your sanctuaries desolate" (v. 31a); (21) "I will not savor your pleasing [sacrificial] odors" (v. 31b); (22) "I will devastate the land" (v. 32); (23) "I will scatter you among the nations" (v. 33a); and (24) "I will unsheath the sword against you" (v. 33a).

26:34-38, The Land and People After Judgment. The sabbatical rest (see 25:2-7) that would be denied the land if the divine ordinances were not kept would be made up when the people were exiled from the land so that it was left to lie desolate and untilled (vv. 34–35; see 2 Chron. 36:20–21).

26:39–45, Human Contrition and Divine Remembrance. In spite of the horrible curses, with their vision of devastated land and an exiled people, the material holds out hope for the future, a hope built on human contrition and repentance and on divine fidelity to the covenant.

The pattern of contrition on the part of those that survive the catastrophes is developed in the following stages. First, they shall feel heartbroken over their iniquities and the iniquities of their fathers (v. 39). Second, they shall confess these iniquities committed in their transgressions against God in walking contrary to divine will (v. 40). Third, they shall acknowledge that God walked contrary to them and brought them into exile in the land of their enemies (v. 41a). Fourth, when they have done these things, then they shall humble their stubborn hearts and, fifth, make up for their iniquities, atoning for their sins through living and suffering in the exile (vv. 41b, 43).

God promises that he shall then remember especially his covenant with Jacob but also the covenant with Isaac and Abraham and the land (v. 42). While the land makes up its Sabbaths and the people languish in exile atoning for their sins, God promises that he will neither completely destroy them nor finally annul his covenantal promise to award the land to their ancestors (vv. 43–45).

27:1–34

Evaluation and Desanctification of Holy Things

This chapter is only loosely integrated into the book of Leviticus and thus gives the appearance of an appendix. The incorporation of chap. 27, however, was used to bring the units in Leviticus to the number twelve and the number of divine speeches to thirty-six. This obvious editorial activity indicates that the separate books of the Torah were edited individually at their final stage.

This chapter concerns the evaluation and desanctification of persons and things given to God in various ways. Since they became “holy” as divine and sanctuary property, a person had to make special arrangements and payment to have the desanctifiable thing or person transferred out of the realm of the holy and back to the realm of the normal or clean.

Many things belonged to God according to divine ordinance; tithes, various sacrifices, the firstborn, and so on. These were given or passed over to God. Other things could be especially given to God through vows, dedications, and “devotion.” Some of these items could be desanctified legitimately and others not (see commentary above on 5:14–19). The income from desanctification was apparently a significant source of funds for the sanctuary and its priesthood (see 2 Kings 12:5).

27:2–13, Holy Things from Vows. Vows were promises made contingent upon divine aid (see Gen. 28:20–22; 2 Sam. 15:7–12; Ps. 66:13–15) and could include the promise to give humans to God (Judg. 11:29–40). One who was ill, for example, might pledge the monetary worth of a person of a certain age if recovery occurred. When divine aid was received, for example, in a recovery from illness, then the promised vow was presented to God (→ Vow). This text does not discuss the actual giving of persons to God, but only the monetary equivalent.

Lev. 27:2–8 set the evaluations for humans along age and gender lines without regard for health or earning capabilities. Females were assessed at one-half, three-fifths, or two-thirds that of males (vv. 5, 3–4, 6, 7). Children under one month of age could not be vowed, probably due to their uncertain viability. For a poor person, the equivalency was set not according to the established scale of vv. 3–7, but by the priest according to the person’s ability to pay (v. 8).

Vowed animals that were eligible to be sacrificed could not be redeemed, exchanged, or substituted; otherwise both the vowed and secondary animal became Temple property (vv. 9–10). Vowed animals unclean by nature or from condition that the Temple could not later use for sacrifice could be redeemed at the appraised value plus 20 percent (vv. 11–13).

27:14–25, Holy Things from Dedication. A person might dedicate (“set apart, make holy”) real estate to God, either house (vv. 14–15) or land from inherited property (vv. 16–25). The priest made an assessment of the property’s value. The value of land was calculated either according to the amount of seed required to plant it or according to its yield (v. 16; the meaning is unclear) and according to the date in relation to the Jubilee (vv. 17–18). Both house and land could be redeemed, if the donor had second thoughts, by paying the assessment plus 20 percent (vv. 15, 19). If one dedicated a portion of inherited land and did not redeem it, then the land became God’s possession after the (unspecified) time of redemption passed. If one dedicated property that had already been sold, it passed into God’s possession at the Jubilee. Either way the land was henceforth to be treated as “devoted” and thus nonredeemable (vv. 20– 21). One could dedicate a purchased field for the number of years remaining until the Jubilee and thereby dedicate the value of the harvests for that period (vv. 22–23a). Verse 23b may mean that the one dedicating a purchased field had to pay the total amount on the day of the appraisal, or that the priest set the annual evaluation once and for all on the day of dedication and that evaluation was paid during each of the years until the Jubilee. Dedicated purchased land was to revert to the original inheritor at the Jubilee (v. 24). (For v. 25, see commentary above on 6:6.)

27:26–27, Holy Things from Firstling. Since the firstborn belonged to God, these could not be dedicated (v. 26). A firstborn that was unclean could be redeemed since it was not eligible to be sacrificed to God (v. 27).

27:28–29, Holy Things from Devotion. Items vowed to God could be redeemed from or sold by the sanctuary unless they were animals that could be sacrificed. Devoted items, in contrast, were pledged and given to God without the possibility of redemption for sale (→ Ban). In the Scriptures, things most often devoted (declared cherem) are materials and personnel captured in war (Num. 21:1–3; Deut. 13:13–18; 1 Sam. 15:3). Devoted objects became Temple and priestly property (“most holy”) or else were destroyed (Num. 18:14; 21:2–3). Lev. 27:28 describes the “devotion” of property under nonmilitary conditions and classifies it as nonredeemable and nontransferable. Since it was most holy, anyone appropriating the “devoted” thing also became “devoted” and was to be put to death (v. 29; Deut. 7:25–26; Josh. 7:10–26).

27:30–33, Holy Things from Tithes. Tithes belonged to God, but grain and fruit tithes could be redeemed at their appraised value plus 20 percent. Verse 32 contains one of the few biblical references to tithes from the herds and flocks (see 2 Chron. 31:6), presumably required in addition to the firstlings (see Deut. 14:22–28). The choice of the animal tithe is depicted as occurring arbitrarily—every tenth animal passing under the shepherd’s staff.

Bibliography

Bailey, L. R. Leviticus. Knox Preaching Guides. Atlanta, GA: John Knox, 1987.

Bamberger, B. J. “Leviticus.” In The Torah: A Modern Commentary. Edited by W. G. Plaut. New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1981.

Levine, B. In the Presence of the Lord: A Study of Cult and Some Cultic Terms in Ancient Israel. Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity, 5. Leiden: Brill, 1974.

Milgrom, J. Studies in Cultic Theology and Terminology. Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity, 36. Leiden: Brill, 1976.

Wenham, G. T. The Book of Leviticus. New International Commentary on the Old Testament. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1979.

NUMBERS

DENNIS T. OLSON

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Numbers is the fourth book of the OT. Numbers derives its name from the census lists of the number of people in each of the twelve tribes of Israel in Numbers 1 and 26. The Hebrew title for the book, "In the Wilderness," comes out of the first verse of the book and accurately describes its setting. Numbers is the story of the people of Israel in the wilderness as they travel toward the promised land of Canaan.

Issues in Critical Study

The most distinctive feature of the book of Numbers is its great variety of literary forms and topics. The book includes stories and laws, travel itineraries and census lists, lists of personal names and lists of instructions for worship, reports of military battles and accounts of legal disputes. This variety has led scholars to study the book from a number of different perspectives.

Critical study of Numbers has uncovered the existence of separate literary sources or layers that have been woven together. These sources or traditions are usually termed J for the Yahwist, E for the Elohist, and P for the Priestly traditions (→ Sources of the Pentateuch). In general, it is agreed that the J and E sources tend to be earlier layers and are concentrated in Numbers 11–25. There is some disagreement on the extent to which the earlier J and E traditions can be isolated from one another. The later Priestly material, while scattered throughout the book, is most in evidence in chaps. 1–10 and chaps. 26–36. It is generally agreed that supplementary material was added to the book sometime after the inclusion of the Priestly tradition.

Study of the book of Numbers has also involved attempts to reconstruct the original oral forms and traditions that preceded the writing of the literary sources. Attention has been focused on the twelve-tribe system; the ordering of the camp of Israel in Numbers 2; the traditions about the Levites in chaps. 3–4; the wilderness murmuring traditions in chaps. 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 21, and 25; the Balaam cycle in Numbers 22–24; and the allocation of the land in chaps. 26 and 34. Those interested in historical issues in ancient Israel have focused their attention on such problems as the early conquest traditions in Numbers 13, 14, 21, and 32; the levitical cities in chap. 35; the development of the Israelite priesthood in Numbers 16–17; and the census lists in chaps. 1 and 26. Numbers has also provided an important source for the understanding of OT law, particularly in regard to ritual, festival, and purity laws (Num. 5–9, 15, 19, 27, and 36).

It is clear that the relative age and subject matter of the materials that make up the present book of Numbers are enormously varied. Some of the traditions have their roots in the actual tribal community of ancient Israel. For example, it is probable that the lists of the twelve tribes of Israel in the census lists in chaps. 1 and 26 derived in part from tribal genealogies in ancient Israel. Before the rise of the monarchy in the tenth century B.C., these genealogies played a sociopolitical role in unifying the diverse tribes that made up Israel. These tribal lists or genealogies have now been significantly reshaped for theological purposes into census lists in the present form of the book. The Balaam oracles in Numbers 22–24 provide an example of ancient Hebrew poetry from the earliest times in Israel's history. Yet the oracles also show evidence of having been reshaped and edited over a long period of time. The original age of much of the remaining material in Numbers is difficult to determine because it has been taken out of its original social or historical setting and placed within the present unified theological portrayal of the wilderness wandering of the Israelites from the area surrounding Mount Sinai to the eastern edge of the promised land. It is clear, however, that the material in Numbers has originated and been shaped in many different periods, ranging from the earliest to the latest times in Israel's history.

It is probable that the definitive shaping of the book of Numbers in roughly its present form occurred sometime during the Babylonian exile (587–538 B.C.). The Jewish community in exile struggled to understand its relationship to God and the promised land in light of the crisis of being driven out of the land. But the definitive structure of the book of Numbers seeks also to address every new succeeding generation of God's people as a generation standing in hope on the edge of the promised land. The new wilderness generation that is poised on the threshold of entering the land of Canaan functions as a paradigm for every new generation of God's people.

Overarching Framework

The central problem in the interpretation of the book of Numbers has been the failure to detect a convincing and meaningful structure for the book as a whole. Numerous interpreters lament the difficulty of determining any coherent structure or outline for the book of Numbers. This perception of haphazard arrangement and incoherence has caused Numbers to be one of the least studied and appreciated books of the Bible. In contrast to Numbers, the structure and story line of Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus is fairly clear. The book of Genesis moves from "the generations of the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 2:4) at creation through the generations of the ancestors of Israel. Exodus and Leviticus tell the story of the generation that experienced the Exodus out of Egypt and the events and laws associated with Mount Sinai. If we jump over Numbers for a moment to the book of Deuteronomy which follows, we see that Deuteronomy is composed of Moses' last words to another new generation of Israelites who had not experienced the Exodus or Sinai events. But how did that new generation appear? How and where was that transition made from the old generation of the Exodus and Sinai to the new generation of God's people on the edge of the promised land in the book of Deuteronomy?

That important transition is made precisely in the book of Numbers. In fact, the transition from the old generation of the wilderness to the new generation of hope and promise on the edge of the promised land forms the primary structure and theme for the book of Numbers as a whole. This structure is marked by the two census lists of the twelve tribes of Israel in Numbers 1 and 26. The census lists divide the book into two halves.

The first census list in Numbers 1 introduces the first half of the book, which includes chaps. 1-25. This first half of Numbers recounts the eventual death of the old generation of God's people out of Egypt as they march in the wilderness toward the promised land. The death of this old generation who had experienced the Exodus and Sinai events is precipitated by the people's continued rebellion against God, coming to a climax in the spy story in chaps. 13-14.

The second census list in Numbers 26 introduces the second half of the book, which includes chaps. 26-36. This second half of the book recounts the emergence of a new generation of God's people as they prepare to enter the promised land. The theme of this part of Numbers is not rebellion and death, but new life and hope. This overarching structure of the death of the old generation and the birth of a new generation of hope provides the interpretive framework for the other varied contents of the book of Numbers.

Importance

The later traditions of both the Jewish and the Christian communities have underscored the continuing importance and relevance of the book of Numbers. The apostle Paul in the NT Letter of 1 Corinthians recounts the story of the wilderness generation in Numbers as an example that ought to apply to his readers: "Now these things happened to them as a warning, but they were written down for our instruction" (1 Cor. 10:11, RSV). The Jewish community continued its interpretation of the book through the Midrash Sipre on Numbers and the Talmud, which focused in large part on the legal material within the book. The Aaronic benediction or blessing that is an integral part of both Jewish and Christian worship services comes from Num. 6:22-27. The key importance of the book, however, remains the inclusion of Numbers as part of Scripture for both Jews and Christians. The book wrestles with the transition from the old generation to the new generation. How is faith transferred from one generation to another? How does the story of a generation of the past become the story of a present generation? These are some of the central questions Numbers addresses.

---

COMMENTARY

---

1:1-25:18

The Death of the Old Generation

The first half of Numbers recounts the fate of the old generation of Israelites who had been eyewitnesses to the Exodus out of Egypt and the revelation of God on Mount Sinai. The beginning of this first generation was marked by a census list in Exodus 1 with seventy people counted among the twelve tribes of Israel (Exod. 1:5). The new census list of the twelve tribes of Israel that appears in Numbers 1 marks a major transition in the people's wandering. They have been liberated from the bondage of Egypt. They have received God's commandments and entered into a covenant with God at Sinai. Now with Numbers 1, this generation that is the first to have come out of Egypt is ready to organize and begin its march in earnest toward the promised land of Canaan.

Initially, the members of this old wilderness generation appear obedient as God organizes them into a holy military camp. This obedience and positive tone, is, however, marred by a number of rebellions against God by the Israelites. These rebellions constitute a resumption of the series of rebellions that take place already in Exodus 16, 17, and 32. The most serious rebellion is portrayed in the spy story in Numbers 13–14 in which the people refuse to trust God to lead them into the land of Canaan. This rebellion of the people provides the basis for God's judgment of death on the old generation and his promise of hope to the new generation to follow.

1:1–10:36

The Preparation and Inauguration of the March of the Holy People of Israel

This section of Numbers is dominated by a positive tone. The people of Israel obediently follow God's instructions to prepare for the march from Sinai to the promised land. The people of the twelve tribes of Israel are counted in a census and then organized into a four-sided military camp with three tribes on each side. Laws are given that preserve the holiness of the camp. The people obediently prepare for a holy war against the native inhabitants of the promised land. These preparations for the journey through the wilderness make up Num. 1:1–10:10.

This section prepares for the march of the people through the wilderness. Then Num. 10:11–10:36 recounts the actual inauguration of the march and the events of the first three days. The holy camp sets out for the first time from the Wilderness of Sinai to the Wilderness of Paran. The first three days of the journey occur without incident. All seems to be proceeding smoothly.

1:1–54, The Census of the Twelve Tribes.

The book of Numbers begins with the people situated in the Wilderness of Sinai fourteen months after the Exodus out of Egypt. God commands Moses to take a census of the twelve tribes of Israel. The census is not to be of all the people but only of the males who are over twenty years of age who are able to go to war (1:2–3). One person from each tribe is chosen to supervise the census (1:4–16). The results of the census for the twelve tribes are given in 1:20–46, with a grand total of 603,550 males over twenty years of age. The emphasis of this first census in Numbers is on the number of fighting men who are available for combat. In light of the goal of the promised land, this census is a preparation for the entry and conquest of Canaan.

The census in Numbers 1 is the first census of the people since leaving Egypt. The only previous full-scale census of the twelve tribes of Jacob occurred at the end of Genesis 46 and lists the sons of Jacob and their offspring as numbering seventy people. The book of Exodus begins by repeating this list of the sons of Jacob or Israel and the number of their families as seventy persons. Exod. 1:6–7 then reports the death of Joseph and "all his brothers and all that generation" as well as the emergence of a new and greatly expanded generation. This census at the beginning of Exodus marks an entirely new generation as well as a major transition from a state of blessing and prosperity to slavery and oppression (Exod. 1:11).

The Census Lists in Numbers 1 and 26

Two separate critical issues are involved in the study of the census lists in Numbers 1 and 26: the lists of the names of the twelve tribes of Israel and the high numbers reported in the census lists.

The earliest version of the names of the twelve tribes of Israel is given in 1:5–15, in which the tribal leaders are chosen to carry out the census. The names of the tribes occur in the following order: Reuben (the oldest son and thus the first tribe listed), Simeon, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, Dan, Asher, Gad, and Naphtali. Other lists of the twelve tribes occur in 1:20–43; 2:3–31; 7:12–83; 10:14–28; 13:4–15; and 26:5–51.

It is probable that these tribal lists in Numbers are dependent upon even earlier versions of the twelve-tribe list in the book of Genesis, most notably the narrative of the twelve sons of Jacob in Gen. 29:31–30:24. This genealogical story about the birth of the twelve tribal ancestors is rooted in a time in Israel's history when the tribal genealogy functioned to unify the society, since there was no king or other centralized government. With the rise of kings in Israel, the genealogical lists of the twelve tribes lost this sociopolitical function. The genealogies were then taken into the religious sphere and used in the emerging literary tradition to express the ideal Israel.

A second issue connected with the census lists in Num. 1:20–43 and 26:5–51 is the high numbers of people counted in the census for the twelve tribes. Num. 1:46 gives a total of 603,550 Israelite males over twenty years of age in the first generation in Numbers. Num. 26:51 states a total of 601,730 for the second generation. The enormous size of the numbers has often struck commentators as amazing or impossible. How could the tiny clan that began in Exodus 1 with the census list of seventy persons swell to over 600,000 fighting men plus women and children and the elderly in the course of a few hundred years?

Many solutions have been offered. Some have suggested a possible alternate meaning for the Hebrew word for “thousand” as a “tent-group.” For example, the tribe of Reuben is counted in Num. 1:20–21 as forty-six “thousand,” five hundred. The number could, however, be translated as forty-six “tent-groups” with a total of five hundred people. This would significantly reduce the numbers in each of the tribes. While this and other proposed solutions may be possible, it is clear that the present form of the text intends these figures to be taken as they stand as “thousands” and not “tent-groups.”

In any case, the high numbers in the census lists are difficult to reconcile historically. Their present role in the book of Numbers, however, seems in part to serve a broader theological purpose. The numbers appear to express the extent to which God has graciously blessed Israel in multiplying their descendants to such large numbers. God’s promises to Abraham of innumerable descendants (Gen. 15:5; 17:4–8) are certainly in view. The emergence of the new generation in Egypt that “increased greatly” and “grew exceedingly strong” (Exod. 1:5–7) is part of this same theological concern to underscore God’s faithfulness to his promises. The large number of fighting men counted in Numbers 1 also ought to be grounds for great confidence as the Israelites near the border of the promised land. The spy story in chaps. 13–14 will show, however, that the people will fail to have confidence and will not trust God to bring them into the land. In short, the problem of the historicity of the numbers is important, but it should not cause us to lose sight of the theological message that the census numbers convey within the present form of Numbers and the Pentateuch.

2:1–34, The Holy Camp Prepared for the March to the Promised Land. Numbers 1 relates the number of people in the tribes of Israel. Chap. 2 specifies the arrangement of the camp by which this large community of tribes is to travel through the wilderness. The camp is arranged in concentric circles of holiness, for it is a holy war in the promised land of Canaan for which God is preparing his people. Verse 2 indicates that the tent of meeting where God meets Moses and speaks to him stands at the center of the camp (→Tabernacle). The Levites, who are a tribe especially set aside to serve in important priestly functions, are also situated in the center of the camp around the tent of meeting (v. 17; →Levites). The holiness of the Levites is protected by the provision for a special and separate census in chaps. 3–4.

Numbers 2 continues by describing the arrangement of the other twelve tribes around the center of the camp occupied by the tent of meeting and the Levites. The three tribes headed by the tribe of Judah (Judah, Issachar, Zebulun) are placed on the east side of the camp and thus lead the march (vv. 3–9). The group led by Reuben (Reuben, Simeon, Gad) forms the south flank of the camp and sets out in second place (vv. 10–16). The tent of meeting and the Levites at the center of the camp are designated as the next group to set out (v. 17). The west side of the camp includes the three tribes led by Ephraim (Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin) that are next in line (vv. 18–24). The fourth group of three tribes led by Dan (Dan, Asher, Naphtali) sets out last (vv. 25–31).

This almost monotonous recitation of the tribal groups in the camp serves to create an atmosphere of careful and meticulous obedience to God’s commands. The final verse in chap. 2 hammers the point home: every member of every family of the people of Israel did as God commanded (v. 34). The impression is given of an eager and obedient people encamped and ready for God’s holy war in the promised land. The sense of readiness and expectation begins to rise.

3:1–4:49, The Special Census of the Levites. Numbers 3 opens with an important generational formula: “These are the generations of Aaron and Moses.” The book of Genesis contains eleven of these generational formulas, beginning with Gen. 2:4a (“These are the generations of the heavens and the earth”) and extending through Gen. 37:2 (“These are the generations of Jacob”). These generational formulas function as the primary overarching structure of the book of Genesis in its present form. A later editor has probably added the generational formula in Num. 3:1 after those in Genesis were already in place. Num. 3:1, however, now extends the overarching generational framework from Genesis into the present form of the book of Numbers. The formula also serves to reinforce the linkage of Numbers with the generations of Genesis that was already evident in the connection of the census lists in Numbers with the tribal genealogies in Genesis.

Apart from their function as the primary framework or structure for the book of Genesis, the generational formulas also function in two other ways. On one hand, some of the genealogies recount several generations, mentioning only one ancestor in each generation (e.g., Gen. 5:1–32, from Adam to Noah). These vertical or linear genealogies serve to narrow the focus of the line of promise down to a smaller and more exclusive group. The progression begins with “the generations of the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 2:4a) and with “the generations of Adam” (Gen. 5:1) but then quickly narrows its focus down to "the generations of Jacob" (Gen. 37:2). Placing the generational formula "These are the generations of Aaron and Moses" at the end of this progression in Num. 3:1 serves to narrow the focus of the narrative even further to one group within the tribes of Jacob or Israel: the priests and the Levites who are the generations of Aaron and Moses. The line of the promise is concentrated on an ever smaller group of people. The arrangement of the camp in Numbers 2 further underscores the narrowing of the focus as the priests and Levites occupy the center of the camp.

On the other hand, the generational formulas in Genesis sometimes also introduce horizontal or segmented genealogies, which usually have a depth of only two or three generations with several members of each generation mentioned (e.g., the children of the three sons of Noah in Gen. 10:1-31). These segmented genealogies in Genesis keep the broader arena of the cosmos and the other peoples of the world in view. Israel exists within a wider world and in the context of many peoples. The people of God are not alone but live within the framework and for the sake of the larger human community (Gen. 12:1-3). This inclusive motif is continued in the book of Numbers as well. The census list of the twelve tribes as well as the numerous other lists of the twelve tribes of Israel remind readers that the priests and Levites, "the generations of Aaron and Moses," do not exist in isolation. Rather, the priests and Levites live and work within the context of the larger community of God's people.

Thus, the dual perspective of a narrowing focus within the broader context of humanity that is evident in the generational formulas and genealogies in Genesis has been extended by a later editor into the book of Numbers. The more narrow focus on the priests and Levites (3:1) is counterbalanced by a concern to include all Israel within the purview of God's concern. The census list of all twelve tribes in chap. 1 maintains the inclusive dimension. It continues the story of "the generations of Jacob" (Gen. 37:2). The census list of the Levites in Numbers 3-4 carries the narrowing of the focus begun in Genesis one more step to "the generations of Aaron and Moses" that includes the representatives of priestly, levitical, and Mosaic offices in Israel (Num. 3:1).

These two concurrent emphases of exclusion and inclusion, of narrowing and broadening, are also evident in the account of the census of the Levites. Two different numberings of the Levites are actually prescribed in Numbers 3-4. The census in chap. 3 is to include every male Levite over the age of one month (3:15). The context that surrounds this census of the Levites in chap. 3 emphasizes the Levites' role as a substitute for all the firstborn of the Israelites who rightfully belong to God. Thus, the purpose of the census in chap. 3 is to check whether the number of Levites corresponds with the number of firstborn children in the other tribes. The results show that the number of Levites falls short of the total number of firstborn Israelites. These extra Israelites are then to be redeemed by another method: the payment of money (3:44-51). The Levites serve on behalf of and for the sake of the larger community of all the twelve tribes of Israel. This stresses the broader or inclusive character of the mission of the Levites.

The second levitical census in Numbers 4 includes only those male Levites between the ages of thirty and fifty years old (4:2-3). The context of this census deals with the Levites' role in the service and maintenance of the tent of meeting. The Levites are to serve the sons of Aaron who are the high priests in the worship life of the tabernacle (3:5-10). Therefore, the Levites serve both the larger community of Israel and also the more exclusive group of Aaron and his sons. The duties of each of the families of Levites are delineated in chap. 4. Again, the impression is left of an obedient people and priesthood preparing for the march through the wilderness (4:49).

5:1-6:21, Laws for Preserving the Holiness of the Camp—Ritual Impurity, Suspected Adultery, and Nazirite Vows. The preparations for the inauguration of the march continue with provisions for dealing with those within the camp who are considered impure or unclean. The requirement of purity or cleanness is an important concept in the OT. Purity meant being free from any physical, moral, or ritual contamination. Contamination resulted from such things as the contact with a corpse, the involuntary flow of fluids from the sexual organs, a skin disease usually translated incorrectly in English versions as "leprosy," or the eating of prohibited foods (→ Purity).

The existence of unclean or impure individuals within the holy camp with God and the priests at the center constituted an affront to God and a threat to the well-being of the community. Numbers 5-6 provides instructions for dealing with the danger of impurity. These chapters are a composite of various laws and supplements that were added at a later stage in the composition of the book. Num. 5:3 instructs the people to put those who are unclean outside the camp since God is in the midst of the camp. Num. 5:4 records the people's obedient response to God's command.

Chap. 5 continues by turning from a concern to preserve the community's relationship with God to a concern to maintain harmonious relationships among the people within the community. Verses 5-10 mandate that a person who sins against a neighbor must confess the wrongdoing and make full restitution plus 20 percent of the total loss. This corresponds to the law in Lev. 6:5. Numbers goes on, however, to consider a case not addressed in Leviticus, namely, when the person wronged is dead and has no relatives. In such a case, the priest is to receive the restitution.

Num. 5:11-31 continues the concern to maintain harmony within the community and to uncover any acts that endanger the purity of the community. A trial by ordeal is prescribed for a woman suspected of adultery. The concern is both to unmask a hidden sin and to vindicate one who is unjustly accused. The woman is to come to the priest at the sanctuary, drink a mixture of water and dust (v. 17), and take an oath (vv. 19:22). The result of the ritual will determine whether she is innocent or guilty of the breach of the marriage relationship. Such trials by ordeal were used in the ancient Near East in legal cases in which direct evidence and eyewitness accounts were lacking. The whole community was in danger as long as a judgment about the alleged wrongdoing was not made.

Num. 6:1-21 further elaborates the concern for maintaining the holiness of the camp. These verses address the Nazirites, those laypeople within the community who have been set aside as especially holy to God through commitments to abstinence from alcohol, uncut hair, and avoidance of contact with the dead (→ Nazirites). Num. 6:1-8 clarifies the nature of the Nazirite vows. Verses 9-12 make provisions for remedying the accidental violation of Nazirite vows through contact with the dead. The ordinary layperson could be cleansed from such contamination by washing in a special mixture prescribed in chap. 19. The special instructions for cleansing that are prescribed for the Nazirites in Numbers 6 underscore their exceptional holiness. Verses 13-21 detail a ritual for terminating the Nazirite vow; this implies that the vows were to be of limited duration. Any commitment to the holy God of Israel, whether by a priest or a Nazirite, was to be taken with the utmost seriousness and discipline for it impinged on the holiness of the whole community.

6:22-27, The Priestly Blessing of the Community. These verses are perhaps the best known of the whole book of Numbers. They record the words of God's blessing that the priests are to pronounce over the congregation. This blessing continues to be used as part of the worship services of many different Christian and Jewish traditions.

The blessing is couched in poetic Hebrew style and is probably one of the oldest portions of Scripture. The elevated style is suggested by the parallelism and expansion of thought and words. In Hebrew, the first line of the blessing in v. 24 consists of three words, the second line of five words, and the third line of seven words. Each line in turn consists of two clauses. The Lord (Yahweh) is explicitly named as subject in the first clause of each of the three lines. That the Lord is the source of blessing is emphasized again in the closing statement in v. 27 in which God says, "I will bless them." The "I" is emphatic in the Hebrew.

The first line of the blessing in v. 24 speaks of God's blessing and keeping. Blessing refers to God's gifts of posterity, land, health, the presence of God, and all other things that make life possible and full (Deut. 28:2-14). God's keeping of his people involves guarding and protecting from evil (Ps. 121:7-8). The second line of the blessing in Num. 6:25 uses the metaphor of light to refer to God's face as it shines benevolently upon God's people. This shining of God's face results in his being gracious and delivering the people in times of trouble (Ps. 67:1).

The third line of the blessing in Num. 6:26 brings the blessing to a crescendo. The Aaronidic blessing moves from the general blessing of the first line to the shining of God's face in the second line to the active movement of God to lift up his face and send blessing and grace specifically toward the people. The goal of God's blessing is summed up by the final word of the benediction, Hebrew shalom or "peace." Shalom refers to more than simply the absence of conflict. It encompasses all of God's good gifts of health, prosperity, well-being, and salvation.

This richly worded blessing comes at the end of the section in chaps. 5-6 that is concerned about the holiness and well-being of the entire community. It highlights God's ultimate will for all the people as one of blessing and peace. The Aaronidic benediction stands as an affirming centerpiece in this opening section of Numbers, which is overwhelmingly positive in its tone. God is blessing the community, and the people are obediently and eagerly following his commands.

7:1-89, The Offerings of the Twelve Tribes for the Altar. The portrait of an obedient people continues in Numbers 7. In thankful response to God's establishment of the priesthood and promise of blessing (6:22-27), the people bring offerings for the dedication of the altar. Num. 7:1-9 recounts the offering of oxen and wagons that will enable the Levites to transport the altar and tent of meeting on the march toward the promised land. Verses 10-88 are a repetitive account of the offerings for the altar brought by each of the twelve tribes of Israel on each of twelve consecutive days. The amount and type of offering are exactly the same for each tribe. The careful repetition underscores the unanimous and strong support for the tabernacle and its priesthood. Every tribe has an equal and strong commitment to the worship of God.

Num. 7:89 is probably a later insertion. In its present context, the verse affirms the sanctuary as the true locus of God's presence and revelation. The community's commitment to the support of God's sanctuary and priesthood and his revelation at the tent of meeting in the preceding verses is part of the ongoing dialogue between God and the people. God is shown to be faithful to his promise to be present in the midst of his people, and the people are shown to be obedient in their response. This image of God's speaking to Moses in the tent of meeting that is now located at the center of the camp (chap. 2) is in contrast with the scene in Exod. 33:7-11. There the grave sin of the golden calf necessitated locating the tent of meeting not in the middle but on the outside of the camp. Here in Numbers the tent of meeting has been restored to the center, and the holiness of God's people has been reestablished.

8:1-26, The Obedient Response of Aaron and the Levites. The meticulous obedience of the people in Numbers 7 is followed by evidence of the obedience of Aaron and the Levites. In 8:1-4, God commands Aaron to light the seven lamps in the sanctuary and to ensure that the light beamed forward in front of the lampstand. Verse 3 states that Aaron did exactly as God commanded; v. 4 again underscores Aaron's obedience in constructing the lampstand. The details for the lampstand's design are given in Exod. 25:31-40. The lampstand or menorah is shaped into a flowering tree with seven branches and symbolizes the life-giving power and light of God's presence (→ Lampstand).

The next section (Num. 8:5-26) tells of the dedication ceremony for the Levites as the substitutes for the firstborn of Israel. Numbers 3, 4, and 7 described the census of the Levites, their duties in caring for the sanctuary and its furnishings, and the gift of oxen and wagons for transporting the sanctuary. All that is now required is the official dedication of the Levites to their tasks. The ceremony is a sign that the actual inauguration of the march of the holy camp of Israel is soon about to take place.

The Levites' dual roles as servants of Aaron and his sons (v. 19) and as substitutes for the firstborn of Israel (v. 16) are again stated. Verse 17 traces the consecration of the firstborn back to God's slaying of all the firstborn of Egypt (Exod. 13:2, 15). This reference to the Exodus out of Egypt opens up the way to Numbers 9 and its reference to the celebration of the Passover.

Again, however, the stress in Numbers 8 is placed on the obedience of Moses and Aaron and the people in dedicating the Levites to God's service (v. 20). Emphasis is also placed on the obedient service of the Levites in doing what God commanded through Moses (v. 22). The chapter closes with the age requirements for the Levites' service in the tent of meeting. They are to begin at twenty-five and retire at fifty years of age. Num. 4:47 presents a different age range for the Levites—from thirty to fifty years of age. There is no obvious reason for the discrepancy, apart from a difference of tradition.

9:1-14, The Celebration of the Second Passover. We move from the obedience of the priests and Levites in chap. 8 to the obedience of all the people in chap. 9. That obedience is expressed in the celebration of the most important festival in Israel, the Passover (→ Passover, The). The first Passover in Exodus 12 had been the prelude to a new beginning in the Exodus out of Egypt. This second Passover signals the reconstitution of Israel after the golden calf debacle had endangered their status as God's holy people. This second Passover in Numbers marks as radical a new beginning as the first Passover in Exodus. Verses 4-5 pick up the characteristic theme of the opening chapters of Numbers: the people obediently follow the words that God speaks to them through Moses.

The subject of the Passover provides an occasion for a legal decision regarding cases in which a person is unable to observe the festival at the appointed time. Two possible situations are raised. What if someone comes in contact with the dead and is thereby rendered unclean? Is the Passover of such importance that the unclean person should still observe the festival on the appointed day—the fourteenth day of the first month (vv. 6-7)? And what if someone is on a journey during the appointed time of the celebration of Passover (v. 10)? God decrees that a special supplemental Passover on the fourteenth day of the second month should be observed by those unable to observe the festival on the fourteenth day of the first month (9-11). This concession should not, however, be construed as a license for laxity in keeping the Passover (v. 13). As a matter of fact, the festival is so important that it should be observed even by the foreigners who live among the Israelites.

It has been argued that the two dates for the Passover, with one in the first month of the year and the other in the second, represent two different traditions, one from northern Israel and the other from the south. The story of Hezekiah's Passover in 2 Chron. 30:1-3 may be a hint of such divergent traditions. In any case, the traditions have now been reshaped to emphasize the importance of the festival and the people's careful observance in obedience to God's command.

9:15–23, God's Guidance Through the Cloud and the People's Obedient Following. This section carries forward the theme of Israel's obedient following and is a sign of the imminent beginning of the march from Sinai to Canaan. The image of God's presence in the cloud and its association with the tent of meeting here in Numbers appears to be a reshaping of the traditions found in Exodus. In Exod. 13:21–22, the cloud is shaped as a pillar that goes in front of the people and guides them in the Exodus out of Egypt after the celebration of the first Passover. Just as the cloud marked a new chapter in Israel's life in the Exodus, so too the appearance of the cloud motif after the second Passover in Numbers 9 signals a major new transition in the life of the people. The march toward the promised land after the reorganization of the holy camp is about to commence.

The cloud in Num. 9:15–23, however, does not go in front of the people as it did in Exod. 13:21–22. Rather, in accord with the tradition in Exod. 33:7–11, the cloud is closely tied with the tent of meeting or tabernacle, which in Numbers 9 stands in the middle of the camp. In Exodus 33, the tent of meeting was located outside of the camp because the sin of the golden calf had rendered the community unclean. In Numbers 9, however, the tent of meeting has been restored to the camp's center and with it the cloud as a sign of God's presence and guidance.

The central theme of this section and of all the opening chapters of Numbers is sounded in a refrain repeated three times (vv. 18, 20, and 21): "At the word of the LORD the people of Israel set out, and at the word of the LORD they made camp." These and other verses in this section contain a chorus of affirmations of Israel's diligent obedience in following God's instructions.

10:1–10, The Signal of the March Soon to Begin—The Silver Trumpets. The role of the cloud and God's leading of the people in Numbers 9 is complemented by the leadership and guidance provided by the sons of Aaron through the blowing of the silver trumpets. Verse 2 suggests two functions for the trumpets. One is to summon the congregation to a gathering. When both trumpets are blown, the whole congregation is to assemble at the tent of meeting (v. 3). When only one trumpet is blown, only the leaders are to gather at the tent (v. 4). A provision that may have been added secondarily establishes the procedure for calling the people together when they come to the promised land. A special alarm signal would gather the people at times of war. The trumpets would also summon the people at times of religious festivals as a remembrance of God's faithfulness (vv. 9–10). This first function lifts readers' attention for a moment to the future goal of the march—life in the promised land.

The second function for the trumpets turns readers' attention back to the immediate context. The trumpets are a signal of the time for breaking camp and the inauguration of the march. The sound of the trumpets gives notice to the twelve tribes to move out according to the order assigned in the arrangement of the camp in chap. 2 (10:5–6). This latter function points to the beginning of the march that is to begin immediately in 10:11.

10:11–36, The Actual Inauguration of the March of the Holy Camp of Israel. At long last, the camp of the twelve tribes of Israel begins its climactic march from the Wilderness of Sinai toward the promised land. The preparations for the march that were designed to maintain the purity and holiness of the camp have been elaborate and meticulous. The plodding and repetitive style of the narrative in Numbers thus far creates in readers a sense of impatience and anticipation of this moment when the camp finally picks up and moves. "They set out for the first time at the word of the LORD through Moses" (v. 13).

According to v. 11, the tribes set out nineteen days after the day that the census was taken (Num. 1:1) and eleven months after arriving at Mount Sinai (Exod. 19:1). Num. 10:14–28 indicates that the tribes begin the march precisely in the order prescribed in chap. 2. The Levites obediently carry out their tasks of taking down the tabernacle and transporting it in accordance with the instructions in chap. 3.

Num. 10:29–32 is typically thought to be from a much older narrative tradition than any of the previous material in Numbers. The mention of Hobab as the father-in-law of Moses in v. 29 raises problems, since the name of Moses' father-in-law in Exod. 3:1 is Jethro. Hobab may simply be an alternate name for Jethro from a different tradition, or the Hebrew term for "father-in-law" may have here the wider meaning of "a relative by marriage." Moses asks Hobab to be a guide for Israel, since he is of the desert tribe of the Midianites and thus well acquainted with the wilderness. Initially, Hobab refuses, but Moses insists and promises that God will be as gracious to him, a foreigner, as he will be to Israel (vv. 30–32). Hobab's response was presumably positive (see Judg. 1:16; 4:11).

The mention of a human guide in Hobab is balanced in the verses that follow by a reaffirmation of the role of the Ark (Num. 10:33) and the cloud (v. 34) as instruments of God's guidance on the journey. Just as the cloud and the trumpets were paired as complementary divine and human instruments of leadership (9:17; 10:2), so too the human guide who is a foreigner and the divine presence in the cloud and Ark are paired as complementary means of leadership for the people. A subtle interaction is suggested here between the divine and the human as well as an openness to guidance and wisdom from those who come from outside Israel.

The words of Moses in vv. 35–36, which announce the breaking and making of the camp, are seen as ancient tradition and have an almost liturgical flavor. They reinforce the impression of the inauguration of the march as a liturgical procession with the holy God at the center leading the faithful people through the wilderness. This impression of a totally obedient and holy people is, however, about to be shattered.

11:1–20:29

Repeated Incidents of Rebellion and Atonement: The Death of the First Wilderness Generation Begins

The transition from the portrait of the people's complete faithfulness in Numbers 1–10 to the portrait of their repeated rebellions beginning in chap. 11 represents a totally unexpected turn-about in the flow of the story. In 11:1 we encounter the first instance of a complaint and rebellion by the people in the book of Numbers. It is a rebellion for which readers are totally unprepared. The abrupt and shattering break of the narrative flow between 10:36 and 11:1 reflects the shattering break in the relationship between God and his holy people. Throughout chaps. 11–20, Israel continually rebels, and God punishes Israel with plagues and military defeats. God offers signs of atonement and forgiveness, but the people still keep slipping back into rebellion. A general rebellion of the people in Numbers 11 is followed by the first rebellion in the wilderness by two leaders of the people, Aaron and Miriam, in chap. 12. The most serious rebellion occurs in the story of the spy mission into the promised land in chaps. 13–14. This story provides the definitive basis for understanding the whole book of Numbers in terms of the death of the old generation and the birth of the new generation of hope on the edge of the promised land. After a word of hope is offered in Numbers 15, the people and even the Levites resume their rebellious ways. Chap. 20 recounts an act of rebellion even by Moses and Aaron against God. Aaron's death and the succession of his son Eleazar as priest in 20:22–29 is a sign of the coming end of the first generation of Israelites out of Egypt and the beginning of a new generation.

11:1–3, The First Rebellion by the People Against God. Numbers 11 marks a dramatic shift from the positive tone in chap. 10, in which people looked forward to the promised land and were sure of God's care and protection (10:29). Num. 11:1–3 involves the first example of the people's murmuring against God in the book of Numbers. The motif of the people's murmuring in the wilderness occurred previously in the book of Exodus, where the complaints were typically understood as legitimate. In response to the intercession of Moses, God met the people's needs in a positive way (e.g., Exod. 15:22–25; 17:1–7). In the book of Numbers, however, the people's complaints are understood as acts of faithlessness. The complaints rouse God's anger and punishment, which is mitigated only by Moses' intercession. Num. 11:1–3 provides a clear and concise example of this second form of the murmuring story and establishes the theme for the entire section that it introduces (chaps. 11–20).

The people's complaining arouses the fire of God's anger, which burns the fringe areas of the camp (11:1). Before the divine fire continues any further toward the center of the camp, Moses prays on behalf of the people and the fire is removed (v. 2). The name of the place is then called Taberah (Heb., "burning"). The location of Taberah is unknown.

11:4–35, The Craving of Meat at Kibbroth-hattavah: Another Rebellion. This rebellion story probably evolved from an original story only about the provision of quail in response to the people's request for meat. The story of the provision of additional leaders to support Moses was then added as the story developed in the course of transmission (vv. 16–17, 24–30).

A rabble stirs up the people's desire for meat and for the variety of food they had in Egypt. This craving for meat is a rejection of the gracious gift of manna that God had provided so faithfully as food for the people throughout their journey through the wilderness (vv. 4–9). Everyone joins in the complaint that angers both God and Moses (v. 10).

The next section is a dialogue between these two. Moses laments the burden of leadership that God has placed on his shoulders (vv. 11–15). He, in turn, commands Moses to select seventy elders from the twelve tribes to share the burden of leading the people. He also commands Moses to have the people prepare to eat meat for an entire month, until it becomes loathsome to them (vv. 16–20). The people's desire for meat and their yearning for Egypt are signs of faithlessness and a rejection of God's gift of manna. Moses himself expresses doubt that God will be able to make good on his promise to provide a whole month's supply of meat for 600,000 people, but God tells him simply to wait and see (vv. 21–23).

God stops talking and begins acting through his spirit or wind. The fact that the Hebrew word for “spirit” is the same as “wind” helps to tie together the two actions of God in vv. 24–35. In the first action (vv. 24–30), God takes some of the spirit from Moses and places it upon the seventy elders who stand at the tent of meeting in the holy center of the camp so that they may share the leadership of the tribes. The episode involving the two people prophesying in the camp illustrates the need to allow for the possibility that persons outside the institutional leadership of God’s people may have genuine words and insights from him (vv. 26–30).

In the second action (vv. 31–35), God sends forth a “wind” that brings flocks of quail from the sea so that they fall far outside the camp. The quail lure the people to leave the security of the holy camp. As they eat the quail that lies at ■ day’s journey outside the camp, God is angered and sends a plague upon the people. The story provides an explanation for the name of the place, Kibbroth-hattavah, which in Hebrew means “graves of craving” (v. 34). The precise location of Kibbroth-hattavah is unknown.

12:1–16, The Rebellion by the Leaders, Miriam and Aaron. Thus far, only the people and not the leaders have joined in the rebellions. Numbers 12, however, introduces the complaint of Miriam and Aaron against Moses. The preceding episode in 11:26–30 opens the door to the possibility of legitimate prophets and revelation outside the official or institutional leadership of the tribes. Chap. 12 wrestles with the limits of such revelation. Miriam is described in Exod. 15:20 as a prophetess and as a sister of Aaron and of Moses. The implicit question in this story is this: can prophetic or any other revelation override Mosaic revelation? In other words, is prophecy subordinate to the authority of Moses and the Mosaic tradition? It has been suggested that behind this story lies a conflict between specific priestly or prophetic groups in Israel’s history. The evidence for such a conflict is far from clear, and, in any case, the story in its present form has in mind the broader issue of the relationship of Mosaic tradition to prophecy in general.

The scene opens with Miriam and Aaron speaking against Moses because he had married a woman from Cush. The Bible often identifies Cush with Ethiopia (e.g., Isa. 20:3,5). The unnamed wife is, in any case, a foreigner. This initial objection is only a smoke screen, however, for the real cause for the rebellion by Miriam and Aaron. In two rhetorical questions, these two challenge Moses’ unique role as the supreme channel of the words of God. After a note about Moses’ humility (Num. 12:3), God appears and emphasizes the role of Moses as the unique and supreme vehicle of divine revelation (vv. 6–8).

God punishes Miriam and Aaron by making Miriam leprous, which renders her unclean so that she must remain outside the camp for seven days until she is again allowed inside the camp. Moses demonstrates his integrity by interceding on behalf of Miriam, who had been the one who had opposed him (v. 13). A question that naturally arises is why God punished Miriam with leprosy and not Aaron. It may be that the story was originally only about Miriam and Aaron was added secondarily. Another explanation may be that the writer simply could not tolerate having Aaron the high priest rendered unclean by leprosy. The requirements of purity or cleanliness for the priests were very strict (see Lev. 21).

13:1–14:45, The Spy Mission into the Promised Land: The Decisive Rebellion.

More than any other story in Numbers, the narrative of the spy mission in chaps. 13–14 provides the foundation for the unifying theme of the book, which is the death of the old generation in the wilderness and the birth of a new generation standing expectantly on the threshold of the promised land. The purpose of the census at the beginning of the book was to count all who were “able to go forth to war” (1:3). The twelve tribes were then organized into a holy camp as an army marching toward Canaan (chap. 2). The spy story in chaps. 13–14 records the first military action of the twelve tribes of Israel, who have been prepared in this way for a holy war.

Scholars are generally agreed that the story in Numbers 13–14 consists of at least two interwoven layers or literary sources, one older and one later. For example, one layer or tradition seems to assume that the area that the spies covered was confined only to southern Canaan around Hebron (13:22–24). A later layer extended the territory of the reconnaissance to include the entire land of Canaan from the Wilderness of Zin on the southern edge to Rehob on the northern (13:21). Another tension in the text that is a sign of multiple layers is the designation of the faithful spies among the twelve. In an earlier tradition, Caleb was apparently the only spy among them who was faithful to God (13:30). In the later tradition, Joshua was also included as a faithful spy (14:6).

Numerous suggestions have been made for the origin of the spy story. Some have proposed that the original story was about a successful conquest of a part of Canaan from the south by a tribe claiming Caleb as an ancestor. The story was then reshaped into a failed conquest story that provided a rationale for the entrance into the promised land from the eastern border of Canaan rather than the southern. Others have proposed that the story originated as a polemic by Judah in the south, represented by Caleb, against the northern tribes. In any case, the story in its present form has been significantly reshaped for theological purposes and has lost any major thrust that it may have once had as one tribe's polemic against another.

The spy story in Numbers 13-14 begins with the Israelites in the Wilderness of Paran poised on the southern edge of the promised land of Canaan (12:16; 13:3). At last the Israelites have reached the doorstep of their destination. God commands Moses to send twelve men, one from each tribe, to spy out the land (13:2-24). After forty days, the spies return and report what they have seen. Initially, the spies give a favorable report about the fruitfulness of the land, but they warn against the inhabitants who are strong and who live in large fortified cities (13:25-29, 31-33). Caleb and later Joshua, two of the spies, counter the unfavorable report of the others by urging the Israelites to trust in God and to proceed to conquer the land (13:30; 14:6-9). The people respond faithfully by refusing to go into the promised land and by desiring to choose their own leader and return to Egypt (14:1-4).

God then appears and tells Moses that he will disinherit the people and instead make of Moses a new and even greater nation than the Israelites (14:10-12). The anger of God is so severe because the nature of the people's rebellion is unprecedented. The people's wish to choose their own leader and go back to Egypt is, in effect, a total rejection of God whose essence and name was "Yahweh your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (Exod. 20:2). This rebellion goes beyond the sin of the golden calf at Mount Sinai, which was not so much a rejection of God as an attempt to shape God into their own image (Exod. 32:4-5).

Numbers 13-14 is a story of high hopes and bitter disappointment. All the promises to the ancestors of Israel in Genesis, which extend through Exodus and Leviticus, have looked forward to this time when the people finally are on the verge of entering the promised land. Coupled with this high sense of anticipation, the census in Numbers 1, which counted an enormous total army of over 600,000 people, and the elaboration of the carefully ordered military camp with God visibly in its midst should have provided grounds for complete faith and confidence. The tone of events in chaps. 1-10 is entirely positive. The initial spying out of the land reveals a beautiful and fruitful land, one that "flows with milk and honey" (13:27). The prospect is bright indeed.

But then comes the fateful rebellion. The people refuse to enter the land, afraid of the death that may await them and afraid to trust God to make good on his promise. As a result, God announces the punishment of death on this old, sinful generation.

Moses intercedes and asks God to forgive the people just as he had done after the sin of the golden calf in Exod. 32:11-13 (Num. 14:13-19). While God had allowed the people to live and be reconstituted as his holy people after the golden calf incident in Exodus 32, the rebellion in Numbers 13-14 is a more serious matter. God agrees to forgive the people by allowing the next generation of Israelites to enter the promised land. The old wilderness generation, however, is condemned to die in the wilderness over the course of the next forty years (14:20-35). At this point, the story is explicitly linked to the census list in chap. 1, which contains the recurring formula "all your number, numbered from twenty years old and upward," now also used by God to designate who will die in the wilderness (14:29). Only two members of the old generation will enter the promised land: Caleb and Joshua, the two spies who trusted that God would be faithful to the promise to bring the people into the promised land (14:30).

But out of the darkest moment of the entire Pentateuch comes the birth and the promise of a new generation of God's people. The children of the old generation whom the rebels used as an excuse for not entering the land (14:3) will become the new vehicles of God's promise (14:31). The new census list in chap. 26 will be a concrete sign of the birth of this new generation of hope even as it signals the final demise of the old wilderness generation.

Numbers 14 concludes with two brief episodes. In vv. 36-38, the ten rebellious spies who refused to trust God to bring the people into the land die in a plague. Their deaths are a sign of the coming punishment that will eventually fall upon all members of the older generation. As if to confirm the people's failure to comprehend their own sin, they change their minds and resolve to go and fight the Canaanites. But Moses warns them that God will not be with them. They go anyway and are soundly defeated in battle (vv. 39-45). The death of the old rebellious generation has begun.

15:1-41, A Sign of Hope: Regulations for Life in the Promised Land. Numbers 15 is a collection of legal material that has been inserted at a relatively late stage of composition between two narratives, the spy story in chaps. 13-14 and the story of the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram in chap. 16. Numbers 15 contains a number of laws concerning sacrifices and offerings that the people are to present to God when they live in the promised land (vv. 1-21). The next section includes regulations for sacrifices that atone for unintentional sins by the community (vv. 22-26) or by an individual (vv. 27-31). These laws concerning intentional and unintentional sins are followed by the legal case of a man gathering wood on the Sabbath day (vv. 32-36). Because the degree of guilt and punishment of the man is unclear, the case is referred to God's judgment. Originally the case may have had something to do with the law against kindling a fire on the Sabbath (Exod. 35:3) or with kindling a fire for a sacrifice to foreign gods. In the present context, however, the case provides a concrete example of the law that immediately precedes it concerning sinning flagrantly or "with a high hand" (Num. 15:30). Such deliberate and defiant sin must be punished severely. Thus, this legal case and the laws that precede it share a common theme: the role of intentionality in determining the degree of guilt and punishment. Sins done unwittingly bear less guilt and can be atoned through sacrifice (v. 28), while a blatant and intentional act of disobedience (v. 30) involves great guilt and severe punishment.

Num. 15:37-41 continues with instructions to the people to wear tassels on their garments as reminders of God's commandments (→Fringes). This section was included as part of the Jewish liturgy of the postexilic period as part of the prayer known as the "Shema" (→Shema). The last verse of the chapter, v. 41, strongly reaffirms God's relationship to the people after the trauma of the rebellion in chaps. 13-14. In fact, the whole chapter functions in this way to provide reassurance to the new generation that God will indeed bring them into the land. The laws presuppose that the new generation will indeed live in the promised land (15:2, 18). They look forward to new generations in that they are to apply "throughout your generations" (vv. 14, 15, 21, 23, 38). The tassels on the garments serve as a reminder of God's covenant to future generations (v. 38) and of Israel's perpetual duty to observe God's commandments and to safeguard their own sanctity (v. 40).

In relation to chaps. 13-14, the laws of Numbers 15 function as profound promise for the future. In relation to the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram in chap. 16, these same laws function as threat and burden. The laws in Numbers 15 are mediated exclusively through Moses, a fact repeatedly stressed (vv. 1, 17, 22, 23, 35, 36, 37). In the present shape of these chapters, Moses' unique role as God's mediator in chap. 15 apparently provides the reason for the otherwise unprovoked rebellion by Korah in chap. 16. Moreover, Korah's blatant and defiant revolt provides an example of sinning "with a high hand" (15:30), which requires the penalty of death, as we shall see.

16:1-35, The Rebellion of Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and 250 Leaders. A number of older and later traditions have been combined in this account of a rebellion against Moses and Aaron. The revolt is led by a subordinate levitical priest named Korah and by Dathan, Abiram, and 250 other lay members of the community. One is also mentioned as a rebel in v. 1, but he does not appear again. The earliest form of the story may have focused only on a rebellion by Dathan and Abiram, members of the tribe of Reuben (vv. 12-15). The story was then expanded to include 250 laymen who claimed the right to offer incense but were refuted in a test (vv. 2b, 4-7, 18, 35). A further elaboration introduced Korah, a Levite, as one of the rebels (vv. 1a, 8-11, 16-17). These separate traditions have been expanded and tied together by one or more editors. The judgment on Korah stresses the subordinate role of the Levites in relation to the sons of Aaron in priestly duties. The issue of whether this conflict between Levites and sons of Aaron reflects an actual historical struggle within the priesthood in either the pre-exilic or postexilic period in Israel is a matter of some debate.

In its present context, the rebellion in Numbers 16 simply confirms the faithlessness of the old wilderness generation that was already demonstrated in the debacle of the spy story in the preceding chapters. In a sense, the story in Numbers 13-14 and the story in chap. 16 signal the unraveling of the careful organization and preparation of the people at the beginning of the book (chaps. 1-4). The census and the holy camp in chaps. 1-2 prepared for the first military engagement, which should have occurred in the spying out of the land in chaps. 13-14. The spy story, however, ends in total failure. Moreover, the census and the preparation of the Levites for their important task of caring for the Ark and serving the sons of Aaron in Numbers 3-4 should have brought satisfaction and fulfillment to the Levites. Instead, Korah, the Levite, leads a rebellion against Moses and Aaron and challenges their legitimacy as leaders here in chap. 16.

The cause of the complaint against Moses in v. 3, "You have gone too far," is not clear in the immediate context. In the larger context and in the present shape of the text, however, Moses' exclusive role as mediator of the laws in Numbers 15 seems to provide the necessary background to the revolt. As we saw in our analysis, the laws in chap. 15 also function to dramatize the grave nature of the revolt in chap. 16. The revolt is an example of sinning openly and defiantly with "a high hand," which demands a judgment of being cut off from among the people (15:30). The judgment on Korah and his cohorts also serves to clarify the nature of the call in 15:40 for all God's people to be holy. The rebels incorrectly use their status as a holy people to seek their own advantage rather than obeying God's appointment of Moses and Aaron as their rightful leaders.

The story begins with the complaint of Korah and the Levites against the supremacy of Aaron and his sons in the practice of the priesthood (16:3-11). The rebels say Moses and Aaron have "gone too far" (v. 3), but Moses replies that the Levites have "gone too far" (v. 7) in their rebellion. A test is established whereby Korah and his company are to bring censers with fire in them on the following day in order that God may choose who is to serve as priests.

The story then proceeds to the challenge voiced by Dathan and Abiram, two laypersons from the tribe of Reuben. They yearn to return to Egypt, which they ironically remember as "a land flowing with milk and honey" (v. 13), the stereotypical designation for the promised land of Canaan. They also throw Moses' own words in his face. Moses attempted to comfort Korah and the Levites concerning their subordinate but privileged role by saying (v. 9), "Is it such a small thing that the God of Israel has separated you?" Dathan and Abiram turn the words back on Moses with a sarcastic twist (v. 13): "Is it such a small thing that you have taken us up out of a land flowing with milk and honey?" Their words belie a lack of faith in God's promise to bring the people into the promised land. They blatantly reject the authority of God's appointed leader, refusing to heed Moses' call to come and stand before him: "We will not come up" (v. 14).

The rebels are then judged by God in a manner that corresponds with their complaints. Korah and the Levites claim to be full priests. As a test of whether God will accept them as priests, the rebels light censers to offer incense as only priests are to do. Rejecting this democratizing of the priesthood, God commands Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the people so that God's wrath may consume the entire congregation (v. 21). Although Moses is very angry with the people (v. 15), he and Aaron reveal the quality of their character and leadership by pleading with God to judge only the guilty ones and to spare the rest of the people (v. 22). God complies, and Moses then asks the people to stay away from the dwellings of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram to see whether God will judge them (v. 26).

God then begins the judgment as the earth opens up and swallows the rebels. In accord with their complaints (v. 13), they do indeed die in the wilderness (vv. 31-34). And in accord with their complaints, these rebellious Levites offered incense to the Lord but were burned and killed as they did it (v. 35). Thus, God vindicates the rightful authority of Moses and Aaron.

16:36-50, Another Rebellion by All the People. God commands Moses to have Aaron's son, Eleazar, gather the bronze censers that the Levites had held as they were consumed in the fire of judgment. The bronze is to be hammered into a cover for the altar. This may have been intended as a supplemental covering or simply another tradition about an altar covering, since a similar bronze overlay is mentioned in Exod. 38:2. In Numbers, the covering serves as a sign to remind the people that only priests of the family of Aaron are to burn incense at the altar (Num. 16:36-40).

But the people soon slip back into their rebellious ways. They begin to accuse Moses and Aaron of killing the people of God, which includes Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and 250 others. God comes down and threatens again to destroy all the people of Israel since "all the congregation" is rebelling (vv. 41, 45). Whereas the question earlier had concerned God's justice in destroying the whole people when only a few were guilty (16:22), now God could destroy all the people since all were involved in the rebellion.

Moses and Aaron exemplify the quality of leadership as they again seek the good of the people rather than their own good or glory. They fall on their faces in an act of intercession on behalf of the people. Moses then instructs Aaron to take a censer throughout the camp and offer incense to make atonement for the people. The plague that is God's judgment kills 14,700 people before Aaron is able to step in to stop the spread of the plague through his intercession (vv. 45-50). Aaron's exclusive role as priest (Heb. kohen) is again vindicated, this time in a positive way. God had rejected and killed the Levites when they attempted to offer incense. In contrast, Aaron's offer of incense is accepted by God, and it effectively stops the spread of the plague. Leadership, priestly or otherwise, is to be exercised for the sake of the community, not for self-glorification.

17:1-13, Aaron's Almond Rod. The previous two incidents of rebellion against Aaron's exclusive role as priest in chap. 16 demonstrate the unwillingness of the people to accept the need for a priesthood. This section in Numbers 17, however, confirms once and for all God's sole appointment of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood. At the end, the people finally acknowledge their need for a priesthood to represent them at the altar (vv. 12-13). The aim of the original form of this story of the almond rods may have been to legitimate the Levites as priests. In the present shape of the story, however, the focus has been shifted from the Levites as a group to Aaron as an individual by having his name written on the rod representing the tribe of Levi (v. 3).

The story begins with God proposing a test to determine which tribe is to assume the privileges and responsibilities of the priesthood. God instructs Moses to collect twelve almond rods or branches and to write the names of the twelve tribes upon them. Aaron's name is to be written on the rod representing the tribe of Levi. Moses deposits the rods in the tent of meeting overnight. God suggests that the tribe whose rod sprouts on the following day will be considered the chosen tribe for the priesthood. God intends that the test will put an end to any further complaints from the people concerning the priesthood (vv. 5, 10). The rebellions that preceded clearly provide the reason for this test.

On the next day, the rod of Aaron is the only one of the twelve rods that sprouts buds, blossoms, and ripe almonds. God tells Moses to display Aaron's almond rod in the sanctuary as a visible sign of Aaron's rightful claim to the priesthood. The people come to recognize the necessity for a special priestly group to represent them at the tabernacle (vv. 8-13). The test and the previous rebellion stories in Numbers 16 clearly affirm God's choice of Aaron as priest of the people of Israel. We lack exact evidence of any historical conflicts over the priesthood in the history of Israel that may have formed the original background to this sequence of narratives. As the narratives stand, they simply reaffirm the uniqueness of the Aaronic priesthood among all the other tribes or groups (→ Aaron; Priests).

18:1-32, The Rights and Responsibilities of the Priesthood of Aaron and the Service of the Levites. The preceding narratives finally convince the people of the necessity of the priesthood. They now can recognize the importance of providing the tithe offerings and sacrifices necessary to sustain the priesthood. The nature of these offerings as well as the role of the Aaronic and levitical priesthood are spelled out in Numbers 18.

The chapter begins by stressing the responsibility of the priesthood to bear the sin of the community and to protect the community from drawing near to the holy vessels of the inner sanctuary. The Levites are to form a second circle of protection around the tent of meeting. The priests and Levites protect the people from compromising the holiness of God's presence in the sanctuary, thus guarding against the wrath of God and the death that it brings (vv. 1-5). The service of the priests and Levites is a gift from God to the community for their own good. Support of the priesthood ought then to be done out of a spirit of thankfulness and not only one of obligation (vv. 6-7).

In vv. 8-20, God speaks directly to Aaron rather than through the mediation of Moses. This is unusual and serves again to underscore Aaron's special role as priest. These verses summarize the sacrifices, the first-fruit offerings of the harvest, the firstborn animals, and the devoted items from holy war that are the priest's due. Many of these same laws are found elsewhere (e.g., Lev. 6-7, 27). The rationale for the offering to the priest is stated in Num. 18:20. The priests will not inherit any of the property in the land of Canaan. Their only source of sustenance will come from the offerings given to God.

The Levites are specifically addressed in vv. 21-29. Although they had been involved in the preceding rebellions (16:1, 7), God reaffirms the role of the Levites' service to the sons of Aaron and their right to the tithe offering of the people. The provision for the support of the Levites in these verses leaves no doubt that their role remains crucial to the plan of God for the people. Like the Aaronic priesthood, the Levites have no inheritance in the land and must be supported through the people's offerings (v. 24).

The Levites are to receive the tithe or one-tenth offering in return for their service in the tent of meeting. In turn, the Levites are to give a tithe of their tithe to the priests, or sons of Aaron. Moreover, the tithe is to be the best part of the offering. This ordinance emphasizes the important but subordinate role of the Levites in relation to Aaron. The rest of the offering, however, belongs to the Levites (vv. 25-31). The note in v. 32 reminds the Levites that any further rebellions like Korah's will lead only to death.

19:1-22, The Ritual of the Red Heifer and the Purification of the Unclean. The first half of the book of Numbers recounts the death of the members of the old wilderness generation in successive stages, leading up to the census and organization of the new generation in chap. 26. The presence of death and its threat to the community permeates these chapters. Several rebellions have already resulted in the deaths of thousands. Death occurs in the plague in 11:33; the punishment of the ten unfaithful spies in 14:37; the military defeat in 14:45; the punishment of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram and the other rebels in 16:33-35; and the plague that killed 14,700 people in 16:49.

After the rebellion of Numbers 16, the position of the priestly house of Aaron, which stands at the center of the wilderness camp, is reaffirmed in chap. 17. Chap. 18 follows by reconstituting the legitimate but subordinate role of the Levites in the next circle of holiness in the midst of the camp. Chap. 19 moves on to consider the major threat to the holiness of the laypeople in the rest of the camp by contamination through contact with the dead. Num. 5:2-3 has already stressed the seriousness of the threat to the holiness of the camp through touching a corpse. Given the several incidents of death among the people thus far and the theme of the death of the old generation in the first half of the book (chaps. 1-25), the concern of Numbers 19 for cleansing those contaminated by contact with the dead seems entirely appropriate.

The ritual of burning a red heifer or cow and using the ashes for a water of purification for the unclean probably reflects an ancient ritual. The details are contained in vv. 1–10. The redness of the heifer, the unusual burning of the blood of the animal (v. 5), and the scarlet stuff (v. 6) all seem to signify blood and its potent ability to cleanse that which is polluted. Cedarwood and hyssop (or marjoram) are other cleansing agents thrown into the fire as ingredients of the purificatory ashes (v. 6; see Lev. 14:4 and Ps. 51:7). The ashes are to be gathered up and kept for mixing with water to cleanse the people from sin and impurity (Num. 19:9). There is no mention in vv. 1–10 of its specific use for purifying those who have touched a corpse.

This link of the ritual of the red heifer with cleansing those who have come in contact with the dead was established with the addition of the ritual laws of vv. 14–19. These verses deal in detail with the issue of uncleanness through contact with the dead and may reflect an originally independent tradition. Verses 11–13 serve as a literary bridge that now binds the red heifer ritual with the concern for uncleanness from the dead. Thus, the ashes of the red heifer in v. 9 are identified in the present shape of the text with the ashes in v. 17. The notes in vv. 13 and 20 emphasize the importance of the cleansing ritual and focus the concern on preserving the holiness of the sanctuary of God at the center of the wilderness camp. The presence of God and the mechanisms for worship and life among the people can be maintained in spite of the continuing deaths of the people of the older wilderness generation.

20:1–29, The Ultimate Rebellion by Moses and Aaron Against God. The rebellion of the central leaders of Israel, Moses and Aaron, signals the pervasiveness of the sin of the old generation. Numbers 20 opens with a note about the death of one of the leaders, Miriam, who had rebelled along with Aaron in chap. 12. Her death and burial in the wilderness is a sign of what lies ahead for Aaron (v. 28) and for Moses (v. 12; cf. Deut. 34:5). None of the leaders of the old wilderness generation will lead Israel into the promised land.

The story of Num. 20:1–13 appears to be a reworking of a similar story about the people's complaint of a lack of water in the wilderness in Exod. 17:1–7. Both stories include the complaint about a lack of water, the rod used by Moses, and the name Meribah for the place. The primary aim of the story has been changed, however. The story in Exod. 17:1–7 illustrates God's care for the people, whereas the focus of the narrative in Num. 20:1–13 is on the extension of the rebellion even into the leadership of Moses and Aaron. The story shows that the sin of Moses and Aaron leads to God's prohibition upon their entering the land of promise in Canaan. It should be noted that the book of Deuteronomy gives an alternative explanation for Moses' not being allowed to enter the promised land. Deut. 3:26 and 4:21 suggest that the prohibition was part of Moses' vicarious suffering on behalf of the people for their sin. In either case, it is understood that the effect of the sin of the people has somehow extended even to God's closest servant, Moses.

The precise nature of the disobedience by Moses and Aaron has been much debated. It is not immediately clear how their actions constituted an act of faithlessness against God. The most probable explanation may be found in God's command in Num. 20:8 to take the rod and to tell the rock to produce water. Instead of just telling the rock to yield water, however, Moses strikes it two times (v. 11). The striking of the rock was not part of God's original instructions. Moses' failure to comply exactly with God's instructions is in contrast to the early chapters of Numbers in which God's commands are obeyed with an almost monotonous and repetitive correspondence (1:54; 2:34; 7:1–89; 9:15–23). Readers sense in chap. 20 a breakdown in the relationship between the leaders and God.

This breakdown in leadership is heightened by the question that Moses and Aaron pose to the rebels (v. 10, italics mine): "Shall we produce water for you out of this rock?" The question assumes that it is Moses and Aaron who have the power to produce the water, not God. This arrogance, particularly on the part of Moses, is in marked contrast to the portrait of a humble Moses in 12:3. Moreover, the primary sin in the spy story in chaps. 13–14 was the people's desire to trust in themselves rather than in God's power (14:11, 39–45). Now this sin of pride that forgets the divine source of all power and blessing has even reached into the leadership of Moses and Aaron. They too show themselves to be part of the old rebellious generation who are condemned to die outside the promised land.

The circles of holiness within the camp that were so carefully organized in Numbers 1–10 have slowly been undone. The people of the twelve tribes in the outer circle of the camp rebelled in chaps. 13–14. The Levites who surround the tent of meeting in the midst of the camp rebelled in chaps. 16–17. Now even the leaders closest to God, at the center of the camp, the priest Aaron and the leader Moses, rebel in Numbers 20. The fate of the whole generation of Israelites who first came out of Egypt is now sealed. Except for Joshua and Caleb (14:30), none of them, not even Moses, will set foot in Canaan. The holy camp of Israel will have to be reorganized with a new generation of Israelites (chap. 26).

Num. 20:14-21 recount Edom's refusal to allow the Israelites to pass through its territory on the way to the promised land. Edom was descended from Esau, the twin brother of Israel's ancestor Jacob (v. 14; cf. Gen. 25:26; 36:1; Amos 1:11). In spite of this kinship, Edom refuses the Israelites passage so that they are forced to take a detour around Edom (Num. 20:21). This lengthening of the journey provides the occasion for another murmuring incident in Num. 21:4. The incident with Edom also provides another example of Israel's leadership going its own way without consulting God. There is no command of God to Moses to approach Edom. Moses seems to be acting on his own (v. 14). Not even a promise of reimbursement will work (v. 19). The failure of Moses' mission may be related to his failure to involve God in carrying it out.

Verses 21-29 narrate the death of Israel's first high priest, Aaron. Aaron's death is described with little fanfare, a somber reflection on his rebellion at Meribah in vv. 1-13. Aaron's priestly garments are stripped and placed on his son Eleazar, who takes over the role of high priest for Israel. The death of Aaron and the succession of Eleazar to the priesthood are a sign of the coming end of the first generation and the beginning of a new generation of hope and promise. The continuance of the priesthood in Eleazar, however, indicates God's ongoing commitment to Israel and the institutions through which God works his will for the sake of the people.

21:1-25:18

The End of the First Generation: Signs of Hope Coupled with Ultimate Failure

A major break in the narrative occurs with Numbers 21. For the first time in this predominantly negative section of Numbers, a positive tone is struck with the story of Israel's military victory over the Canaanite king of Arad. Ever since chap. 11, Israel has continually rebelled and God has punished the people with military defeats and plagues. This negative portrait is abruptly altered by the positive conquest story in 21:1-3, which is followed by another rebellion (21:4-9) and then another positive conquest story with victories over two kings, Sihon and Og (21:10-35). A lengthy section involving King Balak and the prophet Balaam follows (22:1-24:25). The Balaam cycle concludes with a series of climactic promise oracles to Israel. A final rebellion story in 25:1-18 narrates the death of the remaining members of the old and unfaithful generation of the wilderness who continue to rebel in spite of God's promises and faithfulness. This section concludes the first half of Numbers (chaps. 1-25), by weaving together accounts of ultimate failure by a generation past and notes of profound promise for a generation of the future.

21:1-3, God Gives Victory over Arad to Israel. One of the purposes of the original form of this story was to explain the name of a place called "Hormah," which in Hebrew means "destruction" (v. 3). A conflict at Hormah had also been mentioned at the end of the spy story in 14:39-45. The story in 21:1-3 seems to be an alternate tradition about this same conflict at Hormah. In the context of the present narrative, this successful conquest of Arad at Hormah signals God's continuing faithfulness and intention to bring Israel into the promised land. When Israel trusts in God alone, then God will give victory to Israel. The Hormah story in 14:39-45 makes the same theological point in negative terms: when the people disobey and do not trust in God but only in their own strength and resources, they will suffer defeat.

21:4-9, Another Rebellion by the People. In spite of God's gracious act of faithfulness in 21:1-3, the members of the old wilderness generation immediately return to their grumbling ways. The long detour in their journey was necessitated by Edom's refusal to let the people travel through its territory (20:21). The detour causes the people to grow impatient. They complain to Moses and God about the lack of food and water and about the manna, which they detest. The people had complained about the manna before, in 11:6, and their complaint stirred up God's anger in the form of a plague (11:33). In 21:4-9, God's anger manifests itself in the form of poisonous serpents whose bite is deadly (v. 6). The people confess their sin to Moses, and Moses intercedes for them. God instructs Moses to set up a bronze serpent on a pole. Anyone who is bitten by a serpent and looks at the bronze serpent will live (vv. 8-9).

This story provides some background to 2 Kings 18:4, which mentions the bronze serpent made by Moses. People had been burning incense to the bronze serpent as part of their worship. King Hezekiah destroyed the bronze serpent because it apparently had too many associations with the pagan worship of the Canaanites who lived in the land before Israel and for whom the serpent was an important symbol in worship. Thus, Hezekiah banned the symbol to avoid any associations with idol worship. In Num. 21:4-9, however, the bronze serpent is a positive symbol of God's healing power.

21:10–35, Israel Marches On with Victories over Sihon and Og. In spite of the preceding rebellion, God continues to lead the people on their march toward the promised land. The first section (vv. 10–20) describes the itinerary of the Israelites as they camp and then move on from place to place toward their goal. Most of the place names mentioned are unknown. Two poetic passages or songs are included in these verses. The first song (vv. 14–15) is drawn from the “Book of the Wars of Yahweh.” This book was apparently a collection of ancient songs or accounts, similar to the “Book of Jashar” mentioned in Josh. 10:13. The brief song in Num. 21:14–15 is not straightforward in its meaning, although the general sense seems to be an account of the victories or travels of Israel in the areas named. The second song (vv. 17–18) is inserted after the note about God’s gift of water to the people at a place called Beer, which in Hebrew means “well.” God continues to provide for his people as he leads them through the wilderness.

The next section (vv. 21–35) recounts two decisive military victories by Israel over Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan. The form of the account of the conflict with Sihon is similar to that of the story of the Edomites in 20:14–20. The Israelites request permission from Sihon to pass through his kingdom. They pledge not to take anything from the fields or wells as they pass. Sihon denies their request. In 20:14–20, when Edom refused passage to the Israelites, they avoided a conflict by taking a detour around Edom. In 21:21–26, however, Sihon attacks Israel and is soundly defeated. God gives Israel a foretaste of the conquest of the promised land. For the first time, Israel successfully captures cities and land, although they are still on the east side of the Jordan River just across from the promised land of Canaan (v. 25). An ancient song that may have formed the basis for the narrative of the victory over Sihon in vv. 21–26 follows in vv. 27–30. Jer. 48:45–46 contains a slightly different form of the same song. The note about Israel’s settlement in the land of the Amorites in Num. 21:31–32 provides the background for the controversy about the settlement of Reuben and Gad in the Transjordan area in chap. 32.

A second military encounter occurs in 21:33–35. Israel defeats Og, who is king of Bashan. Israel obediently carries out the requirements of holy war and leaves no survivors (v. 35). As a result, God assures them of victory, and Israel is given the land of Bashan to possess. Once again when the Israelites are faithful and obedient, God shows his faithfulness by giving them victory over their enemies (→ Ban). Deut. 2:26–37 and 3:1–7 contain parallel accounts of Israel’s victories over Sihon and Og. Whether one of the two parallel accounts in Numbers 21 and Deuteronomy 2–3 is dependent on the other is a matter of debate. The two may also be independent but parallel forms of a common tradition. In any case, the function of Num. 21:21–35 in its present context is to show God’s faithfulness in giving victory to Israel as Israel moves toward the promised land. For the first time since the spy story in Numbers 13–14, the travels and victories of the Israelites in chap. 21 have moved Israel once again to the edge of the promised land “in the plains of Moab” (22:1). This hopeful setting provides the stage for the climactic promise oracles that Balaam speaks over God’s people in the ensuing three chapters.

22:1–24:25, A Crescendo of Hope: Balak and Balaam and the Blessing of Israel.

Two main characters stand out in this enigmatic story. The first character is Balaam, a professional prophet or seer who travels about and curses military enemies for money (→ Balaam). He is, in a sense, a hired gun, and his only weapons are words that have the power to curse. The second figure is Balak. He is the king of Moab, a country that borders the promised land of Canaan on the east side, just across the Jordan River. Balak fears that the large number of Israelites moving through his nation will attack and devastate his kingdom. He has no faith in his own army and so decides to turn elsewhere for help.

The story tells how King Balak decides to send his messengers to hire the professional curser, Balaam, to curse the millions of Israelites who are camped on the plains of Moab. Throughout the story, the Israelites remain oblivious to the drama taking place outside their camp. They rest in peace, totally unaware of the curse that threatens them and of God’s persistent efforts to block the curse and, instead, to bless Israel.

When Balaam is asked by Balak’s messengers to curse Israel, God first tells Balaam not to go. Balaam complies with God’s command and refuses to go with the messengers to Balak. Finally, however, Balaam does go with his ass. They find some roadblocks along the way but eventually reach King Balak. Balak carefully makes the necessary preparations for Balaam to curse Israel. In three successive attempts, however, Balaam can only speak words of blessing and not of curse upon Israel. Balaam’s last blessing upon Israel is the most extravagant of all, as he promises a glorious future for Israel.

The Balaam story has been a source of intense fascination and great diversity in the history of biblical interpretation. Some commentators have viewed Balaam as a true and faithful prophet of God, and others have seen him as an evil and false prophet. This variation in interpretation is due in part to the complexity of the biblical tradition itself concerning Balaam. Numbers 22–24 is an essentially positive portrait of Balaam. He ends up faithfully speaking God's words. But Deut. 23:3–6 conveys a very different opinion of Balaam and uses his association with the Moabites as a reason that Moabites and Ammonites are prohibited from ever entering the assembly of God's people (see also Num. 31:8). This tension in evaluating the figure of Balaam probably extends all the way back into the oral tradition when stories about the legendary professional curser named Balaam circulated among Israel and its neighbors. Archaeologists have discovered writings on plaster panels in a temple at Deir 'Allah near the Jordan River that refer to a famous professional prophet named Balaam. These inscriptions are evidence that different traditions and stories about Balaam were well known and circulated widely. This variety of traditions has been incorporated into the biblical record.

The Balaam cycle falls into three parts. The first episode in Num. 22:1–14 relates the mission of Balak's messengers as they try to convince Balaam to come with them. In Balaam's first encounter with God, God tells him not to go to Balak and he obeys (22:7–14).

The second episode is a folkloric tale about Balaam and his ass. In Balaam's second encounter with God in 22:15–20, God reverses the earlier decision and this time commands Balaam to comply with the messengers' request and go to Balak (v. 20). Balaam saddles his ass and begins the journey. In what now amounts to Balaam's third encounter with God, however, God seems again to reverse the decision to allow Balaam to go. An angel of God stands in the road and blocks the way. Only the ass sees the angel. Balaam is blind to his messenger from God and so angrily beats his ass who has turned off the road to avoid the angel (22:22–23). The ass sees the angel again on the road in a narrow place, but again Balaam fails to see the angel (22:24–25).

As they continue on the journey, the ass sees the angel a third time and simply lies down in the road since there is no way to go around the angel. Balaam angrily begins to beat the ass, and the ass opens its mouth and asks why Balaam is beating his faithful animal (22:21–30). Then God opens Balaam's eyes, and Balaam sees the angel of God. The angel chastises Balaam for treating his ass so harshly, since it was the ass who saved him from being killed. Balaam begs for forgiveness, and the angel instructs Balaam to go ahead with his mission to Balak. Balaam is to speak, however, only what God commands him to speak (22:31–35).

The third major episode in the Balaam cycle (22:36–24:25) reports the repeated attempts of Balak to have Balaam curse Israel. Each attempt is thwarted, however. Balaam ends up blessing rather than cursing Israel on three different occasions (22:41–23:12; 23:13–26; 23:27–24:25). Ironically, Moab, not Israel, becomes the one cursed by Balaam (24:17).

The experience of Balaam and his ass (22:21–35) is parallel to the experience of Balaam and King Balak (22:36–24:25). The ass was caught three times between the angel's sword and Balaam's stick. Balaam is likewise caught three times between Balak's demands to curse Israel and God's prohibitions. Moreover, in each of the three incidents with the ass and the angel, the intensity rises at each stage toward a climax. Balaam becomes increasingly frustrated. In the same way, the anger of King Balak grows with each of the three oracles of blessing that Balaam pronounces upon Israel. As in the incident with Balaam and the ass, God's apparent arbitrariness is simply evidence of his control of Balaam and Balak and his resolve to bless Israel in face of all outside pressures to the contrary.

In general, Balaam's oracles of blessing all reaffirm the promises made to the ancestors in the book of Genesis. God's initial promise made to Abraham in Gen. 12:1–3 provided for land, descendants, and blessing. Balaam's first oracle in Num. 23:7–10 mentions Israel's positive relationship with God and Israel's great population (23:8, 10). The second oracle concentrates on God's faithfulness to the promises that he had made and on the irreversibility of his blessing of Israel (23:19–20). The third vision describes how Israel will shortly be given victory over its enemies and enjoy peace and prosperity in the promised land (24:3–9).

This last blessing moves somewhat beyond the promises to the ancestors in Genesis and looks forward to a distant time when a king or messiah would arise in Israel (24:14–19). Balaam describes what God would do to Israel "in the latter days" (24:14) as he points to a coming king in 24:17: "I see him, but not now; I behold him, but not nigh: a star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a scepter shall rise out of Israel" (RSV). The image of a star could be used as a metaphor for a royal figure (Isa. 14:12), while the scepter or royal staff symbolized the authority of a king. The original fulfillment of this oracle was probably understood as coming with the reign of King David in Israel, but the promise of a king or messiah was then extended beyond David to a future hope for a messiah who would usher in God's kingdom in the end days.

Scholars are generally agreed that the oracles of Balaam are good examples of Hebrew poetry that may be dated early in Israel's history (→ Poetry). Evidence also suggests, however, that the Balaam oracles have been edited and reshaped in the course of transmission at various points in Israel's history.

The Balaam cycle in Numbers 22–24 plays an important role in the overall theme of Numbers: the death of the old sinful generation and the birth of a new generation of hope on the edge of the promised land. The story of Balaam has been placed in a strategic position in the book of Numbers at the end of the first generation (chap. 25) and the beginning of a new generation (chap. 26). The oracles of blessing that Balaam speaks sound a crescendo of hope and promise at the conclusion of the first generation. Even so, the first generation returns immediately to the way of rebellion and disobedience. The sin that follows in chap. 25 is the final rebellion of the old generation. The ensuing plague kills the last members of the generation counted in chap. 1.

In the midst of the dismal end of the old generation of the wilderness, a new generation of hope arises and is affirmed by the powerful oracles of Balaam. The oracles point beyond themselves to a time to come. It will be a time of prosperity, strength, victory, and hope. Through Balaam, God blesses Israel with accolades and promises unsurpassed in the entire Pentateuch. Thus, Balaam stands at the end of one generation and points ahead to the coming of a new generation of God's people.

25:1-18, The Final Rebellion: The Death of the Remainder of the Old Wilderness Generation.

This last episode in the first half of Numbers brings the story of the generation who experienced the Exodus and Sinai to an end. The story of Balaam in chaps. 22-24 had demonstrated God's faithfulness to the promises that he had made to the people of Israel. In contrast, the story in Numbers 25 shows the fickle and shallow nature of the faith of God's people.

Israel here has every reason to be hopeful and faithful. The Balaam oracles describe the glorious future that is theirs as they stand again on the threshold of the promised land. The setting is a replay of the spy story in chaps. 13-14, in which the people likewise had every reason to have hope and trust in God. And yet the Israelites in Numbers 25 quickly and easily turn from their God to worship a false god and commit sin. The Balaam story described how even an ass can recognize an angel of God. Even a pagan prophet like Balaam can see God and do his will. Numbers 25 reveals that the same cannot be said of this old generation of God's own people. Balaam in chaps. 22-24 sees glorious visions of a great future. The Israelites in chap. 25 see only their own people playing the harlot, prostituting themselves with the foreign women of Moab and Midian. The story of the Israelite apostasy draws a sharp contrast between the faithfulness of God and the faithlessness of the old wilderness generation.

It is generally agreed that 25:1-5 represents an earlier version of the story that focuses on the women of Moab, the punishment of the chiefs of the people, and the role of the judges in carrying out the sentence. This earlier story was then expanded in vv. 6-18 by including the women of Midian, the punishment of all the people (v. 9), the role of Phinehas in carrying out a specific act of punishment, and God's consequent promise of a perpetual priesthood to him. Some of these elements are found in a version of the story in Ps. 106:28-31, which may have provided source material to the writer of Numbers.

The inclusion of the women of Midian in seducing the Israelites into the worship of other gods provides the justification for the later attack against Midian in Numbers 31. The punishment of all the people by a plague as a sign of God's wrath repeats a motif found in some of the other rebellion stories in Numbers (11:33; 14:37; 16:46). The role of Phinehas in killing Zimri the Israelite and Cozbi the Midianite woman was a meritorious act that legitimized Phinehas and his descendants as priests forever. Some commentators have seen this as an attempt to vindicate the priesthood of Phinehas and his line during a time in Israel's history when the legitimacy of that priesthood was in doubt. The notes in Ezra 8:2 and 1 Chron. 9:20 concerning Phinehas have been suggested as reflexes of this concern to validate Phinehas' priesthood in the postexilic period.

The great sin of Numbers 25 is the worship of other gods, in this case the god named Baal of Peor. The phrase in v. 1 describes the sin as playing the harlot with the women of Moab. This has a double sense. It refers to actual sexual intercourse with foreign women (see Exod. 34:12-16; Deut. 7:3-4). But it also refers to participating in the common ancient Near Eastern practice of cult prostitution that was a form of worship of certain fertility gods. The Israelites succumbed to pagan seduction both in a physical and a religious sense. Moab (Num. 25:1) and Midian (v. 6) are close neighbors; their identification in this story is not surprising.

The specific sinful act that enraged Phinehas was the intermarriage of the Israelite Zimri and the Midianite Cozbi. Phinehas killed them with a spear, presumably in the act of sexual intercourse. God interprets the killing as a sacrifice for the atonement of the people (v. 13). Priests usually sacrificed animals, but in this extreme case the two people directly involved in the sin were killed. Phinehas acts in concert with the jealous anger of God and is rewarded with the promise of the priesthood for him and his family.

The narrative of Israel's apostasy in Numbers 25 brings to a close the life of the first generation of Israelites out of Egypt. The twenty-four thousand people who die in v. 9 are presumably the last contingent of the old generation. They have been taken off the stage to make room for the coming of a new generation of Israelites who again stand on the edge of the promised land.

The advent of this new generation of hope and promise is signaled by the second census list of the twelve tribes of Israel in Numbers 26.

26:1–36:13

The Birth of the New Generation on the Edge of the Promised Land

The second half of the book of Numbers begins with the second of two census lists that appear in the book. The first census list (chap. 1) signaled the preparation of the first generation of Israelites out of Egypt for the march through the wilderness toward the promised land. The second census list (chap. 26) signals the preparation of an entirely new generation on the edge of the promised land. Numerous parallels between chaps. 1–25 and chaps. 26–36 enhance the sense of symmetry between the first and second halves of Numbers. This symmetrical construction conveys the impression that the new generation is given similar opportunities and guidance with the hope that it will fare better than the old generation that had died in the wilderness.

For example, the census list in chap. 26 uses the same formula for God's command to count the people (v. 2) as in 1:2–3. The lists of the twelve tribes in Numbers 1 and 26 have exactly the same order, except for a minor reversal of Manasseh and Ephraim. A census of the Levites follows the twelve-tribe census in both cases (chap. 3–4 and chap. 26). A legal discourse involving women in Numbers 5 parallels the legal discourse involving women (the daughters of Zelophehad) in Numbers 27. Laws concerning vows in chap. 6 find an echo in the laws concerning vows in chap. 30. Provisions for the Levites in Num. 18:21–32 are paralleled by the provisions for the levitical cities in Numbers 35. The list of offerings given by each tribe for the dedication of the altar in chap. 7 and the laws concerning offerings in chap. 15 find a parallel in the list of offerings to be given at the appointed feasts and holy days in chaps. 28 and 29. The celebration of the Passover in chap. 9 is mirrored in 28:16–25, where instructions for the future celebration of the Passover are given to all succeeding generations.

The list of spies in Numbers 13 is also echoed in the list of tribal leaders chosen to divide the land of Canaan in Numbers 34. The itinerary of Israel's wilderness journey in Numbers 1–25 is summarized in chap. 33. The story of the spies and the rebellion of Israel in chaps. 13–14 is taken up and used as a lesson for the new generation in 32:6–15. Moreover, the victory of the first generation of Israelites over Sihon and Og in the Transjordan prepares the way for the new generation of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh to settle there in Numbers

32 (32:33). One final echo involves the last act of the first generation, which was apostasy in connection with the Midianites in 25:16–18. This act of seduction of the first generation of Israelites by the Midianites is avenged by the second generation in a holy war in chap. 31.

These parallels between chaps. 1–25 and chaps. 26–36, however, should not obscure the real differences in the characterization of the old generation and the new one. The old generation began with its census in the wilderness, a place of hardship and despair (1:1). The second generation begins its journey poised in expectation and hope on the edge of the promised land in the plains of Moab (26:3).

The first generation had been at the edge of the promised land twice before. When spies surveyed the land of Canaan and reported back, the people rebelled and were condemned to return to wander in the wilderness for forty years (chaps. 13–14). The members of the first generation were given the opportunity to come again to the threshold of the land of Canaan, but again they rebelled and so suffered their final death (chap. 25). In contrast, the new generation begins its life on the edge of the promised land (26:3) and remains there until the end of the book (36:13). Moses reminds the new generation of the wanderings of the preceding generation (33:1–47) and of the place where the new generation now stands (33:48–49). The new generation is also reminded of the goal: the new land to which they are going (33:51).

The fate of the first generation, as it attempted to live as God's holy people, led to ultimate death and failure (11:1–25:18). But the fate of the second generation is left open. Signs of hope appear along the way as disputes move toward peaceful resolution rather than open rebellion (27:1–11; 32:1–42; 36:1–13). Laws are given to the second generation that can apply only when they actually settle in the promised land (chaps. 27, 34–36). Such laws are a subtle promise that there is hope for this new generation to enter the land of promise. In contrast to the death of a whole generation in a series of rebellions and judgments in the first half, the second half of Numbers does not record the death of any Israelite. The Israelites are victorious in their first military engagement against the Midianites (chap. 31).

The second generation in Numbers 26–36 represents an entirely new beginning. Its destiny lies before it as it stands on the doorstep of the land of Canaan. Thus, the second half of the story of the second generation remains undecided and untold. The outcome is a question mark. Will the members of this new generation be faithful and enter the promised land? Or will they rebel and fail as the first generation had done? It is with this undecided future that the book of Numbers comes to an end.

26:1–65

The Second Census of the Twelve Tribes and the Levites: A New Generation

This second census of the twelve tribes of Israel and of the Levites is very similar in form to the census taken in Numbers 1–4. The same formulas are used in the command to take the census. The sequence in the list of tribes is virtually identical. The symmetrical construction of the two census lists suggests that they are intended to function together as the pillars of the structure of Numbers.

One significant difference between the two lists in chaps. 1 and 26 is that the second census list adds an enumeration of the various subclans within each tribe. An example is the tribe of Gad. Num. 1:24–25 simply lists the tribe of Gad and his family. Num. 26:15–18 enumerates the various subclans within the tribe of Gad (e.g., a son Zephon and the Zephonites). Many of the names for the subclans appear related to the list of the children of the twelve sons of Jacob in Gen. 46:8–27. This elaboration of the family groups within the tribes in Numbers 26 functions to express the development of the tribes into a new generation that now has branched out into various subclans. The newness of this generation is underscored by the fact that the names of the leaders of the tribes or clans in chap. 26 do not appear in the earlier census list in chap. 1 nor in any of the other previous lists of clan leaders in Numbers. The second census list represents a totally new generation.

Two important passages in Numbers 26 help to guide our interpretation of this second census list. First of all, vv. 52–56 suggest that the purpose of this second census list is primarily to determine the size of the territory that will be assigned to each of the twelve tribes when they enter the promised land. The focus has been shifted from the census as military preparation for war in Numbers 1. The formula that is repeated fourteen times in chap. 1, “all those who were able to go forth to war,” is dropped entirely from the narrative of the census in chap. 26, with one exception (v. 2). The emphasis has shifted from the people’s military preparation as the means of gaining the land to their receiving the land from God as a gift. The focus is not so much on conquest as on receiving the land as a gift from God and dividing it fairly among the tribes.

The second important passage in Numbers 26 is vv. 63–65. These verses explicitly pick up the theme of the whole book—the death of the old generation and the birth of the new generation of God’s people. The spy narrative in chaps. 13–14 was the first to establish this overarching theme explicitly. The note in 26:63–65 takes it up and applies it to the second census. An entirely new generation has now arisen to take the place of the old. This text represents a programmatic summary of the structure of the book of Numbers. The second census is a sign that God’s judgment upon the first generation has been completed. But the census is also a sign that God’s promise of a new generation of hope has also been fulfilled.

27:1–11

The Daughters of Zelophehad and the Inheritance of Land: A Legal Dispute Resolved

The preceding chapter of Numbers had already established the principle of keeping the promised land equally and fairly divided among the tribes and families of Israel (26:52–56). To ensure that the land remained with the tribe to which it was first apportioned, the land was passed from eldest son to eldest son within the same family. A problem arises, however, as is intimated already in the census list in 26:33–34. Zelophehad had five daughters but no sons. After his death, his daughters urge Moses to allow them to inherit their father’s land. In this way the land will remain in the same family, even though there are no sons. But this would contradict the custom that only males can inherit property.

Faced with this dilemma, Moses consults God for instruction on this unprecedented case. Is it more important that only males inherit property or that the land remain in the same family? God agrees with the daughters that the land must remain in their family’s possession, even if it means violating the other custom that only males receive inherited land (27:5–11). The further issue of what should happen to the land when the daughters marry is not addressed here. That issue will be taken up in the conclusion of the book of Numbers when the daughters of Zelophehad will again appear (36:1–12). God affirms a high priority to the equal distribution of the economic base for each family. Other rules may be bent in order to ensure the well-being of each of the tribes and families of God's people. This legal dispute involving the daughters of Zelophehad provides an interesting look at the way in which new case law may have been developed in the absence of precedents. The successful resolution of the case and its relation to the promised land provide a positive and hopeful tone as the first incident recorded in the life of the new generation.

---

Opposite: Four of the twelve tribes of Israel (clockwise from top: Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan, each represented by a standard-bearing medieval knight) on the way to the promised land; frontispiece to the book of Numbers from the Duke of Sussex Pentateuch, ca. A.D. 1300. Numbers 2 specifies that the tribe of Judah was to camp with tribes to the east and lead the march. The tribes of Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan were to camp to the south, west, and north, respectively, and to lead those contingents.

27:12-23

The Succession of Leadership from Moses to Joshua

God reminds Moses that he may only see Canaan and not actually enter it. Like his brother Aaron, Moses will die outside the promised land. The reason given is the sin of Moses and Aaron at the waters of Meribah of Kadesh when they rebelled against God's word (v. 14). The story is recounted in 20:1-13. As our commentary noted there, the precise nature of the sin or rebellion by Moses and Aaron is unclear. Nevertheless, the sin becomes the warrant for the prohibition of these two leaders to enter the promised land. The book of Deuteronomy provides an alternate tradition. In Deut. 3:26, Moses must die outside the land not because of his sin but because of that of the people.

The reminder of Moses' impending death causes him to plead to God for a new leader for the new generation of God's people. They already have a new priest in Eleazar. The succession of Aaron's priestly office to Eleazar and the death of Aaron were narrated together in Num. 20:22-29. Num. 27:12-23 narrates only the succession of the Mosaic office and not the actual death of Moses, which comes much later in Deuteronomy 34. Instead, we here read of the succession to the Mosaic office of Joshua, who was one of the faithful spies who God promised would enter the promised land (14:30). Joshua has frequently appeared as a close assistant to Moses (11:28; Exod. 17:8-13).

Joshua, however, is not to function simply as another Moses. Moses is to give only some or a portion of his authority to Joshua (Num. 27:20). While Moses spoke to God face to face in a most intimate and direct way (12:6-8), Joshua will have to rely on indirect divine guidance provided by the priest and his casting of lots with the Urim and Thummim (cf. Exod. 28:30; 1 Sam. 28:6). The era and revelation associated with the figure of Moses remain in some way unique and unrepeatable in the history of Israel. Moses and Joshua will lead the people together in a coregency during the time of transition that will end with the death of Moses in Deuteronomy 34. Then Joshua will assume sole leadership of the people, but his leadership will be guided by the book of the Torah of Moses (Josh. 1:7-8).

Although the roles of Joshua and Moses are different, an essential continuity between the two leaders also exists. The laying of hands on Joshua by Moses underscores this continuity (Num. 27:18, 23). The imposition of hands transferred the power of authority, blessing, or sin from one to another. In any case, the one becomes a representative of or substitute for the other. Jacob blessed his grandsons by laying on his hands (Gen. 48:14). People could transfer their guilt or sin to another person or a sacrificial animal by placing their hands on the head of the person or animal (Lev. 1:4; 24:14). The Levites' function as substitute for all first-born children was symbolized by the laying on of hands by the people of Israel (Num. 8:10-12). In chap. 27, authority is passed from Moses to Joshua by the imposition of hands. In this way, new leadership was publicly transferred from one generation to the next.

28:1-30:16

Further Ritual and Legal Regulations for the New Generation's Life in the Promised Land

This section includes a systematized program of sacrifices that Israel is to offer once in the land of Canaan and laws that remove any ambiguities about women and the legitimacy of their vows. Most commentators are agreed that this section of laws is among the latest parts of the book of Numbers and of the whole Pentateuch. Much of it may have been added to Numbers during the postexilic period in Israel's history. The primary function of these laws in the present structure of Numbers is to offer guidance and indirect assurance of the new generation's life in the promised land of Canaan.

28:1-29:40, A Systematized Program for Sacrifices in the Promised Land.

Chaps. 28-29 provide a systematic list of the dates and quantities for the sacrifices that Israel is to offer God. The dates mentioned include the daily sacrifice in the morning and in the evening (28:3-8), the Sabbath sacrifice (28:9-10), the sacrifice on the first day of the month (28:11-15), and the sacrifices for the festivals. These include the Feast of Unleavened Bread (28:17-25), the Feast of First Fruits (28:26-31), the first day of the seventh month or Trumpets (29:1-6), the tenth day of the seventh month or the Day of Atonement (29:7-11) and Tabernacles (29:12-34) together with its eighth day of assembly, attested in Lev. 23:36 but no other Pentateuchal calendar (29:35-38). The various kinds of offerings or sacrifices include the whole offerings (the burnt flesh of animals), cereal offerings (grain and oil), drink offerings (wine), and purification offerings (the goat) (→ Worship).

This summary of the sacrifices appears to be based on much similar material scattered in Exodus 29, Leviticus 23, and Ezekiel 45-46. The sacrifices listed here are in addition to other votive and freewill offerings given by the people (Num. 29:39). The purpose of these offerings is to purify and dedicate the people of the new generation as they look forward to living in the land of Canaan. The enormous quantities of animals and grain and wine presuppose a settled agricultural life in the promised land. Therefore, these laws function as a hopeful sign that the new generation will soon enter Canaan. The laws in Numbers 15 had a similar role in their placement after the debacle of chaps. 13-14.

30:1-16, Women and Vows. Vows in the Bible typically took one of two forms. They could be made to give something to God, usually a sacrifice of some kind. Or a vow could involve abstaining from something as a sign of thankfulness or dedication. Examples include Jacob's vow of a tenth of his possessions to God (Gen. 28:20-22), Israel's vow to destroy the Canaanite cities in return for victory (Num. 21:2), Hannah's dedication of her son Samuel (1 Sam. 1:11), and the Nazirite vows of abstinence (Num. 6:1-8). The vow may be seen as a type of freewill offering or sacrifice; this would explain its position following the laws concerning sacrifices in chaps. 28-29 (29:39).

The issue in Numbers 30 concerns situations in which a woman's vow may or may not be made void by the objection of a father or husband. The general principle is established at the outset: vows made to God by men are not to be broken (v. 2). In regard to vows made by women, the general principle followed is that the immediate objection of a father or husband to a woman's vow nullifies it without penalty (vv. 5, 8, 12). If a woman's husband does not protest the vow at first and only later objects, however, then he is responsible for fulfilling the vow and any penalty involved (v. 15).

In the patriarchal society of ancient Israel, women were often economically dependent on men. In certain circumstances, the ultimate responsibility for fulfilling vows made by a woman could rest upon her father or her husband. The laws in Numbers 30 thus protect the husband or father from the requirement to honor a woman's vow in special cases. But the laws also protect women and the integrity of their vows by requiring a clear and immediate response by a father or husband if the vow is to be nullified. Otherwise, the vow stands and the man bears the responsibility and any guilt incurred in not fulfilling the vow. The overriding concern is that the holiness of the people in the land be preserved and that all obligations to God be clearly fulfilled in a proper manner.

31:1-54

Revenge on the Midianites:

A Foretaste of the Conquest to Come

This section recounts a war of revenge on the Midianites led by Moses in his last act of military leadership. The narrative may be based in part upon the account of the conquest of the five Midianite kings in Josh. 13:21. The battle against the Midianites in Numbers 31 is the first military venture undertaken by the new generation of Israelites, and the success of their mission is overwhelming. This battle functions as a dress rehearsal and builds confidence and hope for the actual conquest of the promised land of Canaan that lay ahead.

The Israelites send out one thousand soldiers from each of the twelve tribes to fight the five Midianite kings (vv. 5-8). They kill every Midianite male and the prophet Balaam in revenge for the Midianite seduction of the Israelites into apostasy in Numbers 25. The guilty Israelites in chap. 25 were immediately punished by a plague (25:9). God commanded Moses at that time also to punish the guilty Midianites for having lured the Israelites into the false worship of a pagan god (25:16-18). Moses obeys this command in chap. 31 by a holy war of revenge upon the Midianites. The prophet Balaam, who is depicted as a faithful spokesperson for God in chaps. 22-24, is accused in 31:15-16 of having counseled the Midianite women into leading the Israelites astray in the false worship of Baal Peor. Thus, Balaam is included among those who are killed (v. 8).

Although every male among the Midianites is killed, Moses is angry because the Midianite women who played an important role in seducing the Israelites in Numbers 25 were not killed. He instructs the Israelite warriors to kill all the Midianite women who have been sexually active, but all virgins may be kept alive (31:17-18). Moreover, the purity of the camp and the Israelites is also to be protected through strict adherence to the purity laws in connection with touching the dead in battle (vv. 19-20) and in purifying all booty through fire and water (21-24).

The bulk of the rest of the chapter deals with the distribution of the spoils of the war, which includes both captives and animals. The booty is divided equally between soldiers and the people (v. 27; cf. 1 Sam. 30:21–25). A proportion of the booty is given to provide support for the priests and Levites (Num. 31:28–31). The list of the enormous quantities of booty that follows underscores God's faithfulness in leading the people in military success (vv. 32–47). It is discovered that not one Israelite died in the battle. In a response of thankfulness to God for protection in battle, a special offering is given in support of the sanctuary (vv. 48–54).

The narrative of the Midianite war plays an important role in portraying the obedience of the new generation of Israelites that leads to God's blessing. The battle and the division of booty illustrate how the new generation puts into practice the laws given to the old generation earlier in Numbers. The trumpets are sounded in accordance with the instructions in 10:1–10 (31:6). Numbers 19 outlined procedures for purification after contact with the dead; these procedures are followed in 31:19–20. Guidelines were given in Numbers 18 to ensure adequate support of the priests and the Levites. These guidelines provide the basis for the division of the booty in 31:25–47. In Numbers 7, each tribe of the old generation had demonstrated its devotion to God by giving offerings to the support of the sanctuary. This devotion is echoed in the new generation's generous offerings to the sanctuary (31:48–54). Numbers 31 is an example of laws obediently followed and put into action.

The new generation's victory in the Midianite war functions as an undoing or reversal of two incidents in the experience of the old generation. The first is the spy mission into Canaan in Numbers 13–14. Standing there on the edge of the promised land, the people had failed to trust God to lead them in victory. The result was death in the wilderness. In the first military expedition of the new generation in Numbers 31, however, the people trust God and obey his command to avenge the Midianites. The new generation experiences a resounding victory, and not one Israelite is killed in the process (v. 49). This first military victory of the new generation serves to undo the first military defeat of the old generation in Numbers 13–14.

The second incident in the life of the old generation here reversed is the apostasy in Numbers 25. The Midianites had led the people to worship a pagan god. The Israelites had been conquered not by military strength but by religious seduction. In Numbers 31, the roles are reversed, as the Midianites are conquered and the Israelites are victorious. The victory over the Midianites signals a new and fresh start for the new generation of Israelites. The victory strengthens the hope and trust of the people as they look forward to entering the long awaited land of promise.

32:1–33:56

Words of Warning and Encouragement: Reminders from a Generation Past

Chap. 32 inserts a note of warning and one of hope into the story of the new generation of God's people. A potential crisis erupts that may upset the whole plan of entering the promised land. Two of the Israelite tribes desire to settle outside the land of Canaan on the east side of the Jordan River. Moses is angered by their request and warns the people that they may become like the old generation who died in the wilderness. A compromise is achieved, however, and the crisis averted.

Chap. 33 is a summary of the itinerary traveled by the old generation of Israelites from Egypt through the wilderness to the edge of the promised land. It contains a list of places where the people camped along with notes that provide both words of warning and words of encouragement to the new generation camped at the threshold of the promised land.

32:1–42, A Crisis Averted: The Request of Reuben and Gad to Settle Outside the Land of Canaan. This section is typically understood by commentators to be a composite of two or more layers of material that have been combined to form the present narrative. The earliest parts of the story may be found in vv. 16–27 and 34–38. In its present form, the story recounts the request by Reuben and Gad to settle on the east side of the Jordan River. It was this territory that the Israelites captured from Sihon and Og in 21:21–35 (32:33). Since the Jordan River forms the eastern boundary of the land of Canaan, their request seems to suggest a desire not to enter the promised land of Canaan. Moses fears that the other tribes will be discouraged and lose heart if Gad and Reuben stay and do not cross the Jordan River into Canaan with the other tribes.

Moses draws a parallel with the experience of the old generation in the spy story in Numbers 13–14 and the request of Gad and Reuben. Like the spies' negative report of the land, Gad and Reuben's request may dishearten the people and cause them not to trust God to lead them into the land. If that happens, the fate of the old generation, which was death in the wilderness, may become the fate of the new generation as well (32:6–15). The lesson of the past becomes a paradigm that interprets the potential rebellion of the new generation again on the edge of the promised land. The outcome of the second generation remains an open question. If they rebel, God may again punish them.

The people continue to live under the threat of God's judgment.

The last word in this episode, however, is one of promise and encouragement. Reuben and Gad propose a compromise whereby they will join the other Israelites in conquering the land of Canaan. Only after the conquest is complete will they return to the territory on the east side of the Jordan to settle there. Moses accepts the compromise as a reasonable one, and the crisis is averted (vv. 16-27). He instructs Joshua and Eleazar to enforce the compromise agreement, and Reuben and Gad pledge their commitment to the plan (vv. 28-32). Moses then grants the territory and its cities to these two tribes and also to half of the tribe of Manasseh as their possession (33-42).

This story plays an important role in the larger structure of Numbers, as it explicitly applies the central theme of the spy story in chaps. 13-14 to the new generation of God's people. Both the promises and the warnings from the old generation are focused on this new one. The final fate of this second generation is unknown at this point, but the successful resolution of the potential crisis brings the episode to a close on a note of hope and promise.

33:1-56, The Travel Itinerary of the Old Generation: Warning and Encouragement for the New Generation. Chap. 33 consists of a list of campsites of the Israelites as they traveled from Egypt to the boundary of the promised land. Many of the names of the campsites are found only in this list (vv. 13, 19-29). Most of the actual locations of the campsites in the wilderness are today unknown. The list of places may reflect a combination of one or more actual itineraries used by travelers or pilgrims in ancient times, but the precise background of the itinerary is very difficult to reconstruct.

Several of the names of the campsites do occur, however, elsewhere in the Pentateuch, and some have specific incidents connected with them. These incidents are recalled to engender hope in the new generation. For example, the recollection of God's victory over the Egyptians (v. 3) and over the Canaanite king of Arad (v. 40) would serve to encourage the new generation about to engage the Canaanites as they enter the land. Other incidents are recalled as warnings to the new generation: the judgment on the worship of false gods (v. 4) and the death of Aaron for his sin (vv. 38-39) are mentioned. The list of campsites is followed by a general word of assurance from God to the people about their imminent entry into the land of Canaan (vv. 50-54). The chapter concludes with a word of warning if the people do not carry out the conquest of Canaan faithfully and obediently (vv. 55-56). The overall effect of the lengthy and detailed list of encampments is to underscore God's faithfulness in bringing Israel through the long and arduous wilderness journey. Such faithfulness ought to inspire confidence and trust in God as the people enter the promised land.

34:1-36:13

Law as Promise: Divine Commands Concerning the Anticipated Residence of the People in the Promised Land

The book of Numbers concludes with a series of laws and instructions that assume that the conquest of Canaan is near at hand. These final chapters of the book strike a uniformly positive note as the new generation looks forward to its life in the land that had been promised to its ancestors for generations.

34:1-29, Boundaries and Divisions of the Land. The chapter outlines the procedures for the future division of the land of Canaan. It opens with precise instructions from God for drawing the boundary lines of the Promised Land. The boundaries in chap. 34 exceed those of Israel at any point in its history. The portrait of the land here is thus an idealized one; the promise in a sense always outdistanced its fulfillment in a particular historical time. And yet the land is a very tangible and carefully delineated promise from God; it is not simply an otherworldly or nebulous hope.

The description of the land in chap. 34 corresponds very closely to the description of the area covered by the spies in chaps. 13-14. The southern boundary is in the Wilderness of Zin (34:3), and the northern boundary extends to the entrance of Hamath (v. 8; cf. 13:21). The eastern boundary is the Jordan River (34:12), and the western boundary is the "Great Sea" (v. 6; cf. 13:29). These precise correspondences between the spy story and the boundaries of the land delineated in Numbers 34 suggest that the original promise of the land to the old generation has now been extended in its entirety to the new generation.

35:1-34, Establishment of Levitical Cities and Cities of Refuge: Maintaining the Purity of the Promised Land. Provisions having been made in chap. 34 for the division of the land among the people, chap. 35 makes provisions for cities for the Levites to occupy and for pasturelands on which to graze their livestock (vv. 1-8). This material may in part be dependent on the list of levitical cities in Joshua 21. Numbers 18 provided for the support of the Levites from the offerings of the people because the Levites "will have no inheritance among the people of Israel" (18:24). The levitical cities are thus not the permanent possession or inheritance of the Levites but rather a place for them to live and pasture their flocks.

Forty-eight cities were to be designated as levitical by the twelve tribes of Israel with the larger tribes contributing more cities than the smaller (35:7-8). In this way, the Levites, who guarded the holiness of God and the sanctuary, would be distributed throughout the land of Israel.

Six of the levitical cities were also designated as cities of refuge to which a person who had killed another person could flee (34:6). Detailed instructions for the cities of refuge and for determining guilt and intention in the matter of murder or manslaughter are given in 35:9-34 (→ Murder). The holiness of God's promised land could be threatened through the shedding of human blood, one of the most serious defilements. Murder and its defilement of the land could be expiated only through the blood of the murderer (vv. 33-34). The cities of refuge, however, provided a place of sanctuary for a person who had killed another citizen unintentionally. Such a person would be admitted only after determination by the elders of the city that the killing was in fact unintentional. Guidelines for such a determination are given in vv. 16-25. The person was then to remain in the city of refuge until the death of the high priest; the violation of this provision would make the person vulnerable to blood revenge by a relative of the victim (vv. 26-28). Related matters concerning the number of witnesses required for a murder conviction and the prohibition of paying ransom to expiate a murder are also given (vv. 30-32). The overall intent of these laws is to ensure the purity of God's holy land, which the new generation is about to receive.

36:1-13, The Daughters of Zelophehad Revisited: Maintaining the Equal Distribution of Land Among the Tribes. Chap. 36 resumes the case of the daughters of Zelophehad and the inheritance of their father's land in the absence of any male heirs, which first appeared in Numbers 27. There it was decided that the daughters could inherit their father's land in order to keep the land within the family. Here another question arises. May the daughters of Zelophehad marry outside their own tribe, or must they marry only men in their own tribal group in order to prevent the alienation of the land (vv. 1-4)? God is consulted and proclaims that the daughters may marry any man as long as he is a member of their own tribe, Manasseh (vv. 5-9). The overriding concern is that the ancestral land remain within the tribe that originally inherited it (v. 9). The daughters of Zelophehad comply with the directive from God, and this brings the commandments of God concerning the land in the last part of the book of Numbers to a positive and hopeful conclusion (vv. 10-13).

The stories of Zelophehad's daughters in Numbers 27 and 36 form a frame that brackets all the material related to the new generation counted and organized in the second census list in chap. 26. Most of the material contained within this frame relates to life in the promised land. Thus, the two narratives of the five daughters of Zelophehad function as a positive confirmation of God's promise that the land will indeed one day be given to the new generation of God's people. Moreover, the case of the daughters and the land affirms the flexibility of the tradition and its need for new interpretation with the experience of each new generation. This adaptability provides a warrant for a new interpretation from another tradition that readers will encounter in the book of Deuteronomy, which follows Numbers as the fifth book of the Pentateuch.

Bibliography

- Budd, P. J. Numbers. Word Biblical Commentary. Waco, TX: Word, 1984.
- Gray, G. B. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Numbers. International Critical Commentary. Edinburgh: Clark, 1903.
- Noth, M. Numbers, A Commentary. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968.
- Olson, D. T. The Death of the Old and the Birth of the New: The Framework of the Book of Numbers and the Pentateuch. Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985.
- Plaut, W. G. The Torah: A Modern Commentary. New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1981.

DEUTERONOMY

RICHARD D. NELSON

INTRODUCTION

Deuteronomy presents itself as a series of addresses offered by Moses to Israel just before its entry into the land of promise. Law giving, wilderness, and the conquest of the east bank of the Jordan are behind Israel. Canaan with its blessings and dangers lies before the people. A large number of introductory formulas and summaries are scattered through the book (1:1-5; 4:44, 45-49; 5:1; 12:1; 26:16; 29:1; 31:1), making a description of its literary shape and its history of composition difficult.

Deuteronomy has two introductions in the form of speeches given by Moses. In the first (1:1-4:43), Moses reviews history from Mount Horeb (Deuteronomy's name for Sinai) to the point of transition into Canaan and exhorts Israel to loyalty. In the second introduction (4:44-11:32), he exhorts and motivates Israel to obey the Torah (God's instruction to Israel), again reviewing history at several points. The central core of Deuteronomy consists of chaps. 12-26. Here Moses promulgates a law designed to shape Israel's life in the land as God's faithful people. The last part of the book, chaps. 27-34, directs this law at Israel's future life in Canaan.

The parts and sections of the book may be outlined in this way:

- 1:1-4:43, Part One: Moses reviews history
  - 1:1-3:29, The road from Horeb
  - 4:1-43, Transition to the law
- 4:44-11:32, Part Two: Moses preaches about the law
  - 4:44-6:9, First principles
  - 6:10-11:32, A motivational introduction
- 12:1-26:19, Part Three: Moses proclaims the law
  - 12:1-14:21, Purity in worship
  - 14:22-16:17, Life in the new land
  - 16:18-20:20, The structures of society
  - 21:1-26:19, Interpreting traditional laws
- 27:1-34:12, Part Four: The story continues
  - 27:1-30:20, Covenant making
  - 31:1-34:12, Transition to Canaan

The original book of Deuteronomy seems to have consisted of the reform-oriented law code proper (chaps. 12-26), framed by an introductory exhortation (chaps. 5-11) and some concluding chapters that directed the law at the readers of the book (chaps. 27-30). There is no agreement whether an even earlier and shorter form of the book once existed. A puzzling feature of Deuteronomy is its alternation between second-person singular and plural address. The plural portions often seem to be somewhat later than the singular portions, but there is no completely satisfactory explanation for this phenomenon.

In its original form, Deuteronomy was addressed to Israel in the period of the monarchy (about the eighth century B.C.) by a group or an individual writing in the name of Moses. Just as Moses was the mediator for God's law, Deuteronomy sought to mediate God's will for the people in a new period of crisis and transition. The precise nature of the intended audience remains uncertain, but there are indications that the Northern Kingdom of Israel provided the original context, rather than Judah. There are close affinities to the northern prophet Hosea, especially in the use of the concept of covenant. The absence of any reference to the Davidic dynasty or Jerusalem and the demand for a radical reform of the kingship point to the Northern Kingdom, as does Deuteronomy's focus on Shechem (11:29-30; 27:1-26).

Although its date cannot be fixed precisely, Deuteronomy provides us with clues to the crisis that caused it to be written. This crisis was partly religious. Loyalty to the God of Israel had been undermined by the worship of Canaanite gods. One source of this syncretism was the cities (13:12-18), which had retained much of their Canaanite heritage in spite of their inclusion in the Israelite state. Another source was the local sanctuaries or "high places" scattered throughout the country (12:2-3). There the gods of Canaan and the God of Israel were worshiped side by side, sometimes with fertility rites alien to Israel's traditions. Certain prophets were compounding the problem by authorizing syncretism and the worship of other gods (13:1-5). One practical result of Israel's lapse in religious loyalty was the precarious economic position of the levitical priests, whose cause Deuteronomy champions.

Another facet of the crisis was social. Deuteronomy reflects a breakdown in family solidarity caused by social change (21:18-21; 25:5-10). The shift from a purely agricultural barter economy to a money economy in which wealth could be accumulated and lent at interest had caused a critical social problem. Farmers who had worked their ancestral lands for generations were losing them to those classes who were in a position to lend them money. Sometimes the inability to satisfy a debt led to the enslavement of the farmer and his family (15:12–18). The gap between the rich and poor was widening and the traditional institutions to protect the poor needed to be revitalized (→ Economics in Old Testament Times).

A third aspect of the crisis was political. The judicial system was corrupted by bribery and had become unfair to those most in need of justice (16:18–20). The authors of Deuteronomy clearly believed that the power and wealth of the monarchy needed to be sharply curtailed. They saw the king's professional army and the royal penchant for international adventurism as problems (17:16–17). Perhaps the danger of Assyrian control or even conquest was already ominously apparent.

To meet this crisis, Deuteronomy offered itself to Israel as a reform law. It imagined and described a new society, one based on renewed dedication to God and God's law. Deuteronomy's vision was fully utopian in the positive sense of the word, calling Israel to restructure itself in the spirit of Mount Horeb.

There would be a seven-year cycle of tithes offered to God and the poor, culminating in a release of all debts and a national rededication to the law. There would be zeal for religious purity at all levels of society. God's law would penetrate all areas of life. The king would become an ordinary citizen whose primary task would be to study the law. Ancestral lands would be protected. Fair justice for all would be the rule, and the economic system would protect the poor from the greed of the rich. The ancient traditions of holy war would be revitalized. Most importantly, the tempting danger presented by the local high places would be eliminated by centralizing all sacrificial worship at a single national sanctuary.

This reform of Israel's life before God was directed at the original readers of Deuteronomy by means of the theological concept of the covenant. Deuteronomy explicitly identifies itself as the content of a covenant made in the land of Moab, itself a renewal of the covenant made at Mount Horeb. This covenant is summarized in 26:16–19 and 27:9–10: Israel is to be God's people and the Lord will be Israel's God. The theme of covenant is further supported by the presence of extensive blessings and curses of the sort used to guarantee ancient treaty documents.

It is often thought that the entire book of Deuteronomy may reflect the shape of ancient Near Eastern treaties and follow the format of some regular ceremony of covenant renewal. It may be more reasonable to look to the prophet Hosea as the source of this covenant concept. In any case, God's covenant with Israel does not only concern the past but transcends generations to confront any audience of Deuteronomy directly with its challenge.

Great rhetorical skill was used to convince readers to adopt the far-reaching reforms proposed by the book. Such skill points to some group that knew Israel's historical and legal traditions well and were practiced in presenting it to lay audiences. Scholars have suggested the prophets, the sages, and the Levites as possibilities. Like Moses, the authors of Deuteronomy were mediators of God's law who did not just promulgate it but explained it (5:22–31). Readers were encouraged and motivated to obey through repetitious, sermon-like language, through repeated calls to remember the past, and through explanations that tried to rationalize the laws and uncover their meaning.

Deuteronomy did not seek to reform external behavior only but inner attitudes toward God and neighbor as well. It endeavored with great urgency to engage and change readers before it was too late, and that urgency is visible throughout the book. Deuteronomy confronts each reader personally and demands a personal response, best summarized by 6:4–9 and 10:12–13.

Characteristic theological themes permeate Deuteronomy. God is the central focus. This is the God of the Exodus (5:6), the God of history who has given victory in war and the promised gift of land (7:17–24; 9:1–6). This is also the Creator (10:14), the God of nature who blesses Israel with rain and fertility (11:10–17).

Israel is the people chosen by God (7:6; 10:15; 14:2). God loves Israel (7:8), and love becomes the basic principle of the relationship between him and Israel (6:5). This love is known to Israel through its memory of God's redemption in the Exodus (7:8; 9:26; 15:15) and nurture in the wilderness (8:2–4; 29:4–5). God's supreme gift to Israel is the good land, the land promised long ago to the patriarchs. The goodness, richness, and fertility of this land is constantly emphasized (8:7–10; 11:10–12), but this land also contains within it the temptation to forgetfulness and apostasy (7:1–6; 8:11–20).

Forgetful, apostate Israel is a people in critical danger. Discipline is part of God's parental love (8:5). The Lord is a jealous God who will not countenance the worship of other deities (5:9; 7:9–10). Israel must be a holy people, loyal only to the God who has liberated it (26:18–19). Israel is to worship the Lord alone, and to do so only in the place which he has chosen. Loyalty to God means following his will not only in matters of religion, but in political affairs and daily life. Yet Israel's record so far has been dismal. Israel is a stubborn and rebellious people (9:7–14) and punishment in the form of national destruction is imminent (29:18–28).

Two ways are set before Israel: the way of obedience and life and the way of continued disobedience and death (30:15–20). The future remains open, but Israel must choose and do so immediately. The terrible curses of chap. 28 hang over the future. Yet the proper choice is so easy and obvious that it is really no choice at all. The law of God is near and easy to obey (30:11-14). Remember what God has done for you (7:18; 8:2; 16:3) and do not forget (6:12; 8:14-18). Circumcise your heart (10:16). Choose life (30:19)!

Deuteronomy underwent a second major stage in its compositional history after its adoption by King Josiah as the reform law of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 22-23; → Josiah). Somehow, a century after the collapse of the Northern Kingdom to which it had probably been directed, Deuteronomy appeared in Jerusalem, where it initiated a spectacular but short-lived reform (622 B.C.). Naturally, the Jerusalem Temple was assumed to be the central sanctuary the book called for. Josiah abolished the local high places in Judah and extended the reform into the territory of the former Northern Kingdom as well. He also centralized the Passover in Jerusalem (16:1-8).

During the reign of Josiah (or perhaps somewhat later, early in the Exile), Deuteronomy was utilized as the first part of a long historical work we today call the Deuteronomistic History. This work tells the story of Israel in the land and stretches through the books of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings. Deuteronomy was integrated into this history by the addition of the first introductory speech (chaps. 1-3 and parts of chap. 4). This historical review by Moses became the first in a series of summary reviews that punctuate the Deuteronomistic History at critical points of transition: Joshua 1 and 23, 1 Samuel 12, 2 Samuel 7, 1 Kings 8, and 2 Kings 17. In this way, Deuteronomy was directed at a new audience and became the interpretive key for understanding the later history of the people. Israel prospered or suffered as a direct result of its obedience or disobedience of this law. Chap. 31 and portions of chap. 34 were also added by this Deuteronomistic historian to link Deuteronomy to the conquest under Joshua and Israel's life under the law (→ Deuteronomistic Historian).

The final stages in the history of Deuteronomy's composition took place in the Exile. Two related short additions (4:29-31; 30:1-10) call on the people to return to God and promise a return from exile. The addition of the Song of Moses (chap. 32) pointed beyond exile and punishment to God's vindication of the people in the face of their enemies. The Blessing of Moses (chap. 33) speaks of God's gracious will for the people and dreams of a better future. At the very latest stage, Deuteronomy became the fifth of the books of the Torah, or Pentateuch (Genesis through Deuteronomy). Portions from the Priestly writer were added to effect this merger: 1:3; 4:41-43; 32:48-52; 34:1a, 7-9 (→ Sources of the Pentateuch).

Deuteronomy plays a central role in the Hebrew Bible. As the authority and norm of the reformation sponsored by King Josiah, it may legitimately be considered the first book of the Bible to be treated as Scripture and in that sense canonized, that is, admitted to the Bible. Indeed the book seems to claim canonical status for itself (4:2; 12:32; 31:24-26). Ideas and language from Deuteronomy helped shape the final form of the Pentateuch and the books of Jeremiah and Amos. Deuteronomistic theology undergirds the entire presentation of history in the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings).

As the last book of the Torah and the first part of the Deuteronomistic History, Deuteronomy may have served as a catalyst for linking these two complexes in the canonization process. In its present place in the canon, it links the narrative of desert wandering to the conquest of Canaan.

The reforming law became an important part of emerging Judaism in the Second Temple period. That the Jerusalem Temple was the only legitimate sanctuary was taken for granted. Passover was celebrated according to the dictates of Deuteronomy as a Jerusalem festival. The Shema and the verses following it (6:4-9) became a focus for the practice of piety. The influence of Deuteronomy may be traced in passages such as Ezra 9:12; Neh. 1:8-9; 13:1-3; and Tob. 1:6-8, as well as in the teaching of Jesus (Matt. 18:16; Mark 7:10; 12:29-30).

The humane spirit of Deuteronomy, its concern for justice, and its call to love God above all else have challenged both Judaism and Christianity to ongoing reform through the centuries.

---

COMMENTARY

---

1:1-4:43

Moses Reviews History

The law of Deuteronomy (chaps. 12-26) is introduced by two successive speeches of Moses. The second one (4:44-11:32) is primarily exhortation. This first speech emphasizes history. Moses surveys the story of Israel from Mount Horeb (1:6) to Beth-peor (3:29) in a connected way and applies the lessons of this history to his audience (1:16-17, 29-30), especially in chap. 4.

Thus the basis for the law Moses is about to deliver is a review of Israel's experience with God. Ancient Near Eastern treaty documents began with similar reviews of history as prologues to the practical commands and prohibitions of the treaties themselves. It is very uncertain, however, whether such treaties actually influenced the shape of Deuteronomy. Scholars have also speculated that covenant renewal ceremonies in Israel may have followed a similar pattern, with historical review preceding a reading of God's law, but again certainty eludes us. It would be natural, however, for any agreement between two parties to reflect on their past relationship as a basis for their shared future. Certainly this is the pattern of Deuteronomy. Reference to the past (9:7–10:11; 11:2–7; 29:2–9) provides the basis for God's gift of the law and a motive for Israel to keep it.

Chaps. 1–4 were prefaced to Deuteronomy to integrate the book into the larger whole of the Deuteronomistic History. They find their counterpart in chap. 31, where the transition from Moses to Joshua is completed and the story moves on to that told in Joshua through 2 Kings. By adding these chapters, the Deuteronomistic historian addressed the book of the law to an audience somewhat later than the original readers of Deuteronomy, to Judah in the late monarchy or early Exile. The law of Deuteronomy is introduced as the evaluative principle according to which the following story of Israel in the land is to be understood. The themes of victorious conquest (2:24–3:11), allotment of the land (3:12–20), and the leadership of Joshua (3:28) prepare for the following book of Joshua. The theological principle that obedience leads to success and disobedience results in destruction (1:41–44; 4:3–4) is the key to understanding the history of Judges and 1 and 2 Kings. In the present shape of the Hebrew Bible, this introduction also links Deuteronomy to the other books of the Pentateuch, covering many of the same traditions reported in Numbers.

Themes important to Deuteronomy as a whole are introduced: love and election (7:6–8; 10:15; 14:2), the dangers of apostasy (13:1–18), a concern for justice (16:18–20; 17:8–13). The focus of this introduction is God, who has guided Israel (1:31–33; 2:7) and given them victory in war (2:24–3:11). God also chose Israel in love (4:31, 37) and remains with them because of loyalty to past promises (1:8, 11). God has given the gift of the law. Now it is time for Moses to explain this law (1:5) and for Israel to adopt it as the basis for their new life in the land (4:1, 5, 14).

The original readers of Deuteronomy were meant to apply to themselves this situation of transition from old to new. The literary technique of distinguishing and merging three generations helped them do so. These chapters speak of the former evil generation whose fate is to be taken as a warning (1:35; 2:14–16), of the present generation that is Moses' audience and that must be attentive and faithful in the face of the crisis of transition to new leaders and a new land (1:39; 3:28), and of a future generation that will experience the punishment and mercy of God (4:25–31). Yet all three generations merge into one in those to whom the book is addressed (1:26; 4:11, 40). Israel in the monarchical period had suffered destruction, yet looked forward to God's mercy. They too faced the challenge of applying old traditions to a new situation.

1:1–3:29

The Road from Horeb

Moses begins his speech with a review of history that leads up to the place and time at which, according to the literary premise of Deuteronomy, he is addressing a new generation of Israel (1:5; 3:29). Retelling older traditions about the wilderness and conquest, these chapters cover about the same ground as the narrative portions of Numbers 11–31, but rely on traditions somewhat different from those preserved there. These stories are kept clearly in the past from the standpoint of Moses and his audience by the repeated phrase "at that time" (e.g., 1:9, 16, 18; 2:34). They have been joined together into a larger story tracing Israel's progress from Mount Horeb (Deuteronomy's name for Mount Sinai) to the stopping point opposite Beth-peor. Linking passages describe the people's movements in the first person plural: 1:19; 2:1, 8, 13; 3:1. A different sort of progress is the transition from the previous disobedient generation to the present one (1:35; 2:14–15) and a consequent shift from failure to success (cf. 1:42; 2:33; 3:3).

1:1–8, Introduction. As an introduction to Deuteronomy as a whole and to its opening review of history (1:9–4:43) in particular, these initial verses answer the questions "Who?" "Where?" "When?" "What?" and "To whom?" Moses is the "who," the speaker of the words that follow. God is the actual source of Moses' words, however, for they are spoken at God's command (1:3). Moreover, Moses quotes God directly (vv. 6–8), as he will continue to do throughout Deuteronomy.

The people are at the end of an arduous journey. Pinpointing the "where" is made impossible by the piling up of contradictory geographical expressions, but the general locale, "across the Jordan" in "the land of Moab," is clear enough. The people are near the crossing point, about to invade Canaan. They will still be there when Deuteronomy draws to a close (29:1; 32:49). The "when" is the eleventh month of the fortieth and last year of wilderness wandering. Mount Horeb is in the past.

The conquest of the land east of the Jordan is complete. Now is the moment of transition into the land of promise.

The "what" about to be spoken by Moses is law (Heb. torah), but more particularly law that will be explained, expounded on, and clarified (1:5). Torah proves to be the opposite of cold legalism in every way. Deuteronomy is a book of "preached law," applied with careful concern to life lived in the new land. This land is described expansively and, in words reminiscent of a legal formula, placed by God at Israel's disposal (vv. 7-8). It is promised land, sworn to the patriarchs and their children.

These children are those "to whom" this law for a new life in the land is expounded. The former faithless generation has died (1:35). A new generation now awaits the move across the Jordan into nationhood. Yet those who hear the speech of Moses are also "all Israel" (v. 1), a universal address used more than a dozen times in Deuteronomy. This preached law addresses an audience that transcends generations, one that includes the original readers of Deuteronomy in the period of the monarchy. They are carried back in time to stand before Moses and to hear him explain the law that must shape their new life as the Israel they ought to become.

This introduction calls readers to give careful attention to what is to follow. Deuteronomy is to be taken with utmost seriousness. It is a law commanded by God and mediated by Moses. It is a law founded on the authority of God, who chose the patriarchs, promised the good land, and fulfilled that promise through victorious conquest. All Israel, as the beneficiary of God's gracious acts, is now to listen.

1:9-18, Judicial Organization. Even before Israel left Mount Horeb, it was structured into a society shaped by God's justice. These verses utilize an old tradition, similar to the traditions preserved in Exodus 18 and Numbers 11, to implant in readers a concern for justice and to argue that a fair judicial system is expected of God's people. Here are revealed the first sketchy outlines of Deuteronomy's visionary portrayal of what life in the land ought to be like. There must be fearlessly impartial justice for both fellow Israelite and resident foreigner, for the powerful and the powerless alike. That is God's way (vv. 16-17).

The problem faced by Moses is, paradoxically, caused by God's blessing, the population explosion promised to the patriarchs (Gen. 15:5). It is a problem that will only get worse (Deut. 1:11). The people agree to a structure for handling legal disputes. This system would rely on well-qualified personnel and would penetrate every level of society from the tribes down to small groups of ten families.

This first story in the historical review establishes basic themes in Deuteronomy: concern for resident foreigners (10:19) and an interest in justice and juridical structures (16:18-20; 17:8-13). Deut. 1:18 presents this story as just one example of how Moses prepared Israel for life in the land. In actual fact, of course, Israel was not always a just society (Amos 5:7, 10-12; 1 Kings 21). Deuteronomy remembers, however, that Israel had once been in harmony with God's justice and dreams that this might be so again.

1:19-46, A Failed Invasion. Moses tells his audience (and Deuteronomy its readers) an illustrative story based on traditions similar to those preserved in Numbers 13-14. This is a cautionary tale, a negative example of what must never happen again. It calls forth fidelity by portraying rebellion. It evokes courage by describing both cowardice and bravado.

Israel's disobedience is put in the worst possible light. It follows a wholly positive scouting report (Deut. 1:25; the bad news about Canaan is saved until v. 28). Israel mutters treason secretly in its tents. The people accuse God of hating them and impugn his motives. Reversing the standard formula of holy war, they insist that they will be delivered into the hand of the Amorites, a grim self-fulfilling prophecy.

The fear and infidelity of Israel's insurrection are undercut for readers in two ways: positively by Moses' two speeches of encouragement (vv. 20-21, 29-33) and negatively by the outcome of the story. Moses stresses that parental concern is obvious from what God has already done for Israel. Israel cannot question the Lord's motives, for he fought for Israel in Egypt (cf. vv. 30, 27). God does not hate Israel but carries Israel like a beloved child (cf. vv. 31, 27). Israel's querulous question of v. 28, "wherever are we going?" receives its answer in God's providential wilderness leadership (v. 33).

The narrative illustrates that rebellion against God leads to disaster. The land the Lord swore to give, he now swears to withhold (vv. 34-35). Even Moses suffers from God's anger (v. 37). Pointed back in the ominous direction of the Red Sea, the people instead compound their rebellion against the command of God (cf. vv. 26, 43) out of a false confidence in the ease of a campaign they had earlier dreaded. The results are defeat and God's refusal to listen to their tears. The people remain frozen at Kadesh (v. 46), no longer on the road to their destiny.

Themes are introduced that recur later in Deuteronomy: God's anger with Moses (3:26; 4:21; 34:4), faith and courage in war (7:17-21; chap. 20), and Israel's unworthiness (8:11-18; 9:1-9). Later readers were meant to apply the lesson of their forebears' folly to their own situation. Like Caleb, Joshua, and Israel's little ones (1:36, 38-39), these readers faced challenges of fidelity that had overwhelmed their ancestors. They were the survivors of defeats believed to have resulted from God's punishing anger. Now they needed courage to face the future and faith to bring into being the sort of community envisioned by Deuteronomy. God's past acts as parent, leader, and warrior could evoke such faith and courage.

2:1–25, Through Neighboring Territories.

Historical recitation continues, based on traditions similar to Num. 20:14–21. Because Israel's goal is the conquest of the Amorites (Canaanites), non-Amorite nations are to be left alone (Edom, Deut. 2:4–7; Moab, v. 9; Ammon, vv. 18–19). Just as God is giving Israel a homeland, so has he already given these nations lands previously promised to their ancestors Esau (v. 5) and Lot (vv. 9, 19). Edom is given the fullest treatment. Israel is cautioned lest Edom's fears lead to war. Purchasing food and water would defuse tensions. Israel is reminded that Edomites are a related people and that experience has demonstrated that God would provide.

These warnings, along with the parenthetical comments of vv. 10–12, 20–23, breathe a cosmopolitan, universalistic spirit. Israel's God is also the God of these nations and has dispossessed other peoples to give them promised lands. This broad vision implies disapproval of those acts of aggrandizement against these nations that preoccupied much of the foreign policy of the Israelite and Judean monarchies. An imperialistic state is not what Deuteronomy is proposing (17:16).

The Zered marks the boundary of Moab here, but it is also a watershed of another sort (2:14). The former generation has died not just from natural causes but through God's direct action (v. 15). Now the new generation to whom Moses is speaking is ready for the conquest. Israel's fearsome reputation has preceded them (v. 25; cf. v. 4). Classic holy war language announces that Sihon will be at Israel's mercy, and warlike imperatives mark the transition from peace to war (v. 24).

2:26–3:11, Sihon and Og. Moses continues his review of recent history with the conquest of the east bank of the Jordan. The defeat of Sihon and Og was a standard item in Israel's national memory (29:7–8; Num. 21:21–35; Ps. 136:17–22). The accent falls on Sihon; the story of Og reiterates and seconds the point. In Deuteronomy's version, God is the prime mover behind the conflict and its outcome. The battle results from Sihon's intransigence, insists the narrative. Israel is not the aggressor. Moses peacefully proposes to keep to the roads lest crops be trampled and people harassed, to buy food and water, and in general to act as circumspectly as Israel already has done in Edom and Moab. Israel's true objective, claims Moses, lies across the Jordan. Yet God is really behind the whole event, strengthening Sihon's resolve to resist, encouraging Israel with promises of success, and handing them a pair of victories.

These victories are wonderfully complete, involving the whole east bank from Moab's border in the south to Mount Hermon in the north. The numerous defeated cities are put under the ban (→ Ban) according to the standards of Deut. 20:10–18, leaving Israel with rich booty. The note in 3:11 about Og as the last of the ancient powerful ones and his huge "iron bed" (perhaps a basalt rock formation) underscores the wonder of Israel's victory.

As an object lesson in courage and obedience, this success story is the reverse of the defeat of 1:19–46. Here the emphasis is on scrupulous obedience (2:37). The high fortifications of Canaan engendered fear in 1:28; here no city is too high or too strong for Israel to conquer (2:36; 3:5). Deuteronomy's original readers could face the uncertain future with courage. God is in ultimate control of events and gives victory to the faithful and obedient.

3:12–29, Foretastes of the Future. These last items in the historical review point forward to events that will take place after the speech of Moses is finished. They prepare his audience for the coming conquest and the first readers of Deuteronomy for whatever challenging transitions lie before them. Four topics are covered in four distinct sections, each marked by a first-person statement of Moses and the expression "at that time": vv. 12–17, 18–20, 21–22, and 23–29.

First (vv. 12–17) Moses recalls the allocation of the land east of the Jordan and the call for those tribes to aid in the rest of the conquest. The geographical description serves to solidify Israel's ill-defined eastern frontier. The exhortation of vv. 18–20 focuses on national solidarity. The very fact that God has already given these tribes their rich grazing land means they are now obligated to help secure this same gift for their fellow Israelites. In the spirit of Deuteronomy, the "haves" join the "have-nots" for the common good. In a preview of 31:3–8, Moses then charges Joshua to have confidence in the future based on God's past victories (vv. 21–22).

The topic of conquest leads naturally to Moses' submissive request and God's angry response to it, which itself leads back to the issue of Joshua's succession. Moses somehow bears the sin of the generation that died in the desert (1:37; 4:21–22). He cannot enter the future, but he is at least permitted to view it from afar, as he will eventually do in chap. 34. This dialogue underscores the richness and goodness of the promised land. It also suggests that the effects of disobedience cannot be facily undone, a grim fact that Deuteronomy's original readers needed to face.

The movement toward Canaan stops with 3:29 and will not begin again until chap. 31. Now both Israel and the readers of Deuteronomy, primed for the challenges of the future, wait opposite Beth-peor for Moses to speak.

4:1-43

Transition to the Law

Chap. 4 is a bridge between the review of history in chaps. 1-3 and Moses' extended exhortation about the law, which begins with 4:44-5:1. In this chapter Moses takes up God's revelation of law from several different perspectives (4:1-40). Then Moses enacts one specific command of the law (vv. 41-43).

This material has a complex history of development. The basic exhortation consisted of vv. 1-14 and 21-22, encouraging readers to obey the whole law of Deuteronomy in the land and to teach it to their children. This would have been the link between chaps. 1-3 and the rest of Deuteronomy provided by the Deuteronomistic historian. At a somewhat later period, vv. 15-18 and 23-28 were added to highlight the specific temptation of image worship and warn that such worship would inevitably lead to destruction and exile. These verses have an outlook similar to 29:22-28. This warning was later broadened by 4:19-20 to include the worship of heavenly bodies. These additions taken together represent the viewpoint of the early Exile. At a still later and more optimistic period, another writer contributed vv. 29-40, material similar in purpose and outlook to 30:1-10. These verses urge those who have suffered defeat and exile to repent and return to God. The report of the three cities of refuge (4:41-43) represents the final stage in this process of successive addition.

In spite of its complicated background, chap. 4 gives an impression of overall unity as an exhortation to keep the law of Deuteronomy, offering several different perspectives on a single central principle: obedience to the law leads to life and prosperity, but disobedience means death (cf. 30:15-20).

4:1-40, Exhortation to Obedience. Moses moves from history to exhortation, urging Israel to perform the law he is about to promulgate and explain. The balance shifts from memory of the past to encouragement for the future. Those who read these words were motivated to keep the reforming law of Deuteronomy in their life in the land (vv. 5, 14). They were to pass on this law unchanged (v. 2) to future generations (vv. 9-10; cf. 6:7, 20; 11:19; 31:13; 32:46). The law is described with a variety of terms—statutes, ordinances, commandments—but most strikingly as God's covenant (4:13; cf. v. 31; → Covenant).

Repetition urges careful attention to prevent forgetfulness (vv. 9, 15, 23). Lest readers imagine that this law was for past generations only, Moses emphasizes the ever-present "today" of its challenge (vv. 8, 26, 38, 40), while also evoking a "far-off" future that actually corresponds to the original readers' present (v. 25). Dramatic quotation (v. 6), the call for a universal quest for precedents (vv. 32-34), and the invocation of heaven and earth as witnesses (v. 26; cf. 30:19; 31:28; 32:1) all add to the rhetorical impact.

A wide variety of motives for obedience are offered. Some are rational. Because you know that the Lord is the only God, you must keep this law (4:39-40). Because you saw no form on Mount Horeb, you must never make idols (vv. 15-18). Some motives are negative: the Baal of Peor incident (v. 3; cf. Num. 25:1-5) or God's anger with Moses (4:21-22). Apostasy will eventually lead to national destruction and exile to an idolatrous land (vv. 26-28). The awesome fire of theophany, God's visual manifestation (vv. 11, 15, 33), is sharpened into the fire of a jealous God (v. 24; cf. 5:9; 6:15).

Yet positive motives for obedience predominate: long life, the land, prosperity (4:1, 4, 40). The law is Israel's prized possession, surpassing the allotment God has given other peoples (vv. 6, 8, 19). The primary motive for obedience is, however, the character of a God who is near and easily found (vv. 7, 29). God is compassionate, never forgetting the covenant (v. 31). He has given the land as a gift for all time, exile notwithstanding (v. 40). Two mighty deeds demonstrate God's regard for Israel. The Exodus was an unprecedented act of election (vv. 20, 34) that, along with the gift of the land, showed God's love (v. 37) and uniqueness (vv. 35, 39; cf. 6:5). The second great act was the revelation on Mount Horeb, manifesting his tolerance (4:33) and discipline (v. 36; cf. 8:5).

This exhortation reveals the fundamental patterns of Deuteronomic thought. The Baal of Peor incident (4:3-4) is paradigmatic. If you obey, you will live; if you commit apostasy, you will be destroyed. The assertion that there is an inevitable correlation between one's behavior and one's fate is basic to Deuteronomy's worldview. The future is always seen in terms of reward or punishment. This concept lies behind the use of blessings and curses in chaps. 27-28 to motivate obedience and can be traced throughout Deuteronomy's language of warning and exhortation (11:26-27; 30:15-20).

Deut. 4:24-31, however, reveals that there is more to the theology of Deuteronomy than this stark formula of retribution. Idolatry and disobedience will indeed result in destruction and exile from the land, punishments from a jealous God. Yet heartfelt return and renewed obedience will lead to a restoration of Israel's relationship with this merciful God (cf. vv. 31, 24). In contrast to all those things a false god cannot do (v. 28), Israel's God will neither fail nor utterly destroy Israel, nor forget the covenant (v. 31). And this, God's graciousness, is the most fundamental theological theme of Deuteronomy.

4:41-43, Cities of Refuge. The literary convention of the direct discourse of Moses is dropped for a moment to report the establishment of three cities of refuge in territory east of the Jordan. This note assures readers that Moses obeyed the law of 19:1-13 at the opportune time, perhaps as a way of motivating readers to strict obedience as well.

4:44-11:32

Moses Preaches About the Law

A second introduction (4:44-49) initiates a second speech of Moses, which prepares for his promulgation of reforming law in chaps. 12-16. Although historical recital continues to be part of his presentation (Exodus, manna, golden calf) as in the first speech, here the emphasis shifts to exhortation. The Ten Commandments are placed first and the role of Moses as mediator (5:23-31) is emphasized. In this way, the whole of Deuteronomy is viewed as an outgrowth of the Decalogue, as God's will communicated by Moses to Israel.

The theological themes of Deuteronomy are developed in this second address to motivate obedience to the law and to encourage reform. This is done through a variety of rhetorical formats: sermonic exhortations centered on the basic principle set forth in 6:4-9 (5:23-6:9; 10:12-11:32), shorter individual sermons (6:10-9:6), and a first-person reminiscence (9:7-10:11). Moses' address focuses on God's grace, protection, and election. It explores the dangers of life in the land, particularly apostasy and the temptation to forget the past. The importance of strict obedience to the law and the education of future generations is emphasized, along with the rewards of obedience. This second introduction ends with the contrast between the blessing that results from obedience to this law and the curse that follows on disobedience (11:26-32).

4:44-6:9

First Principles

The Ten Commandments are presented as the foundation for the rest of the law of Deuteronomy. They have been inserted in their present place in the book, interrupting Moses' recollection of the fearful fire of Horeb that breaks off at 5:5 and picks up again at 5:23. They have special authority, literally graven in stone, complete in themselves (5:22). By their placement here, they authorize and legitimate the rest of the book. Deuteronomy thus claims to be a continuation of God's revelation from Horeb (5:31), mediated by Moses in the same way as the Ten Commandments (5:5, 27).

The setting for Moses' re-presentation of the Decalogue is provided generally by 4:44-49 and then more pointedly by 5:1-5. Following the commandments themselves, Moses drives home their implications for his listeners (5:23-6:9). He continues the mode of historical recollection with 5:23-31, which returns to the topic of mediation begun in 5:4-5. Then he shifts back to the direct imperative address of 5:1, concluding with the extended imperative of 6:4-9.

4:44-5:22, The Ten Commandments. Cf. Exod. 20:2-17. An introduction (4:44-49) sets forth the basic dramatic premise of Deuteronomy: that Moses is addressing the law to Israel after the events recalled in chaps. 1-3. Then Moses summons Israel to hear the covenant made at Mount Horeb forty years ago (5:2, 4-5). This covenant and its law are now directed at a new generation (5:3; cf. 29:10-15). These Ten Words are addressed to a community that transcends time, for whom it is always "today." God's challenge was not just for the ancestors. It was directed at the original readers as well. They too had been slaves in Egypt (5:15) and had been liberated to stand at Horeb (5:4-6).

The Ten Commandments may be viewed as a concentrated version of the entire law of Deuteronomy. They provide a brief description of the love for God called for by 6:4-5. They serve as prologue to the whole law and provide, with the curse list in chap. 27, a frame for it. Like Deuteronomy as a whole, they represent preached law, law set forth with rhetorical flourish, law set in the historical context of God's acts (5:6, 15). Deuteronomy's interest in servants (12:18; 16:11), sojourners (10:19; 24:14, 17, 19-21), and even animals (22:1, 4; 25:4) is echoed in the Sabbath commandment. Deuteronomy's concern to motivate the law to evoke willing obedience is present as well (5:9-10, 11, 15, 16).

The self-identification of the God who speaks, the God of the Exodus (5:6), is the most important word. God's act of redemption is both the claim he has on those who hear and their motivation to rise to the challenge of these commandments.

These commandments describe how liberated Israel should live out their relationship to the God who freed them. Such a relationship demands fidelity. There could be no other gods, no empty use of the Lord's name, no violation of the rest implicit in the Exodus. Such a relationship affects the entire society, cutting across generation and class. Because fidelity to God means limits must be set on behavior, these commands are mostly negative, marking off margins and boundaries. They are concerned not with "religious" life or the life of priests, but with the day-to-day existence of the ordinary Israelite before God and in relation to neighbor. The "neighbor" of 5:20-21 is a central focus of Deuteronomy's social ethic (19:4, 11, 14; 22:24; 23:25; 24:10). These commands protect a fellow Israelite's right to life, to a secure marriage and respect as a parent, to fair legal process, and to property.

Deuteronomy's call to a reformed Israel is founded on God's oneness (6:4) and the constant danger of apostasy and idolatry. Here the commandments begin as well (5:7-9). This is no philosophical monotheism, but the personal claim of the God of the Exodus (→ Monotheism). God's claim on Israel means there can be no other gods and no images of these gods or of the One God. Imageless worship is rationalized in 4:15-18, but here the motive for obedience is provided by God's "jealousy" (4:24; 6:14-15), a powerful emotion springing from the depth of his personhood. There are both threat and promise implicit in this jealousy, according to the old confessional formula employed here (Exod. 34:7; Num. 14:18; cf. Deut. 7:9-10). The implication of 5:9 is either that all three or four generations alive at that one time would be included or that children who followed in their forebears' sins would share in their punishment. In overwhelming contrast to the numbers three or four, thousands of those who love God (5:10) will be the objects of God's covenant loyalty.

God's personal name Yahweh (→ Names of God in the Old Testament) must not be lifted up for any idle, unnecessary, or frivolous purpose, especially in the taking of empty or false oaths (5:11). It is not to be employed to do magical harm, as though to coerce God into action. False prophets must not use it to speak empty words (18:20-22).

Although the Sabbath (5:12-15) is not mentioned in the rest of Deuteronomy, its motivation in the Exodus from Egypt and Israel's servitude there certainly is (15:15; 24:18, 22). Here Sabbath represents a day of liberation, founded on Israel's own journey from bondage to "rest" in the good land (cf. 12:10; 25:19). It is a part of ordinary life (in contrast to the great festivals of chap. 16) set aside as holy, given back, as it were, to God, and so ordered that all levels of society may participate in God's gift of rest.

The command to honor parents (5:16) is addressed not just to children but adults, who in the extended family system of ancient Israel would have continued to live under the authority of their parents for many years. This situation would naturally lead to conflict, especially over matters of land inheritance. In critical economic circumstances there might also have been strong motives to deprive aged parents. Deut. 21:18-21 offers a specific legal process for a related situation. This is one place in OT law where a woman as mother has equal rights with a man. The motivational promise involving the inheritance of land and long life are especially appropriate for this command, both being special interests of Deuteronomy (8:1; 16:20). Deuteronomy adds further motivation to the parallel in Exod. 20:12 by underlining that this is God's command and promising that things will "go well."

The command of Deut. 5:17 did not concern all killing (for capital punishment, see 17:2-7 or 19:12; for warfare, see chaps. 20-21), but rather outright murder and careless accidental killing. Probably the issue of legally inappropriate vengeance (19:4-10) also comes into play here.

In the OT, adultery (5:18) did not correspond to our notions of the act; it was a much more limited issue focused on the rights of the wronged husband. Other sorts of sexual partnerships and marital issues are regulated by chaps. 22-25.

Scholars often assert that 5:19 originally referred to kidnapping a free Israelite and point to Deut. 24:7 as an example. Probably by the time these commandments were included in Deuteronomy, theft in general was meant.

The false, empty, and purposeless witness forbidden by 5:20 refers to testimony in court against an accused person. Deut. 19:15-21 also shows concern for possible abuses of the criminal justice system, which relied on the testimony of witnesses.

Coveting (5:21) moves into the sphere of the psychological and attitudinal. The first Hebrew verb used implies strong desire leading to an actual move to possess, but the second verb in the Deuteronomic version (Exod. 20:17 is different) refers to a completely internal feeling. Deuteronomy is concerned not only with deeds, but also with motives (15:10).

Those who first were confronted by these words were intended to hear, learn, and do what was commanded (5:1). By describing the life

Israel ought to live as a nation freed from Egyptian bondage, these commandments sought to convert readers to become what God's act of liberation had already made them, his covenant people.

5:23-6:9, The Essence of the Law. Moses explores the meaning of God's law, especially as concentrated in the Ten Commandments. The impact of God's commandments is to be total and uncompromising, involving heart, soul, and strength, molding both individual and public behavior. The original readers of Deuteronomy were to appropriate this reforming law personally and live their lives in the good land of promise by its standard.

Deuteronomy was a reforming law, a new look at God's will for the new situation of Israel in the monarchy. It was law heard, as it were, a second time (5:25), an addition to what had already been encountered (5:31). For this reason it was important to authorize or legitimate the Deuteronomic reinterpretation of the law for its audience. To do this, the mediatory role of Moses is stressed (5:23-27, 31; 6:1). Moses reminds his listeners of how mere flesh, mortal and weak, seemed too vulnerable to hear the terrifying voice of God a second time. Encounter with the living God threatened death. The people's request for an insulating medium for revelation was approved. Thus Deuteronomy claims for itself divine authorization and authority and presents itself to readers as God's own words mediated by Moses.

Deuteronomy urgently seeks to motivate its readers to observe its precepts. The deadly power of theophany (5:23-27) is emphasized, along with God's almost wistful wish for Israel's fidelity (5:29). The potential rewards of prosperity and long life in the rich, good land are reemphasized (5:29, 33; 6:2-3). God's own nature motivates obedience as well. The Lord is God alone, unique in power with a sole claim on Israel's loyalty. Unlike Baal, who was manifested at scores of local high places around the country, the one true God had one true place of worship (chap. 12). The Lord is one, and therefore has no doubleness of purpose or intention. Such a God, and only such a God, is worthy of total obedience.

This law is to be appropriated personally, internalized by those whose lives it claims (30:14). They are to pay close attention to it and observe it scrupulously, as the language of 5:32; 6:6, 8-9 insists (→ Phylacteries; Mezuzah). They are to teach it to future generations, literally "sharpening" it for their instruction (6:7). This law must permeate every sphere of life, be bound on each Israelite, and displayed publicly for all to see (6:7-9). It is law lived not only externally, but also with heart and soul, an expression of love for God and humanity.

6:10-11:32

A Motivational Introduction

This transition to the promulgation of law that begins in chap. 12 makes every effort to connect the law to the lives of the original readers to motivate their adoption of Deuteronomy and obedience to it. A number of different formats are used to change attitudes, create repentance, and evoke obedience. Eight short sermons (6:10-9:6) are followed by a first-person historical narrative (9:7-10:11) and a long exhortation (10:12-11:32). The overall purpose is to prepare readers for what is to follow, to cultivate an attitudinal seedbed in which the law of Deuteronomy could take root and flourish.

The sermons (6:10-9:6) require special comment. They are literary creations imitating Israel's tradition of exhortative oratory. They resemble sermons of a military, liturgical, or prophetic nature found elsewhere in the OT. Each of these sermons starts with a citation of some characteristic situation in which the audience might find itself, or perhaps of a tradition from Israel's past. From there the sermon draws conclusions and makes applications to the readers' own lives.

Shared themes hold these sermons together. The first (6:10-15) begins an exploration of what the situation will be when the land has been occupied. It also introduces a call to remember that permeates the other seven, either explicitly or implicitly. Thus 6:16-19 is itself an example of remembering a story from Israel's tradition, as is 8:1-6. The issue of remembering in order to educate the next generation is presented in 6:20-25. The call to remember and never to forget is explicit in 7:17-26; 8:1-6; and 8:7-20. Two of these units seem to be literary imitations of war sermons of the sort delivered to the troops on the eve of battle (7:17-26; 9:1-6).

6:10-15, Do Not Forget. The situation presupposed in this sermon is that the land has been given as promised. Its agricultural richness is described in an attractive way, perhaps following the fashion of ancient vassal treaties. The central theme is that God alone has given these good things. Israel has contributed nothing. The homiletical application is the sharp imperative of v. 12. Never forget the God who is identified by the act of exodus liberation. In contrast to your former servitude, serve God. Swear only by his name and by no other, as might be required in making treaties with other, more powerful nations. This challenge is motivated by reference to God's character as revealed by the Ten Commandments (5:9). The grim result of forgetting this jealous God could be total destruction, complete removal from the rich land he gave.

This sermon convinces readers to obey the law of Deuteronomy in order to remain loyal to God. Any complacency they might have felt about their security in the land is shattered. Any pride they might have had in the military accomplishments of their kings or in the prosperity that characterized some periods of the monarchy is here undermined. Reading between the lines a bit, this sermon may also counter the temptation to enter into a vassal treaty with some foreign power.

6:16-19, Do Not Test God. This sermon recalls a tradition of wilderness testing, preserved for us in Exod. 17:1-7. A simple reference is enough, for readers know it well. The tradition is applied to readers in the fashion of a canonical text. Do not push God too far through disobedience. This unit seeks to motivate obedience by means of a negative historical lesson and a positive reference to the divine victories that gave Israel their good land.

6:20-25, A Child's Question. The situation from which this sermon begins is the rhetorical device of a question put into the mouth of a child. Deuteronomy is concerned with the issue of transmitting the tradition to coming generations. The answer to this question provides the sermonic application in the form of a confession of Israel's classic historical faith. Each succeeding generation of Israel is included by the repeated use of "us" as the object of God's liberation, gift, and command (vv. 21-24). The meaning of the law of Deuteronomy is found in the past acts of God and in the present and future blessings to which obedience leads. True "righteousness," that is, existence in accord with a right relationship to God, is found in keeping this law.

These verses seek to inculcate respect for the law through a recital of God's gracious history with Israel and by pointing to the rewards of obedience. Because a healthy relationship with the God of the Exodus is only possible through this law, it must be taught to each succeeding generation, just as Deuteronomy itself is teaching it to its original readers, who represent a new generation in the land.

7:1-16, A People Set Apart. The situation envisioned in this sermon is again the completion of the conquest. What is called for is the single-minded application of the ban, the wholesale destruction of Canaanite culture and religion (vv. 2, 16). Israel must make no treaties with these seven nations nor ever intermarry with them (though 21:10-14 permits marriages to foreigner captives, probably from nations other than these seven).

The motive advanced for such vigilance focuses on Israel's special relationship with God (7:6-10). Israel is holy, set apart for his purposes (v. 6). Israel was chosen specially by God not out of any merit on their own part, but because he has a personal attachment to them based on love and the promise to their forebears. The fidelity of God to the covenant over uncountable generations has been revealed in the Exodus and Ten Commandments, along with the pattern of individual retribution for the apostate. A further motive for wiping out Canaanite religion is offered by the promise of fertility for family, field, and flock (vv. 13-14), an especially appropriate counter to Baal's claim to be the one who bestows fertility. Obedience also leads to good health. The plagues of the Exodus tradition will be reserved for enemies (v. 15).

The original readers of Deuteronomy could certainly see themselves included in God's graciousness to the thousandth generation. On the other hand, they had experienced the grim effects of Israel's involvement with international alliances and the dangers created by at least one foreign queen, Jezebel. Certainly these readers still lived in an environment of uneradicated Canaanite religion and were all too likely to credit Baal for the blessings of fertility. These verses urge them to see themselves as a people set apart, a people defined, on the one hand, by the gracious blessing of the God of the Exodus and, on the other, by their own obedience to the reforming law of Deuteronomy, particularly those portions that forbid Canaanite religious practices (12:29-13:18).

7:17-26, Memory Cures Fear. This is a literary imitation of a war sermon of the sort delivered before battle in the tradition of Israel's holy wars (cf. 20:2-4). The postulated situation is fear and despondency over the numerical superiority of the enemy. The admonition is classic to the ideology of holy war: do not be afraid (1:29; 20:1; 31:6). The key to this confidence is the memory of the past victories of God, the Divine Warrior. The hornets of v. 20 seem to be a metaphor for the divinely induced panic by means of which God wins holy war victories (2:25; cf. Exod. 14:24-25; Judg. 7:19-22).

This sermon seeks to bring its original readers back to traditional, premonarchical values and institutions, to the ban and the ideology of holy war. These traditions had been replaced by the institutions of the royal state, a state with a standing army and a tolerant attitude toward the Canaanite enclaves and urban centers still to be found in Israel. In the militaristic spirit that pervades the book of Deuteronomy, this sermon insists that these Canaanites represent an unfinished task for Israel. Their continued presence is given a rationalistic explanation (Deut. 7:22), but it cannot be tolerated (vv. 23-24). The royal policy of accommodation is to be rejected. Canaanite culture is to be eradicated without any concern for the intrinsic value of what must be destroyed (vv. 25-26).

8:1-6, The Staff of Life. This unit begins and ends with its central point, a call to obey the law (vv. 1, 6). This point is hammered home through theological reflection on Israel's tradition of wilderness wandering. The wilderness is seen as paradigmatic for Israel's entire experience with God (29:5-6). Those forty years were a training ground, an experience of parental discipline designed to test and temper the character of Israel. The key lesson was that of the manna, which taught that the importance of the "necessities of life" is only relative. The real staff of life is not bread, but that which comes out of God's mouth, every word that he decrees. God's law as set forth in Deuteronomy is Israel's true source of life in the land.

8:7-20, Remember and Obey. The sermon-ic situation is Israel's future presence in the land. A poetic description of the good land (vv. 7-10) leads to a portrayal of the twin dangers of pride and forgetfulness in vv. 11-13 and 17-20. Sandwiched between are vv. 14-16, a hymnlike recital of God's saving deeds and wilderness lessons, which undermine smug pride and must themselves never be forgotten. This sermon is constructed around the opposition between remembering, which leads to obedience, and forgetting, which results in apostasy. A second contrast is created by the land with its dangers of forgetting and the wilderness with its remembered lessons. Both land and desert are colorfully portrayed (vv. 7-9 and 15). The good land presents Israel with a test as dangerous as any offered by the wilderness. The wilderness lesson of humility counters the pride engendered by the land.

The point is sharpened by vv. 19-20, which threatens punishment and destruction. This reflects an outlook similar to 4:25-26 and 6:14-15 and is often thought to come from a somewhat later writer. In any case, this threat harmonizes with the rhetorical power of the rest of the sermon in its impact on the original readers, who are living out the situation described. Their life in the good land has led them to forget, to become prideful and self-congratulatory, to worship other gods. National destruction looms on their horizon. From such readers, these verses urge a renewal of memory, seeking to counter pride with humility and calling for a new commitment to the God who brought Israel out of Egypt.

9:1-6, Dangerous Complacency. After a renewed bid for attention through solemn rhetorical address (5:1; 6:4), the dramatic premise of the book of Deuteronomy is restated by 9:1. Moses is addressing the law to Israel after the events recalled in chaps. 1-3. In format, this unit is a literary imitation of a war sermon, words addressed to Israel before battle. As such its purpose would be to build confidence in the military support of God, the Divine Warrior (vv. 1-3). Yet the actual homiletical situation is the same as the previous unit: the danger of self-righteousness and complacency on the part of Israel already settled in the land (v. 4). This sermon intends to counter such complacency by asserting God's true reasons for the conquest, reasons that have nothing at all to do with any alleged virtue or sincerity on the part of headstrong and stubborn Israel. Instead, the conquest is described as punishment for the wicked Canaanites (18:12) and as a result of God's promise to the patriarchs. Here we see Deuteronomy's concern that readers should obey the law with ■ proper attitude, not out of self-righteousness but out of gratitude for God's gracious, unmerited gift of the land.

9:7-10:11, Rebellion and Forgiveness. Moses now returns to the mode of historical reminiscence to explore the topic of Israel's rebellion and God's forgiveness. The story of Israel's rebellion is told from Moses' own point of view (9:7-24). Then as a flashback, parts of it are retold with an emphasis on intercession and forgiveness (9:25-10:11).

The first telling, enclosed in the repetition found in 9:7 and 24, dwells on Israel's disobedience and underscores its enormity. Israel was chronically rebellious, as the examples of 9:22-23 demonstrate. Even at Horeb, the high point of God's revelation, they "quickly" (9:12, 16) turned to make a molten idol, a sin so grave that Moses performed the symbolic act of shattering the tablets of the law, indicating that the covenant with God had been smashed as well. This was so terrible an apostasy that Moses lay fasting forty days and nights before God. This loathsome idol had to be burned, broken, ground up, and washed away. God's reaction matched Israel's catastrophic sin; he threatened in fury (9:19-20) to destroy them and start the process of election over from the beginning (9:14). The fire of revelation (9:10) became the fire of terror (9:15). God's words to Moses (9:12) carried a terrible message of rejection. They are your people, Moses, not mine.

The second telling, enclosed in the repetition of forty days and nights in 9:25 and 10:10, emphasizes Moses' intercession and God's forgiveness, exploring the implications of 9:18. Moses used telling arguments to turn God around. This is your people, your inheritance. Remember the patriarchs. Guard your own reputation, lest it be said you were powerless to give us a land or lest your motives for the Exodus be questioned. Here Moses practiced the other side of the office of mediator, interceding for the people, as did the prophets. God responded with commands that indicated that Israel's life with God would go on. The reinscribed Ten Commandments were to be put into an Ark that in itself promised Israel future journeys and conquests. In 10:4, Israel found itself back where it had been in 9:10, as the repeated language indicates. In 10:10 the story returns once more to the intercession, this time to announce climactically that God had decided not to destroy them. Israel could go on because the covenant had not been irrevocably shattered.

A side issue is introduced by 10:6-9. The tasks of the tribe of Levi will be to carry the Ark, minister before God in worship, and bless in his name (→ Levites). While these verses reflect Deuteronomy's concern for the status of the Levites, they also serve to contemporize this historical narrative for the original readers (10:8). This story of rebellion and forgiveness would have struck home. Their own history had been poisoned by recidivist tendencies toward idolatry, not the least in the form of Jeroboam's golden calves (→ Jeroboam I). God's wrath and destruction loomed on the horizon. They needed to hear that repentance and forgiveness were still possible and that the institutions of national faith could still continue after disobedience and punishment.

10:12-11:32, Incentives for Obedience.

The exhortations of 6:5-9, 13 are taken up again and directed at readers through the imperatives of 10:12-13, 19-20 and 11:1, 8, 18-21. Fear, love, and serve God, and keep the law. The metaphorical imperatives of 11:18-21 call for an ongoing internal appropriation of Deuteronomy in all areas of Israel's life. A rich variety of motivations for obedience are offered. Some motivational material is attached to the imperatives directly: God's intent for good (10:13), the ability to conquer (11:8), long life in the land (11:21).

Longer motivational sections are interspersed between the imperative sentences. God's own character as reflected in the election of Israel provides the focus for 10:14-18, 21-22. Because God elected this tiny, enslaved people, they should now keep his law. Election requires internal circumcision along with the external ritual (10:16). God's greatness is reflected in concern for the marginal people in society (10:18), a concern characteristic of the law that will follow (e.g., 24:17-22). The motivational impact of God's discipline in history is the topic of 11:2-7, where the traditions of the past are recounted in hymnic praise. The fertility of the well-watered land is portrayed in 11:9-17 as further incentive. The rains of April and October are sent by God, but this direct divine provision also means that drought threatens if apostasy occurs. A complete, nearly effortless conquest is promised, again to motivate obedience (11:22-25).

Reflecting the blessings and curses that conclude Deuteronomy (11:29; chaps. 27-28), this exhortation sets forth a simple choice of weal or woe (11:26-28; cf. 30:15-20). The law that is to follow is not a set of cold legal precepts, but a "way" that leads to blessing (11:26). As the transition to law giving is completed, there is once more a reminder of Deuteronomy's dramatic premise (11:30-31) and a direct appeal for the original readers to obey what is to be set before them "today" (11:32).

12:1-26:19

Moses Proclaims the Law

As a renewal of Israel's traditional law in order to renew Israel as God's people, these chapters form the heart of Deuteronomy. This reformed law is built upon older legal traditions, particularly those found in Exod. 20:22-23:19, the "Book of the Covenant." Moses' promulgation of new law for life in the land of promise provides the analogy for Deuteronomy's reform of law offered to its own readers.

Israelite law has two basic forms. Apodictic laws simply command or forbid behavior (e.g., 14:3; 15:1; 17:1). Casuistic laws set forth a situation and follow it with its appropriate result or penalty (e.g., 17:2-5; 21:1-8). Both apodictic and casuistic laws stand behind Deuteronomy's reformed legal presentation. Motivational and explanatory expansions have often been added to the basic laws to induce obedience (15:2-6, 15; 21:9).

The Deuteronomic restatement of the laws in the Book of the Covenant represents a utopian reform of older laws to meet the challenges of a new day. Deuteronomy's call to centralize all sacrifice leads to numerous changes (cf. Deut. 15:19-23; Exod. 22:29-30; Deut. 16:1-17; Exod. 23:14-17; Deut. 19:1-13; Exod. 21:12-14). Other modifications reflect Israel's shift to a money economy in monarchical times. This shift caused a social crisis that widened the gap between rich and poor and led to the enslavement of many free farmers to satisfy debts (Deut. 15:1-11; Exod. 23:10-11; Deut. 15:12-18; Exod. 21:1-11). Some changes seek to undo the social damage caused by changing times, reflecting Deuteronomy's concern for fairness and human dignity (Deut. 24:10-13; Exod. 22:26-27).

In the context of royal infringements on the traditional rights of free Israelites, Deuteronomy revitalizes old institutions that had become obsolete under the monarchy (holy war in Deut. 20; levirate marriage in 25:5-10). To meet the challenge of syncretism and the temptation offered by Baal worship, these laws call for fidelity in religious practices (14:1-21; 16:21-22).

12:1–14:21

Purity in Worship

Deuteronomy's reform law begins with worship as the center of Israel's life before God. In contrast to past practice, all sacrifice is to be centralized in one place to safeguard the purity and unity of God's covenant people in the face of tempting Canaanite religious practices. The revolutionary renewal of society described by the rest of the law begins with an equally revolutionary reform of Israel's religious life.

12:1–28, Centralization. Although Israel may have earlier had some sort of national worship centered around the Ark, ordinary religious life was focused on the local sanctuaries scattered around the country. It was to these high places within easy walking distance that the Israelites took sacrifices and tithes and to which they repaired for the major festivals. It was to this local altar that fugitives ran for asylum and to the local priest that ordinary folk went for guidance in religious matters (→ High Place).

In a revolutionary attempt to preserve traditional values, Deuteronomy calls for the consolidation of all sacrifice at a single central sanctuary. As Amos and Hosea testify, monarchical Israel's worship at local holy places had often resulted in apostasy to Canaanite practices, the express context for this centralization law (vv. 2–3, 29–31). Deuteronomy seeks to avoid such contamination through a radical, perhaps utopian demand for centralization. This move reflects the theology of God's oneness (6:4). Another theological underpinning is Deuteronomy's "name theology," which protects God's transcendence by asserting that, although God is not actually present at the central sanctuary, his name is at home there (vv. 5, 11). At the same time, the "name" of Canaan's gods is to be wiped out (v. 3).

This radical challenge addresses lay people, not religious specialists. It does not concern itself with technical detail, but with a comprehensive call to centralize, the motivation of which is renewed obedience. Its utopian flavor is balanced by the pragmatic considerations of ordinary life. Repetition is used to fix this call in the mind of readers and to cover every eventuality.

The effects of this primary law of centralization on Israel's religious and juridical life will focus many of the laws to follow (14:22–29; 15:19–23; 16:1–17; 17:8–13; 18:1–8; 19:1–13). The call of Deuteronomy for reform was also concerned with things other than centralization, but this was its most important and most revolutionary facet. The book itself gives no clue as to the identity of the place chosen by God, although Shechem is hinted at, but eventually this radical principle would find its realization in the kingdom of Judah under King

Josiah, who took it for granted that Jerusalem was meant (2 Kings 22–23).

The basic content is repeated five times. Because God has chosen this place, bring all your sacrifices to offer and eat them there (Deut. 12:5–6, 11, 14, 18, 26). Repetitious enumeration covers every type of sacrifice (→ Worship). The special focus of vv. 13–14 is whole burnt offering, while that of vv. 17–19 is the eating of tithes and firstlings. The mood of these offerings is one of joy (vv. 7, 12, 18). Typically, their social effects are not ignored (vv. 12, 18–19) and motivations are set forth: God's blessings, the security of the land, and general well-being (vv. 7, 9–10, 25, 28). The point is sharpened through repeated contrast. What Israel is to do is not like the former practices (v. 8), not done in every place (v. 13), not performed locally (v. 17), and not like secular slaughter (v. 26).

The practical problem of secular butchering is taken up by vv. 15–16 and 20–25. In the ancient world, all slaughter was viewed as a sacramental act, but in Deuteronomy's schema such noncentral, nonsacrificial killings had to be thoroughly secularized. Blood, as the essence of life, was still not to be eaten, however, but poured out in a completely secular manner, "like water."

12:29–13:18, Other Gods. The topic of this unit is how life in the land could lead to apostasy. These verses urge readers to fidelity and drastic action in the face of syncretism. Three times in these verses the tempting refrain "let us follow other gods" (13:2, 6, 13) recurs.

The possibilities suggested were all part of the actual experience of the original readers. General curiosity (12:29–31) is followed by three more specific scenarios. That a prophet should entice Israel to false worship (13:1–5) would have been a possible reaction to disasters from which God seemed impotent to protect Israel (cf. the thinking of Jer. 44:16–18). The prophet described would have been particularly tempting because he performs the sign thought to authorize a word truly sent by God (Deut. 18:22). In fact, this is actually the case in a sense, for his message is a test from God. The secret enticement of relatives and friends (13:6–11) would be especially tempting, resulting in the agonizing choice reflected by 13:9. Again this represents a real temptation resulting from intermarriage, one that Israel's royal families, at least, certainly experienced. The Canaanite cities that had been assimilated into the nation were also a dangerous source of temptation (13:12–18).

The original readers, living in an environment of apostasy, are challenged to take drastic action. God hates these detestable Canaanite practices (12:31). Such situations are tests (13:3). God rescued Israel from Egypt, but these Canaanite gods played no role in Israel's history. Israel's zeal can deflect God's anger and lead to blessing (13:17). Undergirding this challenge is the canonical authority claimed by Deuteronomy itself (12:32).

Apostasy was an objective reality that had to be excised from national life (13:5). There is an uncompromising call for loyalty to God in the demand that one cast the first stone at one's apostate kinfolk (13:8–9). An idolatrous city must become the target of an internal holy war and ruthlessly applied destruction. From such zeal, Israel is to learn a salutary lesson (13:11).

14:1–21, Clean and Unclean. Quoting several traditional apodictic commands (vv. 1, 3, 21), Deuteronomy insists that both Israel's mourning customs and diet must correspond to the people's status as children of God, as a nation set off as holy. Election affects even the most personal and ordinary aspects of life. The customs forbidden by v. 1 seem to have been part of Baal worship, and the unclean animals forbidden as food may have been associated with Canaanite rituals. Boiling a kid in its mother's milk may also have been a non-Israelite religious practice. An animal that had died naturally would contain blood, forbidden for eating. Unclean animals are "abominations" (v. 3), things that defile and endanger one's relationship to God (7:25; 12:31). Incentive to knowledgeable obedience is provided both by rules of thumb (14:6–10, 19–20) and traditional lists (14:4–5, 11–18; cf. Lev. 11).

14:22–16:17

Life in the New Land

The life Deuteronomy envisions for Israel in the land implies a radical reform of both religious and social practices. These are not seen as separate issues. Rather religion and social concern interpenetrate. Deuteronomy's proposed seven-year cycle of tithes and Sabbatical Years has revolutionary social effects (14:28–29; 15:4). On the other hand, the secular practices of money-lending and slave release receive clear religious motivations (15:9, 15). This reform even modifies Israel's three traditional religious festivals, restructuring them according to Deuteronomy's concerns for centralization, social justice, and the memory of God's saving acts.

14:22–29, Annual and Third-Year Tithes.

Using a traditional apodictic law (v. 22), Deuteronomy explores the implications of the centralization law and a money economy for the practice of tithing agricultural produce, a concern picked up from 12:17–19. These tithes are to be eaten as a joyful meal of communion fellowship at the central sanctuary. Geographic distance need be no barrier to obedience, for money can be used to eliminate any need to transport the food itself to the central sanctuary. The plight of the Levites, who would feel the economic impact of centralization, is a concern as Deuteronomy seeks to cushion the revolutionary effects of its proposed reform. The tithes of years three and six of the seven-year cycle (15:1–18) are to be used instead for social welfare and distributed to society's marginal members, again including the Levites.

The reforming intent of these verses is to restructure Israel's use of tithes along the lines of centralized sacrifice and social concern. The monarchy's stratified society and monetary economy are clearly in view. Typically, motives are provided to urge obedience: a lesson in reverence for God and the prospect of further blessing (14:23, 29).

15:1–11, The Seventh-Year Release. Israel's traditional practice of letting the land rest fallow every seventh year is restructured by Deuteronomy into a revolutionary solution to Israel's social inequities. The introduction of a money economy and the resulting alienation of ancestral lands had created a society with wide economic disparities. Israel's peasant farmers were under severe economic pressure, in constant danger of losing land and freedom to rich creditors.

The traditional law of release is cited in v. 1 and then reinterpreted in v. 2. A permanent and total remission of debt every seven years is intended, as implied by v. 9. Issues of motivation and attitude are explored in vv. 3–11. Those in a position to lend are to do so without a grudging eye to the calendar. The motive for lending is the plight of one's fellow Israelite, not economic advantage. The institution of a seven-year debt release converts the oppressive practice of lending into a mechanism for social benevolence.

The intended utopian ideal is presented in vv. 4–5. Perfect obedience would lead to a society without poverty. The reality of poverty presented in v. 11 is seen as an opportunity for generosity. The vision of Israel as a major creditor nation motivates obedience (→ Ownership).

15:12–18, Hebrew Slaves. Building on traditional law preserved in Exod. 21:2–6, Deuteronomy extends the principle of release to those victims of economic pressure who have been sold into slavery for debt. In this case, the seven years are the years of a slave's service, a different matter from the calendar cycle of Deut. 15:1–11. Reflecting its revolutionary social spirit, Deuteronomy goes beyond Exod. 21:2 by insisting on a generous provision for released slaves so that they can retain their independence. If a strong sense of affection should mean that a slave wishes to stay, he or she may be converted to the status of a permanent slave. The ceremony is a desacralized version of Exod. 21:5–6, made necessary by the institution of a central sanctuary. Here again Deuteronomy is concerned with proper attitude and motivation (Deut. 15:10), the most telling motivation being the memory of Egyptian slavery.

15:19–23, Firstborn Males. Deuteronomy sets forth a reformed presentation of the traditional principle that any firstborn male animal must be set aside for God (Exod. 22:29–30). The basic apodictic law is cited in Deut. 15:19a, then explored within the limitations of the centralized system of animal sacrifice. The basic idea is that this animal belongs to God. Therefore no economic benefit can be derived from it. It must be eaten as a communion sacrifice at the central sanctuary. Any animal unfit for sacrifice is to be eaten at home as a completely secular meal (12:15–16, 20–25), shared by clean and unclean participants together.

16:1–17, Festival Calendar. Deuteronomy restates Israel's traditional religious calendar to convert these formerly local celebrations into pilgrimage festivals at the central sanctuary, as summarized in vv. 16–17. The emphasis is on the place chosen by God (vv. 2, 11, 15). Interested in probing meaning rather than giving details, Deuteronomy has stripped the Feast of Weeks and the Feast of Booths of much of their distinctive character, along with many traditional practices appropriate only to their observance at local shrines. We no longer read of bringing loaves of bread before God or of dwelling in booths (Lev. 23:15–21, 39–43; → Pentecost; Tabernacles, Festival of). Although the dates of these latter two festivals remain tied to the harvest schedule (Deut. 16:9, 13), the offerings are no longer closely specified and vary with the situation of the worshiper (vv. 10, 17). The character of the celebrations has been flattened out into joy over God's blessings in general (vv. 11, 14–15), rather than over any specific feature of the harvest. The shared celebration of the marginal classes of society is heavily emphasized, motivated by the memory of shared slavery (vv. 11–12, 14).

The celebration of Passover also had to be brought in line with the principle of centralization. What had traditionally been a domestic festival is converted to a public one. What had been a rite of protection for the home and flock is transformed into a sacrifice performed at the central sanctuary. Because the Passover animal is now seen as a sacrifice, the field of choice is widened to include cattle and not just a lamb or kid (v. 2; cf. Exod. 12:5), and the animal is boiled according to early sanctuary custom (Deut. 16:7; cf. 1 Sam. 2:12–14; Exod. 12:9). The practice of eating unleavened bread seems to be both local and centralized in Deuteronomy's restructured festival. Leaven is removed from the whole of Israel's territory, but unleavened bread is specifically eaten at the central sanctuary by the pilgrims in their temporary lodgings (Deut. 16:3–4, 8).

These verses urge a revolutionary change in worship practice, yet they demonstrate a concern to preserve tradition. The actual date of Passover does not have to be given, for this is less a promulgation of new law than an attempt to reform well-established practice. Deuteronomy is concerned with attitude and with memory. What is important is that Israel remember that Passover happens in the same month, on the same day, and at the very same time as the Exodus (vv. 1, 3, 6). Israel eats unleavened bread because as the bread of affliction and haste it helps them remember that important night (v. 3). Had this reform proposal been adopted by Deuteronomy's original readers (as it eventually was in Judah, 2 Kings 23:21–23), it would have meant far-reaching changes in the religious life of every Israelite. For Deuteronomy, this dislocation would have been justified by the elimination of dangerous local sanctuaries and a renewed appreciation of the Exodus and the blessings of God (→ Feasts, Festivals, and Fasts; Passover, The).

16:18–20:20

The Structures of Society

Deuteronomy goes on to describe the judicial, political, and social structures of Israel's reformed life. Chaps. 17 and 18 deal with legal procedures and public persons (king, priest, prophet). Chaps. 19 and 20 concentrate on issues involving the community as a whole (asylum, warfare). These laws do not offer a complete constitution for renewed Israel but instead concentrate on those areas of life in which Deuteronomy sees the greatest need for reform. Concerns for fairness, fidelity to God, priestly rights, and centralization dominate this material. There is a distinct flavor of nostalgia and a desire to return to premonarchical values, particularly in the portrayal of the central tribunal of justice, the royal office, and the practice of war.

16:18–17:13, The Justice System. These verses demand a reform and restructuring of court process, first on a local level (16:18–20) and then on a centralized national level (17:8–13). Sandwiched between these concerns is material dealing with religious apostasy. Various older apodictic and casuistic laws provided the skeleton for the presentation of these matters in Deuteronomy.

The discussion of local justice springs from three apodictic laws about impartial justice in 16:19, expanded by a proverb about bribes and some typical Deuteronomic motivation in 16:20. Here the judicial task traditionally performed by the elders falls under some sort of centralized appointment procedure.

The centralized tribunal is presented in casuistic form ("if," 17:8). This is not a court of appeal for the accused, but a resource for local judges who would formerly have turned to the priests of local sanctuaries in cases made difficult by the absence of clear-cut testimony or those involving fine questions of law. Legal distinctions involving intentional or accidental death, contradictory pleas, and various types of assault often fell into this category (17:8). Such cases would have been handled by imposing oaths or ordeals on the parties involved (Exod. 22:8, 11; Num. 5:11-31). Both civil and religious judges staff this central tribunal (Deut. 17:9, 12). To undermine its authority is presented as a very serious capital crime, an evil to be purged from Israel.

Deuteronomy urged these reforms on its original readers in the knowledge that improved judicial structures were needed to bring unbiased justice to all classes of society (16:19; 17:6-7; cf. 24:17). It is difficult to decide how much of this law reflected actual practice and how much was utopian proposal. In any case, Deuteronomy's general intentions are clear. The justice dispensed by local elders was to be brought under some kind of central control. The role of the local sanctuaries in deciding puzzling cases was to be superseded by courts attached to the central sanctuary. Priestly and civil justice were to work in harmony.

Strikingly, the king's role in preserving justice is completely bypassed in this reform. It was traditionally to the king that parties would appeal the decisions of the local elders. Reading between the lines, we may assume that Deuteronomy had a low opinion of the royal capacity for unbiased judgment. At the same time, Deuteronomy seems to be convinced that its own reformed court system would have no need for an appeal process.

A concern for purity in worship is sandwiched between this proposal to restructure courts. Three apodictic laws (16:21, 22; 17:1) forbid a sacred pole (→ Asherah) beside the central altar, any stone pillar, and all defective sacrifices (cf. 15:21). Such abuses had motivated the demand for the centralization of worship in the first place. A situation similar to those discussed in 13:1-18 is presented in a casuistic format ("if," 17:2). The general crime is described as transgressing God's covenant and is illustrated by representative specific examples. The appropriate punishment is stoning. This coordination of religious purity with judicial fairness is hardly a surprise. Both had to be achieved if Israel was to become the people God wished it to be.

17:14-20, Kings. Deuteronomy reflects a low opinion of kingship. Doubtless, this was a result of the grim experience Israel had had with its kings. Instead of protecting the worship of God, the monarchy had introduced foreign forms of worship. Instead of providing justice for all classes of society, the kings had piled up riches. Instead of bringing peace and prosperity to the land, they had embroiled Israel in repeated wars and brought the danger of Assyrian conquest ever closer.

Deuteronomy nevertheless acknowledges that kings would still be part of Israel's reformed life in the land, but seeks to bring the monarchy under the control of God's law. The intent is not really to promulgate a reformed political constitution, but to describe in a utopian way what the attitudes and behaviors of Israel's king ought to be. This is less a description of what to do than what to avoid. The result is an insubstantial figure who is more like a student of Torah than a traditional king. He is a "citizen king," one whose status does not separate him from the rest of the people.

In accordance with the ideal in both Judah and the Northern Kingdom, he must be God's choice. His reward is long life for himself and his dynasty, again a wish appropriate to either of the two kingdoms. One wonders what unfortunate historical memories lurk behind the requirements that he be an Israelite, that he eschew a large harem or an impressive chariot force, and that he avoid hoarding wealth. Certainly Solomon comes most directly to mind, but Israel's whole grim experience with kingship is in view. The puzzling v. 16 may refer to trading mercenaries for horses.

The tool for reforming the kingship is to be the book of Deuteronomy itself. The king is to transcribe a personal copy of this law, preserved under the guardianship of the levitical priests. Constant study will lead him to fear God and scrupulously obey the law. It will also prevent royal haughtiness and unconcern for his fellow Israelites. This is a clear instance of Deuteronomy's own view of itself as a reforming law that can convert all Israel to what the nation ought to become. To do this the law must be written on doorposts and gates, on stones and altars, and in books (6:9; 27:2-8; 31:24-27).

18:1-8, Levitical Priests. These verses seek to reform Israel's treatment of the Levites, whose distressed condition is reflected elsewhere in the book. It is uncertain whether the terms "priest" and "Levite" are supposed to be synonymous here or whether two separate groups are intended. If the latter is the case, vv. 6-8 demonstrate that priests and Levites are thought to have equal status, in contrast to later developments. The intention is to induce lay Israelites to support priests and Levites with their rightful shares of the sacrificial offerings. This is rationalized by pointing out that Levites have no inherited rights to the land. Their heritage is God. The levitical share of the promised land must come to them indirectly from those with a direct inheritance. The last three verses of this unit seek to cushion the economic effects of centralization on those Levites who would live at a distance from the central sanctuary.

18:9–22, Prophets. This unit seeks to reform Israel's attempts to learn about divine will, the future, or other hidden mysteries. Its purpose is to encourage its readers to listen to those prophets who follow in the tradition of Moses. As a first step, all divination and magical techniques of inquiry must be eliminated (vv. 9–14), in accordance with Israel's traditional law (Lev. 19:31; 20:6, 27; cf. 1 Sam. 28:3). The fate of their Canaanite practitioners is a warning, as is the assertion that these are "abominations" that destroy the integrity of Israel's relationship with God.

The only proper medium of revelation for Israel is the prophet (Deut. 18:15–18). Here Deuteronomy gives an etiology or rationale for the institution of prophecy as it was known in monarchical Israel. Not just one, but a long series of prophets is in view (cf. 17:14 where more than a single king is obviously intended). The suitability of prophetic mediation is illustrated by Israel's experience on Mount Horeb. It is precisely prophets like Moses that Deuteronomy envisions. Such prophets indeed mediate the divine word, but also serve as intercessors for the people (9:7–10:11) and teachers of Torah.

The ways in which prophecy itself might become a problem are covered by vv. 19–22. Both unheeding audiences and presumptuous prophets are warned. Some advice is given to help with the recognition of prophetic words that are to be ignored. Prophecy in the names of other gods is easily rejected, but false prophecy in God's name is a more serious matter. This dilemma requires the application of a pragmatic criterion that, although clearly useless for judgments on individual oracles, is certainly a way to evaluate a prophet's overall performance (→ Magic and Divination; Prophet).

19:1–21, Asylum and Other Matters of Justice. Deuteronomy continues its reform of Israel's system of justice (16:18–20; 17:8–13), concentrating here on vengeance and asylum (vv. 1–13) and the unsupported malicious witness (vv. 15–21).

Israel's legal institution for dealing with murder was blood vengeance. A member of the victim's family, the "avenger of blood," would hunt down and kill the murderer. In tension with this custom was the principle of asylum, which permitted anyone who had unintentionally caused death to seek shelter at the altar of the local sanctuary (Exod. 21:12–14). Deuteronomy's revolutionary call for a central altar required that the institution of asylum be modified so that the basic fairness of the whole process could be preserved. Otherwise, the great distance to the central sanctuary would lead to frequent miscarriages of justice. Such cities of refuge are also mentioned in Num. 35:6, 13–14 and Josh. 20:7–8, both texts dependent on Deuteronomy. There is no evidence that these utopian provisions were ever actually carried out.

The basic reform law creates cities of refuge (Deut. 19:1–3). Distances are to be surveyed (or perhaps roads prepared) to ensure that every accidental killer would have a fair chance of reaching them. A representative case of manslaughter is offered in vv. 4–7 to demonstrate how distinctions between murder and accidental death can be made by analyzing the circumstances. If national expansion should make distances too great (cf. 12:20), three more cities must be designated (vv. 8–10; cf. 4:41–43). Finally, the problem of illegitimate claims of asylum by intentional murderers is illustrated by a contrasting representative case (vv. 11–13). The rationale for this reform is that any miscarriage of justice involving human death would endanger the whole nation and subvert God's gift of the land (vv. 10, 13).

Between these two sections, v. 14 pursues another matter of justice, the displacement of ancient boundary markers, probably as a result of economic pressure by the rich against the poor. Deuteronomy seeks to halt this practice of alienating ancestral lands by insisting that it too undermines the structure of God's good gift.

Israel's court system depended almost entirely on the testimony of witnesses. The traditional principle that two such witnesses are always required is quoted in v. 15 (cf. 17:6) to introduce the special case of a single, unsubstantiated witness to a charge of apostasy. This is an example of a matter that must be taken to the central tribunal described in 17:8–13. Again fairness is the issue. The lying witness must receive the exact punishment that would have fallen on the innocent victim as a salutary lesson for the rest of the nation. The lex talionis ("an eye for an eye"; 19:21) is quoted to forestall any temptation to leniency. The principle of just and appropriate retribution must be upheld.

20:1–20, War. Although war in Israel had become the province of the king, Deuteronomy seeks to reform warfare according to the older, premonarchical theology of holy war. These verses envision citizen soldiers rather than professionals employed by the king. This is war as it ought to be, war fought by God on Israel's behalf. God as the Divine Warrior fights with a heavenly army against Israel's foes with weapons such as lightning, storm (Judg. 5:20-21), and earthquake (Josh. 6:20). At the critical moment, usually at the break of dawn, a divinely induced panic falls on the enemy and routs them (Deut. 2:25; Judg. 7:22). Because such war was a sacred enterprise, the war camp had to be kept ritually clean (Deut. 23:12-13). Success was followed by the imposition of the ban, by means of which the fruits of victory were dedicated to the true victor, God.

In the theology of holy war, the faith of Israel is decisive, not the respective size of the armies or the presence of chariots. In a dramatic portrayal of events before battle, a priestly war sermon (20:2-4; cf. 7:1-6; 9:1-6) repeats the message of 20:1. The memory of the Exodus is Israel's basis for confidence. Then the military officers address the troops proclaiming exemptions for all whose presence might dilute the army's fearless faith (v. 8). The issue of fairness and of honoring God's gifts is important here as well. Those who have not yet tasted the fruit of what is theirs by right must not be denied (cf. 24:5).

The discussion of siege warfare also presupposes monarchical Israel, involving distant offensive campaigns. Again the tone is utopian and idealistic. Cities not in the promised land (20:10-15) are to be offered terms resulting in forced labor. Only a limited ban is imposed when they are conquered. Foreign cities in Israel's territory receive no terms and are to be totally destroyed (vv. 16-18). At the same time there is a humane concern to ameliorate the destructive effects of siege warfare (vv. 19-20). The half-humorous motivation offered by v. 19 seems to suggest that even the trees deserve fairness.

Deuteronomy's reform stands opposed to those royal military practices known to its original readers, insisting on a return to older ideals of warfare in harmony with God's will for Israel. Royal compulsion is set aside (vv. 5-8). The practice of war must not subvert Israel's joy over God's gift of the land. In place of professional troops, there is to be a militia whose ad hoc nature is clear from v. 9. The barbaric prosecution of total war (cf. 2 Kings 3:25) is limited. The ancient ban, which undermines the purposes of royal warfare (cf. 1 Kings 20:26-43), is restored. The conquest of Canaanite cities, the source of the apostasy infecting the nation (Deut. 20:18), must be taken up again. This is a revolutionary challenge to return to a utopian past, directed at readers who have suffered from the adventurism of their kings and who have a well-founded fear of invading armies numerically and technically superior to themselves. This unit seeks to rebuild their confidence in God's protection and urges that they restructure the practice of warfare along traditional models.

21:1-26:19

Interpreting Traditional Laws

As a reform document, Deuteronomy takes up laws from Israel's traditions and recasts them for a new age. Many of these laws can be found in a somewhat different form elsewhere in the Pentateuch. The result is not a complete legal code, but a selection of those laws most in need of revision or reemphasis.

By modern standards, the organization of the laws is problematic, but such disorder is typical of ancient law codes. A wide range of topics is covered by chaps. 21-25: unsolved murder, family life and sexuality, religious purity, economic exploitation. Deuteronomy's special concern for social justice for the powerless surfaces in many laws. In chap. 26 a description of the ceremony for offering tithes at the central sanctuary provides an opportunity to review God's saving acts once more. A concluding transitional exhortation leads into the last major section of the book.

21:1-9, Unsolved Murder. Israel believed that the objective guilt of a homicide could endanger the rest of society. Guilt was viewed as an objective reality totally apart from any issue of morality or punishment. Ideally, the murderer's execution should remove this danger, but in an unsolved death other steps had to be taken. This procedure is not a sacrifice (which involves a relationship to God), but an act of expiation. Therefore the animal, killed away from the central sanctuary, has its neck broken as a sign of its nonsacrificial function (Exod. 13:13). The guilt that threatened the community is transferred to the animal. Speaking for their city, the elders wash their hands as a symbol of their innocence and as a way of transferring the guilt by means of the flowing water. Both the animal and the place are special in the sense that no human benefit has been derived from them. They are empty vessels for the guilt.

The characteristic reforming concerns of Deuteronomy are visible here. It is the land given by God that is contaminated by blood guilt (Deut. 21:1). The priests must be included in the process (v. 5). The quasi-magical ceremony of expiation must be supplemented by prayer, for in the end it is God who must cover the guilt and who does so out of concern for the people he redeemed (v. 8; → Atonement; Expiation).

21:10-21, Aspects of Family Life. The reform urged on Israel is applied to three facets of family life. First, Deuteronomy advocates the just treatment of female captives (vv. 10-14), women without male protectors in society. They are given legal status and some protection from unrestrained greed. The female prisoner of war makes a new start with new clothing, putting her old life behind her. She is fairly treated by being given a month to mourn those who have been killed or left behind. In the case of a subsequent divorce, she is no slave to be sold off but may leave freely, for her husband has received his benefit from the relationship.

Again, fairness must be maintained in the situation described in vv. 15–17. When the father assigns his sons their shares of the inheritance before his death, the rights of the less-favored wife must be preserved. Here Deuteronomy asserts the principle of fairness over against what may have been a traditional custom of free choice on the father's part, reflected in Gen. 48:13–20. As a widow, the mother would be supported by her son, who is to receive his proper double share as firstborn. This narrow special case seems to be used to advocate justice in general for women in polygamous marriages.

In 21:18–21, Deuteronomy seeks to reform the breakdown in family life that it senses as characteristic of its own era (cf. 5:16; 27:16). Clearly the absolute power parents once had over children has disappeared, and the village elders must become involved. The seriousness of the son's offense is shown by his drastic punishment, which purges the evil from the nation and serves as a salutary lesson.

21:22–22:12, Laws Enhancing Solidarity.

If anything serves as a common theme for this diverse grouping of laws, it may be the concept of solidarity. Israel's solidarity with God is protected when the purity of the land is guarded from the ritual pollution of a hanged body, something offensive to God (21:22–23). The transvestism forbidden by 22:5 may have been a pagan religious practice or viewed as deviant sexual behavior, but in either case it is labeled an "abomination" that subverts Israel's relationship to God. In a similar vein, various mixtures seen as contrary to nature are forbidden (vv. 9–11). The impropriety of these practices must have been clear enough to the original readers as to require no explanation.

The solidarity of the social order is enhanced by 22:1–4. This basic law (v. 1) with its several variations (vv. 2–4) goes beyond the older formulation of Exod. 23:4–5 to a wider definition of national fellowship, even with unknown and far-distant Israelites. The law of the parapet (Deut. 22:8) eliminates a physical risk and, more importantly, guards against blood guilt, a danger to the whole community. National solidarity in dress would be enhanced by wearing tassels (v. 12), a practice for which Deuteronomy provides no rationale (→ Fringes).

The law about birds (22:6–7) has overtones of conservation and humane treatment for animals. There seem to be echoes of the thinking that lies behind laws forbidding boiling a kid in its own mother's milk or destroying fruit trees (14:21; 20:19; see also Lev. 22:27–28). In any case, the welfare and life of the whole community is seen as affected and that may explain the inclusion of this law here.

22:13–30, Sexual Behavior. Sex was not considered to be a matter of private moral decision in Israel; it was something of community concern. These laws regulate sexual behavior out of concern for fairness to the parties involved and a recognition that the whole community has a stake in these matters. Although these laws are one-sided and operate from an exclusively male viewpoint, they did offer women some limited protection from the worst excesses of male domination.

The concern for fairness is clearest in vv. 13–21. The husband's charge may be a vicious pretext for divorce, but the parents may be able to clear their daughter's name by showing the "token" of her virginity, a cloth stained with the blood of her wedding night. Both mother and father share this parental role (cf. 21:18–21). The husband is punished severely because he has defamed her and the nation as well. She is justly protected from further attempts at divorce. If her parents cannot prove her previous virginity, however, she is assumed to have committed a "folly in Israel" (22:21) and is stoned beside her father's house as a sign of the shame she has brought to her family. Whether she turns out to be guilty or innocent, this is no private matter of her personal behavior, for the reputation of the nation is at stake (vv. 19, 21).

Five laws guarding sexual purity follow. Adultery and rape are seen as offenses against the husband or father of the woman involved. There seems to be no concern for rape as a crime of violence against the woman herself in these laws. If both parties are caught in adultery, that is, if the woman is married to someone else, both must die, for this is an evil to be purged from Israel (v. 22). The case is similar if she is betrothed, since that was the legal equivalent of marriage (vv. 23–24).

Deuteronomy's concern for fairness is evident if the couple is discovered in the country, for then this must be considered a case of rape by force in virtue of the circumstances (vv. 25–27). If the raped woman is not married or betrothed (vv. 28–29), the matter is less serious, a clear indication that rape was viewed as a crime against the victim's husband. In this case it is a crime against her father, and he is compensated for the loss of her bride price (cf. Exod. 22:16–17). She is, however, protected by the law from a life of shame and the destruction of her prospects for marriage (cf. 2 Sam. 13:13, 16, 19) by marriage to her attacker without any future threat of divorce.

The series concludes with an apodictic prohibition designed to protect the integrity of the extended family in a polygamous context (Deut. 22:30; cf. 27:20). Sexual relations with a stepmother did not occur only as a mere clandestine affair (as Gen. 35:22); it could also result from a son's inheriting his father's wives and concubines (1 Kings 2:22).

23:1-14, The Purity of Israel. Deuteronomy seeks an idealistic return to traditional concepts of purity in the worship assembly and the war camp, settings in which the people were a sacral gathering, united for the purpose of worshiping God and fighting under God's guidance. The motive for revitalizing these laws was not hatred of foreigners or hygiene, but a desire to strengthen Israel's relationship with a loving, protective God (vv. 5, 14).

A five-part apodictic list restricts participation in the worship assembly (vv. 1-8). Castration may have been an aspect of Canaanite worship, although v. 1 more likely reflects the idea that it was simply offensive for someone less than whole to participate in sacred activities (cf. Lev. 21:17-23). The precise nature of those barred by Deut. 23:2, offspring of an irregular union of some kind, is unclear, but Moabites and Ammonites seem to fall under this rubric, given their traditional origin (Gen. 19:30-38). Two items from the wilderness tradition support their exclusion, and the technical language of Deut. 23:6 implies that no political treaties may be made with them. In contrast, resident Edomite and Egyptian families might eventually gain admittance based on Edom's kinship and Egypt's hospitality to Israel's ancestors.

The sacrality of the war camp was part of the holy war tradition that Deuteronomy seeks to revive. Concepts of ritual pollution (cf. Lev. 15:16-17) and aesthetics are combined here. God's protective presence in the camp is both the rationale and the motivation for these practices.

23:15-25:19, A Renewed Society. These diverse laws protect the harmony of relationships, both with God and with other human beings. Deuteronomy seeks to reform Israel into a society of wholeness and social concord. The motivations offered for obedience describe the nature of this society. "Abominations" and evils that subvert the nation's relationship to God would be prevented (23:18; 24:4, 7). Instead there would be blessing in the land of promise (23:20; 24:19) and approval from God (24:13). Israel would remember the lessons of the past (24:9, 18, 22; 25:19) and behave accordingly. There would be joy, life, dignity, and social harmony (24:5, 6, 13, 15; 25:3).

Such a society requires, first of all, a healthy relationship with God. Therefore sacral prosti-tutes of either sex are forbidden and money earned by such persons is banned from the sanctuary (23:17-18). Vows to God must be kept (23:21-23). Even labor disputes (24:15) and commercial fraud (25:13-16) undermine Israel's harmony with God and must be avoided.

The divorce law (24:1-4), written from an exclusively male perspective, does not give guidance for divorce procedures in general. These are reviewed only to set up the specific prohibition of remarriage to a previous husband by a divorced woman. Divorce is taken for granted as a simple dismissal of the wife by her husband (and not vice versa). The stated grounds could be minor: some undefined impropriety (v. 1) or simple dislike (v. 3). Clearly divorce was an institution by means of which injustices against women were perpetrated, but Deuteronomy is concerned here only with a danger to Israel's relationship with God. Divorce is reformed so that it is permanent rather than temporary, lest God be offended.

Renewed Israel would be a society in which marriage is affirmed (24:5), kidnapping is prevented (24:7), and "leprosy" (which included a wide variety of skin diseases) is regulated by the priests (24:8-9). The innocent are protected from unfair applications of the principle of communal guilt (24:16). Modesty is preserved between women and men and the danger of injury or infertility forestalled in cases like the one described by 25:11-12.

The society envisioned here would take special care of its poor and marginal members. Escaped slaves are not to be returned or reduced again to slavery (23:15-16). This is remarkable, for escaped slaves were a dangerous class and the obligation to return them was a common provision of ancient treaties. A divorced woman is to receive a document that clarifies her status in the community (24:1). Hired servants, who live from hand to mouth, are to be paid promptly (24:14-15), protecting workers from oppression and employers from sin. Powerless people such as sojourners, orphans, and widows are guaranteed justice and economic protection (24:17). Even criminals deserve dignity and consideration. Verdicts must be clear and punishments humane, carried out in the presence of the judge responsible (25:1-3). Even domestic animals have certain rights (25:4).

Lending is envisioned as a way the rich extend social benefits to the poor, not as a way of acquiring interest (23:19-20). The economically marginal could thus be helped over times of crisis. This conception of credit is even more remarkable when one remembers that all debts were to be canceled every seventh year (15:1-6). Moreover, the practice of taking pledges or collateral is strictly regulated to protect the domestic life and dignity of the debtor and to prevent undue hardship (24:6, 10-13). Because such pledges were taken not for their intrinsic value, but to pressure the debtor into payment, Deuteronomy is depriving the practice of much of its oppressive power. Such regulations show that Deuteronomy is thinking of the economic structure of a small town in which the borrower and the lender interact on a daily basis.

The poor are protected from hunger through the social support institution described in 24:19-22, while property owners are themselves protected from abuses of a similar custom in 23:24-25. These practices eliminate the need for direct handouts or begging, thus protecting the dignity of the poor, who must work for what they receive.

The institution of the levirate marriage (25:5-10) offers protection for a man who dies without a son to inherit his property and carry on his name and, less directly, for his widow who needs support and a niche in society. The brother (or other close relative) of the deceased was obligated to marry his widow in order to produce a son, who was then considered to be the son of the dead brother. This ancient practice of surrogate fatherhood rests on the institution of the extended family, in which brothers live together (v. 5). The possibility of refusal, which does not seem to exist in the levirate law presupposed in Genesis 38, is now offered the recalcitrant brother (see Ruth 4:1-8). Now compliance depends only upon social pressure (Deut. 25:9-10).

26:1-15, First Fruits and Tithes. The presentation of the law ends, as it began in chap. 12, with worship. By describing what an individual was to do when the land was first settled, Deuteronomy seeks to establish two continuing liturgical events, providing appropriate liturgical recitations for each.

The offering of first fruits ties together the themes of deliverance, God's gift of the fertile land, the central sanctuary, the gifts due the priests (18:4), and concern for society's marginal people. In the context of Deuteronomy, these first fruits must be taken to be the same as the annual tithe (12:17-18; 14:22-27) brought to the central sanctuary and enjoyed by all. There are two declarations (26:3 and 5-10), each followed by a presentation, first by the priest (v. 4) and then by the farmer (v. 10). The creedal prayer of thanksgiving reviews Israel's experience of salvation. It moves from the national story to the worshiper's personal story, tying God's present gift of agricultural fertility to his past acts of deliverance. The contrast between past and present is sharp. Jacob's wandering (or perishing) as a landless alien and slavery in Egypt are set over against rest and freedom in the rich land of promise.

The tithe of the third year (vv. 12-15) adds the theme of obedience and reiterates the issues of social concern and the land's richness. Third-year tithes were to be distributed to the economically distressed at home, not taken to the central sanctuary (14:28-29). The worshiper's profession of obedience and prayer for blessing are thus addressed to God in heaven (26:15).

26:16-19, Concluding Summary. These verses conclude the legal portion of Deuteronomy begun with chap. 12 (cf. v. 16 with 12:1). The literary premise of the book is restated by the "today" of 26:17. The theological concept of covenant is introduced to lead into chaps. 27-30. The audience is with Moses in Moab, about to conclude a covenant agreement with God. Each party has made a solemn declaration of the covenant relationship. God has taken Israel as a treasured, holy people and promised them a high position among the nations. Israel has declared this God to be their God. Israel's obedience to his commandments is a factor in both declarations, and obedience with total heart and soul is urged upon them.

27:1-34:12

The Story Continues

Materials from a variety of sources work together to focus the reform law of Deuteronomy for readers and to challenge them to accept its authority over their lives. Chap. 27, speaking of Moses in the third person, describes a permanent display of this law before the people and a future ceremony by which they put themselves under its authority. Chap. 28 represents a further speech by Moses in which he sets forth the blessings and curses that give this law power over Israel's future. This is followed by a motivational address set into the context of a covenant made in the land of Moab (chaps. 29-30). Portions of this speech were added during the exilic period and help focus the meaning of the law for those who had already disobeyed it and been punished (30:1-10).

The transition from the age of Moses to the readers' present is carried forward by the Deuteronomistic historian's concluding narrative, which sets out the law of Deuteronomy as the standard by which Israel's continuing story is to be understood (chap. 31). The Song of Moses (chap. 32) and the Blessing of Moses (chap. 33) each had a separate history of transmission before its inclusion in Deuteronomy. In their present context, they focus the law of Deuteronomy on Israel's future life in the land, an existence marred by disobedience yet empowered by God's vindication and blessing. The last chapter concludes both Deuteronomy and the entire Pentateuch with the death of Moses.

27:1-30:20*Covenant Making

Chaps. 27-30 direct the law of Deuteronomy at its readers by using the concept of covenant to challenge readers to live according to its precepts. In chap. 27 Moses sets forth a covenant ritual of curses by which Israel will accept its responsibility to live under the law. Blessings and curses (chap. 28) motivate obedience and cast the entire book into the shape of a covenant document.

Covenant was a vital theological concept for Israel, used to describe the nature of God's relationship to the patriarchs and to the nation. Although some scholars trace the covenant concept back into Israel's earliest days, it may be that the prophets and Deuteronomy are the sources for this idea in Israel. The covenant was described as based on God's own past saving acts, shaped by precepts or laws, instituted by a covenant ceremony, and empowered by curses and blessings. This covenant format follows the analogy of human legal agreements and, more specifically, ancient Near Eastern international treaty practice. In its final form, Deuteronomy follows this covenant format closely.

The covenant theme is carried forward by chaps. 29-30, in which the book of Deuteronomy becomes the content of a second covenant, one made between God and Israel in the land of Moab. The Ten Commandments are described as the covenant document given at Mount Horeb (4:13; 5:2-3; 9:9, 11, 15). In a similar way, the entire written law of Deuteronomy is converted into the expression of God's covenant will for Israel delivered in Moab (29:1, 9, 14-15, 21).

27:1-26, The Shechem Ceremony. Moses no longer speaks alone, but with elders (vv. 1-8) and priests (vv. 9-10), for the focus now turns to the future, when Moses will no longer be with Israel. Instructions for what is to be done on Ebal and Gerizim (11:26-32; 27:2-26) bracket his promulgation of law (chaps. 12-26), for Deuteronomy wants to direct this law at its original readers, who live in the land of promise. It is to them that it will be displayed on plastered stones (27:2-4, 8). Whatever relationship the altar on Ebal (vv. 5-7) might bear to the central altar of the rest of the book, it certainly signals the beginning of Israel's life as a worshipping community in the land, those to whom this book is really addressed.

Moses gives instructions for a covenant ceremony of blessing and curse, but provides here only the curses in an ancient series of twelve laws concerning deeds done in secret. Secret behavior could not be controlled by social pressure or legal process, but it could be regulated by curse, the threatening power of which was taken for granted. The people here agree to each curse with an "amen" and thus mark themselves off from any who would do such things. Many of these curses deal with concerns found elsewhere in Deuteronomy. Idolatry, honor for parents, and murder are topics of the Ten Commandments (vv. 15-16, 24). Displacement of a boundary marker (v. 17) was dealt with in 19:14 and intercourse with one's father's wife (27:20) in 22:30. Deut. 27:20, along with v. 22, was intended to protect the integrity of the extended family. The rights of strangers, orphans, and widows (v. 19) are basic themes of Deuteronomy. Bribes (v. 25) are the topic of 16:19.

The summary curse of 27:26 impels obedience to the whole law of Deuteronomy. Like the Ten Commandments, these curses concentrate the law into an intense, memorable list with a powerful impact. The Shechem ceremony aims Deuteronomy's reforming law directly and forcefully at its original readers. They are the people of the future addressed by Moses, for whom the law is written publicly and plainly (v. 8). As the people of God they are to obey (vv. 9-10) and respond to this law with their own "amen."

28:1-68, Blessings and Curses. Ancient treaties were often guaranteed by a concluding list of blessings and curses that gave the agreement power to regulate behavior. Deuteronomy uses curses and blessings for the same purpose, to motivate obedience to the covenant said to have been concluded between God and Israel on the plains of Moab. The basic structure of this covenant is set forth by vv. 1 and 9, which go over the ground of 26:16-19 and 27:9-10. The blessings will follow obedience (28:2); the curses will overtake Israel if they disobey (v. 15). There is some balance between blessing and curse (vv. 3-6 and 16-19; 7 and 25; 12-13 and 43-44), but the curses are much more extensive and colorful. Their intended purpose is to motivate obedience to the law of Deuteronomy (v. 58) before it becomes too late. The preponderance of curses over blessings underscores the urgency of Israel's need to reform.

These motivating blessings and curses are appropriate for their intended audience in monarchical Israel. They reflect a rural, agricultural life on the one hand and a deep concern over international affairs on the other. The curses are very similar to those found in certain Assyrian treaties, and it seems likely that Deuteronomy made use of Assyrian curse language in formulating these frightful imprecations. Since Assyria was notorious for its wartime atrocities, this borrowing deepens the impact of this unit.

Taken together, these curses and blessings impact on a wide area of life. Fertility (vv. 3-5, 8, 11, 16-19, 38-40, 42) and rain (vv. 12, 23-24) were gifts that Israel was often tempted to associate with the gods of Canaan. Their inclusion here makes a statement about God's demand for exclusive worship. Other curses deal with sickness (vv. 21–22, 27–28, 35, 59–60). Israel looked to its God for military protection (v. 7), but these curses threaten defeat (v. 25), conquest by cruel foreigners (vv. 33, 49–57), and heartbreaking exile (vv. 36–37, 63–68). The blessings and curses are generalized to sweep all readers into their net (vv. 3, 13, 29, 43–44). The curses are also personalized (vv. 30–32) and made as frightful as possible (vv. 26, 34, 53–57) so that no reader might escape their power.

As the curses unroll, transitions are visible. A conclusion of sorts seems to be reached in vv. 45–46, but then a new section of curses begins, vv. 47–57. Here Israel's failure to obey seems no longer just a possibility, but a certainty. The curses focus on invasion by a ruthless enemy and the horrors of siege warfare. Then another new introduction begins vv. 58–68. This section portrays Israel's future as a reversal of saving history, an exile back to Egypt, to a hopeless existence far from rest in the promised land. The most terrible thought of all may be v. 63, which describes God as taking grim pleasure in Israel's destruction (→ Curse and Blessing).

29:1–30:20, A Covenant in Moab. A renewal of the covenant in Moab (29:1, 12) provides the occasion for an oration by Moses. Israel is urged to adopt the reforming law that Deuteronomy presents in written form (29:20–21, 27; 30:10). The entreaty becomes insistent and impassioned. A sense of crisis looms. Today is the moment of decision (29:4). Choose life and not death (30:19).

A review of saving history (29:2–8) reminds Israel that past crises were times of providence and education. The meaning of those events was hidden then but now has been revealed. Deuteronomy urges the adoption of its own particular interpretation of past traditions. Israel is to seize the present moment of crisis as an opportunity for decision and obedience. A renewed dedication to the covenant is required of all, from the greatest to the least (29:10–11). The nature of this covenant relationship is epitomized by v. 13, repeating 26:17–19. The original readers are directly included in the moment of decision by vv. 14–15.

This covenant is guaranteed by curses (chap. 28) that will fall on any man or woman or group who worships a strange god, the rest of the nation being endangered by the guilty one marked off for catastrophe (29:18–21). An effective literary device (vv. 22–28) carries the audience forward into a grim potential future. A vivid dialogue set into a blasted landscape portrays the destruction and exile that will result if this covenant is violated.

Israel is to concentrate on faithful obedience to what is openly revealed in Deuteronomy. The mystery of God's ways remains an impenetrable secret best left to God (v. 29), but this law is not difficult to keep; it is clear and understandable (30:11–14). God's will for Israel is within easy reach; it need not be sought out in some epic quest. Israel is faced with the simplest of choices: life or death (vv. 15–20). Moses, backed up by the witness of heaven and earth, sets before Israel two clear ways. Apostasy means adversity and eventual exile. Obedience means prosperity and long life in the land of promise.

Although a somewhat different and later situation seems to be addressed by 30:1–10, there too Israel is called upon to repent and reform. These verses, resembling 4:29–31 in outlook, speak to an audience that has already experienced national destruction and exile. The path of return is set out step-by-step. Take these blessings and curses to heart in the land of exile and return to God through renewed obedience (30:1–2). Then God will gather and restore you to the prosperous land once more (vv. 3–5), circumcising your hearts so that love for God and obedience will become second nature to you (vv. 6, 8). The curses will be transferred to your enemies, while the blessings will shower on you (vv. 7, 9; cf. 28:4). All this will happen if you obey and wholeheartedly return to God (v. 10).

31:1–34:12

Transition to Canaan

This concluding section provides readers with bridges that connect the reform law of Deuteronomy to their own lives. Moses initiates a regular routine of reading Deuteronomy before the assembled community and gives final instructions that carry forward into the book of Joshua (chap. 31). The Song of Moses and the Blessing of Moses (chaps. 32–33) represent his last testament to Israel. These point forward into a future that is the readers' own present. The Song is a witness to the apostasy in which they have participated, as is the written law of Deuteronomy itself (31:19, 21, 26–27). Yet along with the Blessing of Moses, the Song also points beyond disobedience and punishment to God's gracious will for Israel. The future is ultimately determined not by Israel's infidelity, but by God's fidelity. Chap. 34 continues the transition to the story of Israel under Joshua and summarizes the career of Moses.

31:1–29, Preparing for the Future. A major turning point is reached with this unit. Moses' long speeches are over. There is a return to the narrative, which is picked up from where it left off in 3:23–29. Attention shifts to preparation for Israel's future in the land. This future (which is the original readers' present) will be grim. Following an ingrained predisposition to rebellion already evident to Moses, Israel will violate the covenant by worshiping foreign gods and idols and be punished by God's wrath (31:16-18, 20-21, 27-29).

Since Moses will not cross the Jordan because of age and God's command, Joshua is prepared for his role as military leader. In turn, Moses encourages both the people and Joshua to bravery (vv. 2-8). The transition from Moses to Joshua is made in a different way by vv. 14-15, 23, probably a fragment of tradition from some other source. Here the tent of meeting, the point of rendezvous between Moses and God, is the locale of God's direct authorization of Joshua (→ Tabernacle).

The law is the focus of other preparations for the future. The written law, which is Deuteronomy, is entrusted to the priests and elders. It is to be read at the Feast of Booths every seventh year, the year of debt remission (vv. 9-13; cf. 15:1-11). This is to be an educational and motivational opportunity for coming generations. The book of the law is given to the Levites to be set beside the Ark as a witness against Israel's future disobedience (31:24-27). Another witness against Israel will be provided by a song that Moses writes down and teaches Israel (vv. 19-22; the Song of Moses, chap. 32).

This chapter was intended to connect the book of Deuteronomy to those to whom it was first addressed. They were living in the grim future for which Moses has prepared. The law had been passed on to them. Deuteronomy witnessed against their present apostasy, but at the same time it offered them a chance for renewal and obedience (31:10-13).

31:30-32:52, The Song of Moses. Moses, about to die, offers some last words to Israel in the form of a song. This is spoken rather than sung, indicating its didactic nature. Moses is represented as one with prophetic vision, uncovering the meaning of the past while providing a vision of future and a challenge for the present. He tells the story of Israel from election through apostasy and punishment to God's gracious vindication. Like the law (31:26), this song is to be a witness against Israel (31:19, 21), describing the consequences of the apostasy against which Deuteronomy warns. It is directed at the Israel in Moses' future (31:29), those who have experienced punishment in the shape of enemy conquest.

The poem (32:1-43) uses the traditional format of a lawsuit in which God brings Israel to trial for its infidelity. God calls witnesses to observe the proceedings (vv. 1-3) and then summarizes the prosecution's case (vv. 4-6). The details of the case then follow: God's past graciousness (vv. 7-14), the indictment (vv. 15-18), the guilty verdict, and the sentence of total destruction (vv. 19-25). At this point, the poem abandons the lawsuit format and moves on to assert God's continued vindication of Israel for the purpose of preserving his own honor.

The introduction (vv. 1-3) addresses the heavens and earth, invoked as witnesses against Israel throughout Deuteronomy (4:26; 30:19; 31:28). Water metaphors underscore the beneficial and refreshing intent of Moses' teaching. The song's theme is present in 32:4-6a: God has proven faithful; the people have been faithless and perverse. The poem's central metaphor is God as a rock, the symbol of solidity and stability (vv. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31; cf. 37).

Israel's story begins with the nation's election at the time of the origin of all peoples (vv. 8-9). When parceling out the peoples of the earth to their gods, God kept Israel as a personal inheritance. He found this people in the wilderness and adopted them (a tradition of election found also in Hos. 9:10). God gave Israel the land of promise (Deut. 32:13-14), nurturing them richly, sometimes from the most unpromising places. Complacency in prosperity, however, led to the worship of other gods (vv. 15-17; cf. 6:10-12; 8:7-20). Israel forgot the Rock who had given birth to them (32:18). Israel's idolatry roused God to jealous anger, and punishment followed in the form of invasion and defeat by a cruel people (vv. 19-25). The curses of chap. 28 had struck home.

Disaster does not have the last word, however. Punishment is not carried to its ultimate conclusion but is moderated (32:26). God's inner thoughts reveal that this is not because of Israel's own merit, however, but grows out of his own concern for self. The enemy people whom God had employed against Israel would misinterpret complete destruction and take the credit for themselves (v. 27). These enemies are not wise enough to see the divine pattern behind their victories (vv. 28-30). They are corrupt in origin and poisonous, and the vengeance of God is stored up against them (vv. 31-35).

Israel's vindication begins when their power has reached low ebb (v. 36). Israel's false gods have been unable to help them (vv. 37-38). In contrast, the only one worthy of the designation "God," the one who kills and gives life, takes an impressive martial oath to be vindicated against all enemies (vv. 39-42). The hymnic conclusion (v. 43) applies God's vindication to Israel's own vindication.

This poem confronted its readers, those who had themselves experienced this history of apostasy, punishment, and vindication, with the law of Deuteronomy. They were not to imagine that national catastrophe meant that their God was powerless. Based on the confession that Israel's Lord alone was God (v. 39) and a conviction that he would turn back to rebellious Israel once punishment has run its course (cf. 30:1-10), readers were urged to recognize God's rock-solid faithfulness and to respond with loyalty and obedience.

In the prose section that follows, the center of interest moves back to the law, its transmission to future generations, and its vital importance to Israel's life in the land (vv. 45-47). Moses' impending death is referred to again in vv. 48-52, reflecting traditions like those found in Num. 20:10-13 and 27:12-14.

33:1-29, The Blessing of Moses. Blessings spoken by a leader near death were thought to be exceptionally powerful in shaping the future. This material had a history of its own before being used in Deuteronomy to point to Israel's coming life in the land. A diverse collection of tribal sayings is framed by vv. 2-5 and 26-29 to create a unified poem. The introduction describes God's coming in awesome theophany from Sinai as king over Jeshurun (a poetic name for Israel). Verse 4 connects this poem to its context, the giving of the law by Moses. God's power and love are emphasized, along with Israel's unity. The conclusion speaks of the conquest and the gift of the land. It stresses the protection and providence of God, who rides the clouds (cf. Pss. 68:4; 104:3) to give Israel victory.

The sayings themselves reflect a time of peace and prosperity for the Joseph tribes (Ephraim and Manasseh) and Benjamin, the heartland of the Northern Kingdom. Reuben is small and struggling. Dan has moved to its second home in the north. It is indicative of a northern perspective that Judah is separated from the other tribes and Simeon receives no mention at all.

Some of these sayings are less blessings than statements or aphorisms that characterize a given tribe's life in some way. Benjamin dwells safely, protected between God's shoulders (or the slopes of their hills; v. 12). Dan is aggressive (v. 22). Naphtali is sated with favor (v. 23). Zebulun and Issachar are addressed directly with a command to rejoice, followed by a description of their sanctuary at Mount Tabor and the riches that come from their access to the sea (vv. 18-19).

Closer to the idea of a blessing are sayings that are wishes and prayers. Moses wishes Reuben continued existence and Asher prosperity and security (vv. 6, 24-25). There is a prayer for Judah's reunification with the other tribes (v. 7) and a more extensive one for Levi (vv. 8-11). Levi has proved its fidelity to God (cf. Exod. 17:1-7; 32:26-29; Num. 20:1-13 for similar traditions). Levi's role seems to be insecure in some way. The prayer is that God defend them and prosper their undertakings. To them belong the sacred lots (→ Urim and Thummim), the task of teaching law to Israel, and sacrifice. The Joseph tribes receive a fertility blessing along with a description of their military prowess (vv. 13-17). A tradition similar to Exod. 3:1-3 is referred to in the mention of the bush in v. 16.

The Blessing of Moses is tied to the Song of Moses through the use of the ancient name "Jeshurun" for Israel (32:15; 33:5). The Blessing portrays the results of God's vindication of Israel that was promised by the Song. These blessings are also integrated with the entire book of Deuteronomy as a description of life in the land, offering a positive balance to the curses of chap. 28. The warlike ones connect to the coming conquest.

On the other hand, this chapter moves beyond Deuteronomy's penchant for exhortations and warnings, concluding the book with a picture of Israel's future that seems to transcend the categories of obedience and disobedience to the law. Yet, like Deuteronomy as a whole, it offers a utopian vision of what Israel ought to be like when its life is lived out under God.

34:1-12, Moses Dies. Moses' final words are finished. The narrative returns to where it left off in 32:48-52. This chapter looks back, providing the conclusion for Deuteronomy and the entire Pentateuch as well. Moses' career is reviewed as that of a prophet with the closest possible communion with God, as one through whom God worked wonders (34:10-12). His extraordinary age and vigor testify to his virtue, and the thirty-day period of mourning to his popularity (vv. 7-8).

This is also a transition to the rest of Israel's story, reported in the books that follow. Moses' mountaintop view points forward to the conquest and life in the land promised to the patriarchs. In ancient legal practice, a survey was one way of transferring land ownership. The past is decisively over: Moses is dead and his grave cannot be found. Joshua is empowered to carry the story forward, and the people accept his leadership.

Thus the challenge of the future was set before the original readers of Deuteronomy. For them, this challenge came in the form of the law written in this book. Continued life in the land of promise would depend on their obedience to that law.

Bibliography

- Achtemeier, E. Deuteronomy, Jeremiah. Proclamation Commentaries. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978.
- Clements, R. E. God's Chosen People: A Theological Interpretation of the Book of Deuteronomy. London: SCM, 1968.
- Levenson, J. D. Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987.
- Nicholson, E. W. Deuteronomy and Tradition. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967.
- von Rad, G. Deuteronomy. Old Testament Library. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1966.

JOSHUA

W A L T E R E. R A S T

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Joshua poses a problem for the reader of the Bible. Approximately one-half of it is a book of wars, in which God is a divine warrior who fights at the head of his people. This forthright militaristic portrayal may block the way to a fruitful engagement with the book. Yet it seems that the Jewish and Christian communities decided wisely in including the book of Joshua in the scriptural canon. Despite any negative reaction readers may have, this book provokes us to reflect on some of the issues of war, territorial claims, and nationalism. At the same time it encourages thought about the problems of the justice and mercy of God, of holding one's commitments in a pluralistic world, and of achieving an understanding of life based in covenant. This commentary, devoted to the study of the growth and structure of the book, its social and religious questions, and its theological perspective, is intended as an aid to such reflection.

Literary History

New ground was broken in the literary study of Joshua when the German scholar Martin Noth proposed that the book of Joshua was part of a large historical work from Deuteronomy through 2 Kings. Noth termed this work the "Deuteronomistic History," since he held that its point of view was often identical with that of the book of Deuteronomy. According to a widely accepted interpretation, Deuteronomy was the product of a movement in the latter third of the seventh century B.C. (→ Deuteronomy). Influenced as this so-called Deuteronomistic movement was by the prophets of Israel, the purpose of the great historical work that sprang from it was to trace the downfall of the northern and southern kingdoms of Israel to the people's growing unfaithfulness to the covenant, which finally called forth the divine judgment upon both kingdoms. The Deuteronomistic History was thus very different in style and theology from the J (Jahwist), E (Elohist), and P (Priestly) accounts, which make up the bulk of the Pentateuch. According to most scholars, the Deuteronomistic History was produced by several historians either around the time of Josiah's reform in Judah in the late seventh century B.C. (→ Josiah) or during the Exile, after 587 B.C.

Along with other scholars, Noth also stressed that the Deuteronomistic historians used earlier material but interpreted it according to this theology. This understanding of the literary character of the book of Joshua, which is followed in this commentary, makes it essential that we be aware of earlier and later levels of tradition in the texts. Almost every chapter contains earlier material that now stands in the new context of the Deuteronomistic historians' interpretive framework. This presentation makes an effort to point out both the earlier traditions and the historians' purposes in incorporating them.

Forms in the Book

Older materials in the book can often be identified by their form. One such example is the short piece of ancient verse found in Josh. 10:12b-13 (→ Jashar, the Book of), raised as a cry of victory in the Valley of Aijalon. Older sagalike stories also occur, such as much of the story of Rahab in chap. 2. The historians likewise made use of lists compiled considerably before their time. Such lists are the defeated kings in 12:9-24 and a registry of cities in 15:20-62 and 18:21-28. Some parts of the conquest traditions in chaps. 8-11 also suggest older material formalized long before the historian received it. Similarly, the distribution of the land in 13:1-15:19 and 17:1-18 and the "divisions by lot" in 18:11-20 and 19:1-51 are archaic, having originated probably somewhat before the tenth century B.C. No doubt the account of the "cities of refuge" in chap. 20 and the narrative of the disputed altar in 22:10-34 were also of earlier vintage.

The favorite literary form of the historians themselves was the declamatory speech. Such speeches appear at crucial turning points in the history of Israel. Examples can be found in 1:10-11; 1:13-15; 3:3-5; and 3:9-13 where they are given by the leaders, or in 1:16-18 where such a speech is made by the people, or in 2:8-13 by Rahab. God also addresses his people in this form in 1:2-9 and 3:7-8, as does Joshua in his final oration in chap. 23.

All speeches stress the covenant between Israel and God, and throughout the book the historians assess the history of Israel by means of the Israelites' faithfulness to the covenant or their rejection of it.

Purpose

A single conviction dominates the book of Joshua—that Israel was destined to become a covenant people in a special land prepared for them by Yahweh. Such a promise of land had been made to the ancestors (→ Promise), yet the historians gave it a new dimension by making the inheritance of the land contingent on Israel's keeping the Torah given to Moses. It was Joshua who saw to it that the commands originally given to Moses were carried out. Thus the period of the original entry was a successful one. Israel followed Joshua as "the Lord's servant" just as they had Moses. The historians were firmly of the conviction that, if Israel had continued to follow the Torah, they would not have fallen on the evil days detailed in 2 Kings 17 and 24-25.

The Problem of Historicity

The Deuteronomistic History is more interested in interpreting the past than in giving a chronicle of events exactly as they happened. Some of the difficulties of historicity in the book of Joshua are: Joshua's eminent role in chaps. 1-11 and 22-24, but his virtual absence in 12-21, raising the problem of the specific place of this leader in Israel; the highly embellished story of the conquest of Jericho in chaps. 5-6; the frequent use of the formula "unto this day" in the book (4:9; 5:9; 6:25; 8:29), indicating a later explanation of older material; the mixture of different types of lists in chaps. 13-21; and the contrasting presentations of a swift conquest of the land by Israel in this book as against the more gradual settlement indicated by Judges 1.

The above points suggest that, whatever we may have in the way of historical memory in the book of Joshua, it has often been put through the sieve of later interpretation. Archaeology can sometimes help to clarify what lies behind the book, but archaeology also has increased the difficulty in some cases. There are also differences of opinion on how archaeological evidence is to be interpreted when applied to texts such as those of the conquest in Joshua 6-12. The lists in Joshua 13-21, too, can sometimes be illuminated by archaeological survey and excavation, but since these lists date to a time later than Israel's entry into the land, they often cannot provide us with information about the earlier period.

We are left, then, with records and interpretations that report or tabulate important developments in the history of early Israel in the land of Canaan, even though the specific details of that important period have often been obscured, and its actual history was undoubtedly much more complex. Despite this, it is fair to say that the book of Joshua does introduce us to the struggles that accompanied Israel's settlement in the land. More than that, it provides us with an indispensable description of the developments through which the independent tribes began to merge into the larger group called "the children of Israel."

---

COMMENTARY

---

1:1-2:24

Preparation for Entering the Land

These two chapters differ greatly in content. Joshua 1 contains a speech by God to Joshua and one by Joshua to the people. Joshua 2, on the other hand, consists of a narrative regarding the spies of Jericho. Both chapters build on the charge in 1:2: "Arise, cross over this Jordan."

1:1-9, God's Speech to Joshua. This section fulfills two purposes. First, it shows that Joshua is to carry through what Moses initiated but could not complete, bringing Israel to the land promised to the fathers. Second, it links Joshua to Moses by stressing Joshua's role as the one who, like Moses, is to see that all the law of the Lord is carefully observed, for only then could a successful entry into the land be made.

1:10-18, Joshua's Command to the People. For the first time in the book Joshua "commands" the people. This verb appears often in the Deuteronomistic historians' vocabulary. In their view nothing could occur unless divine action stood behind it. For that reason it is God above all who commands, because all authority derives from him. But in the Deuteronomistic view it is "Yahweh's servants," such as Moses, who transmit the divine commands. This verb, therefore, stresses Joshua's authority to speak and act on behalf of the God of Israel, as Moses had done.

Joshua commands the officers to prepare the people to cross the Jordan. The term "officer" apparently refers to a group whose primary function was keeping records. If this is so, it could be evidence for the existence of writing already in early Israel. The title also denotes an overseeing function as in Exod. 5:14-15. It is not clear, however, whether mention of such functionaries gives us an insight into the social organization of early Israel or whether it is a feature retrojected from a later period. In any case, this group of specialists appears in several places in the book (e.g., 3:2).

The brief Deuteronomistic speech ascribed to Joshua in 1:13-15 reasserts what was earlier attributed to Moses (Deut. 3:8-20), that the two and a half Transjordanian tribes should cross the Jordan to help their kinsmen conquer their land there. The people respond with a statement of loyalty, which again has a Deuteronomistic tinge to it: "As we heeded Moses in everything, so we will listen to you" (1:17).

2:1-24, The Spies at Jericho. The historians proceed to tell the story of the spies. This is clearly a piece of older narrative that fits well at this point, not only in providing the first contact of the Israelites with the land but also in introducing tension into the story of the capture of Jericho. In the forefront are Rahab the harlot and the two Israelite spies, in the background the king's secret police trying to smoke out the potential menace of these outsiders. The tension in the story is in the relation of the spies to Rahab, which is characterized by the mutual suspicion of two inimical parties. Tension is also found in the flight of the spies to the hill country and their pursuit by the king's men.

The story of the spies at Jericho is one of a group of biblical spy accounts (e.g., Josh. 7:2-5; Num. 13; Judg. 18:2-10). No doubt such stories had a firm basis in reality, reflecting familiar military practices. Yet the various references to Rahab in the book do not suggest a unified account so much as a remembered tradition that has been incorporated at several points. When we examine the story of Rahab's family as this is taken up subsequently in 6:22-25, it becomes evident that this part was joined secondarily to the account of Jericho's conquest, since the walls of Jericho had already fallen when Rahab and her family are said to have been delivered. Most likely, therefore, the tradition of the spies and Rahab was joined to the narrative about Jericho by the Deuteronomistic historians themselves.

Some features of the story of Rahab in Jericho are graphically illustrated by archaeology. The city described in the story fits well with what we know of Canaanite cities about the time Israelites were establishing themselves in the land. That the gate of Jericho was closed up at night recalls excavated examples of gates of Bronze Age Canaanite cities that were constructed for such protective purposes. The statement is also made that Rahab's house was "in the city wall" (2:15), a phrase that suggests a unique type of "casemate wall" excavated at several sites by archaeologists. This kind of fortification, known already in the Late Bronze Age, consisted of two parallel walls around the circumference of a city; crosswalls separated off rooms within them. Perhaps it was in such a group of rooms that Rahab lived, although the wall of Jericho may also have been simply a single one with houses built up against it.

The account of the spies, then, is not merely an interlude. In returning they report that Yahweh was about to give the land into Israel's hands, and the Canaanite inhabitants would be unable to resist Israel's advance (2:24). The notion that the Canaanites became faint of heart derives from the idea of holy war, as held by the Deuteronomistic historians (→ War). According to this belief, every conflict was a contest between Israel's God and its opponents. Israel was to have courage, since it was Yahweh who would fight its battles. The "enemies" would be struck down in utter panic (cf. 10:10) before the intervention of God as the divine warrior.

3:1-5:15

Crossing the Jordan

Entry to the promised land could not be made without crossing the Jordan River, the natural barrier between Transjordan to the east and Canaan to the west. Thus it is understandable that the conquest should place the river crossing as the first event and describe it with a greater amount of imagination than in the case of subsequent events. In fact, the crossing became a matter of festive memory. It is essential to bear in mind that chaps. 3-5 contain various elements that accrued in the course of liturgical celebration of these events. Three such items in particular can be singled out: the role of the Ark, the traditions of stones being set up in the Jordan and at Gilgal, and the site of Gilgal, where the festival of entry into the land seems to have been celebrated.

3:1-17, The Ark and People Cross the Jordan. The Ark appears for the first time in Joshua in 3:3. This object, described in Exod. 25:10-22, seems to have originated during the early tribal period, at which time it had a prominent role as the place where Yahweh met his people and communicated his word to them. Later it was deposited in the Jerusalem Temple, from which it was borne into the streets during festivals celebrating the God of Israel as "king of glory" (Ps. 24:7-10).

The Ark very early had a place in the wars of Israel, where it served as a symbol of divine presence and protection (1 Sam. 4-6). That it is the priests and Levites who are said to transport it probably has resulted from the liturgical influences in this account. It was characteristic of the Deuteronomistic school to make little or no distinction between these two groups of liturgical officials.

Thus the role of the Ark in the story of Israel's crossing makes it possible for us to discern influences from later liturgical reenactment of the conquest tradition. A group of ritualistic formulae are introduced into the tradition of the crossing of the Jordan. The Israelites lodge on the edge of the Jordan for three days (3:1-2) before passing over the river. The crossing itself is described less as a military maneuver than as a liturgical procession, with a space of two thousand cubits between the people and the leaders carrying the Ark (3:4). The people "consecrate" themselves (3:5), and just as the feet of the priests are "immersed" in the water (3:15), the miraculous event occurs. The waters open up and the people cross, as they had done in leaving Egypt (cf. 3:16 with Exod. 14:22). After all had crossed and the priests came out of the water, the waters returned to their place. The present shape of the text is thus a fusion of historical memory and an ongoing liturgical representation of this evocative series of experiences. The authors perceive the events through the lens of theological commitments and their own life of worship.

Many scholars have connected this liturgical form of the crossing account with a shrine established at Gilgal. Gilgal indeed is mentioned as the key location to which the people came after crossing (4:19-20; 5:9-10), and commemorative stones erected there became a lasting testimony to its importance as a center of worship.

In this same narrative the motif of holy war continues to be accented by the Deuteronomistic historians (3:10). Yahweh fights for his people as they place full confidence in him. He drives out the peoples before them, so that they may enter the land under his protection. The Ark carried before them is the visible sign of this presence.

4:1-5:1, The Twelve Stones as Memorial of the Crossing. The liturgical descriptions of the passage through the river continue in this section, the events again being connected with Gilgal (4:19-20), a site still unidentified by archaeologists. The name Gilgal, meaning "circle," no doubt recalls the circular position of the twelve stones set up at this site (cf. also 5:9). Actually two accounts are given of where the stones were placed. In one (4:9), they were set up in the river bed where the priests had stood with the Ark. In the other (4:4-8), twelve men were appointed by Joshua to carry twelve stones from the Jordan, apparently to Gilgal. Both accounts, of course, agree that the stones were a memorial to the divine guidance in crossing the river.

Such descriptions provide us with valuable insights into Israelite worship. The worship of early Israel was rooted in the celebration of God's dynamic action in continuously meaningful events. The twelve stones, which also point to connections with the twelve tribes, were not cultic stones like the Canaanite "pillars" (see Deut. 12:3; → Pillars), but commemorated a specific saving event.

5:2-12, Circumcision and Passover at Gilgal. Two additional ritual events are narrated before Israel's departure from Gilgal takes place. First, since the Israelite males who had been in the wilderness for forty years had not been circumcised, a ceremony of mass circumcision at Gilgal was carried out. Verse 8 states that in this representative act "the entire nation" was circumcised. Not only does this indicate the importance that circumcision as a rite attained, it also points to the way later memory reflected on this important act. In this manner the entire people were prepared to enter the new land and to take part in the wars of conquest.

The second rite, a celebration of Passover, is briefly described in vv. 10-12. The date given for the observance ("fourteenth day of the month in the evening") is the prescribed day for Passover of the later Priestly tradition (Exod. 12:6; Lev. 23:5). As to why the Passover was being observed at this time and place, vv. 11-12 offer an answer: the manna with which the people had been supplied ceased. Thus the Passover here initiates a new time in which the Israelites begin to eat food from the land they are about to occupy.

There may be yet another meaning, however. Since the crossing of the Jordan paralleled the crossing of the sea in the Exodus, and since the Passover was so central to that great episode (Exod. 12:1-27), so here the same feast had to be celebrated because another momentous act of God's deliverance was about to occur.

5:13-15, A Meeting with the Lord's Military Commander. This eerie description seems to be a fragment of early tradition. Its inclusion here is especially powerful because Jericho was the first of the cities to be confronted in the conquest. Just as the attacks against the cities of Canaan are about to begin, Joshua beholds the mysterious commander of the Lord's army with an unsheathed sword ready for the fight.

Several other traditions tell of such a figure sent by Yahweh with a sword in hand (Num. 22:23; 1 Chron. 21:16). In 5:14 not only a commander but also Yahweh's army is mentioned, and this adds even greater emphasis to the encounter. Israel is about to enter hostile territory. Yet Israel's strong and courageous leader can have confidence that the heavenly army will be on his side. Like Moses (Exod. 3:5), Joshua removes his shoes in the presence of this awesome personage.

6:1-12:24

The Conquest of Canaanite Cities

6:1-27, The Destruction of Jericho. It has already been noted that the story of Jericho is not a simple historical description, but a recollection carried on in ritual celebration. The description of priests bearing the Ark, the blowing of the shofhar (ram's horn), the prescribed order and times for encircling the city, and the observance of days are all from the rubrics of ritual celebration. The additions from a later age are also evident in v. 25, where it is noted that Rahab's family continued to a later time in Israel.

Whether the conquest of this city is to be taken largely as a later liturgical creation or whether this town actually fell to Israel will remain a debated problem for a long time to come. Here is a case where archaeology cannot seem to resolve the problem. The excavator of Jericho, Kathleen Kenyon, held that the archaeological evidence is unclear about whether a city existed on the site at the time of Joshua's conquest.

A more serious problem in the narrative, however, is the motif of the commanded destruction of everything in Jericho except those items earmarked for the Lord's treasury (vv. 18-19). This notion, called the "ban," is found often in the conquest narrative and is an element in the institution of holy war. The idea was important to the Deuteronomistic historians because they were convinced that Israel's failure had come from intermingling with the religious culture of the Canaanites. According to them, therefore, everything belonging to a captured Canaanite city such as Jericho was to have been offered to God through destruction. Had Israel carried this out throughout its history, as Joshua led them to do earlier, it would have removed this danger and even warded off the eventual destruction of both kingdoms (see Deut. 20).

As unsettling as the ban is to the modern Western ear, it, like holy war, fostered an absolute confidence that God was indeed directing all that was occurring. In the account of Jericho each step was prescribed and the outcome was preordained; all that Israel needed to do was to follow. Because Joshua had such undaunted faith in this divine guidance in the war, he was not only successful, but his reputation became great throughout the land (v. 27).

7:1-26, Achan's Sin and the Defeat at Ai. The story of Achan is the most elaborate account in the Bible of a failure to carry out the ban and its consequences (cf. 1 Sam. 15:1-33). Achan's taking of forbidden things from Jericho resulted in a curse upon the Israelites, so that their superior force of several thousand men was thrown back in defeat at Ai. The divine anger could only be turned away if the forbidden things held by Achan were removed (v. 13).

In addition to informing us about the ban, this story illustrates how the Israelites saw evil and its effects spreading beyond a single person to a larger group. Since all of Achan's family, and even his cattle and possessions, had become infected with Achan's misdeed, they too were put to death or destroyed. A stone heap in the Valley of Achor south of Jerusalem on the way to Jericho became a reminder of this distressing event (v. 26).

Although in these ideas of the ban and punishment we are dealing with conceptions bound to an earlier time, the story of Achan can make us aware of the continuing importance of corporate responsibility. To be sure, we are well rid of the tribalism that extracted punishment for guilt from innocent members of a group. At the same time, the privatism and apathy that dominate so much of modern life are also failings, and a prophetically informed conscience, such as that of the Deuteronomistic historians, will not allow these to go unchallenged either.

8:1-29, The Destruction of Ai. The capture of Ai takes place by means of a brilliant strategy. The occupants of Ai are lured from their city at the same time that a small group of Israelite ambushers attack the city from the opposite side and burn it. The army of Ai is thrown into pandemonium and the Israelites rout them thoroughly.

Ai, identified with et-Tell, nine miles northeast of Jerusalem, is the site of imposing ruins dating to the Early Bronze Age, a thousand years before the Israelite entry into the land. At the time the latter was happening, only a small village stood on the site, and it may have been with this village that the events recorded here were concerned. Problems exist, however, since excavation has produced no evidence of a destruction of this village dating to the time of Israel's entry into the land. Therefore the narrative may also be simply a story based on the earlier ruins, although that interpretation also cannot be taken as assured. In any case, the story of Ai alerts us to the danger of reading Joshua as simple historical description.

8:30-35, An Altar on Mount Ebal. This section gives the impression of being out of place. The account may, however, make sense if it is recalled that in Deut. 27:1-8 Moses commanded Israel, once they entered the land, to build an altar on Mount Ebal and to set up stones with the Torah written on them. Apparently it was thought that this would be an appropriate place for the tradition that Joshua fulfilled this dictate, despite the fact that the rest of the chapter has nothing to do with either Shechem or Mount Ebal.

9:1-27, The Treaty with the Gibeonites. The land that Israel entered was inhabited not only by Canaanites but also by a number of differing ethnic groups (v. 1). One of these was the Hivites, better known today as Hurrians.

Although their main city was Gibeon, several other cities were also included in their territory (v. 17). Archaeological exploration has made a strong case that Gibeon is el-Jib, about five and a half miles northwest of Jerusalem.

The Gibeonites are here described as concocting a scheme to enter into a covenant with the Israelites, so that they might not be destroyed by them. The story shows how strong was the notion of covenant (treaty) in the world in which the Israelites lived. Covenants were serious relationships. They were religiously sanctioned and enforced by the threat of curse and death (vv. 19-20). Thus, even though the Israelites were stunned to find they had been deceived by the Gibeonites, they could not cancel the covenant obligations.

This chapter is a little window into what must have been the complex history of the entry of the Israelites into the land. It ends with a note about later times when the Gibeonites served at the altar in Jerusalem as "hewers of wood and drawers of water" (v. 27).

10:1-27, The Battle with the Five Kings.

Because of Gibeon's treaty with the Israelites, and because Gibeon was located so close to Jerusalem, Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, enlisted a coalition of kings to move against the inhabitants of this city. As these five kings gathered for war at Gibeon, Israel answered the latter's appeal for help. Thoroughly routing the enemy, the Israelites pursued the fleeing armies into the Valley of Aijalon where, in the heat of battle, Joshua uttered an old piece of verse calling upon the sun and moon to stay in their place (vv. 12b-13a). That an astronomical event such as an eclipse may have occurred is possible, but it seems more likely that, since the quotation is from the book of Jashar, the occurrence was metaphorical in the original poetry, although the prose explanation in v. 13b interpreted it literally. The focus in the account is on God's mighty deliverance of Israel in the battle (v. 12a).

10:28-43, The Capture of the South. Archaeologists have debated whether all of the conquests recorded in this section took place as described or whether these texts have greatly telescoped the events. We know from other biblical texts and sometimes from archaeology that most of the cities named eventually became Israelite. But in the case of some of them, this did not occur until the monarchy was well established. Gezer (v. 33), for example, did not become an Israelite city until the time of Solomon (1 Kings 9:16-17). And despite the defeat of the king of Jerusalem recorded in v. 23, in reality this city was first taken only by David (2 Sam. 5:6-10). It makes no great difference theologically, however, whether some parts of the land were occupied early or late. For the historians all of it was a divine bestowal upon a nation that, despite some lapses, was faithful in following Joshua.

11:1-15, The Battle of Upper Galilee. In this final part of the conquest story, the scene shifts to the north and to territory later allocated to the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. The two foci are the battle at the "waters of Merom" and the destruction of the great city of Hazor.

As in the case of the southern battle in chap. 10, the king of Hazor called for a coalition of northern cities (Achshaph, Shimron, and Madon) to come out against Israel. The large site of Tel Hazor has been excavated recently, and the director of the work, Yigael Yadin, attributed the destruction of the Canaanite city (→ Hazor) to the incoming Israelites, with the latter's own smaller settlement being built over the earlier ruins.

11:16-23, The Grand Finale of the Conquest. This section is a summation of the Deuteronomistic historians' interpretation of the period of conquest. Here it is stated that the entire land from the Negev to Mount Hermon was taken, and that God's hand was in all events, including the resistance offered by the inhabitants. Thus God was able to establish his people in their own territories (v. 23). Only the Gibeonites (v. 19) and the Anakim in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (v. 22) were untouched by the conquest.

12:1-24, A List of Kings Defeated by Israel. This chapter contains a summary list of the "kings of the land" (vv. 1, 7) defeated by Joshua. Most of these "kings" were local rulers over city-states. Some, like the Transjordanian kings Sihon of Heshbon and Og of Bashan, controlled larger territories.

The list must have had a teaching purpose and thus was probably formulated much later than the time of Israelite penetration into the land. Its intent was to show how Moses and Joshua had led Israel to victory first in Transjordan and then west of the Jordan River. Evidently the list is a telescoped summation rather than a description of events at the time of the Israelite entry, since it required a longer time for Israel to become dominant in the land than the list implies. Comparison must be made with Judges 1, which describes a more gradual settlement in different areas of the country.

13:1-21:45

Traditions of Land Assignments

These chapters become more meaningful if readers study them alongside the geography of the land of Israel, since frequent reference is made to locations of territories and towns. It is possible to discuss here only the most important locations and proposals for their identifications (see Color Map 3; → most individual place names).

13:1-33, Allotments in Transjordan

13:1-14, The Unpossessed Land. In comparison with 10:40-43, this description presents a very different picture of the conquest. Large parts of the land, especially along the Philistine coast and in Lebanon to the north, remained untaken. These verses fit well with what is presently known from archaeology, and they are also closer to the descriptions in Judges 1. In neither Philistia nor Lebanon did Israel gain a foothold until the time of David nearly two centuries after Joshua.

The nine and a half tribes mentioned in v. 7 were settled west of the Jordan River. The distribution of land to the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan (cf. Num. 32:33-42) is introduced in vv. 8-13. Verse 14, on the other hand, notes the landless status of the Levites, who were set aside for special religious purposes.

13:15-23, The Territory of Reuben. Reuben's area lay directly east of the upper half of the Dead Sea. Its southern border was the Arnon River, the spectacular gorge known today as Wadi Mujib in modern Jordan. The tradition of the slaying of Balaam (v. 22) does not appear in the account of Balaam in Numbers 22-24, and it is bewildering why Israel is said to have killed this foreign seer who placed an unusual blessing on the people.

13:24-28, The Territory of Gad. The territory of Gad was east of the Jordan River, extending from near the north end of the Dead Sea to the Jabbok River (modern Wadi ez-Zerqa). The description has the border going as far as the southern edge of the Sea of Galilee or Chinnereth, but this area was controlled by Manasseh, as the following shows.

13:29-31, The Territory of Manasseh. This tribe, which had more extensive holdings west of the Jordan, occupied territory stretching east and southeast from the Sea of Galilee. The Transjordan allotments are concluded with a summation statement in vv. 32-33.

14:1-19:51, Allotments West of the Jordan

14:1-5, Introduction. The focus of the description is on territories west of the Jordan River. Those in charge of the distribution here were Joshua, Eleazer the priest, and "the heads of the families of the tribes of Israel" (JB). It was they who apportioned the territories by lot according to the divine command given earlier to Moses (Num. 26:55). Lots are referred to throughout this account of the inheritance of the land. Although having some features of magic, the use of lots is better understood as an element in the divine gift of the land, which Yahweh alone could distribute.

14:6-15, The Allotment of Hebron to Caleb. Caleb's claim rested on an earlier pledge made by Moses (Num. 14:24-25). Caleb's request included the area around Hebron (formerly Kiriath-arba), one of the prominent towns of the southern Judean hills. As in the case of the earlier account, he again demonstrates courage in vowing, even at his advanced age, to take Hebron from the Anakim.

15:1-12, The Boundaries of Judah. Judah's boundary on the south (v. 2) cut across the Negev from the south end of the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean Sea. The northern boundary (v. 5) began at the northern tip of the Dead Sea and continued across the hill country to the Mediterranean. Because the northern boundary skirted Jerusalem on the south (v. 8), it placed this city in the territory of Benjamin. Later, after the division of the kingdom, the city that David had made the capital of all Israel became the capital of the Southern Kingdom alone.

15:13-19, The Family of Caleb in Hebron. A further piece about Caleb is introduced at this point, probably because this clan's activities were centered around a major city in Judah, namely, Hebron.

15:20-62, A City List from Judah. This section contains an independent list of the cities of Judah. Scholars have debated its date, but a widely held view is that it was put into final form at the time of King Josiah (640-609 B.C.). On the other hand, there may be earlier parts reflecting an official tally of cities during the early monarchy.

The list has an interest in the four regions of Judah: the Negeb ("extreme south," v. 21), the Shephelah ("lowland," v. 33), the "hill country" (v. 48), and the "wilderness" (v. 61). In addition, it is arranged according to a series of twelve provinces, each with a capital city, suggesting the conditions of the monarchy.

15:63, Jebusite Jerusalem. This brief notation fits well with the account incorporated by the Deuteronomistic historians in 2 Sam. 5:6-10. There the city of Jerusalem was in the hands of the Jebusites until David's army conquered it.

16:1-17:18, Allotments to the Joseph Tribes

16:1-4, General Introduction. Although not mentioned until v. 4, "the sons of Joseph" refers to Ephraim and Manasseh, the two large tribes of northern Israel. Here their southern boundary is very generally traced from the Rift Valley below Jericho to the Mediterranean Sea.

16:5-10, The Territory of Ephraim. The tribe of Ephraim was allotted its land in the central hill country. With a line beginning near Jericho, its southern boundary followed the Brook

Kanah to the Mediterranean Sea. At this western end the area became lowland and coastal plain. The great city of Gezer, located within this territory, remained non-Israelite until Solomon's time (v. 10; 1 Kings 9:16).

17:1-13, The Territory of Manasseh. The account begins with an apportionment of land to a family within the tribe of Manasseh, the Machirites. This family traced its ancestry to Machir, Manasseh's first son (Gen. 50:23). Seeking a special allotment, the Machirites were assigned several territories in Gilead in Transjordan. Thus, as is mentioned elsewhere (Num. 32:33-42), Manasseh possessed land on both sides of the Jordan River.

The boundary descriptions for Manasseh territory west of the Jordan (vv. 7-13) situated this tribe north of Ephraim, and in fact the southern boundary edged up on territories and towns properly in Ephraim (vv. 8-10).

17:14-18, Joseph's Colonization of the Hill Country. Archaeological survey has shown an upward swing in the intensity of settlements in the hill country during the time the Israelites were settling in Canaan. It is possible that terracing was introduced during this period, making a new type of farming in the hilly areas possible. In any case, Ephraim and Manasseh's large territories included newly cleared forest areas (v. 18).

18:1-19:51, Allotments to the Seven Remaining Tribes

18:1-10, Joshua at Shiloh. Joshua 18-19 report the distribution of land to the seven smaller tribes north of Ephraim. Whereas Joshua earlier (14:6) was said to have apportioned the land while at Gilgal, here he is at Shiloh in the land of Ephraim.

18:11-28, The Territory of Benjamin. The description shows the inheritance of Benjamin wedged between the larger areas of Judah on the south and Ephraim on the north. The northern border passed north of Jericho to Bethel, bending back to the south on the south side of Jerusalem and from there once more to the Rift Valley.

19:1-9, The Territory of Simeon. At some point Simeon's territory was absorbed into Judah, and thus its original boundaries are indefinite in the descriptions. Its most famous city was Beer-sheba (v. 2).

19:10-16, The Territory of Zebulun. The land allotted to Zebulun lay between Asher along the coast to the west and Issachar in the southern Galilee to the east. The Bethlehem mentioned in v. 15 is, of course, not the famous one in the land of Judah.

19:17-23, The Territory of Issachar. Issachar's inheritance included the fertile hilly land surrounding Mount Tabor as a western boundary, with its territory extending eastward to the Jordan River below the Sea of Galilee.

19:24-31, The Territory of Asher. Located along the coast north and south of modern Haifa, Asher included such prominent cities as Achzib (v. 29).

19:32-39, The Territory of Naphtali. Naphtali's inheritance stretched along the western side of the Sea of Galilee and included the territory north and west of the same sea.

19:40-48, The Territory of Dan. In its earliest history in the land of Canaan, Dan had settled southwest of Jerusalem in territory made famous by the stories of Samson (Judg. 13:2). As v. 47 shows, Dan lost this territory under pressure from the Amorites (Judg. 1:34) and probably the Philistines (Judg. 13:1-2). Thus this tribe migrated to upper Galilee north of Naphtali. Its boundaries there, however, are only imprecisely described.

19:49-51, Joshua's City and Summation. To Joshua finally was presented his own city by the people of Israel (v. 49).

In summary, it can be seen that Joshua 19 is based in part, at least, on a list of cities similar to the one noted in 15:20-62. It is also apparent from Judg. 1:27-36 that the northern tribes, including Manasseh, did not win swift victories over the Canaanites, as the book of Joshua would have it. They only gradually attained dominance over these areas.

20:1-21:45, Cities of Refuge and Cities for Levites

20:1-9, Cities of Refuge. The establishment of sanctuary cities gives us a glimpse into the way ancient Israel handled the social implications of homicide (cf. Num. 35:9-34; Deut. 19:1-13). Since in Israelite belief the blood carried the life of a person, the shedding of blood not only deprived an individual of life but was also a blow against the corporate group from which the victim came. The "redeemer" (v. 5) was a member of the tribe obligated to see that justice was done by taking the life of the slayer.

Three cities on each side of the Jordan were appointed to protect a person who had killed unintentionally. Fleeing to the gate of any of these cities, an "unwitting" slayer could receive asylum with the town's elders as long as the current high priest lived. Upon the latter's death, the slayer could return home.

21:1-42, Cities for the Levites. The Levites, as has been stressed (14:3; 18:7), received no allotment of land but lived among the other tribes. The history of the Levites shows how they developed from being like the other tribes to a group devoted to special ritual activities. Some have held that the Deuteronomistic historians' interest in the levitical priests indicates that they themselves were from this circle, although the point is disputed. Joshua 21 records forty-eight cities scattered among the twelve territories as special cities for the Levites. Included with these cities were also surrounding lands for livestock and presumably also for cultivation. 21:43–45, The Conquest of the Land Concluded. This summary is from the Deuteronomistic historians. It closes off the materials dealing with conquest and settlement, and also capsulizes the historians' theological perspective, especially their belief that the land was the most tangible sign of God's deliverance of Israel. As the historians view it, toward the end of Joshua's life the land was broadly occupied by Israel, and each part was happily settled.

22:1–24:33

Three Concluding Chapters

22:1–34, The Transjordanian Tribes Return Home. Earlier the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan River had been commissioned to assist the tribes west of the river to settle their lands (1:14–15). Upon their return when all of this was concluded, they built an altar near the Jordan River. This action clearly violated the key Deuteronomic precept (Deut. 12:13–14) that sacrifices and offerings were to be offered only at the central sanctuary of Israel. Shiloh was such a central sanctuary earlier, and later Jerusalem became for the Deuteronomic movement the only legitimate place of worship.

So serious is this violation seen to be that the western tribes prepare for battle against their Transjordanian kinsmen. But the mediation of Phinehas and "the leaders of the community" (NEB) reduces the tension. The eastern tribes present an apology that they meant their altar to serve only as a "witness" of their continuing allegiance to Yahweh. Indeed, their confession in v. 34 is that "Yahweh is God."

Through this episode the Deuteronomistic historians again assert that faithfulness to Yahweh and the covenant must never be compromised. And this included purity of worship in a centralized liturgical system in Jerusalem.

23:1–16, Joshua's Final Speech. The final chapters of this book are something like the closing movement of a symphony. A brief conclusion in 21:43–45 gives way to a new section in chap. 22. Joshua 23 then presents the last oration of the great leader, which is followed by the important Shechem assembly in 24:1–28. Only in 24:29–33 is the final note struck. Unlike a symphony, however, this undulating movement is no doubt the result of several stages in the book's composition.

Joshua's speech is one of the key addresses in the Deuteronomistic History, and again it is mainly the work of the historians. At the heart of the speech is the notion that Yahweh had set Israel aside on a land given by promise, making a covenant with this people that was grounded "in the book of the Law of Moses" (v. 6). Faithfulness to the covenant meant the rejection of Canaanite forms of worship, and above all, intermarriage. Since vv. 14–16 suggest that the people have already gone into exile, or are just about to be deported, the thoughts of Joshua's speech date not far away from the Babylonian exile that began in 587 B.C.

24:1–28, The Gathering at Shechem. It is generally agreed that Joshua 24 contains old traditions about a covenant ceremony at Shechem to which a good deal of Deuteronomic expression has been added (for instance, the listing of the peoples west of the Jordan in v. 11).

A key question for this chapter is whether this ceremony was one in which the various tribes of Israel for the first time gathered together to pledge their loyalty to Yahweh or whether it represented an ongoing, perhaps annual, ceremony of covenant reaffirmation. Scholarship has tended toward the first of these views, taking chap. 24 as an indispensable source of information about the way the tribes came together into a unity in early Israel. Most importantly, however, this great assembly at Shechem sums up the historians' perspective, which can be seen throughout the book. Like Joshua, Israel was called to be Yahweh's servant. Nothing more important could be said by all of Israel than the response given in v. 21: "It is Yahweh we wish to serve" (JB).

24:29–33, A Trilogy of Burial Traditions.

The conquest and settlement history of the book of Joshua closes with brief accounts of the burials of its most important actors: Joshua, Joseph, and the high priest Eleazar. With these prosaic reports the book concludes. Yet taken as a whole the book of Joshua is far from prosaic. It abounds with a sense of urgency. Promise and responsibility are in tension throughout. According to the Deuteronomistic historians who have passed on this rich material, nothing is more wondrous than the covenanting God who gives his people a place and a future. The proper response to him is the committed covenant life that his promise evokes—a life of faithfulness and obedience.

Bibliography

Auld, G. A. "Cities of Refuge in Israelite Tradition." Journal for the Study of the Old Testament 10 (1978):26–40.

Boling, R. G. Joshua. Anchor Bible, 6. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982.

———. "Jericho Off Limits." Biblical Archaeologist 46 (1983):115–16.

Gottwald, N. K. The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250–1050 B.C.E. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1979.

Kenyon, K. M. The Bible and Recent Archaeology. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1978.

Lapp, P. "The Conquest of Palestine in the Light of Archaeology." Concordia Theological Monthly 38 (1967):283-300.

Mendenhall, G. E. "The Hebrew Conquest of Palestine." Biblical Archaeologist 25 (1962): 66-87.

Miller, J. M. "Archaeology and the Israelite Conquest of Canaan: Some Methodological Observations." Palestine Exploration Quarterly 109 (1977):87-93.

Miller, J. M., and Tucker, G. M. The Book of Joshua. Cambridge Bible Commentary. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974.

Noth, M. The Deuteronomistic History. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 15. Sheffield: University of Sheffield, 1981.

Weippert, M. The Settlement of the Israelite Tribes in Palestine. Studies in Biblical Theology, Second Series, 21. Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1971.

Wenham, G. J. "The Deuteronomistic Theology of the Book of Joshua." Journal of Biblical Literature 90 (1971):140-48.

Wright, G. E. "Conquest." Chap. 5 in G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology. Rev. ed. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962.

Yadin, Y. "Is the Biblical Account of the Israelite Conquest of Canaan Historically Reliable?" Biblical Archaeology Review 8 (1982): 16-23.

JUDGES

J. C H E R Y L E X U M

INTRODUCTION

Title and Scope

The English title of the Book of Judges derives from the Latin, Liber Judicum (Heb. shophetim; Gk. kritai) and refers to the leaders of Israel in the critical period between the occupation of the land of Canaan under Joshua (→Joshua) and the establishment of the monarchy under the leadership of Samuel (→Samuel; Saul). The death of Joshua, reported in chap. 1, marks the end of an old era, the period of conquest, and begins a new era, the period of the judges. The period of the judges extends beyond the book of Judges into 1 Samuel, where Samuel, in addition to being a prophet, is also a judge (1 Sam. 7:15–17; cf. 1 Sam. 4:18, for Eli). Whereas the book of Joshua dealt with the occupation of the land of Canaan and its allotment among the Israelite tribes, Judges deals with Israel's inability to drive out all the inhabitants of the land and the reasons for Israel's failure to do so. It thus presents a different picture from Joshua, where the conquest is sudden and complete (though a careful reading of Joshua reveals inconsistencies in its version of the conquest). In Judges, Israel is still engaged in a struggle to wrest the land from the Canaanites and must repeatedly respond to attacks from hostile neighbors.

The book may be divided into three parts: a double introduction, which deals with Israel's failure to conquer Canaan completely, first from a military and then from a religious perspective (1:1–3:6); the main body of the book, consisting largely of the adventures of the individual judges (3:7–16:31); and a double conclusion (chaps. 17–21), which sets the stage for the transition to the monarchy by painting a picture of moral decline and political dissolution in a time when "there was no king in Israel and every man did as he pleased" (21:25). The stories of the judges are thus framed by an introduction that looks back to the book of Joshua and a conclusion that looks forward to the books of Samuel and Kings.

Who Were the Judges?

The main body of the book presents twelve figures as leaders of Israel: Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah, Gideon, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, and Samson. The number corresponds to the twelve tribes of Israel, but not every tribe is represented by a judge; most of the judges are from the central hill country. The exact duties of these figures are not at all clear. None is actually called a "judge" (apart from the introduction in 2:16–19, that title appears only once, in reference to God, 11:27). Only nine are said to have judged Israel (Othniel, Deborah, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, and Samson), whereas some appear on the scene to "deliver" Israel from its enemies (Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Gideon, Tola, and Samson).

It has become customary to distinguish between "major judges"—the military leaders about whose exploits we have stories—and "minor judges"—the relatively obscure figures who appear in a list (10:1–5; 12:[7]8–15) and about whom we know almost nothing apart from the fact that they "judged Israel." Since Jephthah appears both in a story and in the list of minor judges, he is usually assigned to both categories.

The Hebrew word shaphat ("to judge") has a wider semantic range than the English, meaning not only to judge in the forensic sense but also "to govern" or "to rule" (cf. 2 Kings 15:5; Pss. 2:10; 148:11). When applied to the minor judges, for whom no military functions are reported, the title suggests they may have been local rulers responsible for civil administration and jurisdiction (note that while they are said to "judge Israel," their sphere of influence is local). The major judges, except Deborah, are not judges at all in the judicial sense. The term "charismatic" is often used to describe their leadership; for the most part they are divinely inspired by the "spirit of the Lord" to lead individual Israelite tribes against their enemies and their leadership is limited to a particular crisis. Jephthah is appointed commander and head (Heb. ro'sh) by the elders of Gilead on condition that his military campaign against the Ammonites prove successful (11:9–11), but his duties, apart from military leadership, are not described. In contrast, Deborah appears to have rendered legal decisions to Israelites who came to her in the hill country of Ephraim (4:5); and from his home in Ramah, Samuel went on a circuit to Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah, apparently giving case decisions in all of these places (1 Sam. 7:16). The paucity of our knowledge about the political organization of Israel in this time makes it impossible to be precise about the actual functions of its leaders. We seem to be dealing with two forms of leadership, represented by "judges" and "deliverers," which have been combined by the editors of the book under the concept of judges of Israel.

The Composition of the Book

Judges is the second book in the traditional division of the Bible known as the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and the third book of an account of Israel's history that many scholars believe begins with the book of Deuteronomy and continues through Kings (excluding Ruth, which in the Hebrew Bible belongs to the Writings). This composition, called the Deuteronomistic History because of its noticeable affinities with the style and theological outlook of Deuteronomy, presents a comprehensive religious history of Israel from the Exodus to the Exile (→ Deuteronomist; Deuteronomistic Historian). Whereas scholars disagree regarding the date and number of editions of the Deuteronomistic History, most believe it underwent at least two major editions, one in the seventh century B.C., during the reign of the Judean king Josiah (see 2 Kings 22–23), and the other, exilic (sixth century B.C.). In composing their religious history, the Deuteronomistic compilers used earlier sources, but their selection and presentation of the ancient material also reflect the particular religious and political issues of their own time. From Israel's historical vicissitudes the Deuteronomistic historians draw a lesson about God's discipline and mercy (see 1 Samuel, "Commentary"; 2 Samuel, "Commentary"; 1 Kings, "Commentary"; 2 Kings, "Commentary").

The kinds of sources available to the compilers for different periods of Israelite history and the way they dealt with these sources differ for each of the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. Judges itself has a long and complex editorial history. The Deuteronomistic historians probably drew much of their material from local or tribal traditions, which one can imagine arising orally and later fixed into written form. The folkloristic character of the Samson stories, for example, is readily evident. Some scholars think that the editors had a book of "savior" or "deliverer" stories at their disposal. If the minor judges represent some kind of official list, this would mean the editors had access to an annalistic source. They have also included an inspiring victory song (Judg. 5), which is one of the oldest literary compositions in the Bible.

The present form of the book gives the impression that the judges exercised authority over a unified Israel and that they followed one another in an unbroken succession. Closer examination, however, reveals the artificiality of this picture. Chap. 1 details the struggle of individual Israelite tribes to establish themselves in their own particular territory. Moreover, in the individual stories of the judges, the tribes act independently or, at most, two or three tribes band together against a common threat. The exception is Judges 5, where Deborah and Barak lead a coalition of tribes against the Canaanites. The overall picture, then, does not support a view of Israel as a militarily and religiously unified tribal organization but rather suggests that the settlement process was largely a local affair and the influence of the judges too was essentially local. That this picture is not immediately apparent results from the way Judges has been organized: tribal traditions have been nationalized and placed within a chronological framework so that local heroes, some of whom originally may have been contemporaries exercising authority in different geographic areas, have now become a series of deliverers of "all Israel."

In their organization of the book, the editors of Judges are primarily interested in presenting a religious interpretation of Israel's history during the period of the judges. They view this history as repetitive, illustrating again and again the consequences of unfaithfulness. The stories of the major judges appear within the framework of a cyclical pattern that illustrates this theological perspective. The main elements of the pattern are: the Israelites do what is evil in the eyes of the Lord by turning to other gods; as a result the Lord gives them into the hands of oppressors for a stated period of time; the people cry out in their distress; and the Lord raises up judges who deliver them. After the story of deliverance, the land is said to "have rest" for periods of forty or eighty years.

A few things should be noted about this editorial framework. It is frequently described by scholars as a pattern of apostasy/punishment/repentance/deliverance, but in fact, the Israelites repent only once (10:10–16), and other elements of the pattern also vary somewhat. God does not, therefore, act strictly in accordance with retributive theology; instead, a tension emerges between divine mercy, which is moved to intervention by Israel's plight, and divine justice, which demands that as a consequence of disobedience, the Israelites shall not prosper in the land that the Lord promised to their ancestors (2:1–3; 20–23; cf. Deut. 11:13–17; Josh. 23:12–13).

Although its basic orientation is cyclical rather than linear, Judges does move forward. The pattern itself exhibits variation; for example, the rest formula appears for the last time after the story of Gideon, and few elements of the pattern occur in the story of Samson. Thus by the end of the main body of the book, the cyclical pattern of history has exhausted itself. A deterioration in the character of the judges themselves can also be observed. By the end of Judges, the pressing question becomes how Israel can break out of the repetitive pattern that has characterized its life in Canaan since the death of Joshua (2:11-23). Samson, unlike the judges before him, does not succeed in delivering Israel from its oppressor—in this case, the Philistines. Where is the leader who can do so? (Ancient listeners knew, of course, as we do, that David is that leader.) The concluding stories of Judges (chaps. 17-21) even more explicitly acknowledge the crisis of leadership. They look toward the institution of kingship as providing a possible answer to Israel's moral and political problems.

Life in the Time of the Judges

The editors of Judges were concerned not with history per se but with its religious interpretation. As a result, it is impossible for us to get behind their highly stylized, artificial presentation of events to establish a chronology for the period or to discover very much about Israel's political or religious organization during this time. Nevertheless, scholars have sought to reconstruct as much as possible about the actual historical situation. If the chronology of the book itself is followed, the figures for the number of years of oppression, the judges' tenure of office, and the periods of rest add up to 410 years (not including the time of Eli and Samuel). The significance of the figures is lost to us (recall the frequent appearance of the round numbers 20, 40, and 80), and 410 years is much longer than the generally accepted dating of the period of the judges between the initial occupation under Joshua, roughly 1200 B.C., and the accession of Saul, around 1020.

Many of the places mentioned in Judges have been excavated, and archaeology has added considerably to our knowledge of life during the period (→ Archaeology, methods of). Sociological and anthropological methods have also recently been applied to the biblical evidence with important results. Using archaeological and extrabiblical evidence such as the Ugaritic texts, the Alalakh tablets, and the Amarna letters, scholars have been able to shed light on life in Syro-Palestine prior to the emergence of Israel as a political entity. The conflict between "Canaanite" and "Israelite" society is essentially one between a city-state society and a rural, tribal social system. Canaanite social structure was hierarchical, maintaining a clear distinction between the privileged ruling class and its subject population. In Israel, considerable power resided at the ground level, with the extended family serving as the primary social and economic unit, and, beyond it, the clan and the tribe. Israel's economy was based primarily upon pastoralism and agriculture and its early social organization shows little evidence of the division of labor and professional classes of the city-state.

The religious conflict is related to the societal one. Canaanite polytheism and religious practices stand in tension with the Lord's demands for Israel's absolute loyalty and with the largely egalitarian nature of Israelite faith—particularly for men, but perhaps also offering greater equality to women during this period than later. In periods of social disturbance, such as represented by the numerous military crises in Judges, and also in societies where power is centered in the domestic, rather than the larger political, sphere, women traditionally exercise more power (see, e.g., the story of Deborah, chaps. 4-5). The stories in Judges reflect Israel's rural and tribal base. They also illustrate Israel's antipathy toward the Canaanites and their way of life, as well as the attraction of Canaanite worship for Israel (e.g., the story of Gideon's ephod, chap. 8) and the appeal of Canaanite power structures (Gideon's son's city-state kingship, chap. 9).

Evidence of a centralized administration is lacking. The theory, once widely accepted by biblical scholars, that premonarchical Israel was a six- or twelve-tribe amphictyony, or tribal league, organized around a central sanctuary has now been generally discredited. Although Judges 20-21, which depicts a united Israel with the Ark of the Lord at Bethel, fits this picture, its historical value is questionable. But the individual stories of Judges do bear witness to occasional instances of tribal cooperation under "charismatic" leaders against common enemies. This apparently segmentary tribal organization served Israel until external pressures, such as the threat posed by Philistine expansion, combined with David's political shrewdness to produce a new form of political organization. (Saul's monarchy is best viewed as transitional between this older tribal, rural order and the new order represented by the Davidic monarchy, with its central administration, hierarchy, and dynastic succession.)

---

COMMENTARY

---

1:1-3:6

Double Introduction

1:1-36

Introduction, Part One: The Military Problem

Judges begins with the words, "After the death of Joshua," a beginning comparable to that of Joshua, "After the death of Moses." The Israelites seek a divine oracle (through what means is not specified) to determine which tribe should lead the attack against the Canaanites. Their question indicates that Israel's conquest of the promised land is far from complete. The Canaanites are the indigenous population Israel was supposed to drive out (Deut. 7:1–5; 20:16–18; Josh. 23:6–13); other terms used for the inhabitants of the land are Perizzites (Judg. 1:4–5) and Amorites (v. 34). Judges 1 appears to be based on ancient sources clearly at odds with Joshua's picture of a sudden and complete conquest. It functions to enhance the role of Judah, the tribe from which the Davidic kings will come, and to play down the accomplishments of the other tribes. Some consider it a more realistic account of Israelite settlement, as opposed to Joshua's idealized version. The tribes fight more or less on their own, and though some successes are reported, the account quickly becomes a list of failures to conquer the Canaanites. The Israelites were unable to overthrow the city-states in the fertile plains, occupying instead the mountainous regions and steppes. This was essentially the situation until the time of David.

The geographical movement in the chapter is from south to north; a similar movement may be observed in the book as a whole, which begins with Othniel as the judge from the south (3:7–11, also mentioned here in v. 13) and ends with Dan in the north (chaps. 13–18). For groups about whom success is reported (Judah, Caleb, and Joseph), lively anecdotes appear to break up the otherwise matter-of-fact account (1:5–7, 11–15, 22–26).

1:1–21, Victories in the South. First to be reported are the victories in the southern hill country on the part of Judah and groups associated with it: the tribe of Simeon, the Calebites, and the Kenites. Judah has a central role here and also in chap. 20. The location of Bezek, the site of their first victory, is uncertain. They capture Adonibezek (= the prince of Bezek), cut off his thumbs and big toes, and bring him to Jerusalem, where he dies (vv. 5–7). Only in the next verse, however, is Judah said to have captured Jerusalem, and that statement is contradicted by v. 21, which relates that the Benjaminites did not drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem. Josh. 15:63 makes the same statement about Judah. In Josh. 18:28, Jerusalem belongs to the territory assigned to Benjamin. That Jerusalem was on the border between the two tribes may explain the discrepancy. In any event, it is David who actually conquers Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6–10).

According to Judg. 1:10, Judah attacked Hebron and defeated Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai; whereas v. 20 assigns Hebron to Caleb, and both it and Josh. 15:14 credit Caleb with victory over the three sons of Anak—Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai (the Anakim are elsewhere identified as giants, Deut. 2:10–12, 20–21). Caleb was early assimilated to the tribe of Judah. The Calebite Othniel conquered Debir, winning Caleb's daughter Achsah as a wife in the bargain (cf. David's bride price of Michal for two hundred Philistine foreskins, 1 Sam. 18:25–27). Since Othniel is assigned the Negeb (the desert area in the south), Achsah shrewdly asks her father for springs of water (Judg. 1:14–15). The story appears also in Josh. 15:13–19. Josh. 10:36–39, on the other hand, attributes the conquest of both Hebron and Debir to Joshua. The Kenites, related to Moses through marriage (→ Kenites), are mentioned as accompanying the tribe of Judah (Judg. 1:16). Judah and Simeon totally destroy Zephath; the verb used refers to the sacrificial ban or cherem (Heb.; → Ban), which is frequently invoked in Joshua, but only twice in Judges (see also 21:11). The name Hormah is a wordplay on cherem. The statement in 1:18 that Judah took Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron is anachronistic. These cities were members of the Philistine pentapolis and did not come under Israelite control until much later. Perhaps we should read the word “not” in v. 18, with the Septuagint (LXX). Verse 19 offers a more sober assessment of the situation, showing Judah in possession of the hill country, while attributing their inability to conquer the cities of the plain to the Canaanites' military superiority.

1:22–36, Setbacks in the North. Of the central and northern tribes, victory is reported only for the tribe of Joseph. Their capture of Bethel is based on deception. Deception, it turns out, figures importantly throughout Judges, from Ehud's deception of Eglon (chap. 3) to Delilah's deception of Samson (chap. 16). Manasseh and Ephraim, the two tribes into which the tribe of Joseph was divided, were unsuccessful against the city-states of Beth-shean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, Megiddo, Gezer, and their dependencies (RSV: “villages”). Failure is also reported for the northern tribes of Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. That in later times Israel was able to subjugate these Canaanite enclaves is noted in vv. 28, 30, and 33, which inform us that the Canaanites were subjected either to forced labor or to taxation as a form of vassalage, depending on how one understands the Hebrew term. Probably the latter is meant. According to v. 34, the Danites were unable to get a foothold in the plains. Chap. 18 will return to their plight, describing their migration from the central hill country around Zorah and Eshtaol to the north, where they take over an unsuspecting city in a surprise attack.

2:1–3:6

Introduction, Part Two: The Religious Problem

The second part of the introduction to Judges seeks to explain the military setbacks detailed in the first part. Why, in light of God's promises to give Israel the land, has Israel not been successful? How does one account for the continued presence of Canaanites in the land? This introductory section begins by interpreting the continuing presence of the native population as punishment for Israel's unfaithfulness (2:1-5) and ends by describing the nations as a means to test Israel (2:20-23) and to teach war to the generations of Israelites who had not experienced it (3:1-6). These three different but interrelated explanations frame the programmatic description of life under the judges that provides the theme of the main body of the book (2:6-19).

2:1-5, The Lord's Angel. A divine messenger, or "angel," appears to announce that Israel's disobedience is the reason for its failure completely to conquer the Canaanites. Israel broke God's command not to form alliances with the inhabitants of the land (cf. Exod. 34:12-16; Deut. 7:2-5). As a consequence, God refuses to drive out the Canaanites; they will remain a troublesome presence in the land and their gods will lead Israel astray (a pointed example of Canaanite worship becoming a "snare" to Israel is Gideon's ephod, 8:27). Gilgal was Israel's base in the conquest narratives of Joshua. The etiological story of Bochim (of uncertain location) rests upon a wordplay; the place is called Bochim (Heb., "Weepers") because the people wept (2:4-5).

2:6-19, The Cyclical Pattern of Apostasy, Oppression, Deliverance. Verses 6-9 (= Josh. 24:28-31) offer a flashback to the time of Joshua. They function to contrast the faithfulness of Joshua's generation with the unfaithfulness of the present generation (v. 10). Verses 11-19 present an elaborate statement of the schema of apostasy, oppression, and deliverance, which serves as the framing device for the stories of the major judges. The Israelites forsake the Lord and worship the gods of the local population. The god Baal and the goddess Astarte are well known to us from the Ugaritic literature. The Bible uses these names, in the singular or plural, as general designations for the Canaanite deities (similarly the name of the goddess Asherah [plural, Asheroth], 3:7). The Israelites' apostasy provokes the Lord's anger, and he gives them over to their enemies (here again the nations are a means of punishment, 2:14-15). Although the Lord raised up judges to save them (v. 16; according to v. 18 the Lord acted out of pity for their plight), they did not listen to their judges (v. 17), and when the judge died, they behaved even worse than before (v. 19). Israel's faithlessness and stubbornness are thus underscored, and it becomes obvious that the Israelites are doomed continually to repeat this pattern. Whatever successes they have in the land are due to divine mercy, and not any merit on Israel's part. No lasting relief from this cycle is envisioned, so that the implicit question becomes, how can the pattern be broken?

2:20-3:6, The Nations That Remain. Verses 21 and 23 contradict the claim in Joshua that God gave all the land into Joshua's power (see esp. Josh. 10-12). The nations said to remain comprise a standard list of indigenous people—Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites (v. 5; cf. Deut. 7:1 for the "seven nations")—as well as the Philistines, who occupied the coastal plain to the south, and the Sidonians (Phoenicians) on the northern coast (Judg. 3:3). The Jebusites were the native population of Jerusalem. The Israelites intermarry with these peoples and, as a natural outcome, serve their gods (v. 6), both in explicit violation of God's commands.

3:7-11

Othniel

The account of the first judge consists almost entirely of framework formulae: apostasy (v. 7); oppression (v. 8); cry for help (v. 9); deliverance (vv. 9-10); rest (v. 11). For this reason, some interpreters have suggested that Othniel was supplied by the editors of Judges in order to have a judge from Judah (recall the prominence given to Judah in chap. 1). The foe ("Cushan of the Double Evil," king of Aram Naharaim [RSV, Mesopotamia]) also appears contrived, since it is unlikely Mesopotamia would have threatened southern Israel. Some (JB, e.g.) emend "Aram" to "Edom," thereby obtaining a southern adversary. According to 1:13-15, Othniel was the conqueror of Debir. The spirit of the Lord that comes upon him (v. 10) is a divine force that animates various leaders, often causing them to perform extraordinary deeds (Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, and later Saul and David are all inspired by the spirit at some point in their lives).

3:12-30

Ehud

The story of the next deliverer, Ehud, is set within the familiar editorial framework (vv. 12-15, 30). The oppressor is Moab, Israel's neighbor east of the Dead Sea, which, according to v. 13, enlists the help of the Ammonites, to the north of Moab in Transjordan, and the Amalekites, Israel's traditional enemies from the desert (Exod. 17:8–16). They capture the “city of palms,” a common designation for Jericho; it is not, however, altogether clear whether the main action of the story takes place west of the Jordan near Jericho or in Transjordan. The Israelite territory primarily affected is Benjamin, and from this tribe the Lord raises up the deliverer Ehud. Ehud is “restricted in his right hand”; the Hebrew expression refers either to a physical handicap or, more likely, as in 20:16, to left-handedness (LXX and the Vulgate [Vg.] read “ambidextrous”; cf. 1 Chron. 12:2). Ehud achieves deliverance by assassinating Eglon and leading his compatriots from the hill country of Ephraim (Benjamin and neighboring Ephraim) to victory over the Moabites.

As tribute bearer, Ehud has access to the Moabite king, and as a left-handed man he is able to conceal a sword on his right thigh. The assassination account is punctuated by grim and scatological humor. Having dismissed his followers and returned alone from Gilgal, Ehud secures a private interview in the king's cool roof-chamber by proffering Eglon a “secret message” (v. 19). To Eglon's surprise, the “message from God” (v. 20) turns out to be death. King Eglon is grossly fat—so obese, in fact, that the fat closes over the blade and the hilt of Ehud's sword. His name, which suggests a pun on the word for “calf,” makes his assassination appear as a grotesquely humorous sacrifice of a fatted calf. The details are related with relish: Ehud's deed is not immediately discovered because Eglon's servants think their master is leisurely relieving himself. Thus they wait before entering the roof-chamber, giving Ehud ample time to escape and muster his troops. The Moabites, presumably thrown into confusion by the loss of their king, are defeated by Ehud and his followers at the fords of the Jordan.

3:31

Shamgar

No editorial framework accompanies the brief note about Shamgar. Shamgar seems to interrupt the cyclical pattern, since 4:1, which introduces the judgeship of Deborah, begins the cycle anew with “after Ehud died.” Apparently Shamgar was well known, since his name appears in 5:6 for dating purposes. The mention of the name in Judges 5 may be the reason for the insertion of the reference to Shamgar here. Some LXX manuscripts place the Shamgar notice after the conclusion of the Samson story in 16:31. Like Samson, Shamgar fights the Philistines, and his mighty exploit of killing six hundred Philistines with an oxgoad is reminiscent of Samson's slaughter of one thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass. The name Shamgar may be Hurrian. The matronymic “son of Anat [RSV: Anath]” is suspicious; Anat was the Canaanite goddess of war. It has been proposed that “son of Anat” is a military title and that Shamgar was a mercenary.

4:1–5:31

Deborah

The story of Deborah's victory over the militarily superior Canaanites in the north is told in two versions, one prose (chap. 4), the other poetry (chap. 5). The accounts differ in details, but it would be a mistake to try to harmonize them or to prefer one over the other as the more “correct” or “likely” version. Each should be considered on its own merits. The poem, which is older, offers a more dramatic, but also more elliptic, presentation.

4:1–24

The Prose Account

4:1–5, Introduction to Deborah. The editorial framework (vv. 1–3) introduces Deborah's judgeship; the concluding formula of the framework, “and the land had rest for forty years,” occurs at the end of chap. 5. Israel suffers twenty years of oppression at the hands of Jabin, king of Canaan, and his general, Sisera, whose chariots outfitted with iron gave them a military advantage over the Israelites. The reference to Jabin who reigned in Hazor is problematic, since Josh. 11:1–11 reports Israel's defeat of a Canaanite coalition under Jabin, king of Hazor, in the time of Joshua. Jabin is not mentioned in the account of chap. 5, and the real antagonist there and in chap. 4 is Sisera, whose name is not Semitic and who may have belonged to the Sea Peoples (→ Sea Peoples). In contrast to Othniel and Ehud, of whom we are told, “the Lord raised up a deliverer” (3:9, 15), Deborah is already judging Israel when the crisis occurs. The judge Deborah is also identified, v. 4, as a prophet and by a Hebrew phrase usually translated “wife of Lappidoth,” but perhaps meaning “fiery woman” (cf. the NEB footnote, “spirited woman”). Her sphere of influence is the hill country of Ephraim.

4:6–10, Deborah Commissions Barak. In her role as prophet and judge, Deborah summons Barak from the tribe of Naphtali and commissions him to lead the Galilean tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun against Jabin's army under Sisera. Her role can be compared to that of another prophet and judge, Samuel, who commissions Saul to fight the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15). Barak, however, is unwilling, unless Deborah accompanies him. She agrees, but prophecies that God will give victory over Sisera to a woman. The surprise for Barak—and for anyone hearing the story for the first time—is that the victor is not Deborah, which might be expected, but another woman, Jael.

4:11, The Kenites. This verse prepares for Jael's assassination of Sisera by explaining the presence of a group of Kenites, considered by some scholars to have been itinerant smiths, in the north near the site of the battle. Hebrew cheber is usually taken as a proper name, Heber; however, it has been argued that the word, whose basic meaning is "group," refers to an ethnic unit. If this is the case, v. 11 refers to a Kenite group that had separated from the main tribe whose home was in the south (cf. 1:16). The Kenites had ethnic ties with Israel through Moses' Midianite father-in-law, Hobab.

4:12-16, The Lord's Victory over Sisera's Forces. Topographical details of the battle are not entirely clear. Barak's forces advance from Mount Tabor, north of the plain of Esdraelon, while Sisera's army and chariots proceed from Harosheth-of-the-Gentiles to the river Kishon. The battle takes place in the Plain of Esdraelon near the river Kishon, and victory gave Israel control over this strategic area (→ Esdraelon). Victory is attributed to God's intervention (v. 15); the entire army was slain except Sisera (v. 16).

4:17-22, Jael's Victory. Sisera, the general who had "nine hundred chariots of iron" (4:3, 13), is reduced to flight on foot. He is met by Jael, a woman of the Kenite group, who offers him refuge in her tent. The condition of peace (i.e., an alliance) between Jabin and these Kenites explains Sisera's willingness to seek protection there. Over against this alliance, however, must be weighed the ethnic bond between the Kenites and Israel, perhaps the deciding factor for Jael. Jael's actions give every appearance of generosity: when Sisera asks for water to drink, she gives him milk, and Sisera trusts her to stand guard at the entrance of the tent. Jael, however, takes a tent peg and a hammer—tools that she most likely wielded skillfully, since pitching the tent was probably women's work, as it is among the bedouin today—and kills Sisera, apparently while he is sleeping. Barak, in pursuit of Sisera, is met by Jael, who invites him into her tent to view the enemy's body. Just as he was overshadowed in the battle scenes by Deborah, so Barak is overshadowed in the murder scene by Jael. The glory has been snatched from Barak's hands, and Deborah's prophecy, "The Lord will sell Sisera into the hand of a woman," finds its fulfillment.

4:23-24, The Conclusion: Victory Is the Lord's. The prose account of chap. 4 concludes by ascribing victory to God (cf. v. 15).

These verses thus form an appropriate transition to the song in chap. 5, which praises God for granting victory to his people.

5:1-31

The Song of Deborah

The poetic account, traditionally known as the Song of Deborah, is both about Deborah and Barak and, according to v. 1, sung by Deborah and Barak. The verb in v. 1, however, is feminine singular, which may indicate that Deborah was regarded as the singer, with Barak added later; in v. 12 Deborah is the one called on to sing. The poem extols God and his people, who bravely joined the Lord's battle (vv. 2, 9, 11, 13). The ancient poem, dating from about 1125 B.C., exhibits a repetitive style similar to the older, Canaanite poetry from Ugarit (→ Ras-Shamra). Its vivid descriptions, striking imagery, effective repetitions, and skillful use of various poetic techniques have rightly earned it the designation as a literary masterpiece. Unfortunately, the text and its meaning are often obscure. If the traditional dating is correct, the poem comes from a period not far removed from the events themselves.

5:1-12, Praise of God and Human Heroes.

The poem begins with a call to "bless the Lord" (v. 2), and continues with an evocation of the Lord, the God of Sinai, marching forth from the region of Edom (vv. 4-5). The Hebrew text of vv. 6-12 is uncertain, and many quite varying interpretations have been offered. The verses appear to contrast the precarious social and economic conditions before Israel's victory with the situation after. In v. 7 Deborah is called a "mother in Israel"—a title indicating her authority and prophetic leadership (cf. the use of "father" for male prophets; 2 Kings 2:12; 13:14); elsewhere the title appears only in reference to a city (2 Sam. 20:19, referring to its status in Israel). The reference to Deborah as a mother at the beginning of the poem is balanced by the mention of Sisera's mother at the end.

5:13-23, The Battle. These verses are extremely important for the light they shed on premonarchical Israel's political organization. In contrast to the prose version, which mentions only the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun, the poem praises Ephraim, Benjamin, Machir, Zebulun, Issachar, and Naphtali for their heroic participation in the battle, while censuring Reuben, Gilead, Dan, Asher, and Meroz for not responding to the muster. The list differs from the traditional twelve-tribe reckoning, which is later (see Gen. 29:31-30:24; 35:16-26; Gen. 49; Num. 26; Deut. 33). Meroz, which appears in an obscure context (v. 23), is otherwise unattested. Machir and Gilead appear instead of Manasseh and Gad, to which they are respectively related. Noteworthy is the absence of the tribes of Levi, Simeon, and Judah, particularly the last which apparently was not reckoned as part of "Israel" at this time, and which historically always had a tenuous relationship with the northern tribes (→ Judah).

In contrast to the battles led by the other major judges, in which Israel defends its territory against the encroachments of hostile neighbors, Israel here fights a Canaanite coalition in the plain, where the Canaanites had a clear military advantage. Victory meant the breakdown of the Canaanite city-state system and gave Israel control over central and northern Palestine. The setting at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo places the battle in the Esdraelon somewhat south of the battle site in chap. 4. According to vv. 19–22, the forces of nature intervened on Israel's behalf. Apparently the Canaanite chariots became bogged down in the marshy terrain created by the flooding of the Kishon.

5:24–31, Defeat of Sisera. The poem ends with the juxtaposition of two "domestic" scenes. The first heaps extravagant praise upon Jael for killing Sisera (vv. 24–27). Her violation of the laws of hospitality and deception of Sisera are viewed with hearty approval, as was Ehud's use of a ruse to assassinate Eglon earlier (3:12–30). Here, apparently in contrast to chap. 4, Sisera is struck down while standing. The second scene (vv. 28–30) ironically shifts perspective to that of Sisera's mother, anxiously awaiting the return of her son from battle and attempting to assure herself that his delay is caused by the amassing of booty.

Verse 31 concludes the story of Deborah's judgeship. The period of rest is twice as long as the period of oppression (4:3) but only half that of the period of rest after Ehud (3:30).

6:1–8:32

Gideon

6:1–10, Introduction. The editorial framework of apostasy/oppression/cry-for-help appears in vv. 1–6. The seven-year oppression takes the form of raids from Transjordan on the part of the Midianites, the Amalekites, and the people of the East (→ Midianites; Amalekites). Their forays across the Jordan, particularly into the territory of the tribe of Manasseh, severely threaten the local population's means of livelihood (vv. 2–6, 11). In response to Israel's cry, God sends a prophet (v. 8). Unlike the previous account, where the prophet Deborah was also the judge and deliverer, this anonymous prophet recites God's saving deeds (vv. 8–9), accuses Israel of disobedience in serving the gods of the Amorites (= Canaanites, v. 10), and then disappears from the scene. The accusation recalls that of 2:1–3, except that the consequences of disobedience are not spelled out (cf. also 10:11–14). In 2:3 God warns Israel that foreign gods will be a "snare" for them; this is precisely what happens at the end of Gideon's judgeship, when "all Israel prostituted themselves after [Gideon's ephod] . . . and it became a snare to Gideon and to his house" (8:27). Verses 7–10 are lacking in 4QJudg. (→ Scrolls, The Dead Sea).

6:11–18, Gideon's Commission. In contrast to Othniel and Ehud, whom God "raised up" to deliver Israel, and to Deborah, who was already judging Israel when the crisis occurred, Gideon, from the Manassite clan of Abiezer, is commissioned by a divine messenger (RSV, JB: "angel") to deliver Israel. Like Barak before him, Gideon is hesitant, and his reply, v. 13, expresses his doubt (cf. the hesitancy of Moses [Exod. 3:10–12] and Jeremiah [Jer. 1:5–8] to accept God's call). God's response, "I will be with you," Judg. 6:16 (cf. v. 12; Exod. 3:12), turns attention away from Gideon's merits to the God who will be the source of his victory. Gideon, whose doubtful and hesitant nature will become clearer as the story continues, requests a sign (Judg. 6:17).

6:19–24, Gideon Experiences a Vision of God and Builds an Altar. The messenger reveals his divine identity and Gideon, in a response typical of such visionary experiences, fears death because he has seen God (see Gen. 16:13; 32:30; Exod. 3:6; 33:20; Judg. 13:22). On the basis of God's words of assurance to him (Judg. 6:23), Gideon builds an altar and names it "The Lord Is Peace" (v. 24). The account displays a number of similarities to the apparition to Samson's parents in Judges 13.

6:25–32, Gideon Destroys Baal's Altar and Builds an Altar for the Lord. These verses relate how a Canaanite sanctuary became an Israelite one. The Asherah Gideon was commanded to cut down was probably a wooden pole that served as a fertility symbol associated with the Canaanite mother goddess Asherah. It is further desecrated when Gideon uses it as firewood for a sacrifice to the Lord. Because Gideon is afraid, he carries out the deed by night; his character begins to emerge as not only hesitant (6:15, 17) but also timorous. Gideon's destruction and desecration of the Canaanite religious site and erection of an altar to the Lord in its place is used to explain the name Jerubbaal. One would not expect a follower of the Lord to bear a Baal-name; thus the story presents the name as meaning "Let Baal contend" and as bearing witness to Baal's impotence to defend his sanctuary. Some take the identification of Gideon with Jerubbaal as a sign of the fusion of two different, though related, traditions.

6:33–40, Preparations for Battle; Gideon's Tests.

The Midianites and their allies encamp in the valley of Jezreel, at the eastern end of the Plain of Esdraelon, the site of the previous battle under Deborah and Barak. In addition to his own clan (Abiezer) and tribe (Manasseh), Gideon summons the neighboring tribes of Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali (all but Zebulun are mentioned in 7:23 as pursuing Midian). Next to the coalition under Deborah (chap. 5), this is the largest muster of tribes mentioned in the battles of the judges (see commentary below on chap. 21). What was perhaps originally a victory of the clan of Abiezer over the Midianites may have been expanded to include other tribes in the area that would have been affected by Midianite incursions (note the tension between Gideon's three hundred troops and the muster of the tribes in 7:23, and the comparison of Abiezer's accomplishment with Ephraim's, without mention of the other tribes, in 8:2). In spite of his animation by the spirit of the Lord (6:34), Gideon, still hesitant, tests God two times (6:36–40).

7:1–8, Preparations for Battle; the Lord's Tests.

Gideon's forces camp on a hill near the spring of Harod (probably in the vicinity of mount Gilboa); the Midianites are to their north in the plain below (vv. 1, 8). Now God makes use of two tests, designed to reduce drastically the number of Gideon's troops and thereby ensure that the Israelites will acknowledge God rather than their own might as the source of their deliverance. The first test is straightforward: the fearful are sent home (v. 3; cf. Deut. 20:8). The second test has to do with the warriors' manner of drinking water (Judg. 7:4–7). The text is problematic and the reason for preferring those who lapped with their tongues over those who knelt down to drink is not clear. Perhaps the point is that God chooses the least likely (least cautious) warriors to demonstrate that victory is due solely to God's intervention (v. 7; cf. 7:2). Victory is the result of God's action, not human endeavors.

7:9–15, Gideon Reassured. Again, Gideon's fearfulness and hesitancy are brought out. God reassures him by sending him down to the Midianite camp to overhear the recounting of a dream and its interpretation. Since dreams were regarded as divinely inspired, the enemy's dream of Gideon's victory offers Gideon confirmation of God's providence.

7:16–23, The Battle. Gideon's three hundred troops, divided into three companies and supplied with horns (Heb. shophar) and jars with torches in them, advance against the Midianites at the beginning of the middle watch (the night was divided into three watches), before the relief sentries would have become familiar with the appearance of the landscape by night. That Gideon's men could have blown horns and broken jars while holding torches in their left hands and horns in their right and also sounding the battle cry, "For the Lord and for Gideon" (vv. 18, 20), contributes to the spectacular nature of the account. The Midianites, thrown into a panic, flee, attacking their own companions (vv. 21–22). Victory is attributed solely to God (v. 22), and the account, with its sounding of the horn and absence of human involvement in battle, is reminiscent of the highly ritualized capture of Jericho in Joshua 6. Verse 23 reintroduces the warriors of Naphtali, Asher, and Manasseh, who rally to the aid of Gideon's three-hundred-strong force.

7:24–8:3, Ephraim's Involvement. The tribe of Ephraim plays a central role in Israel's history (→ Ephraim). Here they capture and execute the Midianite princes Oreb ("Raven") and Zeeb ("Wolf"). They are angry with Gideon for not calling them to join in the battle against Midian, apparently a reference to the earlier muster in 6:35 and 7:23 and not to Gideon's summons in 7:24. Gideon diffuses their anger with a sagacious response (8:2). A similar situation occurs under Jephthah, but with quite different results (see commentary below on 12:1–6).

8:4–21, Gideon's Pursuit. Like the preceding section, these verses tell of the capture and execution of two Midianite leaders, here called "kings" and given the names Zebah and Zalmunna (meaning in Heb. "Sacrifice" and "Protection-Withheld"). Gideon and his three hundred followers cross the Jordan River into Transjordan. Their requests for provisions, first from the citizens of Succoth ("booths") and then Penuel ("face of God"; see Gen. 32:30), meet with refusal on the grounds that Gideon is not yet clearly the victor. Gideon threatens cruel reprisals (Judg. 8:7, 9). Gideon's forces catch the remainder of the Midianite army off guard in their camp at Karkor (location uncertain) and capture Zebah and Zalmunna. A victorious Gideon returns with his captives and fulfills his threats against Succoth and Penuel (vv. 13–17). Verses 18–21 introduce a new motive, blood revenge. To avenge the slaughter of his brothers at Mount Tabor (cf. 4:6), Gideon orders his son Jether to slay Zebah and Zalmunna. But the young man, like his father earlier, is afraid. Gideon, who by now has ceased to show fear and has begun taking action on his own initiative (8:1–17), kills them himself.

8:22–23, Gideon Is Offered the Kingship.

Although the text repeatedly stresses God's role as the true deliverer of Israel (7:2, 7, 9, 22), the Israelites credit Gideon with the deliverance (8:22) and offer him a hereditary monarchy. They use the term "rule" (Heb. mashal) rather than the usual verb “to be king” (malak). Gideon’s refusal is praiseworthy (some, however, have argued that v. 23 represents a positive, rather than a negative, answer). The anti-monarchical sentiment that God alone is the proper ruler for Israel appears elsewhere (see esp. 1 Sam. 8:7) and plays a significant role in Israel’s self-understanding. Nonetheless, there are hints that something is amiss here: one of Gideon’s sons bears the suspicious name Abimelech (“My Father Is King”) and according to 9:2, Gideon’s sons rule over at least an area of Israel. Thus even if Gideon himself refuses the kingship, his decision will shortly be overturned by his son (see commentary below on chap. 9).

8:24–28, Gideon’s Ephod. Although he refuses the kingship, Gideon allows himself some of its trappings: he requests a large share of the spoil, the golden earrings of the enemy, here identified as Ishmaelites. The Ishmaelites were related to Israel through Abraham’s son by Hagar (Gen. 16), the Midianites through Abraham’s second wife, Keturah (Gen. 25:1–4); for similar alternation of terms, see Gen. 37:25–28. From the spoil, Gideon makes an ephod, which becomes the source of idolatrous worship for Israel (Judg. 8:27; cf. 2:3). The ephod was either a priestly vestment or ritual object, perhaps an image (cf. 17:4–5). It was used in divination (see 1 Sam. 23:9–12; 30:7–8). Gideon, who began his career by tearing down the Baal altar (Judg. 6:25–32), finishes by leading Israel into apostasy. In contrast to the other stories of the judges, Israel’s apostasy begins while the judge is still alive and the judge contributes to it. The rest formula, which belongs to the editorial framework, appears for the last time in the book in 8:28.

8:29–32, Transition. Judg. 8:29–32 forms the transition to the account of Abimelech’s abortive attempt at monarchy. As with the minor judges (see commentary below on 10:1–5), we have a report of the number of sons Gideon had, his death, and his burial. Abimelech is here introduced as one of Gideon’s sons, by a legitimate wife of secondary rank (“concubine” in most English translations) whose home is Shechem.

8:33–9:57

Abimelech

8:33–35, Introduction. The story of Abimelech begins in a way similar to the accounts of the major judges, with Israel’s apostasy. This time the specific god Israel worshiped is named, Baal-berith, “Lord of the Covenant.” Abimelech, however, does not illustrate the cycle of apostasy/punishment/cry-for-help/deliverance, but rather interrupts the cycle. He is an oppressor, not a judge or deliverer. Moreover, this is not a story of oppression of “all Israel” or even of one or two tribes; only the city-state of Shechem and its territory are affected.

9:1–6, Abimelech Is Made King. Abimelech’s power base is Shechem, a Canaanite city-state with a long history (→ Shechem), now somehow incorporated into Israelite territory and administered (“ruled”) by Gideon’s sons. Through his mother’s influential kinspeople, Abimelech convinces the Shechemite leaders that the rule of one who is their blood relative is preferable to the rule of the seventy sons of Jerubbaal (Gideon). Seventy is a conventional number of largeness or totality (cf. 2 Kings 10:1; Judg. 1:7; 12:14); the citizens of Shechem give Abimelech seventy pieces of silver, with which he hires “worthless fellows” or “ruffians” to provide his personal entourage (9:4). These followers sound very much like the ‘apiru (Heb.) known to us from other sources (→ Khapiru; cf. also 11:3; 1 Sam. 22:2). Abimelech kills his half-brothers, except Jotham the youngest, and is made king (Heb. melek) of the city-state Shechem.

9:7–21, Jotham’s Speech. Jotham stands on Mount Gerizim, one of the two mountains overlooking Shechem (the other is Mount Ebal, which some identify with Mount Zalmon, 9:48), and excoriates the Shechemite leadership with a fable (vv. 8–15) and a curse (vv. 16–20). The fable, one of two examples of that genre in the Bible (see also 2 Kings 14:9; 2 Chron. 25:18), is strongly antimonarchical. It illustrates both the folly of kingship (only the worst and least qualified aspire to it) and its dangers (it destroys those who place their reliance on it). The bramble offers scant shade but is a prime cause of fire (v. 15). A monarchy founded on murder can come to no good and inevitably will destroy those who support it. Jotham’s call for the mutual destruction of Abimelech and the Shechemite leaders (v. 20) anticipates their fate.

9:22–33, Conflict Between Abimelech and the Shechemites. Abimelech is said to have ruled over Israel for three years (the verb is sarar, not malak); however, there is no evidence to suggest that his influence extended beyond Shechem and its territory. According to 9:41, Abimelech lived at Arumah, southeast of Shechem, with Zebul acting as his deputy in Shechem. Verses 23–24 show the principle of retribution at work: God, by means of an evil spirit, brings about conflict between Abimelech and the Shechemites to punish Abimelech’s mass murder and the Shechemites’ support of him. The retributive theme is repeated in 9:56–57. Gaal the son of Ebed (“son of a servant”) incites insurrection against Abimelech with a highly nationalistic speech during the harvest festival, when spirits were high and tensions easily excitable. Abimelech's deputy Zebul ("Prince") alerts Abimelech and counsels him to quell the rebellion in a surprise attack upon Shechem.

9:34–45, Abimelech Puts Down the Revolt. These verses report two successive and related campaigns, the surprise attack upon Gaal (vv. 34–41) and an ambush against the city using a stratagem similar to that employed in the capture of Ai (Josh. 8) and Benjamin (Judg. 20:29–48). Abimelech destroys the city and its inhabitants. The custom of sowing the city with salt (9:45), otherwise unattested in the Bible, has analogues in other ancient cultures and apparently symbolizes the finality and irreversibility of the destruction.

9:46–57, Campaigns Against Shechem's Tower and Thebez. When the people of Shechem's Tower hear of Abimelech's victory and violence, they take refuge in the temple of Elberith ("God of the Covenant"; cf. Baal-berith, 8:33). Shechem's Tower is either a quarter of the city or an outpost of it, but at any rate a separate place from the scene of the battle in 9:42–45. Abimelech burns down the stronghold, killing all the people (vv. 46–49). When he tries the same siege tactic against Thebez—perhaps in an attempt to extend his influence and support now that his base in Shechem has been destroyed—a woman throws a millstone on his head that crushes his skull. His death illustrates the imprudence of drawing too close to a defended city wall. By having his armor bearer run him through, Abimelech hopes to avoid the stigma of an ignominious death, for to be killed by a woman was a disgrace for a warrior. Ironically, this is precisely what is remembered about him (2 Sam. 11:21). Judg. 9:56–57 attributes these events to God's retributive action in fulfilling the curse of Jotham. It is worth noting that Abimelech is not punished for establishing a monarchy but for killing his brothers. As in the earlier stories (e.g., 4:15, 23; 7:2, 22), so here also God is in complete control of events. Charismatic leadership is preferable to a monarchy founded on violence, but charismatic leadership is not without its problems, as we saw with Gideon and as we will see even more clearly with Jephthah and Samson.

10:1–5

The Minor Judges

No editorial framework introduces the minor judges. Judg. 10:1–5 together with 12:(7)8–15 have the appearance of an annalistic list, which, along with the judges' names, gives information about their tribal or city affiliation, the length of their judgeship, and their death and burial. The minor judges are presented in succession (note the repetition of "after him"). For three of them—Jair (10:3–5), Ibzan (12:8–10), and Abdon (12:13–15)—we are given interesting family details, which testify to their substance and prestige. All are said to have "judged Israel," but whatever functions they exercised are not reported, and in spite of the pan-Israel perspective suggested by the phrase "judged Israel," nothing in the descriptions of these figures indicates a sphere of activity beyond a particular city or tribe.

Many suggestions have been put forward about the office held by the minor judges, but the fact is that the information in the list is too meager to permit any meaningful conclusions. The editors of the book of Judges apparently intend us to see these figures as exercising the same office as the other (major) judges, even though they report no stories about their delivering Israel from oppression (but note that Tola [10:1] is said to "deliver Israel" "after Abimelech"). Perhaps they governed local areas in times of peace.

Judg. 12:7 sounds as if it too belongs to the list. If so, the editors presumably interrupted the list because at this particular point they had substantial material to include about one of the judges' activities.

10:6–12:7

Jephthah

10:6–16, Theological Introduction. The Jephthah story interrupts the list of minor judges, 10:1–5; 12:8–15. The framework formula (10:6–10) is here elaborated into a full-scale indictment of Israel's apostasy. Similar theological elaborations occur in chap. 2 and in 6:7–10. For the first time, Israel actually repents (10:10, 15–16), but God does not, as at other times, raise up a deliverer in response to Israel's cry for help. The Gileadite elders appoint Jephthah their leader (11:4–11) and only later does God confirm their choice (11:29). In contrast to the following account, where the conflict is limited to Ammon and Gilead, 10:9 introduces a wider Israelite perspective (note that Jephthah is appointed leader only over Gilead, not over "all Israel").

10:17–11:11, Jephthah's Appointment as Leader. In response to pressure from the Ammonites (from central Transjordan), the elders of Gilead (in northern Transjordan) seek out Jephthah to be their leader. The elders represent a form of local leadership evidenced throughout the biblical period. Jephthah had earlier been driven away from his Gileadite homeland by his half-brothers, jealous of their inheritance rights (11:2); 11:7 suggests that this may have been a political action involving the elders. The elders choose Jephthah because of his military skills (11:1), a consideration that outweighs his objectionable origins and current status as leader of a band of outlaws (for the same expression, see 9:4; see also 1 Sam. 22:2). Jephthah negotiates with the elders to have himself made not only their leader against the Ammonites (Judg. 11:6, 11) but also their head (vv. 8, 9, 11). “Leader” (Heb. qatsin) may represent a temporary military leadership, and “head” (Heb. ro’sh), a permanent civil one. Thus Jephthah is appointed for the present crisis and for the future, if he succeeds in ridding Israel of the Ammonite threat (v. 9). The agreement is ratified at Mizpah (cf. 1 Sam. 11:14–15; 2 Sam. 5:3; on Mizpah, see commentary below on 20:1–17).

11:12–28, Jephthah Negotiates with the Ammonites. Jephthah tries to settle Israel’s differences with Ammon through diplomacy. The Ammonite king contends that Israel took part of their land in central Transjordan between the Arnon and Jabbok rivers. Jephthah’s laborious counterargument has two main points. First, he rehearses Israel’s encounters with Edom, Moab, and Sihon, king of the Amorites, in the process of entering the promised land (see Num. 20–24), arguing that Israel conquered and took possession of the land of the Amorites because it was God’s will to give Israel the land, and a nation has a right to whatever its god gives it through conquest (Judg. 11:15–25). It is often claimed that the description fits Moab better than Ammon, but the fact that Ammon had conquered part of Moabite territory may help explain the confusion. The territory in dispute, the land east of the Jordan River between the Arnon and the Jabbok (v. 13), was taken in battle from Sihon, king of the Amorites (v. 22). Chemosh, according to the Bible and the Mesha Stele, was the national god of Moab, but may also have been worshiped by the Ammonites (→ Mesha). Jephthah’s second point is that since Ammon laid no claims to the land during the three hundred years Israel occupied it, they have no right to dispute it now (v. 26). Jephthah’s lengthy attempt at negotiation proves unsuccessful.

11:29–40, Jephthah’s Vow and Its Tragic Consequences. Like Othniel and Gideon before him, Jephthah is animated by the spirit of the Lord (v. 29), but in Jephthah’s case this takes place after he had assumed leadership. In return for victory over Ammon, Jephthah vows to sacrifice as a burnt offering to God the one who meets him upon his return from battle. Some commentators have argued that he may have had in mind an animal, but both the language and the nature of a vow (namely, an extreme measure that would ordinarily entail the offer of something quite precious) suggest that a person was meant.

The Hebrew Bible generally condemns human sacrifice (Lev. 18:21; 20:1–5; Deut. 12:31; 18:10; but see also Gen. 22; Exod. 22:29–30; and Mic. 6:7–8), and the actual biblical examples of the practice, which are few, view it with horror (see 2 Kings 3:27; 16:3; 21:6). God gives Jephthah a great victory (Judg. 11:32–33) and thus Jephthah must fulfill his part. A vow, once uttered, was irrevocable (v. 35; Num. 30:2). Jephthah’s reaction (Judg. 11:35) makes clear that he had not expected the one to meet him to be his daughter. His daughter courageously accepts her fate, requesting only a two-month delay to lament her virginity, since to die childless was a great misfortune. Jephthah too will die childless, since his daughter is his only child. The sacrifice itself is treated in less than one brief verse (v. 39); the details are too terrible to receive elaboration. The young woman’s tragedy is tempered by the company of women who grieve with her (vv. 37–38) and who, after her death, remember her in a yearly ritual (v. 40). RSV and JB, following LXX and Vg., read “to lament,” but the Hebrew verb has the sense of “recount” or “commemorate” (cf. its only other occurrence in 5:11). The most startling feature of the narrative is the absence of any condemnation of Jephthah’s sacrifice of his daughter to God.

12:1–7, Civil War Between Gilead and Ephraim. Some commentators understand the conflict as originating in Ephraim’s reaction to the threat to its influence in Transjordan posed by the assertion of Gileadite authority. Unlike Gideon before him (8:1–3) and in marked contrast to his own lengthy attempt at negotiations with the Ammonite king, Jephthah does not seriously pursue diplomacy as a means of placating Ephraim’s anger at not having been called up to join the battle against Ammon. Moreover, Jephthah and the Ephraimites have different versions of the events (12:1–3), and the text gives us no clue which to believe. Fighting breaks out and the Gileadites gain the upper hand. They seize the fords of the Jordan and slay any Ephraimite trying to escape to his own territory. Anyone trying to cross over into the area west of the Jordan had to say the word “shibboleth” (meaning “ear of grain” or “torrent of water”). The Ephraimites, who spoke a different dialect of Hebrew, pronounced it differently from the Gileadites, and thus betrayed their true identities. The information about Jephthah’s term of office, death, and burial (v. 7) links Jephthah with the list of minor judges, where the same type of information is summarily presented.

12:8–15

The Minor Judges

See commentary above on 10:1–5.

13:1–16:31

Samson

It is frequently observed that Samson does not behave like a judge. He does not lead any Israelite troops into battle but rather engages in personal vendettas against the Philistines. When one considers his wild escapades and sexual liaisons, his character leaves much to be desired. Unlike the major judges before him, he does not achieve Israel's deliverance from its oppressor. Nonetheless, for the editors of the book, Samson was a judge (15:20; 16:31), and what were probably originally folktales—rowdy adventure stories told by an oppressed group as an outlet for their frustration at their inability to gain the upper hand over their more powerful oppressors—have been given a theological interpretation. The stories in their present form repeatedly remind us that Samson is the instrument of God (13:25; 14:4, 6, 19; 15:14, 18–19; 16:28–30). Even if he is ultimately unsuccessful in ridding Israel of the Philistine menace, his final act brings glory to God (16:28–30).

The setting is the Shephelah in the vicinity of Zorah and Eshtaol (13:25; 16:31), with specific events related to the surrounding area: Timnah, Etam, Ramath-lehi, Hebron, the valley of Sorek. In the period of Israelite settlement, this area came increasingly under the Philistine sphere of influence. Ashkelon and Gaza, members of the Philistine pentapolis, are visited by Samson, and Gaza is the scene of his death. The Philistines, Sea Peoples who came from the Aegean and settled along the southern coast of Canaan in the twelfth century B.C., sometime after Israel, posed a serious threat to Israelite existence during the time of the judges and in the early days of the monarchy (see above commentary on 1:1–21; 4:1–5; → Philistines). Philistine pressure forced the Danites to migrate from their assigned territory in south-western Palestine to the far north of the country (see Josh. 19:40–48; Judg. 17–18). Samson's failure completely to defeat the Philistines, in spite of his victories, may reflect Dan's inability to get a stronghold in the plain.

13:1–25, Samson's Birth. Only two elements of the editorial framework appear in the story, apostasy and oppression. There is no cry for help, and deliverance from the oppressor is not achieved. Unlike the deliverers before him, Samson is chosen by God before birth. He is set apart as a Nazirite “to begin” or “to be the first” to deliver Israel from the Philistines (v. 5), but it will remain for David to complete the task.

Judges 13 has features in common with other birth accounts (see 1 Sam. 1; Gen. 18; 16:7–16). There are also strong similarities to Gideon's visionary experience in Judg. 6:11–24. The account enhances Samson's mother's role and portrays her as more perceptive than her husband. The divine messenger's appearance and announcement are to her alone (13:3–7). When Manoah manages to get an audience with the messenger and seeks to obtain more information, the messenger tells him even less than he told the woman (vv. 8–14). Whereas Manoah is unaware of the messenger's divine identity (v. 16), his wife senses it from the outset (v. 6). Manoah's fear of death upon witnessing the revelation of the messenger's identity is an appropriate response (vv. 15–22; see commentary above on 6:19–24); but his wife displays greater theological acumen, recognizing the divine intention behind the events (13:23).

Samson's Nazirite status (vv. 4–5, 7) has perplexed commentators. The Nazirite regulations of Numbers 6 do not fit the picture in Judges 13–16, where Samson is a lifelong Nazirite consecrated before birth, who may never cut his hair. The injunctions against wine and beer and against unclean food are placed on the mother in Judg. 13:4, 7, and 14; presumably they apply to the child. Samson does not behave like a Nazirite and, moreover, chaps. 14–15—where Samson touches a carcass (14:8–9) and presumably drinks at the feast (14:10)—make no mention of Nazirite status. Nazirite status appears to be a later development in the tradition to provide a theological rationale for the strong man's strength that resides in his hair (16:17), a common folklore motif.

14:1–15:20, Samson's Marriage to a Philistine Woman and Its Consequences. Israelites and Philistines live side by side and even intermarry (though for faithful Israelites this is not desirable, 14:1–3; recall Deut. 7:3–4), but relations between the two peoples are strained. Samson's marriage may be of the tzadiga type, in which the wife continues to dwell in the house of her father (see 15:1). The account of Samson and the Timnite is modeled on the story of Samson and Delilah in Judg. 16:4–22. In both cases Samson is persuaded by a woman to reveal a secret: in 14:15–18, the answer to his riddle; in 16:4–22, the explanation of his great strength. The Philistines are behind each woman's attempt to learn Samson's secret, and each time the woman breaks down Samson's resistance by casting doubt on his love (14:16; 16:15). The woman betrays Samson's secret to the Philistines, and this leads—directly in 16:21 and indirectly, through a series of reprisals, in 14:19-15:13—to the handing over of Samson to the Philistines. Samson's riddle (14:14), based on his private experience (14:5-9), would have been insoluble had the Philistines not gotten the answer from Samson's wife by threatening to burn her and her father's house (14:15). Ironically, the fate she sought to avoid befalls her (15:6). Her betrayal of Samson's riddle to the Philistines occasions a series of reprisals between Samson and the Philistines (14:19-15:8) that finally leads to the Philistine attack on Judah and the Judahites subsequently handing over Samson to their oppressors (15:9-13). The Judahites are thus portrayed in a negative light; like Delilah, they deliver Samson into Philistine hands.

The spirit of the Lord inspires Samson's unusual feats of prowess (13:25; 14:6, 19; 15:14; see commentary above on 3:10). The spirit enables Samson to kill one thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, providing the name of the place, Ramath-lehi, which means "hill of the jawbone" (15:14-17). Immediately thereafter, however, Samson falls victim to thirst and appeals to God (15:18). His response not only reveals his dependence on God; it also makes a crucial theological point: the strong man cannot save himself. God provides Samson with water, and another place receives its name, En-hak-kore, "the spring of the caller" (15:18-19).

16:1-3, Samson and the Harlot of Gaza.

This brief anecdote offers another illustration of Samson's enormous strength and equally large libido. The Philistines fail in their only attempt to trap Samson without a woman's help.

16:4-22, Samson and Delilah. On the similarity with the story of Samson and the Timnite, see the commentary above on Judg. 14:1-15:20. That Delilah was Philistine is not stated in the text, but in view of Samson's other liaisons, it is quite likely. Her first two unsuccessful attempts to discover the source of Samson's great strength involve binding Samson (vv. 6-9, 10-12). The third attempt comes perilously close to the secret, since it has to do with Samson's hair (vv. 13-14). Her fourth attempt succeeds, and Samson is captured, blinded, and imprisoned by the Philistines (vv. 15-21). Verse 22 offers a sign of hope and a hint of victory to come.

16:23-31, Victory at Gaza. What appears initially as a victory for Dagon, the Canaanite grain god worshiped by the Philistines, becomes the victory of God. While the Philistines praise their god (vv. 23, 24), Samson calls on his (vv. 28, 30). He acts as the agent of God's punishment, in particular for the ignominy he has suffered at the hands of the Philistines (v. 28). Samson's death is not, strictly speaking, a suicide, since God grants his prayer for death, accepting him as an instrument through which to carry out the divine plan (v. 30). His death is viewed as achieving an important result, killing more Philistines than he had killed in his lifetime. The story closes with the statement that Samson judged Israel twenty years. No rest formula occurs, the cyclical pattern of Judges is at an end, and we move into the final chapters of the book on a somber note.

17:1-21:25

Double Conclusion

The concluding chapters of Judges sound a recurrent theme, "In those days there was no king in Israel" (17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). The first and last times this phrase occurs, the implications are spelled out: "every man did what was right in his own eyes." Neither judges nor deliverers appear in the concluding stories, and significantly, the threat to Israel is no longer external but internal. Even when no foreign oppressor appears on the horizon, conditions do not improve, for Israel left to its sinful ways pursues a course that threatens its political and religious survival. From the evidence of the major judges, it would seem that charismatic deliverers who arise in time of need have not provided the kind of stable leadership Israel requires. Moreover, beginning with Gideon, whose ephod led to apostasy, followed by Jephthah, who makes a human sacrifice, and Samson, who failed to live up to his calling, the judges themselves have displayed disturbing weaknesses. A serious crisis of leadership emerges. By illustrating the depravity and anarchy of the times when Israel had no king, Judges 17-21 looks forward to the monarchy as a possible solution. The degree to which kingship provides a solution to Israel's problems receives attention in the following books of Samuel and Kings.

17:1-18:31

Conclusion, Part One: The Origin of the Sanctuary at Dan

Although they contain no explicit censure, these chapters offer a subtle and ironic polemic against the sanctuary at Dan, which, along with Bethel, was a national sanctuary of the Northern Kingdom (see 1 Kings 12:26-33). The Danite sanctuary is founded on theft (Judg. 18:14-26) and violence (18:27); its main ritual objects are stolen images made by human hands (17:4; 18:24, 27, 31) from stolen silver (17:1-4). Judges 17-18 also portrays the levitical priesthood in a negative light, as do the following chapters.

17:1–6, Micah's Image and Other Ritual Objects. The strange account begins abruptly with a theft, a curse, and the making of a molten image. From the outset Micah is presented negatively. He steals a large sum of silver from his own mother (eleven hundred pieces of silver is the amount each Philistine lord promised Delilah, 16:5) and engages in apparent syncretistic religious practices that belie his name (the full form, which appears in vv. 1–4, is Micah-yahu, meaning "Who is like Yhwh [the LORD]?"). Molten images are forbidden in Exod. 20:4–6; Deut. 5:8–10; Exod. 34:17; and Deut. 27:15; and warnings about the dangers of syncretism appear in Judg. 2:1–5; 6:7–10; and 10:10–15. Whereas Gideon made an ephod that led to apostasy (8:27), Micah has a shrine (lit., "house of god[s]") with a graven image, a molten image, an ephod, and teraphim. The terms "graven image" and "molten image" (RSV) may indicate a single carved statue covered with silver, but elsewhere in the account they seem to indicate two different images (18:17, 18). On the ephod, see above commentary on 8:24–28; teraphim were statues used in worship (→ Teraphim). Whereas the exact nature and function of all this ritual paraphernalia are obscure, there can be little doubt that the piling up of these terms is meant as ironic disapproval. The image, after all, is made from stolen silver; and though Micah's mother consecrates all of it to the Lord, she obviously keeps the larger portion.

17:7–13, Micah Employs an Itinerant Levite as His Priest. Micah installs a Levite from the tribe of Judah as his family priest. Whereas 17:5 indicates that a priest did not have to be a member of the tribe of Levi (cf. 2 Sam. 8:18), these verses show that a Levite was especially desirable. Micah believes that having a Levite as his priest will bring him God's favor (v. 13), but the following events will prove him wrong.

18:1–6, The Danite Spies Consult God Through Micah's Levite. The Danites' appearance on the scene, seeking an inheritance, looks back to the beginning of the book (1:34). From their base in the area of Zorah and Eshtaol (see commentary above on chaps. 13–16), they send out spies who, coming upon Micah's house, recognize the Levite's voice (18:3). Either they knew him or, more likely, they recognized his dialect as Judahite or perceived him to be a priest on the basis of what they overheard him saying. He "inquires of God" on their behalf—probably a reference to divination by means of the ephod and teraphim—and gives them a highly ambiguous answer. "Your way is before the Lord" (v. 6) is not a clear promise of divine blessing, and its obscurity perhaps functions to dissociate God from the questionable conduct of the Danites.

18:7–26, The Danites Steal Micah's Priest and Ritual Paraphernalia. Laish in the far north was desirable because of both its fertile land and its military vulnerability, there being no allies to come to its defense (vv. 7–10). Upon hearing the spies' report, the tribe of Dan journeys to Laish (vv. 11–13). On the way, they steal Micah's images and ritual objects (vv. 14–26). The Levite reveals himself as an opportunist happy to accompany the Danites as their priest (v. 20), and the Danites are bullies who intimidate Micah, threatening bloodshed, when he protests their plunder (vv. 23–26).

18:27–31, The Sanctuary at Dan. In an attack that resembles holy war, with its total slaughter and destruction by fire, the Danites capture Laish. They rebuild the city, naming it "Dan" after their eponymous ancestor, and establish their shrine with Micah's stolen image and priest. Only the graven image is mentioned; the other ritual objects have dropped out of the picture. But the syncretistic nature of this form of worship is nevertheless intimated by the phrase "Micah's image which he made" (v. 31). Only now do we learn the priest's name, Jonathan the son of Gershom, son of Moses (i.e., Moses' grandson or simply a member of the Gershomite branch of Levites). The copyists, reluctant to associate the name of Moses with a questionable type of religious service, changed the name (mosheh) to Manasseh (menasheh) by inserting a suspended "n" in the Hebrew text. The captivity of the land (v. 30) may refer to the deportation that took place under the Assyrian ruler Tiglath-pileser III in 734–732 B.C. (see 2 Kings 15:29). The reference to the house of God at Shiloh seeks to make the two religious centers contemporary (→ Shiloh).

19:1–21:25

Conclusion, Part Two: Violence at Gibeah and War Against Benjamin

The pan-Israel perspective of these chapters reveals the hand of a later editor, since the kind of tribal organization envisioned can hardly have preceded the consolidation under the monarchy (see "Introduction" above). The events recounted show how utterly low Israel has sunk without a leader (19:1; 21:25). The threat of dissolution through internecine warfare was avoided under Gideon (8:1–3), but fighting between tribes did take place, albeit on a smaller scale, under Jephthah (12:1–6). In Judges 19–21, one Israelite tribe is nearly wiped out by a confederation of the others. Near anarchy and moral depravity characterize the times. The crimes of rape and murder are punished by the Israelite assembly with violence that does not stop short of mass rape and murder.

19:1-9, A Levite Fetches His Wife from Her Father's House. These chapters exhibit a stronger antilevitical sentiment than Judges 17-18. The Levite here is not simply worse than the Levite of chaps. 17-18 but is possibly the most disreputable character in the book. None of the characters in this grisly story is named. The Levite is from the central hill country of Ephraim; his wife of secondary rank (see commentary above on 8:29-32) is from Bethlehem in Judah, south of Jerusalem. Her reason for returning to her father's house is not clear. A reference to harlotry, following the Hebrew, does not make a great deal of sense in this context. It has been suggested that the Hebrew means she divorced him. Many modern translations follow the versions in reading, "she was angry with him" (so RSV, JB).

The Levite's weakness of character is hinted at when he allows his father-in-law repeatedly to persuade him to remain in Bethlehem. First he is too irresolute to leave on his journey at a reasonable hour, and then too stubborn to remain yet another night. Had he left early in the morning as intended, the outrage at Gibeah might have been avoided. The woman does not participate in either the decision making or the merriment (vv. 4-9). In what follows, she is clearly treated as an object.

19:10-21, The Decision to Spend the Night in Gibeah. The Levite rejects his servant's suggestion to spend the night in Jebus (Jerusalem) because he could expect no hospitality from foreigners. Jerusalem was a Jebusite city (see commentary above on 1:21); Gibeah, north of Jerusalem, was Israelite, belonging to the tribe of Benjamin. They receive no hospitality in Gibeah (vv. 15, 18), however, until an old man from Ephraim, a resident alien in Gibeah, takes them in for the night. Gibeah was King Saul's hometown, and an anti-Saul polemic is noticeably at work in Judges 19-21.

19:22-30, The Rape of the Levite's Wife. In the night their merriment is interrupted by Benjaminite ruffians who demand that the man be brought outside so that they might sexually assault him. The account has striking similarities to Gen. 19:4-11, except that here an assault is carried out, making this story perhaps the most gruesome in the Bible. The host offers his virgin daughter and the Levite's wife as substitutes. In Genesis 19, Lot's offer of his two virgin daughters is viewed by many scholars as demanded by the conventions of hospitality, which require that the guest be protected at all costs. In Judges 19, in contrast, the host offers one of his guests, and, in fact, only the Levite's wife is thrown out to the mob. It is not certain whether the host or her husband throws her out.

The men of Gibeah rape and abuse the helpless woman all night. When the Levite opens the door in the morning "to go his way"—not to see what has happened to his wife—and finds her lying on the threshold, his crass response underscores his depravity, "Get up, so we can go" (v. 28). He puts her on his ass, travels home, and chops her body into twelve pieces, which he sends through the territory of Israel. It is not at all clear that the woman was dead when he dismembered her—a point that clearly concerned the translators of the LXX and Vg., who added "for she was dead" in v. 28. (Is this a morbid parody of Saul's mustering of Israel, 1 Sam 11?) The abuse of the woman by her husband, her host, and the mob reflects Israel's moral and spiritual deterioration.

20:1-17, The Tribes Assemble Against Benjamin. All Israel responds to the crime by assembling at Mizpah "as one man." "Dan to Beersheba" is a conventional designation for the northern and southern extent of Israel; Gilead refers to northern Transjordan. Mizpah was a sanctuary on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin. For the first time in Judges, we have something that looks like a tribal confederation taking united action in response to the crime of one of its members. The historical value of the account is questionable, however; it has been suggested that an original story about warfare resulting from rivalry between Ephraim and Benjamin has been expanded to include all Israel. The figures given for the number of warriors involved are greatly exaggerated.

The Levite's testimony (vv. 4-6) confirms his baseness. He magnifies the threat to himself ("me they sought to kill," v. 5) and neglects to mention that he remained in the safety of the house while "my wife they ravished." His final statement, "and she is dead," preserves the ambiguity whether the woman was alive or dead when he dismembered her. The tribes march against Benjamin and demand that the criminals be given to them to execute the death penalty. The Benjaminites refuse, thereby assuming solidarity with the guilty, and the battle lines are drawn. The heavy odds against Benjamin are somewhat compensated for by the elite corps of left-handed or ambidextrous men skilled with the sling (v. 16; see also 3:15; 1 Chron. 12:2).

20:18-28, Benjamin Twice Defeats Israel. The Israelites go to Bethel to inquire of God by means of the oracle. Bethel and Dan (see commentary above on 18:27-31) were the two principal sanctuaries of the Northern Kingdom; in 20:27 we learn that the Ark was at Bethel. The question as to which tribe should lead the advance (v. 18) is the same question asked in Judg. 1:1, with regard to the Canaanites. The answer is also the same, indicating the primacy of Judah in these two narratives. Unlike Judg. 1:2, God does not promise victory and, indeed, Benjamin defeats Israel. As in Judg. 2:4, the Israelites weep before God in a ritual lament and inquire again, this time asking not who should attack first but whether they should do battle at all (v. 23). It is a question they should have asked earlier. Again they fight Benjamin, are defeated, and lament before God at Bethel, fasting and offering sacrifices (vv. 24–26). Again they inquire of the oracle, and this time God promises them victory (vv. 27–28).

20:29–48, The Defeat of Benjamin. Two accounts of the same event may have been combined in these verses. On the third day, Israel defeats Benjamin by an ambush similar to the attack on Ai under Joshua (Josh. 8; see also Judg. 9:34–45). Judg. 20:35 attributes victory over Benjamin to God. Only six hundred Benjaminites escape, while Israel destroys the rest of the tribe in what sounds like an implementation of the ban (v. 48), but in this case is war against their own kinspeople!

21:1–25, Wives for Benjamin Obtained Through Violence. Israel again weeps before God at Bethel, ironically this time, not because they could not defeat Benjamin, but precisely because they have (v. 3). They are distressed that one tribe faces extermination, and they question how to find wives for the few Benjaminites who remain (20:47) since they themselves have slain the Benjaminite women (20:48). The solution is to carry out the ban against Jabesh-gilead, which had not joined the war against Benjamin, sparing only four hundred virgins. As these were not enough, and everyone else was under oath not to give their daughters as wives to Benjamin, the Benjaminite men are told to kidnap wives from the dancers in the annual vintage festival at Shiloh. Since the women would have been stolen rather than given in marriage, their families would not be guilty of breaking the oath. Thus the book of Judges comes to a close with the outrage at Gibeah repeated on a mass scale by the whole assembly of Israel. To punish the violence done to one woman (and the threatened crime against the Levite), the Israelites kill many innocent women, women from Benjamin and women from Jabesh-gilead who are not virgins. They take by force four hundred virgins from Jabesh-gilead and capture others from Shiloh. At the end of Judges, Israel lacks direction; all behave as they please. This is the editor's final word on Israel's plight without a king.

Bibliography

Bal, M. Death and Dissymmetry: The Politics of Coherence in the Book of Judges. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1988.

Boling, R. G. Judges. Anchor Bible, 6A. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975.

Gottwald, N. K. The Hebrew Bible: A Socio-Literary Introduction. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985.

———. The Tribes of Yahweh. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1979.

Gray, J. Joshua, Judges, Ruth. New Century Bible Commentary. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1986.

Malamat, A. "The Period of the Judges." In Vol. 3, Judges, of The World History of the Jewish People. Edited by B. Mazar. Tel Aviv: Massada, 1971. Pp. 129–63.

Mayes, A. D. H. Judges. Old Testament Guides. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985.

Polzin, R. Moses and the Deuteronomist: A Literary Study of the Deuteronomistic History. New York: Seabury, 1980.

Soggin, J. A. Judges. Old Testament Library. Translated by J. Bowden. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1981.

RUTH

A D E L E B E R L I N

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Ruth is a short narrative independent of the long narrative running from Genesis through 2 Kings but similar to it in style and outlook. There are two main traditions regarding the placement of Ruth in the canon (→ Canon). In Christian Bibles, which derive their order from the Septuagint and Vulgate, Ruth is found after Judges, for this is the period in which the story is set. Jewish Bibles follow the tradition of placing Ruth in the Writings, as the Masoretes did. Although there is some variation in the Masoretic ordering of the books in this section, in modern printed Hebrew Bibles Ruth is the second of the Five Scrolls, because it is read publicly on the festival of Shavuot (Weeks, Pentecost), the second festival in the year commencing with Passover.

According to rabbinic tradition, the main theme of Ruth is chesed, loyalty or faithfulness born of a sense of caring and commitment. Chesed is a Hebrew term used to describe God's relationship to Israel as well as the relationship among members of a family or a community. All of the main characters in the book, Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz, act with chesed. Naomi, although she technically had no responsibility for her widowed daughters-in-law, was concerned that they find new husbands; she went out of her way to see that Ruth did. Ruth, on her part, had no obligation to Naomi, but she remained steadfastly with her, even giving up her native land and religion; all of her actions were directed toward finding support and protection for Naomi. Boaz too took upon himself a commitment beyond what was required; not only was he willing to redeem the family's land, but he was eager to marry Ruth and enable the family name to be perpetuated. God also manifested his chesed, by virtue of which the individuals are repaid for their loyalty by finding security and fulfillment, and the family that came close to destruction finds new life and continuity.

Closely related to the theme of chesed is the theme of family continuity. The male members of Naomi's family who might normally be expected to perpetuate the family are quickly removed from the story, and it is through the women, an elderly widow and a non-Israelite, that family continuity is achieved. Nor is this the only time in the Bible that such is the case. The book of Ruth calls attention to its similarity to the story of Judah and Tamar (in Gen. 38; cf.

Ruth 4:12) and to the matriarchs Rachel and Leah, "who built the house of Israel" (4:11). The first two chapters of Exodus also recount how, through the fertility and quick action of the women, Israel survived and grew to nationhood.

Another important element in the book, related to the national interest, is David and his ancestry. The book culminates with the Davidic genealogy and the last word in the book is "David." In addition, the Judean and Bethlehemite interests are strongly felt at several points in the story. The book may be read as a glorification of David through the glorification of his ancestors. What fine stock the ideal king of Israel is descended from! And how fitting for his ancestors that they were to produce a figure like David.

A secondary motif that runs through the story is emptiness/fullness. This applies to the land—famine/harvest—and to the main characters, Ruth and Naomi, who first suffer death and then celebrate birth. Naomi gives expression to this thought in 1:21: "I went away full and the Lord has brought me back empty." On both a human and a national level, in small and large ways, emptiness is replaced by fullness and completion.

The book of Ruth is a masterpiece of literary artistry. This short narrative, often called a short story or novella, seems disarmingly simple on the surface, but, like most biblical narrative, it is complex and sophisticated. The plot contains numerous symmetries and operates on various levels: the romantic, the quasi-legal, the familial-national, and the moral-religious. The characters are developed through their speech and actions; little of their inner life or the narrator's evaluation is expressed. Like most of the Bible, Ruth is written with great economy. Words are chosen carefully and their recurrence often signals significant connections or developments. Frequently occurring terms, like chesed and go'el (Heb., "redeemer"), point to the main concepts of the story. Although Ruth is not poetry, its language is elevated and elegant. The book leaves readers, as it leaves its characters, with a sense of fulfillment.

It is difficult to establish the date of composition accurately. Certainly in its final form, Ruth cannot predate David, although the story is set in an earlier period. Because of its affinity in language and content to some of the early parts of the Bible such as Genesis, Judges, Samuel, and the prose sections of Job, it is often dated between 950 and 700 B.C. If we interpret it as a glorification of David, then its date might be closer to the time of David, around 950-900 B.C. The period of David and Solomon saw a great flourishing of Israelite culture and the formation of some of the earliest parts of the Bible. It seems appropriate that Ruth might have been a product of this literary effort.

On the other hand, certain late linguistic features, especially Aramaisms, have prompted some scholars to date the book to the exilic or postexilic period (the sixth century B.C. and later). This view is reinforced by those who interpret the book as a polemic against the decree of Ezra that the returning exiles should divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 9-10; Neh. 13:23-29). This interpretation seems forced, but the exilic and postexilic periods were times during which many national traditions were preserved and became a source of comfort and encouragement. Many people looked forward to the reestablishment of the Davidic dynasty, and they would no doubt have derived hope from the book of Ruth.

It is, of course, entirely possible that the book was composed in an early period and was subsequently edited, thereby acquiring late characteristics as well. The uncertainty regarding its date of origin, however, does not diminish the book's significance or the pleasure that we derive from reading it, for these are timeless.

COMMENTARY

1:1-5, Setting the Scene. The story is set in the days of the judges, before the monarchy, but its pastoral tone is in marked contrast to the wars and violence of the book of Judges. A famine provides the impetus for the migration of a Bethlehemite family to Moab (cf. Gen. 12:10 and 42:1-2 for other famines that lead to sojourns in foreign lands).

After having been introduced by their positions in the family—husband, wife, sons—the characters are introduced by names whose meanings appear to be symbolic: Elimelech, “My God is king,” this being the period before human kings ruled Israel; Naomi, “Pleasantness,” a woman whose lot in life turns bitter (cf. 1:20) and then fortunate; then Mahlon, “Weakness, Sickness,” and Chilion, “Annihilation, Consumption,” sons who die young and leave no offspring. Although Elimelech is named first, Naomi quickly becomes the focus of attention and other characters are named in reference to her: “Naomi’s husband,” “her two sons,” “her daughters-in-law.”

Since there was no ban on marriages between Israelites and foreigners in the early biblical period (cf. Joseph, Moses, David, and Solomon), it is quite natural that Naomi’s sons should marry local Moabite girls. From the point of view of the dynamics of the story, however, this fact is crucial, for Ruth’s loyalty to Naomi’s family is extraordinary precisely because Ruth is not an Israelite. The name “Ruth” probably derives from the word for “friend, companion”; Orpah means “back of the neck” (as seen when one turns away). The character of Orpah, who is not bad but represents the norm or the expected, serves as a contrast to Ruth, who goes far beyond the norm in maintaining her loyalty.

1:6-15, Plans to Return to Bethlehem. The action of the story commences with Naomi’s intention to return to Bethlehem now that the famine is over. Since she cannot provide for her widowed daughters-in-law, she begs them to return to their own mothers’ homes where they may find security in the form of remarriage. Both daughters-in-law initially refuse to leave, and this elicits a moving plea from Naomi (1:12-13) in which she calls Ruth and Orpah “daughters” (as she does Ruth throughout) and stresses that if she could have more sons for them to marry, she would gladly marry and bear children. But, alas, she is too old; and even if she were not, Ruth and Orpah would have to remain husbandless until these children were grown. This may seem to refer to the levirate marriage (see Deut. 25:5-10), but, since these new sons would not be paternal brothers of the deceased, as the levirate law of Deuteronomy requires, it is more likely that these words are exaggerated rhetoric, whereby Naomi attempts to convince her daughters-in-law how hopeless it is for them to look to her for support. There is also a note of bitter frustration on Naomi’s part that she could not provide for Ruth and Orpah. Orpah is persuaded to depart at this point, but Ruth remains steadfastly with Naomi. Naomi urges Ruth to follow Orpah’s example, but to no avail.

1:16-18, Whither Thou Goest. In moving rhetoric Ruth pledges her loyalty to Naomi. She will remain with Naomi always: while going and while lodging, in life and in death. In what amounts to a change of identity, from Moabite to Israelite (for there was as yet no formal procedure or even the theoretical possibility for religious conversion), Ruth adopts the people and God of Naomi. Religion was bound up with ethnicity in biblical times; each people had its land and its gods (cf. Mic. 4:5), so that to change religion meant to change nationality. Boaz recognizes the enormity of this in 2:11. Ruth is apparently totally accepted when she comes to Bethlehem, but the narrative continues to refer to her as “the Moabiteess.”

1:19-22, Arrival at Bethlehem. Naomi's return after her long absence creates a stir. She contrasts her name, "Pleasantness," with her present condition, deeming it inappropriate. The motif of emptiness/fullness finds expression in v. 21. Indeed, Naomi is now empty but will be fulfilled at the end of the story. The land, however, which had been emptied by famine, is now enjoying the barley harvest. The harvest sets the scene for the action in the next chapter.

2:1-23, Ruth Gleans in the Field of Boaz

2:1, Boaz. A new character is introduced. As in the case of the other characters, first his status and family connection are given, finally his name. The meaning of "Boaz" is obscure, although it has been explained as "In him there is strength." More important is the fact that he is a man of substance from Elimelech's family.

This chapter and the following one are each composed of three scenes: Ruth and Naomi at home, Ruth with Boaz, and Ruth returns home to Naomi.

2:2, Ruth and Naomi at Home. Ruth tells Naomi that she is willing to go out to glean in the fields. Gleaning is a form of charity in which the poor are permitted to gather the grain left by the harvesters (cf. Lev. 19:9; 23:22; Deut. 24:19). This underscores the poverty of Naomi and Ruth's willingness to support her.

2:3-17, Ruth with Boaz. Ruth happens on the field of Boaz (but readers sense that this is more than coincidence). At this time she does not yet know of Boaz or his relationship to the family. She appears throughout this section as hardworking, humble, and grateful for her good fortune.

Her fortune is indeed good, for Boaz accords her a number of special privileges in an incremental progression. She is invited to glean in his field for the entire harvest instead of moving from estate to estate; the male workers are warned not to bother her; and she is permitted to drink from the workers' water. Later she is invited to share a meal with the harvesters; they are ordered to let her glean among the sheaves, are cautioned not to shame her, and are even told to pull out stalks for her from the bound sheaves.

Most significant is the way in which the relationship between Ruth and Boaz develops. Boaz first refers to Ruth as "a young woman" and then addresses her as "my daughter," the same term used by Naomi, suggesting that Boaz feels a paternal protection toward Ruth. Ruth is at first surprised to have been singled out, since she is a "foreigner"; a wordplay is involved in v. 10: the words "take cognizance of" and "foreigner" are from the same root, nkr. Then, in v. 13, Ruth addresses Boaz as "my lord" and refers to herself as "your maidservant, even though I am not [worthy of being] one of your maidservants." Ruth and Boaz both change their terms of reference, raising Ruth's status vis-à-vis Boaz, but on different planes. Ruth takes herself from foreigner (to whom Boaz has no obligation) to maidservant (to whom Boaz has some obligation); Boaz's terms for Ruth move from "young woman" (neutral) to "daughter" (family). This process will culminate in chap. 3.

2:18-23, Ruth Returns Home to Naomi. The first turning point of the story is reached as Naomi learns that Ruth has gleaned in Boaz's field and Ruth learns of Boaz's family connection. Even before learning Boaz's name, Naomi blesses the one who has taken cognizance of Ruth (using the same term that appeared in 2:10). When she hears that it is Boaz, Naomi blesses God, "who has not abandoned his chesed," and she tells Ruth that Boaz is a relative, in fact, a go'el, a redeemer or family protector. Naomi encourages Ruth to accept the invitation to remain in Boaz's field throughout the harvest.

The go'el, usually translated "redeemer" or "next of kin," is one legally responsible for protecting the interests of the family. His main obligation is to buy land that must be sold or buy back land that has already been sold, so as not to let property be alienated from its original line of ownership (cf. Lev. 25:25; Jer. 32:7-10).

3:1-18, At the Threshing Floor. As in the previous chapter, there are three scenes, the second being the longest and most important. The tension escalates as the relationship between Ruth and Boaz develops.

3:1-5, Ruth and Naomi at Home. This section parallels 2:2, but here it is Naomi who takes the initiative. She seeks "security" for Ruth, meaning a husband, as she did in 1:9. "Boaz our kinsman with whose girls you were" is immediately juxtaposed, forcing Ruth and the reader to view Boaz not as a father/master, but as a potential husband. Naomi does not call Boaz "our relative" or a go'el, as in chap. 2, but "our kinsman," as the narrator did in 2:1 when introducing Boaz. Naomi continues by outlining a plan whereby Ruth will approach Boaz at night at the threshing floor. The nature of this meeting is left ambiguous; there are undercurrents of a sexual encounter mixed with matters of family business and propriety.

3:6-15, Ruth with Boaz. During the harvest season the grain was threshed in the evening wind at an appropriate spot in the field and then guarded to prevent damage or theft. For this reason, Boaz was lying at night at the threshing floor. Ruth, doing as Naomi told her, approached him and "uncovered the place of his feet" (this may be a euphemism). It was perhaps Naomi's intention that Ruth should make her presence known to Boaz after he had eaten his dinner and lain down, but before he had fallen asleep. Boaz, however, does not become aware of Ruth until about midnight, when he is startled to find a woman "at the place of his feet." He asks, "Who are you?" a direct request for personal identification, in contrast to "Whose young woman is this?" in 2:5, which seeks to put Ruth in her family context. Naomi uses the same phrase, "Who are you?" in a different sense in 3:16. Ruth's response to Boaz is significant but difficult to interpret: "I am Ruth your handmaid; spread your skirt/wing over your handmaid for you are a go'el." Ruth has raised herself from "maidservant" (2:13) to "handmaid" and has come to seek Boaz's protection in his role as go'el. "Spreading the skirt/wing" means taking one under protection, into the family; it recalls the same phrase used by Boaz in 2:12 in reference to God's protection. It is not clear whether Ruth is specifically proposing marriage here or not.

Opposite: Scenes from the story of Ruth; Ruth gleaning after reapers in the field during the barley harvest (bottom) and Ruth with Boaz (top); illustration from the Admont Bible, ca. A.D. 1130-1150.

Boaz responds to this potentially embarrassing situation by making it seem that Ruth is doing him a favor rather than the reverse. He declares Ruth blessed (as Naomi did Boaz in 2:20) and views her coming to him as another, even greater, act of chesed. Indeed it is, for it shows that Ruth's actions were not motivated by selfishness, but out of family solidarity. Boaz adds that Ruth is a "worthy woman" (Heb. 'eshet chayil), and by using this term he equates Ruth's status with his own; the narrator had used a counterpart term meaning "man of substance" (Heb. 'ish gibbor chayil) to describe Boaz in 2:1. Ruth is no longer a servant or a daughter, but a woman fit to marry Boaz. The major turning point of the story has been reached.

But just when we think a happy ending is in sight, we are told that there is another go'el, a closer kinsman who has a prior claim. Boaz bids Ruth "lodge [here] tonight"—this is the first time that Ruth has not "lodged" with Naomi, as in her declaration of 1:16—and promises to clear up the matter of who will act as go'el. He sends Ruth home early in the morning, thus protecting her reputation, and again provides her with food.

3:16-18, Ruth Returns Home to Naomi. Naomi greets Ruth with the words "Who are you?" meaning "What has happened? Has your status changed?" As before, Ruth tells Naomi what has transpired, emphasizing that the grain was sent especially for Naomi, for Boaz had said, "Do not return empty-handed to your mother-in-law." There is no record of his having said these words; Ruth wants to reinforce Naomi's positive image of Boaz as caring for the family. Naomi expresses her confidence that Boaz will expedite the matter of the redemption.

4:1-17, Go'el, Marriage, Progeny. The other go'el, left nameless in the story, is located by Boaz at the city gate, the commercial center of the town, and apprised in the presence of witnesses of the legal situation. The legal situation is complicated and puzzling. First of all, we are informed for the first time that Naomi has put up for sale or has already sold land that belonged to Elimelech. The go'el would have the first option, indeed the obligation, to buy it. The nameless go'el is willing to do his duty in the matter of the land but is put off by a further complication. According to Boaz, the go'el who acquires the land also acquires the obligation to perpetuate the name of the deceased on his inheritance. Now this sounds like the law of the levirate, in which the widow of a man who died childless marries the brother of the deceased so that their firstborn may perpetuate the deceased's name (Deut. 25:5-10). If the transaction narrated in 4:1-12 is a form of the levirate, however, it is a form at variance with Deut. 25:5-10, which pertains only to the brother of the deceased. Neither Boaz nor the nameless go'el is the brother of Mahlon (nor apparently of Elimelech, despite Boaz's use of the phrase "our brother, Elimelech"), and therefore neither would be obligated to marry Ruth. Whatever the precise legal background may be, Boaz's obscure warning in 4:5 has the happy effect of dissuading the primary go'el from acquiring the land, so that when Boaz marries Ruth, as seems to have been his intention since 3:11, he, Ruth, and their children retain possession of the family inheritance. Unless one accepts an emendation in the text of 4:5, there is no mention in this verse of marriage. When Boaz makes his legal declaration in 4:9-10, however, he acquires both the land and Ruth as a wife. He has thus extended his role as go'el beyond the norm and thereby matches with his chesed the family loyalty already manifested by Ruth.

An ancient legal practice validating the transfer of real estate is noted in 4:7-8. Apparently it was no longer practiced by the time the book was written or edited. The removal and transfer of the shoe is an added confusion with the loosening of the shoe in the ceremony of rejection of the levirate (Deut. 25:9-10).

Wishes for progeny and communal status are given; they express the continuity with the patriarchs, hopes for many children, and continued prominence in Bethlehem. A more specific connection is made with Tamar and Judah because Boaz (and David) is a descendant of Judah; and through Ruth, as through Tamar, the family lineage is rescued and perpetuated.

A son is born to Boaz and Ruth. He is Naomi's comfort and fulfillment and the family's continuity and protector. Naomi takes him to her bosom and the women of the town proclaim "A son is born to Naomi." This helps to keep Naomi a central character; this is the culmination of Naomi's story no less than Ruth's.

4:18-22, The Davidic Genealogy. A brief genealogy listing three generations from Obed to David concludes the action of the story (v. 17). This is followed by a longer, more formal genealogy beginning with Perez, the son of Judah, and ending ten names later with David. Boaz occupies the significant seventh position. There is no mention of Mahlon, "the name of the deceased." There is no consensus on whether this genealogy was part of the original story or a later addition. In either case, it serves to focus on David, either to explain and legitimize David's ancestry or to legitimize a wonderful story about otherwise obscure people by linking them to the great national hero.

Bibliography

Beattie, D. R. G. Jewish Exegesis of the Book of Ruth. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1977.

Berlin, A. Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative. Sheffield: Almond, 1983.

Campbell, E. F. Ruth. Anchor Bible, 7. Garden City: Doubleday, 1975.

Gordis, R. "Love, Marriage, and Business in the Book of Ruth." A Light Unto My Path: Old Testament Studies in Honor of Jacob M. Myers. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974. Pp. 241-64.

Rauber, D. F. "Literary Values in the Bible: The Book of Ruth." Journal of Biblical Literature 89 (1970): 27-37.

Sasson, J. M. Ruth, A New Translation with a Philological Commentary and a Formalist-Folklorist Interpretation. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1979.

1 SAMUEL

ROBERT L. COHN

INTRODUCTION

Literary Analysis

The identification of the First Book of Samuel as a separate book derives from the Septuagint (LXX), in which Samuel and Kings are each divided into two parts and together constitute the four "Books of Kingdoms." Hebrew tradition, on the other hand, did not recognize 1 Samuel as an individual book until the printed edition of the Bomberg Bible of 1517. Thus the literary analysis of 1 Samuel apart from 2 Samuel is necessarily truncated, for the two books were transmitted and canonized together. But, by the same token, analysis of 1-2 Samuel apart from 1-2 Kings is incomplete, because 1-2 Kings completes Samuel's story. In short, every literary unit in the Bible grows in meaning from the ever larger literary contexts in which one considers it.

Although the division of Samuel into two books may seem artificial, 1 Samuel does possess its own literary logic, which begins with the birth of Samuel and ends with the death of Saul. In fact, the book falls clearly into two parts centering upon these two figures: chaps. 1-12 chart Samuel's career from his birth to his farewell address; and chaps. 13-31 start with the notice of Saul's reign and conclude with the account of his death. But this division is not rigid: Saul is introduced as early as chap. 9 and Samuel continues to function after chap. 12. Yet these appearances are subordinated to the stories of Samuel and Saul, respectively. Similarly, the second account of Saul's death in 2 Samuel 1 properly forms part not of Saul's story, but of David's. Unlike the first account of Saul's death in 1 Samuel 31, the second account is presented not as an objective narration but as a post factum, tendentious report by a messenger to David. Only in 2 Samuel 1, after Saul's death, does David function independently—in 1 Samuel he is regarded always as the servant of Saul and his story is always subordinated to Saul's.

At the same time, we must not over-emphasize the break between the two parts of 1 Samuel. The narrative strategy of the book depends upon the weaving of stories of successors into the lives of their predecessors: Samuel's into Eli's, Saul's into Samuel's, and David's into Saul's. In each case the narrative aims to reflect God's readiness to provide new leadership for his people as old institutions and individuals fail. With a sense of historical evolution as well as ideological revolution, the narrative of 1 Samuel moves us in stages toward the Davidic dynasty.

Composition

The classic theory of composition of 1 Samuel, fully articulated by Julius Wellhausen, perhaps the greatest critical scholar of the Bible in the nineteenth century, divides the book into an early promonarchical source and a late antimonarchical source. The opposition of these two sources is most visible in the account of Saul's accession to kingship (chaps. 8-12), in which Samuel's strenuous opposition to the people's request for a king is interwoven with his enthusiastic support for Saul. Later theories insist that the source division is far more complex, that more than two sources are represented, and that compilation and redaction took place in several stages.

The final stage is the most evident. Most scholars agree that the last hands to work on 1 Samuel belonged to Deuteronomists, those anonymous writers and compilers of the books beginning with Joshua and ending with Kings that tell the story of Israel's life as a nation in its land. Unlike other parts of this Deuteronomistic History, however, 1-2 Samuel seems not to have been much edited or expanded in this last stage. The strict structure and formulaic introductions and conclusions so apparent in Judges and Kings are lacking here. Yet certain characteristic Deuteronomistic features surface: for example, the rehearsal of Israel's history of disobedience culminating in the need of a decision for or against God (1 Sam. 12:6-25) and the oracle against a "house" by a "man of God" (1 Sam. 2:27-36). If the Deuteronomists made only minor repairs to the materials of 1 Samuel, it was because those materials already fit their agenda well. True to the Deuteronomistic understanding of the covenant, these pre-Deuteronomistic traditions showed how Saul's disobedience to God's command eventually led to his destruction, while David's faithfulness was rewarded by God. Furthermore, these materials subordinated the "secular" leaders to the word of God as mediated by the prophet Samuel.

Most scholars also agree that the materials in 1 Samuel came from originally independent narratives such as the tales of the Ark, the Saul cycle, and the rise of David. The Ark narrative appears to have been an Israelite version of a common ancient Near Eastern type of tale about captured deities wreaking havoc upon the enemy captors. The Saul cycle likely arose among partisans of Saul eager to champion his political cause and his military prowess. Only as a result of this cycle's combination with the David materials did Saul become a pitiful psychotic with no chance of success. The romanticized story of David's rise from a shepherd of sheep to a shepherd of God's people may have been composed during his reign to legitimate him against strong opposition or may be part of a much later attempt to underscore his exemplary qualities.

Between these earliest materials and the Deuteronomistic redaction, there must have been other contributions to what became 1 Samuel, but here there is less agreement among biblical scholars. One popular view posits a prophetic history in which the earliest materials were arranged in three sections: the story of Samuel (chaps. 1-7), in which the prophet Samuel replaces the priest Eli as the leader of all Israel; the story of Saul (chaps. 8-15), in which the prophet Samuel acts as both king maker and king breaker; and the story of David's rise (chaps. 16-31), in which God chooses his own king whom the prophet Samuel anoints privately (chap. 16) and, finally, confirms to Saul (chap. 28). In this history the prophet functions as sole intercessor even after the kingship is established with God's blessing. This focus on the prophet's role may reflect a northern Israelite perspective rather than the perspective of Jerusalem where dynastic succession was well established. According to this view, the prophetic history nicely served the purposes of the Deuteronomists.

Importance

1 Samuel documents momentous changes in the character of the Israelite polity that took place roughly between 1050 and 1000 B.C. The book traces the beginnings of monarchy, the central institution of Judah and the cause of and the evidence for God's blessings upon Israel. It shows how this institution, which many from the very outset must have perceived as alien to Israelite identity and to the covenant tradition of early Israel, came to be not only accepted by Israel but embraced by God. The book depicts the difficult transition from rule by charisma to rule by dynastic kingship by showing the inadequacy of judge, priest, and prophet to provide the stability necessary for national development. The book also explains the difficult problem of why, despite God's approval in principle of monarchy and his selection of the first king, that king failed and a new start had to be made under David. Saul is shown as a foil to David, who can do no wrong for he alone is the man after God's own heart.

The treatments of the central personalities of the book constitute paradigmatic studies in the highly nuanced biblical vision of the relationship between divine control and human initiative. Thus Samuel, Saul, and David are all "chosen," but they exercise their freedom under God very differently. Samuel protests the people's rejection of him to God but carries out God's order to anoint Saul king. Saul sees himself caught between the demands of the God who chose him and those of the people he rules and shows what happens to a leader who gets his priorities reversed. David's success depends on both God's favor and his own acumen; the complex interrelationship between these forms much of the dynamic of the engaging David cycle. So leadership under God has many human faces. 1 Samuel reads as a work deeply sensitive to the uses and abuses of human power and to the abiding ineluctability of divine election.

---

COMMENTARY

---

1:1-12:25

The Life of Samuel

The first part of 1 Samuel focuses on the life of the prophet Samuel, taking us from his birth (chap. 1) to his farewell speech (chap. 12). After chap. 12 the spotlight shifts to the first king, Saul, although Samuel plays a supporting role until his death in chap. 25. Samuel functions as priest, judge, and prophet—a kind of composite of premonarchical leadership roles. Like Moses, in whose image he is in many ways drawn, he intercedes with God on behalf of Israel. Although he surrenders his governing role to the king, his intercessory role remains crucial. Indeed, the books of Samuel are written not from a royal but from a prophetic perspective that accepts the institution of monarchy but is critical of individual kings. Although the torch is passed to Saul and then to David, the book is rightly named after Samuel.

1:1-4:1a

The Coming of Age of Samuel

Unlike the accounts of many biblical figures who claim our attention only after they assume leadership, the story of Samuel, like those of Moses and Samson, begins before his birth. In this section the young and maturing Samuel is contrasted with the old and decaying Eli to underscore the dramatic new leadership Samuel will bring to Israel. The narrative heightens the contrast by opposing the piety of Samuel's parents to the corruption of Eli's sons. The climax of the section is reached in the first and only encounter of Samuel and Eli—when they come to terms with the invasive divine word that officially launches Samuel's career.

1:1-2:11, Samuel and His Parents. The story of Samuel's birth establishes both the piety of the family from which he hails and the reason that he, like Moses, comes to grow up in the house of the one he will displace. The tale begins with an unhurried narration aiming to root Samuel firmly in Israelite tradition both genealogically (1:1) and gynecologically (1:2), for like Isaac, Jacob, and Samson he is born of a long-childless mother. Next, Elkanah's piety is indicated by the description of his annual pilgrimage to Shiloh and by the special sacrificial portion that he reserved for his beloved but barren wife Hannah. The verb forms in 1:7b signal the end of the parenthetical background (1:4b-7a) about Elkanah's yearly ritual and the beginning of the story's action. Thus, the tale starts: "One day when Elkanah sacrificed . . . [Hannah] wept and did not eat" (1:4a, 7b). Despite Elkanah's compassionate response to her (1:8), Hannah now turns to God to pray for a son. Eli sees her, and the narrator, by contrasting our privileged view of Hannah's behavior with Eli's external observations, makes Eli look obtuse. Yet the priest reacts generously to Hannah's explanation, though she reveals nothing of the content of her prayer and vow. Ironically, the petition that he blesses will directly impinge upon him and his house. Eli is thus introduced as decent but lacking in-sight, a characterization that subsequent events will confirm.

Having devoted considerable attention to the tradition of the plight of the barren but beloved co-wife, the narrator swiftly telegraphs the conception and birth of the long-desired son (1:19b-20). No ordinary conception this but a joint venture, for after "Elkanah knew Hannah his wife, the LORD remembered her." His "remembering her" here means more than mere memory; it suggests the common north-west Semitic notion of a god's kindly treatment of a suppliant. Note that there is no "annunciation"; God enters the story not through speech but conception. Hannah alone knows what she had prayed for, and she alone sees the child as an answer to that prayer. The focus thus falls on Hannah's faith expressed both in the meaning of "Samuel," the name she gave the child ("because from the LORD I have asked him," 1:20), and in her fulfillment of her vow (1:21-28).

The emphasis on Hannah's piety continues in the narrative of the presentation of Samuel to Eli (1:21-28) and in the prayer following (2:1-10). The narrative is told from Hannah's perspective—Elkanah is identified as "her husband" (1:22, 23) and Samuel as "her son" (1:23). Refusing to accompany "the man Elkanah and all his household" to Shiloh, she stays behind until she weans Samuel and is ready to deliver him to the priest. Then alone she treks to Shiloh and confronts Eli again. Elkanah is noticeably absent as Hannah returns to God at Shiloh what she received from God at Shiloh. Only at the very end of the scene do we hear that Elkanah was there too (2:11), a silent partner as his wife fulfills her vow and puts her son in the service of God.

The psalm that Hannah prays (2:1-10), usually regarded by critics as a late insertion, serves well to conclude Hannah's story and to preface the books of Samuel, for it celebrates the divine justice that reverses human expectations. It looks back to the barren woman (2:5) who has given birth, and it looks ahead to the king (i.e., David) whom God will empower (2:10). The movement of 1-2 Samuel is nicely encapsulated in the inclusio formed by the word "horn" in the first and last verses of the psalm: the poet begins with Hannah's good fortune ("my horn is raised up in the LORD," 2:1) and ends with the success of the king ("and he will raise up the horn of his anointed one," 2:10). As an expression of Hannah's thanksgiving, the psalm thus also sets the theme of the entire book.

2:12-36, Eli and His Sons. We turn from a tale of a mother's triumph to one of a father's tragedy; Eli's woe follows hard upon Hannah's joy. The narrator identifies the sons of Eli (whose names were mentioned earlier [1:3]) as "sons of Belial" (2:12), a derogatory epithet meaning "perverse" that Hannah earlier disclaimed in responding to Eli's charge (1:16). Next their habitual sin is detailed: they flout the "law of the priests" (2:13; stated here in legal rhetorical form) by greedily demanding the sacrificial meat and denying God his due.

By means of juxtaposition the narrator contrasts these "young men" (Heb. na'arim), sinful in "the LORD's sight" (pene Yhwh, 2:17), with the "boy" (na'ar) Samuel, who ministers "before the LORD" (pene Yhwh, 2:18). Indeed the reports about little Samuel's physical and spiritual growth (2:11, 18, 21, 26; 3:1) punctuate this tale of the corruption of Eli's sons. As Eli's natural sons degenerate in our eyes, his "adoptive" son blossoms. Meanwhile Samuel's natural parents have not abandoned him. The narrative stresses Hannah's ongoing maternal concern by mentioning her annual visits and gifts to her son (2:19). Hannah exits from the narrative with a notice of her remarkable fertility (2:21) preceding the report of Eli's sons' fornication (2:22).

Eli finally learns of his sons' perversity not from his none too keen observation but from the people. In both the narration (2:22) and in Eli's own words (2:23–24), the text stresses that Eli does not see himself but hears from others about his sons. Clearly he is not in control of his own family, let alone of his people. And his protests to his sons fall on deaf ears (2:25), deaf because God has his own plans for them. Eli asks his sons, "But if it is against the LORD that a person sins, who will pray for him?" (2:25). Though Eli asks the question rhetorically to condemn his sons, the answer ironically is hinted at in the next verse. There we are reminded that "the young man Samuel grew and prospered, with the LORD and with people" (2:26) at the same time that Eli's sons are sinning against people and God. Though there is no help for Eli's sons, Samuel will act precisely as intercessor later in the narrative by praying for the people. That Eli cannot even imagine such intercession is a sure indication that new leadership is needed.

The end of this unit (2:27–36) is an oracle against the house of Eli by an unnamed man of God. Its length and style identify it as a contribution of the Deuteronomistic writer eager to show God's tight control over events (cf. 1 Kings 13). This oracle appears to look ahead to Saul's massacre of the Elide priests of Nob (1 Sam. 2:31; cf. 22:6–23), the escape of Abiathar alone (2:33; cf. 22:20–23), and Solomon's banishing of Abiathar from Jerusalem (cf. 1 Kings 2:26–27). Here Eli is held directly responsible for his sons' behavior (1 Sam. 2:29), so that God appears justified in decimating and demoting Eli's house. To confirm the accuracy of these long-range predictions, a short-range sign is offered: the death of Eli's two sons on the same day (2:34; cf. 1 Kings 13:3). So when these two degenerates next appear (1 Sam. 4:4), we know that their days are numbered. Hannah's song echoes in this oracle: one house will be cut down and a faithful priest raised up (2:35). But though we expect Samuel to be this new priest—indeed, the narrator reiterates his priestly behavior immediately following the oracle (3:1)—events belie our expectation. The oracle rather looks ahead to the installation of Zadok and his house to replace the deposed Abiathar (cf. 1 Kings 2:35).

3:1–4:1a, Eli and Samuel. With Samuel's parents blessed and Eli's sons cursed, the text now turns to the encounter between the two principals. The pregnant stillness of the first verse hints that that encounter will be climactic: neither divine word nor prophetic vision breaks through these days. Eli, already shown as blind to his sons' deeds, is now physically blind as well. But it is not quite dark for Samuel—or for Israel—because the lamp still burns. The old man lies sleeping while the young lad is awake to the word of God. There is a comic touch to this scene: God speaks while his appointed priest sleeps and the young man Samuel races between them trying to figure things out. Just as Eli misread the meaning of Hannah's moving lips, so too does he misunderstand the source of the persistent voice Samuel is hearing. But similarly, just as he accepts Hannah's explanation, so now he accepts God's judgment against his house (3:18). God's oracle here is like a précis of the one in chap. 2, and again Eli is held responsible for his sons' misdeeds.

The chapter ends with the solution to the problem stated in 3:1. There "the word of the LORD was precious" and Israel lived with divine silence. But now Samuel becomes a channel for the word of the LORD and his reputation spreads throughout the land. So although Eli and his sons still live, they are no longer in control. The center of gravity has shifted to Samuel.

4:1b–7:17

The Philistine Interlude

But Samuel does not take over directly. In this section Samuel is depicted as a "judge" (7:15) who, following the pattern in the book of Judges, saves Israel from its enemies. Thus the Philistine defeat of Israel (4:10) precedes Samuel's assumption of leadership of an Israel leaderless for a formulaic twenty years (7:2). This section begins with Israel's loss to the Philistines and old Eli's death (4:10–18) and ends with Israel's triumph over the Philistines under Samuel's leadership (7:3–14). Between defeat and victory the scene shifts to Philistine territory for the tale of the adventures of the captured Ark of the covenant. This originally independent narrative, in which neither Shiloh nor Samuel figures, is fit into the space between the end of Eli's priesthood and the beginning of Samuel's judgeship. With clear allusions to the story of the plagues in Egypt, this narrative humorously shows God's power within the enemy camp in preparation for the Ark's "exodus" and Israel's victory under Samuel.

4:1b–22, The Defeat of Israel. Two tragedies are interwoven here: the national and the personal. Israel goes down to the Philistines (4:1–11), and Eli and his daughter-in-law die, though for different reasons, as a result (4:12–22). Linking the two tragedies is the Ark of the covenant. The report of its capture by the Philistines occurs midway through this unit and both caps the defeat of Israel and precipitates the death of Eli (→ Philistines). The chapter begins with the unexpected slaughter of Israelites by the Philistines (4:2) and the elders' call for the Ark (4:3), which was believed to ensure Yhwh's presence in the battle. Lest there be any doubt about this motivation, the narrator calls the Ark by its full name: "the ark of the covenant of the LORD of hosts who is enthroned upon the cherubim" (4:4). Ominously, though, the already cursed (2:34) sons of Eli accompany the Ark to battle.

In 4:6 the scene shifts to the Philistine camp where we see the Philistine reaction to the Ark. In their benighted pagan way they assume that Israel is polytheistic, but they do correctly identify the Ark with incomparable divine power. The identification of these "gods" with those that plagued the Egyptians (4:8) foreshadows the plagues that will soon strike the Philistines themselves. By stressing the Philistines' great fear of God, expressed in their emphatic direct address (4:7-9), the author allows them to defeat the Israelites but does not compromise God's power.

Meanwhile back at Shiloh Eli awaits word of the battle (4:13), "watching," though, we soon discover, he cannot see (4:15). In a scene calculated to draw out the tragic effect of the new bad news, the messenger first informs the city and only then approaches Eli (4:14). Then he repeats his credentials twice as if trying to avoid what he is about to say (4:16). At last he gives his report (4:17), but he reverses the chronological order of the last two disasters as given by the narrator (4:11). Though his intent may be to soften the blow, the climactic news that the Ark has been captured topples Eli and kills him. Not his sons' death but the Ark's capture pushes him over the edge; our last view of him is again as a pious though powerless priest. And the narrator concludes his life with the formulaic conclusion of a judge's reign (4:18), for, from the Deuteronomistic perspective, every major figure between Joshua and Saul was a judge.

In a kind of human interest footnote to the death of Eli, the author recounts the impact of the events on Eli's daughter-in-law. Only after Hophni and Phinehas are dead are they differentiated by the information that Phinehas is survived by a pregnant widow. The narrator reverses the order of disasters yet again, putting the death of her husband last (4:19). And though we might think that it is this personal tragedy that sends her into premature labor and sudden death, her own last words suggest otherwise. She names her son Ichabod in memory of the lost Ark (4:21) and mourns its capture as she expires (4:22). This sad little incident hammers home the overriding tragedy we have just witnessed.

Finally, it should be noted that Yhwh is completely silent in this chapter. The loss of the battle and the Ark are not attributed to him, nor is his purpose clear in permitting his Ark to be captured. Israel could have suffered for the sins of the house of Eli in some other way. So though the scene ends in death and desperation, we anticipate some explanation for this strange turn of events.

5:1-12, The Hand of God upon the Philistines. That explanation is not long in coming, for our attention is now directed to Philistine country and the manifestation of God's power against the Philistine god Dagon (5:1-5) and against the Philistine people themselves (5:6-12). The first evidence that the capture of the Ark did not signify the humbling of Yhwh comes in a mock battle with Dagon. The Ashdodites, who are shown to understand the Ark as Yhwh's physical representation, set it up beside Dagon in his temple to symbolize Yhwh's honoring of Dagon's might (5:2). But, comically, Dagon is twice found toppled, the second time with hands and head cut off (5:4), a mutilation motif known from Canaanite mythology. Only the results of the battle are reported, not the battle itself, because for a biblical author Yhwh's battle with an idol could only be a mock battle. Yet it is clear both to the Philistines and to us that Yhwh had defeated Dagon just as he defeated Pharaoh, the symbol of the gods of Egypt. And lest there be any doubt, the doubling of Dagon's downfall (5:3, 4), just like the doubling of Joseph's dreams, guarantees that the occurrence was no accident (cf. Gen. 41:32).

Having punished the god, Yhwh turns to punish the people by striking the Ashdodites with plague. A phrase commonly used to refer to plague, "the hand of the LORD was heavy," encloses the action (1 Sam. 5:6, 12; cf. Exod. 9:3; Hab. 3), but here control by the LORD's hand underscores his cutting off of Dagon's hand. The nature of the plague is not altogether clear. The Masoretic scribal tradition read "hemorrhoids" for the written "swellings" (5:6). But the LXX includes a verse here that tells of mice swarming upon the land from the Philistine ships. The combination of mice and swellings has suggested to commentators bubonic plague carried by rats and often spread among sea-coast cities. In any case, the later fashioning of both golden tumors and golden mice (6:4, 5) would seem to presuppose a plague involving both.

The Ark is rapidly passed from Ashdod to Gath to Ekron, and by implication, to the other Philistine cities—Ashkelon and Gaza—as well (see 6:17), bringing tumors and death wherever it goes. Prominent are the cries of fear and desperation of the Philistines (5:7, 8, 10-11) who, like the Egyptians before them (cf. Exod. 12:30-33), want to rid their land of the source of the plague.

6:1-7:1, The Return of the Ark. Just as the biblical storyteller delighted in elaborating the ironic predicament of the Philistines smitten by their prize trophy, so too he relishes detailing the careful plan that the Philistines prepare for returning it. Bypassing the fallen and powerless Dagon, they ask their priests for aid (6:2). The priests respond with an extraordinarily lengthy plan (6:4-9) for sending back the Ark, but also with a test to determine if the source of the plague is really the god of Israel. They propose a "reparation offering" (6:3) to accompany the Ark back to Israelite territory. The five golden tumors and mice serve, on the one hand, as a sacrifice that decontaminates Philistine territory (hence, the need for a new cart and unyoked cows) and, on the other hand, as a payment of tribute symbolically representing the five Philistine lords and their cities. The priests further determine that if the young postpartum cows can, unnaturally, ignore the cries of their newborn calves and proceed without guidance to Beth-shemesh, then it must be Yhwh's power in the Ark that leads them now and that caused the plague in the first place (6:7-9).

Prominent throughout this choral instruction is the parallel to the Exodus story. Thus, just as the Egyptians "sent forth" the Israelites with "golden vessels" (Heb. kele zahab; Exod. 12:35), so too the Ark is to be "sent off" with the "figures of gold" (kele hazzahab; 1 Sam. 6:8). Consciously too the priests recall the Egyptians as a negative example for their countrymen: they are warned not to harden their hearts and be made sport of, as the Egyptians were (6:6; cf. Exod. 10:2).

In 1 Sam. 6:10-16 we see the journey of the Ark and its reception in Beth-shemesh from the Philistine perspective. From their purchase on the border, the Philistines hear nothing; no Israelite dialogue is recorded. Instead, with the Philistines, we watch as the men of Beth-shemesh rejoice (6:13) and sacrifice (6:15). When the Philistines finish their observation and return home (6:16), we too can see nothing further and the scene ends. The appearance of levitical priests, anachronistically here, is probably a late interpolation suggested because Beth-shemesh was a levitical city (→ Levites; Priests).

After a formulaic conclusion and etiology (6:17-18), the story takes a surprising turn. In an epilogue (6:19-7:1), some number of Israelites are slain for looking into the Ark. The tale then ends with a question that points to the theme of the whole: the Ark and its god are not to be taken for granted, owned as a prize possession. The naked power of Yhwh will strike out at Israelite and Philistine alike. So the Ark is sent off to Kiriath-jearim, a town on the border of Judah, Dan, and Benjamin, and put in the charge of someone especially consecrated to care for it. That way, presumably, it will pose no danger. But then, Yhwh would also seem to be set at a distance. To solve this new problem, Samuel reemerges.

7:2-17, Samuel's Intercession. Balancing Israel's defeat at the hands of the Philistines in chap. 4 is Israel's victory over the Philistines here. While the house of Eli fell then, now the star of Samuel rises. And, not coincidentally, Samuel names the place of victory Ebenezer (Heb., "stone of help"; 7:12), the name of the site of the earlier slaughter (4:2, 10).

This unit begins with the predicament of the Ark apparently out of commission and Israel mourning God's absence. Into this scene comes Samuel who initiates a ceremony with Deuteronomistic trappings of a covenant renewal: the disposal of Canaanite icons, a water-pouring rite, the people's admission of guilt, a sacrifice, and prophetic intercession. Samuel's order to put away the foreign gods recalls Joshua's covenant renewal at Shechem (Josh. 24:14), while his care in offering the sacrifice contrasts sharply with the practice of the sinful sons of Eli. Samuel's intercessory role is spotlighted here. "I will intercede on your behalf," he announces (1 Sam. 7:5). He becomes the answer to the question that for Eli was unanswerable (2:25): "Who will intercede for the sinner?" The scene seems to continue the pattern of the book of Judges—apostasy, punishment through the agency of an enemy, cry to the LORD, and deliverance by a judge—though here apostasy follows, not precedes, divine abandonment. By successfully enlisting God's aid, Samuel accomplishes what neither Eli's priesthood nor the Ark could: the elimination of the Philistine threat.

The concluding narration (7:12-17) stresses Samuel's continued intercession: "and so the hand of the LORD was against the Philistines all of Samuel's life" (7:13). Thanks to Samuel, the equilibrium lost when the house of Eli fell apart is restored. Finally, the summary of Samuel's functions and regular circuit (7:15-17) telescopes the rest of his life in preparation for our next view of him as an old man. But also the report of his successful "judging" of Israel sets a backdrop against which the people's demand for a king to "judge" them and fight for them (8:20) appears unwarranted.

8:1-12:25

Samuel Prepares for His Successor

The lion's share of narrative space devoted to Samuel concerns his relationship with his successor, Saul, just as most of Saul's story is enmeshed with David's. The problematic of the book of Samuel is the quest for godly and durable leadership in Israel, so that the transitions between leaders prove to be the flash points of narrative interest. In this section the issues surrounding the introduction of kingship to Israel are brought together. While some circles in Israel regarded this institution as necessary and desirable, others saw it as a threat to inherited tribal traditions. Both perspectives are represented in this section. Sources favorable to Saul are sandwiched in a narrative quite hostile to monarchy. Together they form a five-unit bloc, alternating between anti-king and pro-Saul views. As a result monarchy emerges as an institution fraught with ambiguity. Born out of human rebellion, it is nonetheless supported by God; kingship may bring disaster but also salvation. Samuel appears in this seesaw story as both bitter lame-duck leader and joyful patron of his successor.

8:1-22, The People Request a King. Wayward sons in the Bible frequently bring ruin upon their fathers' houses (e.g., Ham, Abimelech, Absalom), but here the repetition of the motif first with Eli's sons and now with Samuel's points to a larger literary scheme. Just as Eli's two sons abused the priesthood and led to Samuel's judgeship, now Samuel's two sons pervert justice and provoke the people's request for a king. A new order—the monarchy—is about to emerge.

The unit centers on Samuel's lengthy harangue on the evils of kingship (8:10-18). It is bracketed on either side by dialogues in which Samuel intercedes between the elders' demands and God's responses (8:4-9, 19-22). The elders speak as representatives of the people as a whole who will later appear en masse to reap the fruits of the negotiations (10:17-27). Although judicial corruption provides a reasonable motive for the elders' request for new leadership, their blunt style and revolutionary demand conspire to make Samuel the more sympathetic figure. The narrator's neutral comment about Samuel's age (8:1) becomes in their mouths crude and cruel ingratitude when addressed to the man whose intercession had kept the Philistines at bay for a generation (8:5). Moreover, when they request a king "to judge us like all the nations," they show themselves eager to cast off their unique role as God's special people (cf. Deut. 17:14-15). Samuel's reaction reveals for the first time in his story a fragile ego stung by rejection. What reportedly irks Samuel is not the threat to the covenant, the desire to mimic the nations, but only the threat to himself, expressed in the words: "Give us a king to judge us" (1 Sam. 8:6). God rejoins gently that it is not Samuel but he whom the people have rejected. The allusion to the Exodus (8:8) aligns the people's request with an unbroken series of apostasies reaching back to the beginning of Israel.

Samuel's recitation of the excesses of royal rule (8:11-18) begins and ends with ironic jabs at his audience. At the outset he calls his speech "the justice of the king" (8:11) yet details only injustice. And he concludes with the reminder that all this tyranny will be brought to you by "your king whom you have chosen for yourselves" (8:18). Many scholars have argued that this litany of deprivations and persecutions actually reflects the hardships suffered under Solomon and that the passage is a late Deuteronomistic composition. Yet opposition to monarchy as such never again surfaces in Deuteronomistic writings. Moreover, the royal corruption depicted here matches that of Canaanite kings from as early as the Late Bronze Age (ca. 1500-1200 B.C.). So it is more likely that this picture represents the view of those circles who, from the beginning, opposed monarchy, even if our text bears later Deuteronomistic markings.

The unit concludes with the elders' reiteration of their demand and God's reiteration of his order to Samuel to do what they say. God appears reluctant but resigned to the change in leadership, but Samuel, by again seeking God's reassurance, reveals his abiding resentment.

9:1-10:16, Samuel Privately Anoints Saul. Juxtaposed to the account of God's concession to popular outcry stands a folktale about God's gracious provision of a king for his people. With the elders' carping complaint still reverberating, the narrative cuts away to a quiet pastoral scene and the charming story of a man who, in search of his father's lost asses, finds a kingdom instead. This story comes at kingship from a different angle: Samuel is depicted not as national judge but as local seer, not threatened by kingship but embracing God's chosen. Kingship here is all God's idea, not the people's. Unlike chap. 8, in which we saw events through Samuel's eyes, this story proceeds from Saul's point of view. The difference in perspectives is the key to resolving the apparent conflict between the two tales. Saul lacks the readers' privileged access to the elders' request or knowledge of Samuel's pique. Saul experiences only Samuel's solicitude and God's onrushing spirit.

The tale begins with Saul's pedigree (9:1), syntactically identical to the one given Samuel (1:1), but continues not with a birth story but with the mature Saul. This initial parallel marks Saul as, in some sense, Samuel's equal and prepares us for the role about to be thrust upon him. And Saul's distinctive good looks give him a further credential for leadership. The action proper is narrated through Saul's perceptions: we hear his father sending him out (9:3), follow his journeys (9:4), share his anxieties (9:5, 7), and search for an unnamed seer (9:11-13). Only when Saul and his servant actually arrive does the narrator intrude with Samuel's name (9:14) and reveal that Saul's quest for the seer is reciprocated by Samuel's search for him.

Throughout, Saul appears quite childlike, following the lead of others. Initially his servant, presumably his inferior, soothes his anxiety, leads him to the seer, and supplies the gift for him. Then he submits without a word to the instructions of Samuel (9:22-10:8), who dominates the rest of the unit. Although in the tradition of Moses (Exod. 3:11) and Gideon (Judg. 6:15), he questions Samuel's acclamation of him (1 Sam. 9:21), he silently follows Samuel to dinner, to sleep, and to his anointing. The elevation of this simple man is yet another enactment of the lyric of Hannah's song.

If Saul's star is rising, Samuel's is falling. Because he is seen from Saul's perspective, Samuel here lacks the judicial, executive, or military functions he wielded earlier. Samuel only anoints and predicts signs to confirm the legitimacy of the anointment. In fact, before he even appears in this chapter, he is demoted by the very terms used to refer to him. First, the servant tells of a "man of God in this city" (9:6), that is, a local clairvoyant. Then the narrator, in an explanatory gloss (9:9), tells us that the figure formerly called "seer" (Heb. ro'eh) is in his day called "prophet" (nabi). Both terms get deflated in the story. Saul's concern that "we bring" (nabi) a gift to the man of God (9:7) defines the term (by the play on the unrelated homonyms) as one who receives gifts for his services. And though the maidens drawing water call Samuel a "seer," he does not "see" very well. Pointedly, the narrator tells us, "The LORD had opened up the ear of Samuel" (9:15), not the eye, to tell him of Saul's arrival. And even when Samuel sees Saul (9:17), he does not recognize him until God expressly identifies him. Samuel then looks rather ludicrous as he proclaims, "I am the seer" (9:19). The seer of this story sees only what God tells him to see; Samuel here functions purely as an instrument for God's elevation of Saul to "king designate" (nagid).

From the perspective of this unit, monarchy derives exclusively from God's compassion. God's first words to Samuel (9:16) echo that earlier summons to Moses before the Exodus. There too he "saw" his people and "heard their cry come up to me" (Exod. 3:9). Now the Philistines are the new Egyptians, oppressing God's people and calling forth God's salvation. Saul is a new Moses. Monarchy here presents no challenge to the ancient traditions; it simply fulfills God's promise to his people to be with them. The "king designate" takes his place in a long line of divinely chosen saviors, not, as in the previous chapter, as the symbol of the people's latest rebellion against God. The hand of God lurks here in subtle ways too: a coin is found to give to the prophet (9:8) and maidens appear to point the way to the seer (9:11-13). But these are no chance occurrences. The onrush of God's breath upon Saul confirms to him all that Samuel has told him. Indeed, to all present he becomes another person (10:11-12), no longer recognizable as the "son of Kish" but as an ecstatic to be identified in terms of his prophetic "father" (the leader of a group of prophets).

As positive as the story is toward Saul, it leaves us wondering just a bit about what the future holds. Saul has been anointed privately as nagid (Heb., "king designate") but the public "election" as melek ("king") still lies ahead. And Samuel's warning that Saul must wait at Gilgal for seven days for Samuel to come to offer sacrifice raises the specter of trouble ahead in light of Saul's already demonstrated childlike behavior. The unit is rounded off by a return to the problem that launched it, the lost asses of Kish, and Saul's assurance to his uncle that they had been found. With the note on Saul's silence about his anointment, the narrator prepares us for the public selection in the next unit.

10:17-27, Samuel Orchestrates the Public Selection of Saul as King. Verses 17-27 may originally have followed upon 8:22. There the elders have been dispersed to their cities to convey Samuel's response to their demand for a king, while here Samuel assembles "all Israel" at Mizpah to execute that demand. The negative view of the king resumes here: again God interprets the people's request for a king as their rejection of him (10:19). At the same time, the intervening positive view of Saul comes into play. Again Saul is described, this time from the point of view of the people rather than the narrator, as the tallest among them (10:23), and Samuel acclaims his uniqueness (10:24). Moreover, those who accompany Saul, inspired by God, are called "sons of valor," while those who denigrate him are termed by contrast "sons of Belial [wickedness]" (10:26-27).

Yet the interweaving of positive and negative perspectives lends an ironic tone to the whole. Though the selection of Saul by lot indicates God's direct hand in the matter, in other stories the casting of lots determines not a hidden hero but a hidden sinner whose sin has brought divine wrath upon the whole people (e.g., Josh. 7; 1 Sam. 14:24-45). Then too at the crucial moment our champion, Saul, is nowhere to be found: is his hiding a sign of the modesty or of the childish fear that we saw earlier? And does Samuel's acclamation of Saul's greatness after the people drag Saul into the open (1 Sam. 10:24) carry a sincere or a sarcastic tone? These ambiguities are the inevitable result of the dovetailing of pro-Saul and anti-king traditions.

The unit ends with two final ambiguities that point ahead to a rocky future for kingship. The narrator alludes to Samuel's dire warnings of "the justice of the king" (8:11) when he tells of Samuel's writings of "the ways of the kingship"

(10:25) in a book. Second, the wicked fellows' question, "How will this one save us?" raises questions about Saul's abilities before they are even tested. That question casts a giant shadow over the subsequent story of Saul's reign.

11:1-15, Saul Demonstrates His Leadership. Having been demanded by the elders at Ramah, privately anointed by Samuel in his city, and publicly selected by lot at Mizpah, Saul is now popularly acclaimed as king at Gilgal. Like colonial American cities each claiming that "George Washington slept here," important Israelite shrines preserved traditions connecting them with Israel's first king. One only wonders why no tale naming Bethel, Samuel's other haunt (7:16), is extant. But these tales have been transformed into a single linear narrative subordinating Saul to Samuel. In this unit that aim is most blatant, for Saul hears of the plight of Jabesh-gilead and responds to it quite without Samuel's intervention. Yet Samuel's name is included with Saul's in the rally cry to battle (11:7), and it is Samuel who leads the people to Gilgal to proclaim Saul's kingship. At every stage of this extended accession of the first king, the prophet Samuel remains in control; indeed, in the next unit (chap. 12), he has the last, and a foreboding, word.

Because the Philistines would seem to be the major threat to Israel (9:16), this tale of Saul's initial victory over the Ammonites comes as a surprise, and for that reason it probably has a historical basis (cf. Judg. 11; 1 Sam. 12:12; 31:11-13). The purpose of the tale is not to chronicle a battle but to demonstrate Saul's leadership. The tale fits the pattern of those of the "judges" and incorporates elements of holy war ideology. The enemy threat calls forth a hero empowered by God's spirit to muster the tribes and lead them to total victory. The pattern is broken, however, by the unlikely week-long reprieve given Jabesh by the Ammonites (11:3), a respite that gives the author time to dramatize the transformation of Saul from farmer to general. The conclusion to the war also breaks the pattern, this time definitively, for now the judge becomes king. In triumph Saul appears magnanimous, demanding amnesty for those who doubted him (11:13) and thus winning total support.

12:1-25, Samuel's Farewell Address. The last unit in this section ends the extended narrative about the beginning of monarchy on a sober note and concludes as well the era of the "judges," for Samuel, the last judge, takes leave of his people. This lengthy sermon and valedictory address marks Samuel's last public appearance, and he takes the occasion both to review Israel's history and to lay out the options that lie ahead. In terms of the larger Deuteronomistic History, this speech thus constitutes a major structural pivot between two different periods.

The first verse resumes the language of 8:7: Samuel reminds the people that kingship was all their idea, not his. He proceeds to extract from them a confession that he was an honest and honorable leader undeserving of their rejection. Against the backdrop of Samuel's justice, the people's demand for a king again appears ungracious. Having established his own unblemished leadership, Samuel recalls all of the "righteous acts" of God. Specifically, he alludes to those of God's salvific acts that featured heroes whom he deems his predecessors: Moses and Aaron, Jerubbaal, Bedan (perhaps another name for Jephthah), and Jephthah. The series ends with Samuel naming himself in the third person (12:11) as the final deliverer before kingship begins. This slip into the third person points to the author's intention: to punctuate his history with the career of Samuel, the last of the old order.

With the "and now" of 12:13, the speech shifts into the present and the choices that will determine the future. In Deuteronomistic language Samuel sets forth the people's choice: obedience to "the commandment of the LORD" or disaster (12:14-15; cf. Deut. 30:15-20). To prove his contention that the people have sinned in requesting a king, Samuel calls for divine confirmation in the form of an out-of-season thunderstorm. Struck by this miracle the people for the first time admit their sin (1 Sam. 12:19). Yet precisely at this point Samuel turns the tables and offers comfort and hope. Despite their sin, he promises, God will not forsake them, and he, Samuel, will continue to pray for them. So this speech envisions an important ongoing function for Samuel and his prophetic successors during the monarchy: as intercessor and instructor (12:23) he is not replaced by the king but remains superior to him.

Samuel's swan song, though antimonarchical in its general thrust, nonetheless looks ahead to kingship with hope in God's continued faithfulness toward Israel and the prophet's continued intercession on Israel's behalf. Samuel's last word on kingship is thus more moderate and positive than his first. The intervening narrative, which looks at kingship from several different points of view, issues in this cautious look ahead.

In summary, the combination of "pro" and "anti" perspectives on kingship in 1 Samuel 8-12 created a wholly new examination of the beginnings of monarchy. Although the positive view of Saul in 9:1-10:16 and 11:1-15 would seem to contrast sharply with the negative view of kingship we saw in 8:1-22; 10:17-27; and 12:1-25, in these "anti" units not the person of Saul but the institution of kingship is attacked. Only the wicked "sons of Belial" challenge Saul himself (10:27). Conversely, in the “pro” passages, where Saul is viewed as a savior, the institution of kingship as such is never discussed in general terms. It presents no threat because it is taken for granted, not viewed as a novelty. The effect of this combination is to place the hero Saul in an ambiguous position, the first incumbent of an institution hedged about with question marks. Ironically, it will be the institution and not the hero who survives.

13:1–31:13

The Reign of Saul

The second part of 1 Samuel spans the career of Saul as king but is principally concerned with his relationship to David. Although Saul does not die until the last chapter, God’s rejection of him at the outset casts a pall over his reign. The subsequent anointment of David sets the two on a collision course that runs through nearly every chapter. One finds only sparingly in this narrative the political, military, social, and demographic details that would be necessary to reconstruct a rudimentary picture of the early monarchy. Instead, one finds a story of two giant personalities caught up in a struggle of love and power that sends Saul spiraling downward and leaves David positioned to assume control.

13:1–15:35

The Beginning of the Fall of Saul

The reign of Saul begins with three successive tales in which disobedience to an order exposes his foolishness and leads God to reject him. While in the previous section not Saul but the institution of monarchy was attacked, here Saul proves a failure while monarchy persists. Saul’s ritual infractions may seem on a first reading minor, hardly weighty enough to justify his punishment; God may appear to be looking for a pretext to depose Saul. Yet the sequence of errors suggests habitual behavior unbefitting God’s chosen. Still, with the deck seemingly stacked against him from the start, he remains a sympathetic character.

13:1–22, Samuel Condemns Saul. The historian’s difficulty in chronicling Saul’s reign is pointed up in the formulaic verse with which the story of the first king opens, for the crucial age and regnal years have been dropped in transmission. This inauspicious opener is followed by the troubling report of a victory against the Philistines by Jonathan, as yet unidentified, for which Saul apparently takes the credit (13:3–4).

Next, sandwiched between accounts of Philistine might comes the first of the three episodes depicting Saul in a compromised position (13:8–15). The extended description of Israelite fear in the face of overwhelming Philistine power (13:5–7) gives teeth to the explanation that Saul gives Samuel for his failure to wait for the prophet’s arrival (13:11–12). Moreover, the narrator is careful to point out that Saul did wait the seven days as Samuel had commanded and that Samuel appeared only afterward, just in time to condemn the king: “And so as he was finishing the offering of the burnt offering, here comes Samuel!” (13:10). Saul eagerly greets Samuel and responds to his question unaware, it seems, of any guilt; his response to Samuel’s harsh words of judgment can only be shocked silence.

On the one hand, it is almost as if the old Samuel is eager to abort the term of a successor he never wanted. Saul’s sin hardly seems grievous enough to warrant God’s rejection. On the other hand, because Saul did not keep the “appointment,” or commandment (Heb. mitzwah) of God, God is justified in “appointing” (wayetzawwehu) a successor to him (13:13–14); the word play clinches the connection between the two acts and thus the justice of Samuel’s charge. At this point, however, we sympathize with Saul, who seems to have followed the commandment and broken it at the same time.

The rest of the unit returns to narration about the Philistine might. We see Saul and Israel staying put while the Philistines send troops in several directions at once. Then the narrator flashes back to explain that the Philistine monopoly on iron prevented the Israelites from fashioning swords and spears. In light of Saul’s inaction and Israel’s weakness, the courage of Jonathan in the next chapter stands out even more sharply.

13:23–14:46, Jonathan’s Valor and Saul’s Folly. In this second episode of Saul’s kingship, Saul looks bad again, this time in contrast to his son Jonathan. While Saul sits encamped under a pomegranate tree, Jonathan wreaks havoc behind the Philistine lines. When Saul at last goes to battle, he precipitously utters an oath of vengeance that nearly destroys the heroic Jonathan.

The focus on Jonathan in this chapter shows us the man who could succeed Saul were his kingdom to continue. But since we already know that Saul’s kingdom will not survive (13:14), Jonathan, whose bravery and popularity clearly exceed his father’s, becomes a poignant figure. The episode begins with the first identification of Jonathan as Saul’s son (14:1) and thus as a logical candidate for succession. Already a victor in war with only half as many troops as Saul (13:2–3), Jonathan now sets off on a solo expedition to break the deadlock with the Philistines. While Jonathan is accompanied in this daring act over rough terrain (14:4–5) by only his armor bearer, Saul, with six hundred troops, sits motionless. Saul, it is noted, has with him a priest from the rejected house of Eli (14:3), not an associate to inspire our confidence. As he sets out, Jonathan shows himself appropriately pious, again in contrast to Saul. While Saul countermanded Samuel's order for fear of desertion by his troops, Jonathan righteously affirms that God can save with many or few. Moreover, he waits for a sign from God before proceeding (14:8–12). Saul, on the other hand, having called for the Ark (or the ephod, according to the LXX) before battle, dismisses the priest and marches out without knowledge of God's will (14:18–19).

Although Saul's rashness does not lose the battle for him this time, his next impetuous act nearly costs him his son: he lays a curse on anyone who eats before he defeats the Philistines (14:24). Jonathan, who speaks rather pompously and disparagingly of his father after unwittingly disobeying his father's order (14:29–30), places the onus of guilt squarely upon Saul. And the altar that Saul builds, pointedly the very first (14:35), does little to assuage our growing sense that Saul cannot redeem himself.

Flushed with victory, Saul decides, again rashly, to pursue the Philistines to the last man (though, ironically, in the very next chapter he will fail to follow God's order to do precisely this to the Amalekites). This time he does inquire of God, but God does not respond because of the curse brought down by Jonathan's sweet tooth. After the casting of lots points to Jonathan as the culprit, the confrontation between father and son exposes sharply their contrasting personalities. Without apologies or excuses, the righteous Jonathan tells what he did, albeit in a manner that makes ludicrous both Saul's order and his own willingness to die: "I surely did taste with the tip of my staff in my hand a bit of honey; here I am ready to die" (14:43). But Saul, missing the irony, is adamant that he shall die. Saul is determined to follow strictly his own rashly taken oath, yet he has interpreted God's commandments freely and will do so again. Finally, the soldiers intervene on Jonathan's behalf, acclaiming his victory and charging Saul with stupidity. Saul departs without a word, though clearly humiliated, having surrendered to the people's will as he will again in the next episode—with grievous consequences for himself.

14:47–52, Summary of Saul's Reign. Abutting this unflattering view of Saul are two positive reports about Saul's military achievements (14:47–48, 52) bracketing a short family tree. Again we are reminded that in the eyes of some, Saul did valiantly despite the general negative impression we get from the episodes. The final author has positioned this regnal summary, however, not at the end of the Saul narrative but close to the beginning, between two tales of Saul's recklessness. In so doing he suggests that the reign of Saul is, for practical purposes, over. The narration also serves the purpose of introducing members of Saul's family soon to come into play. Finally, the mention of Saul's victory over the Amalekites (14:48) connects this summary to the subsequent story, which views that battle differently.

15:1–35, God Rejects Saul. In this unit Saul's poor judgment, which we have seen twice already, seals his doom. By failing to execute the cherem (Heb.; → Ban) against the Amalekites, Saul directly contravenes God's command and merits God's rejection. Yet the matter is not quite so simple: Saul is no villain and Samuel, who pronounces his fate, is not just a mouthpiece for God. In the complex dialogue between the two principals, we see the anguish of two men caught between the divine will and their own freedom.

The episode begins with God's uncompromising demand for extermination of the Amalekites, a sacred duty that rightly falls upon the first king who has defeated his enemies round about (14:47; cf. Deut. 25:17–19). With the imperatives of 1 Sam. 15:3 stated in the singular, there can be no ground for misunderstanding—or the excuses that Saul will later give. Dutifully, Saul sets out for battle, but mercifully he pauses to send the Kenites away (15:6). Although this thoughtfulness would seem to be unimpeachable, it is just that kind of independent judgment that, we next discover, has led Saul to "have mercy upon" (wayyachmol) not the women and children as we might expect, but the king and the best of the livestock and "upon all the good things" (15:9). Saul has utterly subverted God's commandment of cherem by taking the good things instead of devoting them to God.

God reacts by repenting of his choice of Saul as king, but Samuel, crying all night, apparently takes Saul's side. While Saul builds a self-congratulatory monument (15:12), Samuel approaches to deliver a devastating critique. In his subsequent dialogue with Saul, Samuel repeatedly offers him a chance to confess his sin, but obdurate Saul fails the test.

Saul treats Samuel's initial question (15:14) as a request for information rather than for confession. And in his answer he shifts the blame for capturing sheep and oxen to the people and takes personal credit for executing the cherem—this in pointed contrast to the narrator's objective report that Saul and the people together did the sparing (15:9). Saul altogether fails to mention Agag and invents out of whole cloth a supposed sacrifice to the LORD for which the livestock have been reserved. To Samuel's second set of questions (15:19), Saul responds in a similar way, this time claiming total personal obedience and heaping all the blame on the people. Given every chance to confess, Saul, unlike Jonathan in the previous episode, mounts a cover-up.

With keen psychological insight Samuel diagnoses Saul's problem: he is "little in [his] own eyes" (15:17), the victim, we might say, of an inferiority complex. When Saul finally does confess, he confirms this judgment in admitting that "I feared the people and obeyed their voice" (15:24). For the third time in three chapters we see Saul giving in to the people's wishes, following them rather than leading them, putting his public image before his responsibility to God, who alone is to be feared and obeyed. Saul's confession comes too late, however—only after Samuel, in formally metered couplets, has announced his verdict (15:22–23). In fact, though, Saul has condemned himself: since he was willing to kill Jonathan for unwittingly breaking his own oath, how much more so does he deserve punishment for knowingly defying God's order?

Saul, realizing that all that is left to him is the appearance of royalty, asks for Samuel to accompany him, but Samuel initially refuses. As God's spokesman he reiterates mechanically his reasons: you have rejected God, so he has rejected you (15:26); just as you have torn my robe, so has God torn the kingdom from you (15:28). His revenge upon Agag he explains with similar bloodless logic: as you have made women childless, so shall your mother now be (15:33). Yet, in the end, Samuel's sympathy for his favorite wins out and he consents to honor him (15:31). The last verse of the chapter confirms that Samuel's prophetic duties have not diminished his abiding love for Saul.

16:1–18:30

David in the House of Saul

Having rejected Saul, God wastes no time in finding a successor to him. This time, though, the king is unambiguously God's man; the people have no voice in his selection (16:1). David's resounding successes make us wonder whether Saul's failure was God's way of rejecting the people's choice. In this section David is twice introduced to Saul, who twice takes him into his house. As musician David appears sensitive and intellectual, while as warrior he shows bravery and faith in God. These qualities endear him to Saul's son Jonathan and daughter Michal. By the end of the section, David has established formal bonds with both, but he has also earned the undying jealousy of Saul.

16:1–13, Samuel Anoints David. Despite his reluctance, Samuel sets out at God's command to find a replacement for Saul. Whereas Saul came to Samuel as if by accident, Samuel sets out purposefully to find David, thus underscoring God's greater initiative this time. Yet the anointing scene seems calculated to stress the similarities between Saul and David to show that David is indeed the proper successor. Both anointings are secret: in the case of David, even he is not told why he is anointed and his kingship remains hidden until Saul is dead. Both Saul and David are of similar social station before they are chosen. Saul claims to be of the least important tribe and clan (9:21) and is found while searching for his father's asses. David is the youngest of Jesse's sons and tends his father's sheep. The motif of the youngest or least likely who becomes the greatest clearly replays Hannah's song. Like Saul, David must be brought in from the wings to be anointed; neither seeks the position suddenly thrust upon him.

In this tale the power of Samuel continues its eclipse. Just as his ability as a "seer" was mocked in the story of Saul's anointment, here he wrongly assumes that the first son of Jesse upon whom he lays eyes must be God's choice, apparently because of his physical resemblance to Saul (16:6–7). God chastises Samuel for relying solely on outward appearance, yet when David is chosen, it is precisely his good looks that the narrator describes (16:12). Whether David, unlike Saul, has inner as well as outer substance only time will tell.

16:14–23, David Comforts Saul. Immediately following the rush of God's spirit onto David (16:13) comes its departure from Saul (16:14), as if it fled directly from one to the other. Ironically, the inheritor of the divine spirit is brought in to soothe a Saul possessed by an evil spirit also "from the LORD." More ironic still, he succeeds and wins Saul's gratitude and love. While David is described so promisingly as a sensitive artist and military warrior (16:18), Saul is pictured as pathetically unstable. As he was once led by his servant to the prophet Samuel, who held the key to his future, now he is directed by another young man to David, who has inherited that future.

17:1–54, David Defeats Goliath. Just as 1 Samuel provides multiple perspectives on Saul's initiation into kingship, so too it offers several introductions of David. First he is anointed by Samuel, then brought to the moody Saul, and now celebrated as the victor over Goliath and introduced again to Saul. Twice as long as most other chapters, this one tells its story at a leisurely pace developing folktale motifs and including traditions missing in many Greek manuscripts (17:21–31; 17:55–18:5).

17:1–10 presents the Philistine enemy personified in the ten-foot-tall Goliath, whose fearsome appearance and military equipment are described in more detail than those of any other biblical combatant. His fierce challenge panics the Israelites (17:8–10) but, remembering Hannah's proclamation that God punishes the arrogant (2:3–4), readers already anticipate Goliath's downfall.

Next the text backtracks to introduce David, the challenger-to-be. Emphasized here are David's youth, his simple shepherd life, and his obedience to his father. Striking also is the echo of the Joseph story (Gen. 37:12–14), for there too the father sends the youngest son off to the older brothers and asks for word from them. Just as Joseph provokes resentment, so does David, and just as Joseph eventually triumphs, so, biblical logic predicts, will David.

In his first speech in the Bible, David reveals the two sides of his character, which the rest of 1 and 2 Samuel will develop. As he becomes acquainted with the dire straits of Israel, he displays his bravery and devotion to God, but not before he twice inquires about what is in it for himself (17:26, 30). In resolving, then, to challenge Goliath, David has determined to win the battle for God but also for the hand of the princess. He accomplishes both aims. David's practical and devotional dimensions are also revealed in his encounter with Saul. To convince Saul of his ability to defeat Goliath, the untrained David naively relates to the king his practical experiences protecting his father's flocks from lions and bears. But it is only when David invokes God's protection (17:37) that Saul responds. Unable to wear Saul's armor, David symbolically refuses to play Saul; he is his own man and this is his battle.

In this battle the verbal duel is more important than the military maneuvers. To Goliath's taunts about David's primitive weapons, David responds with a resounding proclamation of God's ability to save without any human weapons at all. Like the plagues on Egypt, this victory has an ulterior motive, "that all the earth may know" (17:46) God's power (cf. Exod. 9:14). Having declared his faith, David—and the narrator—make short work of Goliath.

17:55–18:30, Saul's Recognition and Jealousy of David. In this unit various traditions have been structured into a thrice repeated pattern of two parallel episodes and a narrated summary about David's successes and popularity. The first sequence features the separate introductions of David to Saul and to Jonathan. Although Saul's ignorance of David's identity would seem to contradict 16:14–23, in which Saul already knows David intimately, the interest here is to legitimate David as a victorious warrior acclaimed by the king. Together that episode and this one show David fighting Saul's inner and outer battles. For his part, the brave

Jonathan finds in David a kindred spirit. The language of love used to describe their relationship is found frequently in ancient Near Eastern texts to describe the loyalty of king and subjects, so here there are likely both personal and political connotations. Importantly, Jonathan gives David his clothes and armor, and David wears them, symbolically assuming the role of crown prince.

After a summary about David's success (18:5), the second pair of episodes sketches Saul's abrupt change of attitude toward David. In the first, Saul reacts jealously to the adulation of David the warrior by the young women of Judah. His inner thoughts are given voice (18:8) to show us that he already intuitively what the future holds: "only the kingdom is not yet his!" In the second episode this quite rational fear takes the form of irrational "prophesying," the raving of a man possessed (18:10), and he lashes out, ironically, at the man whose music formerly soothed his spirit. The second summary statement is more pointed than the first. Now we are told specifically that the Lord was with David (18:14) and that the people "loved" him (gave him their allegiance), while Saul stood in awe of David's success.

The third repetition of the pattern features two stories of Saul's efforts to do away with David without bloodying his own hands. Saul promises each of his daughters to David in return for David's victories against the Philistines, though he really intends for David to die at the Philistines' hands (18:17b, 21a, 25b). Though at an earlier stage of tradition the story likely told how David, through marriage to the king's daughter, established a rightful claim to inherit the loyalty of the northern tribes, in its present form it aims to develop the theme of Saul's jealousy and his unsuccessful effort to destroy David. By the end, David has won from Saul his own son and daughter leaving the king isolated. The final summary raises the tension to the breaking point. Now the desperate Saul "saw and knew that the LORD was with David" (18:28), and he is even more afraid than he was before. The three summaries thus map the rising tide of Saul's realization and concomitant fear of the enemy in his own court and of his recognition of God's hand in it all.

19:1–23:28

Saul in Pursuit of David

In this section Saul takes his vendetta against David into the open. But David has important allies—Saul's own son and daughter, the prophet Samuel, and the priest Abiathar—whose defection contributes to Saul's feeling of isolation. The pursuit is narratively orchestrated as a cat-and-mouse chase; we are led back and forth from Saul to David, from pursuer to escaper, but Saul never catches David. Instead we witness Saul's rising desperation until, in the next section, he becomes the one who is caught.

19:1–24, Jonathan, Michal, and Samuel Shield David from Saul. Saul's public pursuit of David begins with four short episodes in which those people closest to Saul prevent him from killing David. First, Jonathan warns David of Saul's intention and then convinces Saul that to kill David would be to shed "innocent blood" (19:5). Importantly, Jonathan dissuades Saul from killing David by appealing to his sense of justice and by depicting David as God's agent against the Philistines. The next scene (19:9–10) virtually repeats 18:10–11 and is placed here to illustrate the wild and repeated fluctuations of Saul's mood. Saul, just reconciled with David through Jonathan's intervention, now erupts violently against him, not coincidentally just as David wins another victory against the Philistines. It was the popular adulation following David's earlier victories that initially set Saul against David. In the third episode Michal follows her brother's lead and intercedes to protect her husband from her father. Sending David out the window and, apparently, over the city wall, she improvises a dummy in David's bed out of the teraphim (household idols) and some goat hair. When her masquerade is discovered, she disclaims responsibility and places the blame on David. Michal here shows the independence that will later (2 Sam. 6) be turned against David himself.

The last scene picks up the story of the fleeing David who until now has not been credited with a single word; his friend and his wife have done his talking for him. But now David pours forth words to the prophet who had anointed him. In a popular folktale form (cf. 2 Kings 1), the text relates how Saul's attempt to seize David is frustrated as his messengers are repeatedly rendered useless by the contagion of ecstatic prophecy. Finally, Saul himself appears, but he too is possessed and unable to take David, who again escapes. This is the second time that the origin of the saying, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" is given an explanation. While the first story of ecstatic possession signaled God's choosing of Saul (10:6), this one, symmetrically, underscores God's rejection of him. Thus Jonathan by persuasion, Michal by deception, and Samuel by prophecy have deflected Saul's wrath. But from here on David is on his own.

20:1–42, David and Jonathan Part. Escaping from the raving Saul, David returns to Gibeah for what turns out to be his parting rendezvous with his beloved Jonathan. Jonathan, whom we last saw successfully pacifying his father, appears stunned at David's new charge against Saul. While this seeming contradiction may be the result of the juxtaposition of different sources, it serves in the text as we have it to emphasize Saul's erratic behavior. In a lengthy conversation (20:3–23) David devises a scheme to test Saul's intentions and Jonathan decides how to inform David of them. At the literary center of this dialogue Jonathan sounds the theme that carries forward the rest of the book: the inevitability of David's kingship. Before agreeing to David's plan, Jonathan invokes the "chesed Yhwh," the mutual loyalty of those bound together in sacred covenant (20:14), to elicit an oath from David. Jonathan, not overcome by the emotions of the moment, makes David swear to protect his house after David has established himself. Again, after describing the secret message relayed with the arrows, Jonathan reminds David that the LORD stands "between" them, guaranteeing their fidelity (20:23).

David's absence from the new moon feast arouses, as he predicted, Saul's suspicions, and Jonathan's excuse for him provokes Saul to attack Jonathan himself with his ever-ready spear. But in the midst of his fury, Saul backhandedly affirms his son's affirmation of David's kingship, for he correctly sees that David's life is the price that must be paid if Jonathan is to assume the throne (20:31).

According to plan, the grieving Jonathan the next morning shoots the arrows beyond his servant to signal to David Saul's murderous intentions. But then, seemingly rendering the signal superfluous, he sends the servant home and embraces David directly. Again a splicing of sources is indicated, yet by having the bad news transmitted through a sign, the text allows the final scene between the two comrades to be a poignant leave-taking. Jonathan repeats his prayer that the Lord will stand between himself and David but extends their mutual loyalty to their progeny (20:42; cf. 20:23). Though they now part, God will continue to join them. On this pregnant note they go their separate ways, David to return only after Jonathan is dead.

21:1–22:5, David Flees from Saul. From here on out David's path goes in two directions. At the same time that the narrative shows him fleeing from Saul, it has him edging closer to his own kingdom. As he escapes from the present crises, he prepares for the future. The featured story in the account of David's flight from Saul centers on David's use and Saul's abuse of Ahimelech, the priest of Nob and great-grandson of Eli. Arriving alone, hungry, and defenseless at Nob, David requests from the priest the two prerequisites of the successful fugitive: food and a weapon. But he does so with the aid of a verbal ruse to calm the nervous priest.

Ahimelech, believing him to be on a mission from Saul, gives him not just any bread and sword but, the story emphasizes, the holy bread and the sword of Goliath, symbolizing perhaps David's authority over the priesthood and the military. Placed strategically between David's two requests is the seemingly irrelevant but actually ominous note about the presence of Saul's mercenary, Doeg the Edomite, at Nob while David masquerades as Saul's trusted servant (21:7).

Filling in the time interval until Doeg reports to Saul about David's appearance at Nob, the text includes three more stations on David's path of escape. At the first, the Philistine city of Gath, David improvises his second masquerade (21:10–15). Preceded in Gath by his reputation as "king of the land," an ironic foreshadowing of his future position, David feigns madness to avoid capture. His behavior recalls the recent "prophecy" of Saul with the important difference that, whereas Saul was actually possessed, David is in full possession of himself. From Gath David goes to Adullam in southern Judah where he attracts a following of Apiru types (→ Khapiru) who will serve him as a personal army (22:1–2). Here clearly the text shows David with his eye on his destiny. Similarly, at his next stop in Moab he alludes to his future when he deposits his parents there in the care of the king "until I know what God will do with me" (22:3). As in the book of Ruth, here Moab serves as refuge for displaced Bethlehemites. The unit ends (22:5) with a prophetic word noteworthy both because it establishes David as the recipient of prophecy and because it directs David back to Judah and, ultimately, a confrontation with the king from whom he has until now fled.

22:6–23, Saul Slaughters the Priests of Nob. The scene now shifts to Saul, who eliminates his priestly support at the same time that David obtains his very own priest. In contrast to the ever-moving David, Saul now sits in state at Gibeah (→ Gibeah). Ranting on to the silent tribesmen surrounding him about their ingratitude and their conspiracies against him, he reveals his sense of utter isolation. Referring to David only as "son of Jesse" (22:7–8), Saul makes him into a distant, nameless enemy. Only Doeg the Edomite breaks the silence with his eyewitness account of the visit of "the son of Jesse" to Nob. But Doeg, while reporting nothing of David's ruse, adds the information that "Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub" inquired of God for David (22:10). The text seems to present Doeg with his own motivation for not telling the whole story, on the one hand, and adding an important fact, on the other. If Doeg had been forcibly detained at Nob (21:7), he may have had his own gripe against Ahimelech. By making it seem that Ahimelech knowingly conspired with David against Saul and by stressing divine inquiry, Doeg baits Saul against the priest and his house. Indeed, in his report about Ahimelech, Doeg places divine inquiry in first position, because Saul is most threatened by David's having the access to God, which he now lacks. And Doeg, in contrast to Saul's again silent servants, readily slaughters the priests at Saul's command and executes, perhaps at the same time, his own revenge (22:18b–19).

The text describes the total destruction of Nob in precisely the same language as that of God's command to Saul to destroy Amalek (15:3). But while Saul failed to fulfill God's command to destroy the foreigners, he ruthlessly, through the foreigner Doeg the Edomite, fulfills his own order to slaughter Israelite priests. Saul's disobedience then and lack of humanity now come into sharper relief when seen in light of each other.

But if Saul is credited with destroying the priests, thereby fulfilling the prophecy of the man of God to Eli (2:27–36), David, with guilt on his conscience (22:22), promises to protect the one son of Ahimelech who escapes. Saul, rejected by the prophet Samuel, now has cut off his priestly link to God as well, while David has inherited both.

23:1–28, Saul Chases David. In this chapter Saul's actual pursuit of David is telescoped in two tales. While the king devotes all his energies to capturing David, David exercises the duty of a king by defeating the national enemy in battle. This is the point of the first episode in which David, not Saul, does battle on his own initiative against the Philistines and, like the judges of old, "saves" (23:2, 5) the Judahite town of Keilah. In this battle David apparently exploits the services of Abiathar (not, however, mentioned until 23:6), for he twice inquires of God before going into battle. In two further inquiries, he discovers the intentions of both Saul and the men of Keilah (23:11–12). The doubled questions and answers underscore David's reliance on God and God's support of David.

Saul meanwhile, bereft of priests and access to certain knowledge, gropes in the dark. First he plans to besiege Keilah, but David escapes. Then, responding to the Ziphites' voluntary offer to turn David over, Saul demands from them better reconnaissance, but David eludes him again. Saul's fruitless insistence on sure information (23:22–23) highlights the contrast with David who has such knowledge for the asking. Finally, a Philistine attack calls Saul away from his pursuit of David leaving the fugitive providentially reprieved (23:26b–28).

Between the two tales of David's escapes is placed the short episode of Jonathan's visit (23:14–18). Jonathan's encouragement thus occupies the literary center of the narrative of Saul's manhunt. More explicitly than ever he predicts David's future as king and his intention to be second in command (Heb. mishneh, 23:17; cf. Esther 10:3). He also provides objective confirmation of Saul's increasing desperation, for he adds, "Saul my father also knows this." The cutting of a "covenant" concludes this last rendezvous of the intimate friends, just as it marked their first meeting (1 Sam. 18:3). In this chapter, then, God's assistance is mediated through oracles, through Jonathan, and ironically at the end, through the Philistines.

23:29-26:25

David Confronts His Enemy

After successfully eluding Saul, David turns the tables and twice confronts Saul and mercifully spares his life. Between these two scenes comes the episode of David and Abigail, which forms a narrative analogy to them. Again David refrains from taking vengeance and leaves his destiny in God's hand. Indeed, the lesson he learns from Abigail in chap. 25 prevents him from killing Saul in chap. 26, as Abishai urges him to do. In sequence the three tales show David's growing mastery of his emotions and willingness to put his fate in God's hands.

23:29-24:22, David Sparing Saul's Life.

The first scene depicts an accidental encounter between pursuer and pursued in which David skillfully gains the upper hand. Discovering Saul preoccupied in relieving himself in the front of the cave where he and his men had been hiding, David cuts off Saul's skirt, symbolically emasculating him. Suddenly realizing that the man his men called "your enemy" (24:4) is, in fact, "the LORD's anointed" (24:6), David is stricken with remorse and prevents his men from killing Saul.

In the lengthy speech that follows David confronts Saul with the physical evidence of his mercy and innocence. Dramatically producing Saul's skirt, David challenges Saul to "see" (a verb repeated four times in 24:10-11) David's sinlessness and not to listen to hearsay reports about him. Forswearing vengeance, David declares his reliance on God's justice (24:12, 15). Saul's response is moving, for he humbles himself and declares David's righteousness. More importantly, he adds his voice to the growing chorus of those who acclaim David's future kingship (24:20).

25:1-43, David Saved from Bloodguilt.

Although the story of David and Abigail initially appears to be unrelated to the episodes of David's encounters with Saul, this story too shows David forbearing from murder and consequently acclaimed as future king. Perhaps the isolated notice of Samuel's death at the outset (25:1) is meant to account for the new dimension of David we see here. His link to kingship now deceased, David strikes out on his own, ready to take vengeance against those like Nabal who stand in his way.

Nabal, a rich but stingy rancher, refuses David's request for food in return for what David claims has been his protection of Nabal's flocks. Nabal appears as a one-dimensional character whose name, as in a morality play, describes him: nabal means fool or churl in Hebrew (cf. Isa. 32:5-8). Wholly a skinflint, he responds to David's politely worded plea (1 Sam. 25:6-8) with sarcasm. He stigmatizes David as a servant disloyal to his master (25:10-11), a charge that, ironically, will soon be applicable to one of his own servants, who takes up David's cause before Abigail.

Abigail is Nabal's opposite in every way. Introduced by the narrator as intelligent and beautiful at the beginning of the story (25:3), she remains in the wings until warned by Nabal's servant that David plans to attack her husband and his men. Then she emerges to use both her intelligence and her beauty to prevent David's revenge on her husband and win his heart for herself. Her lengthy, carefully crafted speech (25:24-31) to David is the centerpiece of the entire chapter. Sending tribute to David on ahead with her servants, she arrives alone ready to deal woman to man. Quickly she deflects attention from her husband, whom she dismisses as a crank, to herself, for she accepts the blame for Nabal's behavior (25:24-25). As a supplicant she then presents her gift and prophetically proclaims David's impending kingship. Because David fights "the battles of the LORD" (25:28), she says, his vendetta against Nabal is senseless; bloodguilt would destroy his stainless record (25:26, 31). Finally, having persuaded David of the folly of vengeance, she gives him a way to save face by making herself, not Nabal, the beneficiary of his change of heart (25:31). David responds exactly as Abigail must have hoped, for he blesses God and her as well and accepts her gifts in lieu of murdering Nabal's men, the "pissers on the wall" (25:34), as David none too delicately calls them.

The scene shifts abruptly to Nabal seen through Abigail's eyes. She returns home after her rendezvous with the future king to find her husband, whose life she has just saved, having a feast without her, ironically "like the feast of a king" (25:36). She saves her news until he is sober enough to appreciate it, the next morning when the fool who feasts like a king is just another "pisser" (25:37). His two-stage death allows for both natural and supernatural causation. David's reaction to the news of Nabal's death is no surprise, and Abigail, without a tear, responds to David's summons with the same alacrity she had shown twice earlier (25:18, 23, 42).

The tale aims not only to depict David's learning that revenge does not befit the LORD's anointed. As the final verses remind us, behind the story is the historical reality of David's cementing by marriage alliances with clans that will support him in his drive for power: Abigail, the widow of the Calebite chieftain, and Ahinoam, who may well have been none other than the wife of the reigning king, Saul (25:42-43; 14:50).

26:1-25, David Challenges Saul. The second account of David's sparing of Saul's life is usually identified by critics as another version of the one in chap. 24, but in its present context it plays a rather different role. It depicts a David more calculating and more in control than does the earlier story and a Saul stripped of all power and hope for the future. In this, their last meeting, David is cold and distant, challenging Saul to justify his conduct toward him but finally looking toward God, not the impotent king, for his reward.

The first verse replicates 23:19, but while in that episode it was Saul who sought reconnaissance to entrap David, here David sends out spies to pinpoint Saul's position. Earlier Saul chanced into the cave where David and his men were hiding (24:3), but here David plans his entrance into Saul's camp (26:6-7). Whereas in the first encounter David's remorse over cutting off Saul's skirt makes him prevent his men from killing Saul, here David coolly calculates that to slay God's anointed would be counterproductive. Here David seems more intent to demonstrate his own righteousness than to show mercy for the king. In detached third-person formality, David asks as he stands over the sleeping Saul, "For who can raise his hand against the anointed of the LORD and be guiltless?" (26:9). Alluding to the recent death of Nabal, David rather smugly declares that Saul too shall die in due course. While in 24:6 an impassioned David fumbles for the right words to prevent his men from attacking Saul, in 26:11 the same sentiment has become a cold formula.

David's control of the situation is underscored by the thrice repeated mention of Saul's slumber. First, from afar David sees Saul sleeping with his army surrounding him (26:5). Next, with Abishai, David enters the camp and approaches the sleeping Saul who lies unprotected, for his army too sleeps (26:7). Finally, as David and Abishai steal out of the camp, the narrator explains that this deep sleep was divinely sent (26:12), and we again see God's hand behind David's fortune.

When David does awaken Saul, he is far away atop a mountain. The physical distance between them now symbolizes their irreparable rupture. David taunts Abner and protests to the suddenly awakened Saul. Though Saul, as earlier, familiarly calls David "my son," David replies correctly, "my lord king" (26:13-17). David is finished reasoning with Saul: he declares and Saul must listen. David claims that Saul's pursuit has forced him into apostasy (26:19); he wants only to return to his own land and his God. Saul's confession and apology do not move David. David challenges Saul to reclaim his captured spear, but there is no indication that Saul retrieves it. As he captured Goliath's sword, so now he possesses Saul's spear; Saul is left defenseless. In David's final words he talks past Saul to God (26:22-24). In return for sparing Saul's life, David seeks protection not from Saul but from God. In his last words Saul blesses David, but David does not respond; it is too late to make amends (26:25).

27:1-31:13

Saul and David Part Ways

In this final section of 1 Samuel, Saul and David never meet. David escapes to Philistine territory and raids the enemies of his own tribe, Judah, all the while pretending to fight the battles of his overlord, the Philistine Achish. He thus establishes a power base in Judah for his rapid rise to kingship after Saul's demise. Meanwhile, Saul has abandoned his pursuit of David to fight the Philistines. But the ghost of Samuel warns him that the battle is lost, and the last chapter relates the predicted death of Saul. By alternating stories of David and Saul, the narrative communicates the simultaneity of the destinies of the once and future kings but also the contrast between those same destinies.

27:1-28:2, David Among the Philistines.

Despite Saul's apology to David and blessing upon him, David does what he claims Saul has forced him to do (26:19) and seeks refuge among the Philistines. In this second flight to Achish he faces him not alone (cf. 21:10-15), but with his whole retinue; he need not fear and feign madness now. Instead, he feigns loyalty. Granted his own property by Achish, as favored servants often were in ancient Near Eastern city-states, David professes to return the favor by fighting Achish's battles. In fact, David raids the enemies of Judah including the Amalekites (27:8), the enemy against whom Saul failed to complete the cherem (15:9). This narration plays upon that memory, for David, under no command to execute the cherem, leaves no one alive anyway and brings back booty in addition. While Saul is condemned, David is implicitly praised, for he outsmarts the hated Philistines and Achish trusts him completely.

The narrative transforms what must have been an embarrassing historical memory—the defection of the future king to the enemy camp—into a piece of dramatic irony. David, who came to Saul's attention by battling the Philistine giant, now flees that attention as a soldier for the Philistines just at the time that Saul will meet his death at their hands. Yet David, it is claimed here, only feigned service to the Philistines. He thus escapes Saul and, as we shall see, any involvement in the battle that brought on Saul's death.

28:3–25, Saul Learns His Fate. Breaking into the account of David's success comes the story of Saul's nadir. Not coincidentally Samuel's death is again reported (28:3), for with David in the wings, the Philistines encamped against him, and God silent, the entrapped Saul has only Samuel to turn to. The text plays upon Saul's name, wayyish'al sha'ul ("and Saul asked," 28:6), to point up the irony that the one whose name means "ask" gets no answers from God. So powerless that he must break his own edict rather than revoke it, Saul disguises himself and goes to a necromancer still in the land and persuades her to practice despite her fear of the king.

The woman's success gives us a unique picture of an Israelite view of the dead and gives Saul confirmation of his worst fears. Samuel, enraged at Saul's summons, which the dead apparently cannot resist, responds by hinging two new predictions upon one old fact. He predicates disaster upon Saul's disobedience in the battle against Amalek. Now, finally, Saul hears explicitly what he has always known in his heart about David. Now too he knows that tomorrow is doomsday for him, his sons, and Israel (26:16–19).

The audition over, Saul falls prostrate "from the words of Samuel" (28:20). The woman had seen Samuel but not heard his words; Saul had heard the words but not seen the apparition (28:13–14). Starved physically, Saul is now crushed spiritually as well. Again the seeing of the woman is stressed, for it is Saul's appearance that prompts her to insist that he eat to revive himself. Like a condemned prisoner on death row dining on steak and champagne the night before his execution, Saul eats the fatted calf. The secret nocturnal visit over, Saul returns to his troops, and the narrator returns to the interrupted story of David among the Philistines (28:21–25).

29:1–30:31, David Victorious. Having prepared us—and Saul—for Saul's imminent demise, the narrator turns back to the story of David and Achish to explain how, despite his alliance with Achish, David had nothing to do with the Philistine defeat of Israel and the death of Saul. By repeating the phrase "And the Philistines gathered all their troops" (29:1), which preceded the episode of Saul's consultation with the necromancer at Endor (28:1), the text indicates the simultaneity of Saul's unsuccessful masquerade before the necromancer and David's successful bamboozling of Achish. As Saul is discovering that he cannot escape an ignoble end, David escapes from an uncomfortable vassalage to Achish and prepares for his new beginning.

Despite his own trust in David, Achish is forced by his allies to send David away from the battle and back to his fief at Ziklag (29:4; cf. 27:6). The irony of Achish's defense of David before the justly suspicious Philistines is highlighted by the innocent honesty of his words, "And I have not found in him a fault" (29:3). More ironic still are the gentle words with which Achish breaks the news to David. He amplifies his praise of David and downplays the Philistines' objections so as not to hurt him: "but in the eyes of the princes you are not so good" (29:6). And in response to David's feigned pique, in which David with intentional ambiguity expresses his desire to "battle against the enemies of my lord the king" (29:8), Achish compares the scheming David to "a messenger of God" (29:9). David submits without another word, rescued from having either to fight against Saul, God's anointed, or betray his new lord Achish. Instead he soon finds himself in a position to continue building his own power base by distributing gifts to his Judean countrymen (30:26–31).

Upon his immediate return to Ziklag, however, he confronts apparent catastrophe. Although we are told that it was the Amalekites who burned the city and took the women and children captive, David and his men see the result but must discover the source. Trusting in God (30:6) and summoning the priest Abiathar with the ephod, David begins that process of discovery. To David and, we remember, not to Saul the oracle speaks, and David sets out to pursue the as yet unidentified raiders. Further information is provided by the abandoned Egyptian slave who just happens to cross David's path. Whereas all avenues to knowledge are closed to Saul, David's way is strewn with clues. Whereas the battle against the Amalekites proved to be Saul's undoing, David's battle against the same people paves the road to his success. Far from being condemned for capturing the Amalekite flocks and herds, David is lionized and distributes the spoil both to his own men who stayed behind and to his countrymen whose support he will later need. The juxtaposition of Saul's pathetic, lonely last supper at Endor and David's triumphant, providential massacre of the Amalekites sets the stage for the final chapter in Saul's life.

31:1-13, Saul Defeated. With but a single line of direct discourse—Saul's request to his armor bearer to slay him—the author hurriedly sets the inevitable concluding scene. Whether the author understood Saul's suicide as a final show of force or a failure of nerve, Saul's end is a tragic one, made more so by the unadorned reportage of the narrator. Saul's sons are killed before him, and the armor bearer follows Saul's example. The death of the leader routs the Israelites, and the Philistines easily advance (31:1-7).

The epilogue (31:8-13) adds a last ironic note. Saul, who had grown increasingly isolated and "little in his own eyes" (15:17), was not to be left abandoned in death. The men of Jabesh-gilead, whom Saul had bravely saved in the first battle of his career (11:1-11), now rescue the bodies of Saul and his sons from Philistine disgrace and give their bones proper burial. In this touching tribute to their fallen leader, Saul's followers demonstrate their abiding loyalty.

Bibliography

Birch, B. C. The Rise of the Israelite Monarchy: The Growth and Development of 1 Samuel 7-15. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series, 27. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976.

Garsiel, M. The First Book of Samuel: A Literary Study of Comparative Structures, Analogies and Parallels. Ramat Gan, Israel: Revivim, 1983, 1985.

Gunn, D. The Fate of King Saul: An Interpretation of a Biblical Story. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 14. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980, 1984.

Halpern, B. The Constitution of the Monarchy in Israel. Harvard Semitic Monographs 25. Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1981.

Hertzberg, H. W. I and II Samuel, A Commentary. Old Testament Library. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965.

McCarter, P. K., Jr. I Samuel. Anchor Bible, 8. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980.

Miller, P. D., Jr., and J. J. M. Roberts. The Hand of the Lord: A Reassessment of the "Ark Narrative" of I Samuel. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1977.

Miscall, P. I Samuel, A Literary Reading. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1986.

Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1985.

2 SAMUEL

DAVID M. GUNN

INTRODUCTION

Content and Context

Reading the Second Book of Samuel as a separate book is rather like reading a single chapter in an episodic novel. The story makes sense but keeps directing us beyond itself to its larger context. In the case of 2 Samuel, that context is the great story of God and Israel—its origins, nationhood, and eventual removal from the land—told in Genesis–2 Kings.

2 Samuel belongs to the part of the story that recounts Israel's nationhood in the promised land and its attempt to adapt religious and political institutions to changing circumstances. Running through both books of Samuel is a major interest in leaders and the nature of leadership. 1 Samuel tells of the transition from the period of judges to a monarchy under Saul (see 1 Samuel "Introduction"). The priest Eli, the prophet-judge Samuel, and Saul himself each hold center stage for a time.

The story is not just Israel's story, however; it is also God's. Above all, it is about Yhwh's attempt to maintain or recreate a relationship of loyalty between God and people. (The Hebrew text has preserved only the consonants of the divine name, Yhwh, perhaps originally Yahweh; English version: "the LORD.") Yhwh takes the people's desire for a human king as a rejection of divine sovereignty. Thus Saul, designated by God at the people's insistence, must be rejected in favor of one who is freely chosen by God (a man "after [God's] own heart," 1 Sam. 13:14). That man is David.

The story of David's rise, woven into the story of Saul, finds fulfillment in the story of his kingship in 2 Samuel. In turn, just as the account of Saul's end dovetails into 2 Samuel, so the account of David's death dovetails into the beginning of 1 Kings, which continues the story of monarchical Israel.

It may be helpful to regard the book as having three main parts. First is the story that lies between the death of Saul and the consolidation of the kingdom under David (chaps. 1–8). In the center is a story of the king's private life and its repercussions upon the kingdom; it becomes an account of his loss and regaining of the throne (chaps. 9–20). Finally some narrative and poetic units form a coda or epilogue connected to what has gone before not by plot but by theme and allusion (chaps. 21–24).

Composition

Attempts to reconstruct the history of the composition of the book have depended largely on observations about writing style, plot (where a plot line seems to begin and end), and literary genre (for we find various kinds of material such as prose anecdotes, archival lists, annalistic reports, a psalm, short stories, etc.). The results remain speculative. Suggested dates for individual units often differ widely, in some cases ranging from near the time of the events depicted (tenth century B.C.) to the period of the Exile (sixth century B.C.). This uncertainty over dating, together with a dearth of external evidence relating directly to the events of the book, also make it difficult to determine the historical accuracy of the material.

Most commonly accepted of the ideas about sources is the view that chaps. 9–20 together with 1 Kings 1–2 was originally a separate document. This "story of King David" is often referred to as the "court history" or "succession narrative," since some have seen the struggle between David's sons to succeed him on the throne as its primary theme. A case has been made for including most of chaps. 2–4 (the war between David and Saul's son Ishbosheth) with this material and possibly parts of chaps. 6 (David and Michal) and 7 (the promise of a Davidic dynasty). But where this postulated document originally began is uncertain.

Many critics believe that another account, a "story of David's rise" can be traced in 1 Samuel and 2 Samuel, finishing in chap. 5 with David's coronation over all Israel (though some include chap. 8, David's victories over the neighboring states). Likewise, the story of the Ark's coming to Jerusalem (chap. 6) is often seen as the original conclusion to an "Ark narrative," which began in 1 Samuel 4–6. Other parts of the book appear to have had origins in a variety of sources—popular, prophetic, liturgical, and bureaucratic.

Isolating the original components of 2 Samuel has always been a tentative matter. It is now doubly so, as recent studies in the "poetics" or "art" of Hebrew narrative cast doubt on much of the evidence appealed to by source critics. The further problems involved in determining the editorial stages through which the material might have passed are, in the view of increasing numbers of scholars, insuperable.

Hypotheses, however, abound. Most commonly accepted is the hypothesis that the last stage was the incorporation of the material into a "Deuteronomistic History"—Deuteronomy through 2 Kings—composed during the Exile in the sixth century B.C. (→ Deuteronomist; Deuteronomistic historian; Deuteronomy). (Some think that an earlier edition was written near the end of the seventh century.) While the exilic dating of the final form of Deuteronomy–2 Kings still looks relatively secure, however, the idea that these books were composed as an independent work, separate from Genesis–Numbers, faces serious criticism.

Perhaps more helpful to modern readers than hypotheses about editorial history is some understanding of how the kind of Hebrew narrative we find in the books of Samuel works to unfold meaning. We need to be aware, for example, that the narrator is fond of using repetition, and variation on the basis of it, in a way that much modern Western writing tends to avoid. We also observe that the narrator is generally reticent about telling readers what to think. Thus, for example, readers are often left to judge characters for themselves on the basis of their speech and actions. And speech can rarely be taken as the plain, unvarnished "truth." Characters in Hebrew narrative, like people in real life, present their own point of view or attempt to manipulate someone else's point of view. Constantly we find ourselves invited to fill gaps of information or meaning. Why has this character done this? Has something happened about which we have not been told? Why does this character's report of an event not match the narrator's account?

Meaning emerges little by little as we try out one way of reading against another. But because the text is so open to interpretation, the process of discovering meaning is never complete. Reading 2 Samuel, which contains some of the finest prose in the Hebrew Bible, is always a rich experience of discovery.

Meaning

The David of 2 Samuel starts life in 1 Samuel, in Hannah's hymn (1 Sam. 2:1–10). A mother gives thanks for the gift of a child (Samuel) and speaks, prophetically, of the king, the "anointed one" to whom Yhwh will give power. As the child is a special gift to the barren woman, so the kingdom is a special gift to David. Both gifts are freely given by God.

Giving and grasping are at the center of the story. It is when David allows choice to lie in the hands of others, especially Yhwh, that he most seems to flourish. Then he provokes readers to contemplate forbearance, to recognize providence as reality (e.g., 1 Sam. 24; 26; 2 Sam. 15–16). It is when he cannot rest content with the risk entailed or accept injured esteem issuing from rejection that he falters (e.g., 1 Sam. 25; 2

Sam. 11–12). Then we are confronted with a reality we know only too well, the reality of deceit, greed, and violence that makes us judge the David story so "realistic," so "plausible."

Yhwh gives David the kingdom, the house of Israel and of Judah (cf. 2 Sam. 12:8). But David's life consists not only of the public world. What happens privately in his own house (palace and family) will have an impact on the nation. As his mighty men are fighting the Ammonites (chap. 10), David seizes Bathsheba (chap. 11). As the one house (the house of Israel) is secured, another (the house of David) begins to crumble. In the story of Amnon and Absalom that follows, both family and nation will be torn apart (chaps. 12–20).

The kingship arose out of the people's search for security. But David's story in 2 Samuel embodies an old truth: human security all too readily generates corruption. Kingship, God-given or not, turns out to be no talisman (cf. 1 Sam. 8; Deut. 17:14–20). Our story retells a story told and retold in Genesis–2 Kings: Yhwh alone is sovereign, Yhwh alone offers security, and even then the people of Yhwh cannot acquire that security and fashion it their own way.

Thus David here embodies the nation that is given the land but falters in the receiving of it (in Joshua and Judges). His son Solomon falters in turn. Too soon the glory of Yhwh's house that Solomon has built (→ Temple, The) gives way to the expanding glory of his own house, from the security of which he serves other gods! So is torn from his house the house of Israel (the Northern Kingdom).

The house of Yhwh is no talisman. The larger story ends with it ruined, the people dispersed. So too with the house (dynasty) of David. 2 Kings concludes with a brief note about the exiled Davidic king, powerless in the house of his Babylonian conqueror.

The promise of an enduring house for David seems in 2 Samuel 7 to be unconditional but turns out to have limits. God, we may hear the story saying, offers a gift that is lasting—a gift to Abraham, to Moses, to David. But God cannot be taken for granted. That comment catches the story of the nation from entry into the land to exit. The promise of a "house" offers a gift that establishes order. But in itself no institution can secure order, no institution is secure. The promise cannot be presumed upon. It is not a crutch but an invitation to share in God's gift for the future.

David is not an ideal character. Rather the story that he inhabits points to various ways, negative as well as positive, in which a relationship between Yhwh and humankind might work. The original readers of the story perhaps sat in exile and wondered whether they might hope to rebuild a broken house. Why, they asked, had the old one been destroyed? But it is not just their story. As Deuteronomy helps us to see (cf. Deut. 4-6), the readers of Genesis-Kings are those who "today" stand beyond a river and yearn to cross and to build or rebuild a house. This is a story for them, wherever their "today" might be.

COMMENTARY

1:1-8:18

David's Kingdom Established

The first major movement of the book begins where the story of 1 Samuel has come to rest, with the death of Saul (→ Saul). It ends with David on the throne, king of both Judah in the south and Israel in the north (2 Sam. 5:1-5). Jerusalem, lying strategically between the two regions, has become David's capital (5:6-9).

By the end of the section important questions raised early in 1 Samuel have been resolved. The failure of the families of Eli and Samuel, priest and prophet, had led to a crisis of leadership (1 Sam. 1-8). The problem has been met by the institution of kingship in the person of David, chosen by God and promised by God a stable and enduring dynasty or "house" (2 Sam. 7). The symbol of the system of divine service, the Ark, has apparently found rest after much wandering and prominence at the center of the new kingdom (chap. 6; → Ark). The long-standing threat of national neighbors (cf. Judg.; 1 Sam.) appears to have been finally overcome. By the close of chap. 8 David appears to be established in power, in control of cult and state, and blessed by God.

1:1-27

The News of Saul's Death

1:1, Connections. The opening of the story resonates with earlier beginnings: "After the death of Saul" revives memories of Judges ("After the death of Joshua," 1:1) and Joshua ("After the death of Moses," 1:1), and beyond that the opening of Exodus ("Then Joseph died . . . and there arose a new king over Egypt, who did not know Joseph," 1:6, 8). Readers are at a pivotal moment.

Other stories, from 1 Samuel, also come to mind, creating some fine ironies. The narrator introduces David to us at his city of Ziklag, gift of the Philistines (1 Sam. 27:6) against whom Saul has just died fighting (1 Sam. 31). David has returned from slaughtering the Amalekites (→ Amalekites). That information reminds us of Saul's ill-fated campaign that led to his rejection as king for having spared some of the booty (1 Sam. 15). In striking contrast stands David's amazing good fortune in not only recovering his own family and property but also seizing much booty (1 Sam. 30).

Thus to speak of David in the context of Ziklag and the Amalekites is to say something about the way that providence has moved, at times strangely, with David against Saul. To cap the irony, it is an Amalekite, of all people, who brings David word of Saul's death.

1:2-16, Message and Mourning. The narrator describes the messenger scene in terms that allude to Eli's hearing of Israel's defeat, the capture of the Ark, and the deaths of his two sons (1 Sam. 4). That story grew out of the failure of the priestly government (1 Sam. 2:22-36), which also led to God's choice of Samuel as the new leader. Now we are at another pivotal moment when the leadership is about to change. David will succeed Saul, by Yhwh's choice.

Yet the story of the message is not quite what it seems, for what the messenger says does not fit well with the narrator's account in 1 Samuel 31. Did Saul die by his own hand or by that of the Amalekite? Is the Amalekite lying, hoping to gain a reward? If so, he is mistaken, for his deed is rewarded by execution.

David takes the lie to be truth (or so it appears) and condemns him for having slain "Yhwh's anointed." Earlier, in Exodus and Leviticus, anointing has been associated with the Aaronic priests; in 1 Samuel, however, it comes to refer to the king chosen by God (→ Messiah). Occurring in this sense first in Hannah's song (1 Sam. 2:10), it is used frequently of Saul by various characters and of David by Jonathan.

With Saul at his mercy (cf. 1 Sam. 24; 26), David explains his restraint in terms of not putting forth his hand against Yhwh's anointed. Whether that restraint is an exercise in piety or in political shrewdness is not told to readers directly. Perhaps it contains a measure of both. Although Samuel never tells him so, David seems aware that Saul has been rejected as king by God (1 Sam. 15) and that his own anointing (1 Sam. 16) has been an anointing for kingship. Yet he does not presume to seize immediately what may still lie in God's gift for the future. Rather he bides his time, building his power base (his small army and his circle of well-treated "friends" [1 Sam. 30:26]) and waiting for others to see to Saul's demise. Dramatically now (2 Sam. 1:14-16) he proclaims his innocence of Saul's blood by publicly mourning for him, by naming him once more (for the last time) as "Yhwh's anointed" and by having the Amalekite put to death.

1:17-27, A Song of Lament. David rounds off his public disclaimer with a lament for Saul and Jonathan ("to teach the people of Judah"; → Poetry). It crowns their death in glory and proclaims his own deep bond with Jonathan. Yet the song may also leave us uneasy. Were father and son truly “in life . . . not divided?” (see 1 Sam. 19–20)? “How are the mighty fallen!” runs the refrain. Is that praise or a judgment? For so it might have been said of Goliath (1 Sam. 17)! Divided from Saul in life, David claims him in death. That makes good politics, but it may leave his true feelings masked behind the words.

2:1–5:5

The Gift of the Kingdom

2:1–7; 5:1–5, King of Judah and Israel.

The way to the throne is now clear. As in times past, David consults the oracle to determine his next move (2:1; cf. 1 Sam. 23:1–14; 30:6–9). Sure enough, the ascent to Hebron in Judah turns out to be the right one. At Hebron the leaders come of their own accord to anoint him king over the southern nation (“the house of Judah”; → Hebron). Not that he was a person they could easily ignore, for he had not come alone but had brought with him a powerful military presence (v. 3).

Part of greater Israel is now David’s. The remainder, the northern nation (“the house of Israel”), will not become his without opposition. The story of enthronement culminates in 5:1–5 with the northern tribes claiming kinship with him (“we are your bone and flesh,” 5:1) and professing to know that even when Saul had been alive it had been David who had fought at their head, David whom God had designated to lead them. So David makes a treaty (“covenant”) with them and they anoint him king over the Northern Kingdom. That makes him at last king of all Israel.

2:8–3:5; 3:17–30, War Between Brothers.

The opening and closing scenes (2:1–7; 5:1–5) frame the story of the ongoing conflict between the ailing house of Saul and the ascendent house of David. And at the heart of the story lie two power brokers, the generals Abner (for Saul’s son Ishbosheth) and Joab (for David; → Abner; Joab).

Ishbosheth, the narrator infers, is largely a pawn in Abner’s hands: “And Abner son of Ner, commander of Saul’s army, took Ishbosheth son of Saul, and caused him to cross over to Mahanaim [a town east of the Jordan]; and he made him king over Gilead [a region east of the Jordan] and the Geshurites [in the far northeast] and Jezreel [in the north, between the Galilean and Samaritan hills] and Ephraim [the main northern territory] and Benjamin [central territory and Saul’s homeland] and all Israel [the entire land, probably including Judah]” (2:8–9). As the list expands, the claim to kingship looks increasingly hollow. Ishbosheth sits across the Jordan, virtually in exile, his power fragile and growing weaker (3:1).

Initially the issue is put to a kind of trial by combat. “Let the young men [or soldiers] arise and make sport before us,” says Abner to Joab (2:14), clothing in jest the deadly seriousness of the occasion. But the contest solves nothing, since all twenty-four combatants fall dead, and war ensues.

The battle goes against Abner and the northerners but the narrator rapidly passes over the details (2:17) in favor of two scenes from the aftermath. In the first (2:18–23), Abner reluctantly slays Asahel, the son of Zeruiah, who was also Joab’s brother (and David’s nephew—Zeruiah was David’s sister, according to 1 Chron. 2:16). In the second (2 Sam. 2:24–28), Joab agrees to call off the pursuit, faced with a united band of Benjaminites under Abner who are determined to fight to the death (vv. 25–26).

In both cases the personal tensions peculiar to opponents in a civil war are focused sharply. Abner pleads with Asahel to give up his pursuit, lest by slaying him Abner start a blood feud with Joab (v. 22; cf. 3:27). Likewise, Abner challenges Joab to bid his troops stop pursuing “their brothers,” lest “the sword devour for ever” (v. 26; note the repetition of “brothers” in Joab’s reply).

There is a disheartening familiarity in this struggle between “brothers” right at the outset of David’s reign; the story of the book of Judges is pockmarked with such strife, culminating in the virtual annihilation of Benjamin, the very tribe fighting so desperately here (Judg. 8:13–17; 9:1–57; 12:1–6; 20:1–21:25; cf. 5:14–18, 23). In turn, struggle between brothers will darken much of what remains of David’s story in 2 Samuel and in 1 Kings 1–2. And within little more than a generation the kingdom will be split once more, brother against brother (1 Kings 12).

Within this struggle too readers see the close intertwining of personal and public concerns. The fact that Abner had killed his brother, Asahel, will perhaps tip the scales for Joab when deciding how to respond to Abner’s secret visit to David (3:23–25). Abner has come as a spy, asserts Joab (3:25)—and given the extent of the enmity between them, private as well as public, why should Joab see it differently? While David was dealing “in peace” with the enemy general, Joab was out winning David’s battles (3:22).

3:6–16, Rizpah and Michal. Abner’s decision to desert Ishbosheth is crucial to the plot, for it leads to his death and thereby to the death of Ishbosheth (chap. 4). And crucial to the decision is a quarrel over a woman, Rizpah, one of Saul’s concubines (3:6–11). The brief episode lies between a list of sons born to David’s wives in Hebron (3:2-5; listed in order of birth)—a list that readers will want to remember from chap. 13 onward—and the account of David's recovery of his first wife, Michal, the daughter of Saul (3:12-16; cf. 1 Sam. 18:20-27; 19:11-17).

Neither Rizpah nor Michal has a voice in the narrative; they are disposed of like property. Whether David, who already has at least six wives, wants Michal for herself is not indicated—has, indeed, never been indicated (cf. 1 Sam. 18:20-27). As a symbol of his alliance with the house of Saul, however, her presence with him is politically invaluable. Yet she has her own presence, powerfully suggested by the grief of Paltiel, her second husband, at her departure (2 Sam. 3:16). Of Rizpah, on the other hand, we can glimpse nothing. Both characters remind us that however much the Abners, Joabs, and Davids protest their loyalty, good faith, or piety, it is a soldier's world in which they seek to wield power. The two women will return to confront both David and readers again (chaps. 6, 21).

3:31-39, More Mourning. With the death of Abner, David cannot lose. He can, however, capitalize on the deed, and he does so at Joab's expense. His mourning for the enemy general is extravagant; and, caught up in the fever, the people weep and lament also. David's language is extravagant: "as one falls before the wicked you have fallen," he exclaims (3:34), conveniently forgetting for a public moment that the "wicked" Joab is his right arm. But his extravagance makes its point; it was not David who killed Saul's general.

4:1-12, The End of Ishbosheth and His Assassins. When two of Ishbosheth's unit commanders treacherously assassinate their master in his bed in the noontime heat, David is presented with yet another opportunity to write his own version of history and demonstrate his loyalty to Saul and his restraint in the taking of the kingdom. Alluding directly to the execution of the Amalekite in chap. 1 (vv. 10-11), he has the brothers Rechab and Baanah similarly dispatched (v. 12). Then he is ready to receive the gift of the house of Israel, the completion of his kingdom. And this duly takes place (5:1-5; see 2:1-7).

5:6-8:18

Consolidation

The story of the kingdom is now one of consolidation and centralization.

5:6-16, Jerusalem. David moves to counter the separatist politics of north and south by seeking a new, centrally located capital in the Jebusite (Canaanite) city of Jerusalem near the borders between Judah and Benjamin. (The reference to the "blind and lame" in vv. 6-8 is best understood as sarcasm, by the Jebusites toward David and vice versa; → David, City of.)

The narrator then pauses to add a word about the new king's growing power, "for Yhwh, the God of hosts [armies], was with him" (v. 10). Furthermore, David knew his success to be the doing of Yhwh "for the sake of his people Israel" (v. 12). David's relationship to Yhwh appears to be as firmly established as his kingdom.

Yet a jarring note follows (vv. 13-16). "And David took more concubines and wives from Jerusalem"—an unusual and interesting order of priority for Yhwh's chosen king! Moreover, to elaborate the king's establishment by first speaking of him "taking" from the city is to remind readers of Samuel's impassioned warning to the people about the ways of kings in 1 Sam. 8:10-20. The king, says Samuel, will take and take from you. It recalls too the law of kingship in Deut. 17:14-20. "He is not to multiply wives for himself," runs the law of Moses, "or his heart will turn away [from God]" (v. 17). These passages haunt the whole story of kingship in Samuel and Kings.

Later, when we read the story of David's taking of Bathsheba (chaps. 11-12), the phrase "he took wives from Jerusalem" will be seen to have strikingly foreshadowed the taking of Uriah's wife.

Verses 13-14 continue, "and more sons and daughters were born to David. And these are the names . . ." Yet only the names of sons follow. David perceives Yhwh's action toward him to have been "for the sake of Israel" (v. 12). Does that include daughters? Or are daughters of no account in David's Israel? These verses, then, bring back into focus those voiceless women, Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and Michal, Saul's daughter, taken for David from the weeping Paltiel.

5:17-25, Philistines. The focus switches from internal consolidation (both public and domestic) to the issue of external security and the defeat of the new nation's most pressing enemy, the Philistines (→ Philistines). With success on the front, the king is ready to continue centralizing power by establishing his capital as a center of worship (chap. 6).

6:1-23, The Ark. With its relocation from Baalah (i.e., Kiriath-jearim; cf. 1 Chron. 13:6; 1 Sam. 7:1-2; the Hebrew text may be garbled here) to Jerusalem, the wanderings of the Ark seem to be over. Great rejoicing marks the account. Two incidents, however, disturb the triumphal tone.

First is Yhwh's anger when Uzzah touches the Ark, which in turn prompts David's anger and fear of Yhwh (2 Sam. 6:6-10). The Ark, the narrator reminds us, is a sacred object and represents the awesome and sometimes unpredictable power of the sacred (→ Ark; Holiness). Yhwh does not need Uzzah to prop up the Ark of God. Set against such mystery, Uzzah's very human reaction is made to appear of secondary importance. But if this is what can happen to Uzzah, what response might a deliberate sin of some magnitude bring forth?

The incident reminds both David and readers that David's relationship with Yhwh does not guarantee divine blessing on all he does. Is it even Yhwh's will that the Ark be brought to Jerusalem? In contrast to the preceding accounts of the Philistine battles, David has made no inquiry of Yhwh before acting. Now, fearful because of the setback, he waits for a divine sign (cf. v. 12).

The second incident is the quarrel between David and Michal over his dancing in public. The precise nature of his action in Michal's view is unclear (v. 20: "uncovering himself" [RSV] or "exposing himself" [NAB] may equally be "flaunting himself" or "showing off," i.e., without implying nakedness). Plainly, however, she thinks that it is debasing for a king; hence the heavy sarcasm of "How the king of Israel has distinguished himself today!" (NIV).

The narrator introduces her as "Michal the daughter of Saul" (v. 16 and again in v. 20), not "Michal the wife of David," thereby distancing her from David and reminding readers of her royal lineage. Here is a daughter who does count in David's kingdom, at least to the extent that she is useful to the new king. She can buttress his claim to the throne and no doubt produce a son who will then conveniently inherit both royal houses.

But this daughter is not prepared to be so used. She pits her sense of royal dignity against his public posturing. Like her father, she cannot win the contest, for Yhwh is on David's side, has chosen him above Saul, as David himself is only too ready to tell her. "And Michal the daughter of Saul had no child to the day of her death" (v. 23)—the due reward, readers might suppose, for opposing Yhwh's chosen. Yet in another sense David's is a pyrrhic victory, for not through her will David's line be able to legitimize succession to the throne of Saul. And without her son, the obvious heir, the way is open for the bitter struggle between brothers that will plague the latter part of David's story.

7:1-29, A House. Chap. 7 develops two elements of chap. 6—divine service and dynastic succession. Tying them together is a play on the word "house." David, dwelling comfortably in his house (palace) of cedar, decides that the Ark too should have a house (temple) (v. 2; cf. vv. 5-7). Nathan the prophet, here introduced for the first time, makes an instant response: "Go ahead, do whatever you have in mind; for Yhwh is with you."

Alas, his advice proves less than sound. As we have already seen, the fact that Yhwh is with David does not give him carte blanche to do as he chooses. And Yhwh hastens to tell the prophet that very night to sort out his theology. On the contrary, Yhwh suggests with some sarcasm, a house is the least of the Deity's concerns.

Yhwh turns the conversation around instead. Rather than you build me a house, the Deity says, I will build you one (vv. 11-16). The "house" in mind is, of course, a royal house or dynasty. The Deity offers the prospect of a peaceful transfer of power with a successor from among David's sons taking the throne with Yhwh's blessing. Let that heir, then, build a "house for my name" (though whether this refers to building, literally, a temple or rather to building, metaphorically, a royal house or, perhaps, nation—the "house of Israel"—which is dedicated to Yhwh, is far from clear).

Yhwh is making here a major concession, for the history of Israel's leadership to this point has been one dissociated from dynasty. Again and again sons have proven unworthy successors and leadership has had to devolve elsewhere (e.g., Samuel and his sons, 1 Sam. 8:1-3; Eli and his sons, 1 Sam. 2:22-36; Gideon and his son, Abimelech, Judg. 8:22-9:57).

The prophecy hugely reinforces David's sense of being favored. He responds enthusiastically in a long prayer, acknowledging Yhwh's gift to Israel and to him (2 Sam. 7:18-24). Yet he hovers curiously between the security of knowing great blessing and the insecurity of needing to have it confirmed for the future. With elaborate rhetoric the king urges Yhwh to "confirm for ever the word which you have spoken" (vv. 25-29).

8:1-14, Further Conquest. Having drawn us into the world of cult and prophecy the narrator now pulls us back to where these themes entered, the Philistine war (8:1; cf. 5:17-25). Now all the nation's borders are secured. The list takes readers on a grand tour of Israel's boundaries.

Skirting the edge of the Deuteronomic law ("nor is he to multiply greatly for himself silver and gold," Deut. 17:17), the king dedicates gifts and booty of silver and gold to Yhwh (2 Sam. 18:11). So "Yhwh gave David victory everywhere he went" (v. 14).

8:15-18, The Bureaucracy. This first movement of David's story comes to rest with a bland summary: "So David reigned over all Israel; and he did what was just and right for his whole people" (v. 15). A brief list of officials follows. It begins with Joab, the army commander, and includes the “recorder,” the priests, the secretary, the commander of the Cherethites and Pelethites (the professional guard)—and some more priests! “And David’s sons were priests” (v. 18).

Again, therefore, we find equilibrium disturbed (as earlier in 5:13–16). For David’s sons to be priests is to flout the Mosaic law that draws the priesthood exclusively from the tribe of Levi (→ Levites; Priests). (Many versions, like many commentators, have attempted to smooth the text by rewriting it—cf. 1 Chron. 18:17.) Just as we sense completion at hand, the narrator unsettles us. David, chosen and supported by Yhwh, is no simple model of piety.

9:1–20:26

Kingdom and Family

The story moves into a new phase. Consolidation gives way to a new struggle for power within the kingdom. The story of the Ammonite war (chap. 10) has tempted readers to consider the greatest threats to David to lie beyond Israel’s borders in the realm of international politics. Subdue those outside, it suggests, and all will be well. The story of David’s taking of Bathsheba and murder of Uriah (chaps. 11–12) and the subsequent story of rape, murder, and rebellion (chaps. 13–20) tell otherwise. It is a threat from within, a corruption that grows from within himself and his own family, that most menaces David’s exercise of power. From this point on, despite enlivening moments, David’s story becomes increasingly bleak.

Nathan’s prophecy (chap. 12) presses us to see that David’s crime and the events of chaps. 13–20 are part of a chain that is anchored in David’s sin. Ironically, one of the seeds of disruption lies in the very thing that David so earnestly desired—the divine promise of a “house” (chap. 7). While that promise offers the king security and stability by sanctioning the transfer of kingship to one of David’s offspring (7:12), it opens up the question “Which one?” The appetite for power by and on behalf of various sons permeates the remainder of David’s story, both in chaps. 13–20 and, equally bloodily, in the closing chapters of his life (1 Kings 1–2).

Though David is eventually restored to his throne, his power is in reality held by others, men of violence, most notably Joab. Moreover, the signs of division in the kingdom have already reappeared with the quarrel between north and south (2 Sam. 19:41–43) and the withdrawal of support by some northerners under Sheba ben Bichri, of Saul’s tribe of Benjamin (chap. 20).

9:1–13

Mephibosheth, Son of Jonathan

The story of Mephibosheth’s coming to court, in chap. 9, is transitional. On the one hand, it looks back to David’s time at Saul’s court, when Jonathan loved him (1 Sam. 18:1; 19:1; 20:17), dealt loyally with him (1 Sam. 19–20), and had him swear never to “cut off [his] loyalty [kindness]” from Jonathan’s house (1 Sam. 20:14–17; cf. 20:42). And in raising the question of David’s relation to Saul’s family, the story brings to mind again the division between David and Michal, Saul’s daughter (2 Sam. 6:20–23). On the other hand, the chapter looks forward to the forthcoming story of the rebellion of Absalom, David’s son (chaps. 15–20), of which it forms part of a subplot.

David’s action in summoning the lame Mephibosheth (9:3, 13; cf. 4:4) is clothed in the language of loyal dealing (vv. 1, 7). Yet once more we find ambiguity as Mephibosheth grovels fearfully before the king (v. 8).

David’s generosity means restoring to Mephibosheth land that is in any case Mephibosheth’s by right of inheritance. The produce, from the labor of Ziba’s considerable household (v. 10), is to be brought to the king’s table—far beyond Mephibosheth’s needs and leaving, no doubt, a handsome surplus for the court. And for the heir of a defeated royal house to eat at the conqueror’s table is itself an ambiguous honor. That way David has this heir of Saul under his scrutiny. Mephibosheth is effectively a prisoner.

We shall again glimpse this picture of Mephibosheth, “who used to eat always at the king’s table” (v. 13; cf. vv. 7, 10), at the very end of the larger story (Genesis–2 Kings). Jehoiachin, defeated king of Judah and heir of David, is released from prison in Babylon by Evil-merodach—“and he used to eat food always before [the king] all the days of his life.” His prison has but changed its appearance (as he changes his clothes, 2 Kings 25:29). Ironically, the fate of Saul’s house and of David’s will turn out to be the same.

10:1–12:31

War, Adultery, and Murder

The account of the Ammonite war in chap. 10 becomes, in 11:1, both starting point and background for the crucial story of David, Bathsheba, and Uriah. The war report is then resumed in 12:26–31, which details the taking of the Ammonite capital, Rabbah. Thus the domestic story of David’s adultery and murder is framed by the public story of war and conquest. The taking of the city of Rabbah parallels the taking of Bathsheba and the life of Uriah.

10:1–19, The Ammonite War. From seeking to “deal loyally with [Mephibosheth] for Jonathan’s sake” (9:1, 7)—and for the sake of internal security?—David now turns his attention beyond Israel’s borders and seeks to “deal loyally with Hanun the son of Nahash [king of the Ammonites], as his father dealt loyally with me” (10:1). He sends envoys, says the narrator, “to console [Hanun] over [the death of] his father” (v. 2; → Ammonites).

But if we have been suspicious of David’s motives in treating Mephibosheth “loyally,” we might also wonder a little here. Is the narrator expressing only the publicly stated intent of the mission? Concern for the security of his borders and the maintenance of a treaty of nonaggression must be at least David’s objective (as many historians have observed). But Hanun’s advisors appear doubly suspicious. They persuade the new king that the mission is in fact espionage preparatory to an Israelite assault on the capital. Or is it that they too have a hidden agenda and wish to provoke a war to destroy the growing power of Israel under David while there is still time? The episode conjures a memory of Abner’s visit to David (chap. 3) and Joab’s accusation that the enemy general had come to spy (3:25).

Talk of “treating loyally” and “consoling” can all too easily conceal ulterior motives. What “seems to be” and what “is” in David’s story—as in Genesis–2 Kings as a whole—turn out, so often, to be rather different things. As much as human beings struggle to communicate what “is” through what they say, they have an even greater propensity for using words to fabricate appearances. And between speaker and listener, moreover, there is always a void in which lurks the possibility of misunderstanding. So here we are not surprised to see the language of loyalty turned into the language of enmity; and as readers we are left struggling to know what lies behind what seems.

The account of the war that inevitably follows the humiliation of David’s envoys also unsettles our sense of knowing exactly the time frame of the events. When we read that the Ammonites hired the Syrians of Zobah and Rehob (10:6) in the first phase of the war (vv. 6–14) and note the Syrian king Hadadezer in the second phase (vv. 15–19), we begin to wonder whether this episode is not a flashback to the campaigns recounted in chap. 8 (cf. 8:3–12).

If, on the one hand, we think of the Ammonite war as subsequent in time to the events of chap. 8, we are struck by the rapidity with which what appeared secure has again become a threat. If, on the other hand, we read the war account as a flashback, we may be struck by the irony of the context in which David’s adultery and murder have been set. It is at the very peak of his power, when Yhwh is giving him victory wherever he goes (8:14), that the king most conspicuously fails. Security breeds insecurity; success incubates failure. It is as the gift of the kingdom is being made complete that Yhwh’s chosen one chooses to grasp most rapaciously what is not his to grasp. In short, it is at his most secure that David turns out to be most open to failure.

11:1–27, David, Bathsheba, and Uriah.

The story is full of irony, starting with the narrator’s dry comment that “At the turn of the year [i.e., the spring], at the time when kings march out [to battle], David sent Joab, and his servants with him, and all Israel. . . and David stayed in Jerusalem” (v. 1). So while the army besieges Rabbah, David takes an afternoon nap and then besieges Bathsheba.

The narrator gives us few explicit clues to the inner feelings or thoughts of the characters. Bathsheba’s point of view, particularly, is concealed. Rather, events unfold through David’s eyes. The nature of the king’s interest in Bathsheba is thus implicitly revealed. The word “bed” sets the tone, and we see that what he sees is “a woman” and “a very attractive woman” (v. 2). In due course we hear, with David, only the stark content of her message: “I am pregnant” (v. 5).

In the word choice, readers may also find a clue to another dimension of the story. David, we are told, was walking on the roof of “the king’s house” (rather than “his house”). This is about a woman and a king, and that means a story about a disparity of power, not only that existing between a woman and a man, but between a woman and the most powerful man in the land. Bathsheba (and later Uriah) is the object of a king’s transactions. The text is full of the word “send” (twelve times in chap. 11).

The narrator provides another piece of important information. Bathsheba was “purifying herself from her uncleanness” (v. 4), that is, from her menstrual period (→ Purity). David’s paternity of the child she conceives will be beyond dispute.

The interchange between David and Uriah follows directly (vv. 6–13). Readers know David’s words cloak deceit from beginning to end. His asking after the welfare of Joab and the army is a sham, merely the pretext to get Uriah home. “Go down to your house,” he says to the soldier (v. 8), adding lightly, as man to man, “and wash your feet”—a euphemism for sexual intercourse. The suggestion is designed to sound like indulgent generosity, especially since to follow it would be to break the rules of purity (v. 11; Exod. 19:14–15; Deut. 23:9–14; cf. 1 Sam. 21:5; Ps. 132:1–5). But, of course, to both David and readers the suggestion really means much more than “sleep with your wife." Rather, it means David's opportunity to pass off paternity to Uriah, the deceived husband.

With David's failure to subvert Uriah, the scene shifts again (2 Sam. 11:14-25). David does not hesitate. "In the morning" he sets murder in motion. Ironically, the faithful Uriah carries his own letter of doom.

But does Uriah really not know what is happening? Can the affair, the subject of so much message sending, have remained hidden from the man who slept with "all the servants of his lord"? If David can speak in code, why not Uriah? Understood thus, Uriah's refusal to go down to his house is in fact his refusal to compromise his own house, to condone David's crime and so to embed further the corruption in the king's house. Does he therefore go to his death knowingly, still the king's loyal servant, but with his own integrity intact? In that case the irony of his death is turned against David. It is Uriah who is in charge of it, not David. It is Uriah the Hittite (whose name in Hebrew means "Yhwh is my light") who rules in Jerusalem.

The narrator switches back for a brief moment to Bathsheba. Our focus is brought to bear on the marital relationship that has been destroyed: "And the wife of Uriah heard that Uriah her husband was dead, and she lamented over her lord" (v. 26, emphasis added). The proper social customs are observed: Bathsheba enters a period of mourning, feeling what we know not. Then David who began the episode ends it by once again sending to have her brought to his house, this time as his wife. She bears his son.

"Let not this thing be evil in your sight," David says to Joab concerning Uriah's death (v. 25). "But the thing that David had done was evil in the sight of Yhwh" (v. 27), concludes the narrator. Thus the first part of the story of adultery and murder closes with our glimpsing Yhwh's perspective. And that will preface Yhwh's action.

12:1-25, Judgment. The act of "sending"—people, words—has characterized David's manipulation of his power in chap. 11. Now it is Yhwh's turn. "And Yhwh sent Nathan to David" (12:1). What the prophet will wield against David are simply words, but they will be powerful words that will shape David's future. Then Yhwh will wield death against David's house as David has against Uriah's.

In the parable of the poor man's ewe lamb, Nathan deploys words that are slippery, an apt weapon against the David of slippery words. He teases readers with the parable's alternative referents: the lamb is pictured as a child but also as one who "ate his morsel and drank his cup"—language often used in sexual imagery—and "slept at his breast"; she became to him like a "daughter" (Heb. bath, as in Bathsheba). The parable sucks the king in and extracts from him self-judgment.

Suddenly we are confronted with what was so palpably absent in chap. 11. As David sits in judgment upon others his feelings are opened up to our view. He responds to the account with passion and invokes Yhwh's name in righteous anger. We recognize once more the David who could so tellingly lend his emotions to a public occasion (e.g., at the deaths of Saul, Abner, and Ishbosheth, chaps. 1-4). And if his outburst in 12:5 means "the man who has done this deserves to die" (RSV; but it may mean something like "... is a hellish fiend"), it doubly exposes his own hypocrisy. He, after all, approved taking and slaughtering not a lamb but a woman and a man.

He speaks of restitution. If "fourfold" is read (12:6, Masoretic Text [MT]; the Septuagint [LXX] has "sevenfold") there may be here a foreshadowing of the premature deaths of four of David's children: Bathsheba's first child, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah. "Let not this thing be evil in your sight, for sometimes the sword devours one, sometimes another," David had said to Joab (11:25). "So now," says Nathan (for Yhwh), "a sword will not turn aside from your house, a lasting sword. . . . Thus says Yhwh: Behold, I am raising up evil against you from your house" (12:10-11).

"I gave you," says Yhwh, "your master's house . . . I gave you the house of Israel and Judah (v. 8). "House" is ambiguous. It is kingdom, dynasty, extended family. One meaning slides into another. Just so, the king's private and political lives merge, often mirror each other. What he does in the one has a way of impinging on what he does in the other.

Yhwh's gift has been met by David's grasping. He has taken what is not his to take—Bathsheba and the life of Uriah. Therefore, says the prophet in Yhwh's name, "I will take your wives in your sight, and give them to your neighbor [cf. Samuel's words to Saul, 1 Sam. 15:28], and he shall sleep with your wives in the sight of this sun [i.e., with everyone's knowledge]" (v. 11). The words foreshadow Absalom's treatment of David's concubines (16:20-22).

David's response is powerful. In recognizing his sin against Yhwh he recognizes his ultimate antagonist in the matter. Somehow Uriah and Bathsheba become secondary. Readers too may sense that the stakes are higher than the individuals concerned, for at issue is Yhwh's choice and support of David. Can the Deity countenance the rejection of the chosen one? On the other hand, at what cost can the Deity afford to continue supporting him? Nathan's response points to ongoing support but at a price, paid first by the child conceived in adultery. We shall see it paid in turn by a succession of others in David's house—family and kingdom—in the episodes to come.

Powerful too is David's response to the child's death. Against what his servants expect he shrugs aside his loss, symbolizing his commitment to living by asking for food and eating (compare Saul's equally symbolic reluctance to eat in 1 Sam. 28:20, prior to his death). At the heart of David's action seems to be his recognition of Yhwh's power to give and take life (cf. v. 23).

The king's speech to his servants (vv. 22-23) may evoke different responses in different readers—as resignation, indifference, or even callousness. But there is a softening in the picture at the close. As we read of David renewing his relationship with Bathsheba, we note, at last, an affective verb: "And David comforted Bathsheba, his wife, and went in to her, and slept with her" (v. 24). A son is born and Yhwh's response, as if mirroring David's, is also affective: "And Yhwh loved him."

12:26-31, The Taking of Rabbah. Abruptly we are thrown back into the political world, where fighting and taking/capturing dominate the scene. It is too a world of appearances, for although Rabbah has effectively fallen to Joab, the king must be seen to be its captor. Torture (perhaps—so, e.g., Josephus and KJV, but few modern English versions) and forced labor are the lot of its people (v. 31). The momentary note of contrition and comfort is lost in the glorification of war.

13:1-14:33

Rape, Murder, and Exile

13:1-39, Tamar and Her Brothers. We meet three characters. Two are sons of David—Absalom and Amnon, whom we have met before as third-born and firstborn, respectively, in the list of sons born to David at Hebron (3:2-5). Introduced between them is a daughter, Tamar, sister of Absalom, half-sister of Amnon.

From the beginning the familial relationships are sharply focused by constant definition and redefinition of characters (as the point of view changes) in terms of "son," "sister," "brother," and "father." This is a story of sickness within a family, where the very ties that betoken solidarity and protection are perverted into the means to commit crime.

That Tamar, the sister, is described at the outset as "beautiful" is perhaps ominous, given the way the David and Bathsheba story had started (11:2; Bathsheba is "very attractive"). And, indeed, so it proves: Amnon loved her and wanted to sleep with her (13:1-2).

But already our understanding has come under strain. We are first struck by the verb "love," which was, together with other affective language, so obviously missing from David's story. Yet the word is immediately defined in terms of "doing something to her" (v. 2). "Love" looks more like "desire" and will soon most resemble "lust." (In the same way we will come to put quotation marks around the word "wise" used of Jonadab, "a very wise man," in v. 3.) Unlike David with Bathsheba, however, Amnon is unable simply to send for and take Tamar, because as a young marriageable woman (most English versions read: "a virgin") she is subject to strict oversight. Hence he must use subterfuge to take her (cf. David with Uriah).

Thus the son's story both imitates that of the father and differs from it. And at the heart of the difference is perhaps the outcome for the woman. Bathsheba, whose taking is described in such dispassionate terms, is finally offered comfort by David. Tamar, excessively "loved" at the beginning (vv. 1-4), is at the end excessively hated by her rapist (vv. 11, 14-17; he "seizes," "overpowers," and "rapes" her). The violent fluctuation is conveyed also in the dialogue: "Come, lie with me, my sister" (v. 11) gives place to "Get this [woman] out of my presence" (v. 17).

By contrast too, Shechem, who raped Dinah, Leah's daughter, ends by loving her, speaking tenderly to her, and asking his father to get her to be his wife (Gen. 34:1-4). But there the contrast stops, for her brothers will not consider a marriage, since her honor (by which they really mean their own) has been slighted. Shechem is slaughtered and Dinah disappears from view, locked up in perpetual dependency upon her do-nothing father and dominating brothers. A similar fate awaits the now unmarriageable Tamar, shut up, desolate, in the house of her brother Absalom (2 Sam. 13:20) while her angry father, like Jacob (Gen. 34:30-31), does nothing.

"And King David heard all these things and was very angry" (v. 21). Some ancient versions add here: "but he did nothing to vex his son Amnon because he loved him, for he was his firstborn." Again the woman is pushed to the margin. Abused by her brother, she is ignored by her father in the interests of the firstborn son. David, the lastborn (1 Sam. 16:11), has forgotten his own beginnings. The king, the assiduous taker of women, will not take up his daughter's cause.

Mention of favoritism toward the firstborn also prods us to reflect on Absalom's response to his sister's plight. Is the rape the beginning of his hate toward Amnon or but another episode in it? With Chileab, the second-born son (2 Sam. 3:3), unmentioned, does that make Absalom and Amnon rivals for the succession?

David's cynical disposal of Uriah was left to a chance enemy arrow. Absalom, however, leaves nothing to chance—"When I say to you, 'Strike Amnon,' then kill him" (13:28). Here is a character who knows how both to bide his time and to act. He also knows how far to push David. So he flees to Talmai, king of Geshur, his maternal grandfather (v. 37; cf. 3:3).

The narrator's closing remarks typically provoke questions. For which son did David mourn (13:37)? And if David "was comforted" (or "consoled"; cf. 12:24, David "comforted" Bathsheba) over the death of Amnon, did he welcome it all along or at least see in it someone else's solution to his dilemma? Did he really suspect nothing, as Absalom pressed him to let Amnon go to the sheepshearing (13:24-27, especially v. 26)? Or was David, after all, acting once more through abstaining?

His attitude toward both Amnon and Absalom may thus be complex. A hidden factor becomes evident only when we remember the larger setting of the story. David's hands are tied by his own evil (chap. 11), for the sons have merely mimicked the king, their father. To function as judge would thus be to expose himself fatally to a charge of hypocrisy. He would then be like his ancestor Judah, condemning the other Tamar to death (Gen. 38).

14:1-33, Absalom's Return. Again the plot turns on coded words—a parable intended to provoke the hearer to self-judgment (vv. 4-21; cf. 12:1-7; 1 Kings 20:35-42). Again a woman is at the center of the episode, apparently not this time as a victim of a man's grasping, but as a mediator and reconciler.

It is Joab, however, who initiates the attempt to bring Absalom back to court. And notice how David perceives that Joab is behind the action (2 Sam. 14:19). That happens after the woman has made her judgment against the king (v. 13), as she seeks desperately to mitigate her dangerous effrontery. Her speech subtly transforms the story of threat to the widow and son in the parable into an account of the threat that has forced her to risk confronting the king in this way.

She has been threatened, she says, by "the people" (the word could also mean "army") and, in particular, by "the hand of a man who would destroy me and my son" (v. 16). She is speaking to the king now in her own voice, not the voice of the widow in the parable, but she allows the two voices to flow together, for she cannot openly accuse the king's general (perhaps standing nearby—cf. v. 21) of intimidating her. But she has no need to do so. In the language of violence David unerringly recognizes "the hand of Joab" (v. 19).

Whether or not it is wisdom to grant Joab's request remains to be seen. (And what is Joab's motive in making it?) Nor can we be sure that the wise woman thinks it to be wise, since the narrator never tells us what she thinks. The parable and judgment are put in her mouth by Joab (v. 3)—put there, moreover, to the accompaniment of other words of coercion (according to her) that the narrator mischievously neglected to mention (vv. 2-3). Thus her role as reconciler must be reconsidered. The nature of her wisdom remains elusive, to be sought perhaps in her skill as playactor and wordsmith. Perhaps she is simply trying to stay alive in a world where men wield power ruthlessly and capriciously.

Absalom's return is thus woven from words of deception and violence. That is both ominous and appropriate—for certainly violence is a language both he and Joab understand well, as the field burning exemplifies (vv. 28-33). Throughout the whole episode reconciliation is constantly compromised—by fear and coercion (the wise woman's speech), by the aggression of Absalom's message to Joab (vv. 28-33), by the king's refusal to let his son come into his presence (v. 24; so Absalom, like Tamar, dwelt apart in his house), and finally by the wordless reunion that conceals as much as it reveals (v. 33).

Absalom's story began in 13:1: "And Absalom, David's son, had a beautiful sister, whose name was Tamar." With Amnon dead and Absalom back in Jerusalem, the narrator pauses to fill in some details (14:25-27). They are details full of irony. We read of Absalom's unsurpassable beauty (a fateful thing in King David's family), of the absence of blemish in him (like a sacrificial animal), of the cutting of his extraordinary hair (like a Nazirite; cf. Num. 6:1-21; Judg. 13:3-5; 16:17), and of his three sons and one daughter. For once, the sons are unnamed, the daughter named: she was called Tamar, and, adds the narrator, "she was a beautiful woman to look at" (2 Sam. 14:27; cf. 11:2; 13:1). Readers might well tremble for this Tamar too.

15:1-16:14

Rebellion and Exile

Now comes the story of Absalom's rebellion. In effect, it puts David back to the beginning of the book, with the kingdom in the grip of civil war. This reverse, however, has a curiously positive effect. As the king journeys across the Jordan into the wilderness (cf. 17:29), he rediscovers for a moment some of his sources of strength.

There is symmetry in the way the narrative of exile and return unfolds. It draws our attention to similarities and differences between particular scenes, especially in the journeys to and from the Jordan (15:13-16:14; 19:15-20:3). Framed by these journeys are the central scenes of debate (between Hushai and Ahithophel, 17:1-14) and battle (between the armies of David and Absalom, 18:1-17). Each culminates in a messenger scene (17:15-21; 18:19-32) and an account of the king's response (17:22; 18:33-19:8).

15:1-12, Absalom Steals Hearts. The story gathers speed. From the picture of Absalom's ostentation (v. 1), and his cultivation in Jerusalem of support for himself and disaffection for the king (vv. 2-6), the narrator moves to Hebron, where David had been made king (vv. 7-12; cf. 2:4, 5:3). Four years (LXX; the MT has "forty") are traversed in a few sentences, compounding our sense of the rapid growth in Absalom's popular backing. That, of course, raises questions. What was David doing all this time? Is it possible that Absalom's claims about his father's failure to provide justice are well founded?

The son cloaks his visit to Hebron in piety, claiming that he must fulfill a vow to Yhwh, as though it were the Deity who had brought him back to Jerusalem (15:7-8). Two verses later and rebellion declared, that implication might seem a striking blasphemy on Absalom's part. Yet Nathan's prophecy should nag our memory—"Behold," says Yhwh, "I will raise up evil against you out of your own house" (12:10-11; cf. 15:14). Perhaps, ironically, there may be truth in Absalom's deceptive words after all. There is irony too in the picture of the man "without a blemish" offering sacrifices to Yhwh while he summons Ahithophel, David's counselor, to betray his own father, Yhwh's chosen king.

The return of Absalom, begun with Joab's observation that "the heart of the king was [set] on Absalom" (14:1), culminates in "the hearts of the men of Israel [going] after Absalom" (15:13), for Absalom "stole the hearts of the men of Israel" (v. 6). With their hearts in the grasp of Absalom, the men of Israel who had given David the kingdom now revoke their gift. The roles of father and son are reversed. It is now David's turn to go into exile.

15:13-16:14, From Jerusalem to the Jordan. The speed with which David abandons his capital more than matches the rapidity with which rebellion overtakes him. Indeed, there is a touch of pathos, if not farce, in the response to Absalom by the conqueror of Rabbah. Barely has the flight begun before we find him in conversation with a powerful mercenary captain, referring to Absalom as "the king," and, of all things, urging this vital ally to desert him (15:18-22).

Read from another perspective, however, things may look different. David's flight is in the interests of preserving the city from the ravages of war and his response to Ittai illustrates his understanding of freedom.

Ittai is made no unwilling captive to a contract. Instead, he matches David's gift of liberty with his own commitment. In Ittai's view, despite all appearances to the contrary, David is still his lord "the king" (v. 21). And in his commitment lie the seeds of David's restoration. Ittai will play an important role in making David's kingship real again (18:2).

It is similar with the Ark (15:24-29). Instead of grasping at it as a guarantor of success (like the Israelites in 1 Sam. 4), David returns it to the royal city. "If I find favor in Yhwh's sight," he remarks, "he will bring me back . . . but if he says, 'I have no pleasure in you,' behold, here I am, let him do to me what is good in his sight" (2 Sam. 15:25-26).

Shimei of Saul's house expresses vehemently the view that Yhwh has indeed no delight in David (16:5-12): the rebellion is divine vengeance "for the blood of the house of Saul, whose place as king you took. . . . See, your own evil is upon you, for you are a man of blood" (v. 8). Abishai's violent response (he is Joab's brother)—"Let me go over and take off his head" (v. 9)—is what we might expect of the participants in this world. David's restraint—"Leave him alone and let him curse" (v. 11)—is by contrast extraordinary. And again it is expressed in terms of Yhwh's doing.

Shimei we know to be wrong. It was, of course, Yhwh who gave David Saul's throne. The story was remarkable for David's restraint toward Saul, above all at the cave at Engedi and in Saul's camp at Hachilah (1 Sam. 24; 26). But perhaps Shimei is also, unconsciously, right. As already observed (on 15:7-8, 14), given Nathan's perspective (12:10-11), it may well be David's own evil that is now upon him.

As for blood, we may recall an earlier flight from court—Saul's court—when David had recklessly taken supplies from Ahimelech the priest at Nob, knowing a spy to be there, and costing the blood of eighty-five priests and more, "men and women, children and sucklings" (1 Sam. 21-22; cf. 1 Sam. 15:3). We see too the blood of the civil war (2 Sam. 2-4), of the wars to secure borders—Moabites measured out for death (8:2), twenty-two thousand Syrians slain (8:5), eighteen thousand Edomites (8:13), and much more—and, of course, the blood of Uriah (11:14-25; 12:9-10). Has David no hand in any of this?

Yet that view of David as a man of blood need not dominate here. If we so choose, we may rather enjoy the king who lets power pass into the hands of others whom he trusts.

The account of David's progress out of the city has almost a ritual quality to it. It is full of participles indicating continuing action; the verb "pass over" ("pass on," "cross over") is repeated sixteen times (similarly in Josh. 3-4, the account of crossing the Jordan); and it is narrated at a measured pace, scene by scene.

In the procession comes the Ark (2 Sam. 15:24-29), though that is turned back. But then David and the people with him, in the attitude of mourning, ascend the Mount of Olives (v. 30). Here word comes of Ahithophel's treachery, to which David responds with a prayer: "Yhwh, please turn the counsel of Ahithophel into folly" (v. 31). "And it came to pass," continues the narrator, "that when David came to the summit, where God was worshiped, behold, Hushai came to meet him" (v. 32). As the story unfolds it will become clear that Hushai is the answer to David's prayer. The king's friend (v. 37; 16:16) will persuade Absalom to reject Ahithophel's advice and so allow David to escape safely across the Jordan (17:1–22). The narrator makes explicit the connections in 17:14: "For Yhwh had ordained to frustrate the good counsel of Ahithophel, in order that Yhwh might bring evil upon Absalom."

Ahithophel, summoned to treachery as Absalom offered sacrifices at Hebron, finds his best counsel rejected. Hushai, called to loyalty as David prays "where God is worshiped," finds his deceptive counsel accepted. Irony is a hallmark of Yhwh's workings in this story.

16:15–17:23

Debate, Message, and Escape

With David at the Jordan, the narrator switches scene to Jerusalem. Ahithophel and Hushai are introduced side by side (16:15–16), and their battle of words will dominate the section.

First (A) Ahithophel advises the new king to take possession publicly of his father's concubines. So Absalom goes in to them on the roof of the king's palace, "in the sight of all Israel" (16:22)—a roof last mentioned as the place from which David saw Bathsheba bathing (11:2). Now Nathan's judgment is fulfilled: "I will take your women in your sight (says Yhwh), and I will give them to your neighbor, and he shall lie with your women in the sight of this sun . . . before all Israel" (12:11–12).

The narrator then (B) interposes a comment on Ahithophel's counsel: it was considered by all alike to be equivalent to the divine oracle (16:23). Implicitly Ahithophel is pitted against God.

The central scene of debate follows (C). It hinges on whether pursuit should be immediate (Ahithophel) or cautiously prepared (Hushai, playing for time; 17:1–14).

Ahithophel's advice is expressed in terms of an apt and ironic metaphor. By killing the king alone, he says, he will "bring all the army [or people] back to you as a bride comes back to her man" (v. 3, following the LXX; so RSV, NAB). The army is depicted as a woman desired by Absalom. Kill but one man, David (the old husband), and she can come to him as a bride. We recognize the scenario. It is David, Bathsheba, and Uriah again, but with David this time playing Uriah's role! The advice ("word"), says the narrator, was "right in Absalom's sight" (v. 4). Just so had David assured Joab, "Let not this matter [word] be evil in your sight" (11:25)—to which the narrator had responded, "But [it] was evil in the sight of Yhwh" (11:27).

Absalom's decision to prefer the counsel of Hushai draws from the narrator a comment (B') that puts firmly in divine perspective the previous evaluation of Ahithophel's wisdom. It may undoubtedly be good, but it cannot stand against the power of Yhwh (v. 14).

Finally (A'), it is Hushai's turn to offer advice to the old king, David, via the priests who had returned with the Ark, Zadok and Abiathar (17:15–22). And in the adventure of the messengers (vv. 17–21), we recognize a striking allusion to the story of the spies at Jericho in the house of Rahab (Josh. 2). It is as though we are witnessing the conquest of the land in reverse.

Realizing that David has gained the time needed to escape safely, Ahithophel tidies his affairs and hangs himself (2 Sam. 17:23); for, like the divine oracle (cf. 16:23), he can see the outcome. Now readers know that both Yhwh and Ahithophel have foreseen Absalom's doom. That fate is no longer open to doubt. Interest now lies in the manner of the son's destruction and in David's response.

17:24–19:8

Battle, Message, and Mourning

The story of the ensuing battle and the death of Absalom centers around David's struggle to come to terms with his conflicting roles as king and as father.

17:24–29, Prelude. The stage is set. Absalom too crosses the Jordan, "with all the men of Israel" (v. 24).

Some brief items then bear witness to the strange twists and turns of loyalties in David's world. Mahanaim, where David finds refuge (vv. 24, 27–29), is the place from which Ishbosheth, son of Saul, had waged war against him (chaps. 2–4). Amasa, whom Absalom—now also across the Jordan—sets over the army in Joab's place, is David's nephew, Joab's cousin (though his genealogy poses some difficulties).

Shobi, a son of Nahash, is from conquered Rabbah of the Ammonites (chaps. 10–12). Machir, the son of Ammiel, was the guardian of Saul's grandson, Jonathan's son, Mephibosheth (9:4). They, together with Barzillai the Gileadite (see also 19:31–39), offer king and people manna in the wilderness (cf. v. 29).

18:1–18, Battle. The army is put under the command of Joab, his brother Abishai, and Ittai from Gath, the mercenary captain. Thus, when David adds that he too will go out with the army, his offer sounds a little lame; he already appears superfluous. Perhaps he has been remaining in Jerusalem too long (cf. 11:1) and is not the soldier he once was. Whatever their underlying reasons, the soldiers put a flattering construction on their insistence that he stay behind. To this he responds meekly, "Whatever is good in your sight, I will do" (vv. 1–4).

Yet he must still interfere: "Deal gently with [or perhaps protect] the young man Absalom" (v. 5), he commands the generals, unwilling to let them do what is good in their sight in the matter of his rebel son. The narrator adds that all the people heard this order, but leaves us to guess at their reaction—enthusiasm, indifference, dismay?

Two things rapidly become clear. First, Joab is determined to be rid of Absalom. Second, David's command, expressing his commitment to his son, has great potential for straining his men's loyalty and destroying morale. The man who reports Absalom's whereabouts is unwilling to kill him not simply because of his sense of loyalty and obedience to the king. He knows only too well how quickly he would find himself alone, a convenient scapegoat (like the Amalekite who claimed to have killed Saul [chap. 1] and the captains who killed Ishbosheth [chap. 4]). Thus soldier and general are set at odds.

18:19–19:8, Message and Mourning. The point is brought home in chap. 19 as the army slinks into the city as though loser rather than victor, "for the army heard that day, 'The king is grieving for his son'" (vv. 2–3). General is set at odds with king: "you have made it clear today," says Joab to David, "that commanders and servants are nothing to you. . . . So now, get up, go out and placate your servants!" (vv. 6–7). We come full circle—as at the outset, the king does what he is told.

At the center of the story of Absalom's death is David's reception of the news. The account is teased out by an elaborate messenger scene, neatly linking battlefield and waiting king through a switch in point of view at 18:24. Like a thread through the account is the question, how will the king take the news of Absalom's fate? Who will tell him and how? Will the messenger become the object of violent displeasure?

In the event, both young Ahimaaz, whom Joab tries to protect, and the Cushite, an African no doubt backed by long experience, prove able to deflect the king from anger. The Cushite's indirect language on top of Ahimaaz's hedging is brilliantly framed. It conveys the message without the brutality of the fact and in terms that force the king to see the news as his people must see it: "May the enemies of my lord the king be like the young man, and all who rise up against you for evil" (v. 32).

David's moving outburst (v. 33) ends the scene. That may be read as a poignant expression of a father's grief that invites us to identify with David's ordinary humanity. Or it may be read critically, through Joab's eyes (19:5–7), as revealing the king's absurd self-indulgence. It invites at least those responses along, perhaps, with others more nuanced.

At the close of the episode we glimpse the king, sitting mute at the gate, reviewing his triumphant army and nursing his parental anguish. We have an even more vivid image of the son, suspended between heaven and earth (18:9)—most appropriately for one who so aspired to raise himself up. For the man with the splendid hair this too is a fitting end—ensnared by his handsome head. (Josephus makes it his hair and so it is often portrayed in Western art.) And for the man without a blemish who is paying the price of his father's sin as well as his own there is also apt irony: for he is a ram caught in a thicket (cf. Gen. 22:13).

19:9–20:3

David's Return

Joab ejects David from his private chamber of grief into the world of public appearances. In doing so he makes apparent to readers the fragility of David's power. Perhaps too he makes that apparent to David. Whatever the talk of providence and the hands of God (chaps. 16–17), it is, in this view, victory in battle and control of the army that counts.

19:9–14, David Sways Hearts. The fact that David has been deposed cannot be glossed over. The prelude to restoration is thus a passage that exudes compromise and irresolution (vv. 9–10). David must sway some hearts and minds. He makes his play hard for the support of Judah, his power base from the beginning. He calculates that by appointing his kinsman Amasa as army commander he can win over the remaining rebel forces and risk alienating the loyal Joab (vv. 11–14). The strategy works (v. 14), but it also proves divisive (19:41–20:3).

19:15–20:3, From the Jordan to Jerusalem. The road to exile saw a gradual decline in the quality of the relationships between David and the people he meets on the way. The loyalty of Ittai the foreigner and mercenary was striking. Hushai, the king's friend, risked his life to do what David asked, though that is perhaps what we should have expected from a friend. Ziba appeared to be a loyal subject, although his story of Mephibosheth's expectations (that he gain the crown) sounded suspiciously strained. Shimei was openly hostile.

The return has some interesting and ironical variations. Shimei is now making a passionate (and desperate!) declaration of loyalty.

Mephibosheth's story—which, when heard in light of his lameness, carries a ring of probability—compromises Ziba and makes David's earlier judgment look more than a trifle hasty. Moreover, it leaves David in doubt about Mephibosheth and occasions an even more dubious judgment, that they are both equally in the right or the wrong! Whereas Hushai had wished to go on with the king but had gone back at his insistence, Barzillai resists the king's wish to go on and goes back at his own insistence, making it clear that he values a way of life independent of king and court. In stark contrast to the quiet loyalty of Ittai, the foreigner, the men of Israel who hotly claim kinship with the king are only too quick to refuse to have anything more to do with him.

Return, therefore, also reveals an unrecurrent of decline. Both the inverted order of the scenes in the journeys to and from the Jordan (i.e., A B C B' A') and the ostensible occasion, a victorious restoration, lead us to expect the return to be narrated as a movement from a low point back to a high one. Instead, the movement to restoration is counterpointed by a falling tone. David's return is far from triumphal.

The return has some important links to the story ahead. The meeting with Shimei (19:16–23) resonates with the earlier encounter (16:5–13). Again an apparently magnanimous David refuses to acquiesce to Abishai's hardheaded ethic of power and offers mercy: "And the king said to Shimei, 'You shall not die'; and the king gave him his oath" (19:23). Yet when it is David's time to die, he will charge Solomon, "do not leave [Shimei] unpunished," but "send his grey head down with blood to Sheol" (1 Kings 2:9). Solomon will oblige, like David with Uriah, at arm's length (1 Kings 2:36–46). It is a jarring scene with which to bring David's story to a close, especially since it is clothed in a heavy layer of pious rhetoric.

The quarrel between the men of Israel and men of Judah takes us back to the civil war with which the book began, but also beyond that to Judges (e.g., the quarrel between the men of Gilead and the men of Ephraim in Judg. 12), to Joseph and his brothers, or to Jacob and Esau. For the nation-family to be riven by jealousy and status seeking is not new.

Moving ahead, we hear Sheba's words echoed in the northern secessionist cry against Rehoboam, Solomon's son (1 Kings 12:16). The nation's unity is fragile at best. With Rehoboam the split will become permanent.

The return ends where the journey into exile began, with the concubines whom the king left behind "to keep [watch over, guard] the house" (2 Sam. 15:16, 20:3; cf. 16:21–22). Unable to keep in order his own house (family), unprepared to guard his own house (city and nation), he leaves ("forsakes," 15:16) the women whom he has taken for his pleasure. They are expected to do what he will not do—with a rapacious Absalom descending upon the palace! But now deeming them tainted by Absalom's intercourse, he will do what patriarchal honor and political wisdom dictate. He "takes" them and "gives" them . . . a prison cell, "the house of keeping"! "So they were confined until the day of their death, widowed by the living" (20:3).

Thus these women are condemned by a man's sin to be shut out of society. Their fate at the hands of Absalom and David compounds that of Tamar (13:20) at the hands of Amnon and David (who offers her no help or consolation). They are both members and victims of David's house. Unlike the king's mercenary captain (Ittai; 15:19–20) or his cursing enemy from the house of Saul (Shimei; 16:11–12; 19:21–23), his women will receive from David no gift of freedom.

20:4–26

The Aftermath of Restoration

20:4–22, War Between Brothers. Given back the kingdom, David now takes action against those who choose to have no part in the giving. Amasa is commissioned to eliminate Sheba. Why he delays beyond the appointed time is unclear, though what little we know of Amasa already suggests either incompetence or treachery as possibilities. His death comes by deception, like the death of Abner in chap. 3. Joab is once more firmly in control.

A wise woman's speech marked the beginning of Absalom's return to Jerusalem (chap. 14). Another wise woman's speech marks the close of David's return (20:14–22). Her wisdom is her way with words—her ability to seize Joab's attention, to recognize the force of his demand, and to sell it to the besieged inhabitants. Joab, like his brother Abishai (16:9; 19:21), wastes no time with political opponents but deals effectively in death. The woman bows to that reality, but in doing so prevents more destruction in the family of Israel—the swallowing up of the city Abel Beth Maacah, a mother in Israel. (Verse 19; the city's name in Hebrew, ironically, means something like "mourning the house of Maacah"; Maacah was the name of Absalom's mother; 3:3.)

20:23–26, The Bureaucracy. The plot of the central section of the book (chaps. 9–20), the story of sin, exile, and restoration, now seems to be exhausted (though it will briefly resume in 1 Kings 1–2, in the story of Solomon's accession to the throne). Marking its end, as its beginning, is a list of David's officials (2 Sam. 20:23–26; cf. 8:15–18). A few changes stand out: there is no mention of David administering justice and equity to all his people; there is now an officer in charge of forced labor (20:24), foreshadowing the issue that will divide the kingdom (Adoram appears again in 1 Kings 12:18); and while David's sons are no longer listed as priests, another non-Levite appears in their place.

21:1–24:25

Last Words

The book draws to a close with chaps. 21–24. Like much of chaps. 1–8, it is fashioned, anthropology style, from apparently disparate narrative accounts, lists, and poetry. Though no longer continuing the plot of the central section, it draws some of its characters from previous parts of 2 Samuel, and in this and other ways is closely linked to the body of the book. It soon becomes clear, however, that the events recounted need not all be considered as occurring in time after the events of chap. 20. The section encompasses the whole of David's life.

The material is clearly structured in a chiasmic pattern, A B C C' B' A'. It starts and ends with narratives of famine, plague, and death, where the action stems from a divine oracle and ends with God "heeding supplications for the land" (21:1–14; 24:1–25). Between these lie anecdotes and lists suggesting David's military power. At the center are two poems of David—a hymn of thanksgiving (chap. 22) and his own "oracle," his "last words" (23:1–7).

21:1–14, Rizpah and the Sons of Saul. In response to a long famine David consults the divine oracle ("sought the face of Yhwh") and receives what is to readers a puzzling response: there is "bloodguilt" on the house of Saul "because he put to death the Gibeonites" (v. 1). We know nothing of such an event. The narrator hastens to explain, reminding us of the story of the Amorite (Canaanite) Gibeonites' covenant with the Israelites (Josh. 9) and informing us that Saul had indeed attempted, "in his zeal for the people of Israel and Judah" (2 Sam. 21:2), to wipe out the Gibeonites—plainly without success. Ironically, in seeking to implement what the Israelites had originally been commanded, Saul now stands condemned for violating their subsequent oath, made through deception.

A moment's reflection reveals the issues of "guilt" and justice here to be highly complex. When does one covenant (or promise or commandment) override another? For how long must "bloodguilt" haunt a house? If Saul's house has blood on its hands, what of David's?

David's response is to allow the Gibeonites to name their compensation. Their request, obliquely, is for blood. The king takes them up with alacrity: "What are you saying [exactly]? I will do it" (v. 4). So seven sons of Saul are given into the hands of the Gibeonites for execution. Once again, conveniently for David, the house of Saul is reduced, and the blame laid at another's door.

The story is troubling. Does the oracle require the deaths of the sons or does David only get from it the answer that he wants in the first place? (We see something similar, perhaps, in Judg. 20:18–28.) It is the Gibeonites who determine that only blood will compensate for blood, and David who encourages them in their demand.

Against Gibeonites and David—and Yhwh?—is set Rizpah. Against bloodguilt that traverses generations and swallows up the innocent is set a mother's care. Rizpah's loyalty traverses death as she fends off from her dead kin the ravening wildlife, the counterpart of the human world that consigned the sons to death. The Hebrew meaning of her name captures, with some irony, something of her spirit: she is "glowing coal," daughter of "falcon."

At the beginning of the book Rizpah was the voiceless pawn in a man's quarrel (3:6–16). At the end she is still voiceless and still a pawn, as she watches her sons destroyed in another quarrel between other men. Yet she succeeds in exercising power through the only action open to her—her mourning and her defiance of the gratuitous humiliation by exposure that was part of the execution (cf. Sophocles Antigone). Her action shames David into bringing the bones of Saul and his sons home, into their family tomb, in their own land.

21:15–22, Philistines Again. The narrative breaks off into some anecdotes of the Philistine wars—anecdotes of fights against descendants of giants. First we read of a tiring David rescued by his nephew Abishai—of whom we have earlier heard him exclaim in exasperation, "What is there between you and me, you sons of Zeruiah?" (16:10; 19:22; cf. 3:39). Among the items that follow, one is startling: Elhanan of Bethlehem slew Goliath of Gath, "the shaft of whose spear was like a weaver's beam" (21:19). That is exactly how the Goliath whom David slew is described in 1 Sam. 17:7. So who did slay Goliath?

The narrative of 2 Samuel invites readers to question characters' actions, to probe behind their speech, and to find so often that appearance is not reality. Now it seems that even the narrator may not have all the "facts" reliably arrayed. Perhaps the "truth" of the narrative lies beyond the mere ordering of "facts." Meaning is found when what is important to readers and what seems important in the text interact. The narrator reminds us here that this is not a "story brought live," but a story of life woven out of many strands of information and many perceptions of value. There will be many times when we cannot make it all "fit."

22:1-51, The Righteous Psalmist. The song in chap. 22 is found also in Psalms as Psalm 18 with small variations. Its position here at the end of the books of Samuel links it to the song of Hannah at the beginning (1 Sam. 2:1-10). That also is in psalm form. It not only reflects Hannah's own situation but foreshadows the concern with kingship of the two books; it ends with the expectation that Yhwh "will give strength to his king, and raise the horn [exalt the power] of his anointed" (1 Sam. 2:10). David's song is related to a specific occasion ("on the day when . . .") that turns out, however, to be occasions of deliverance throughout his life, including escape from Saul. It too reaches its climax with "Yhwh's anointed," now specified as David himself (2 Sam. 22:51).

The opening imagery of Yhwh as rock (vv. 2-3; cf. vv. 32, 47) is apt for one who found refuge at the Rock of Escape (1 Sam. 23:24-29). The psalmist then recalls his cry in his distress, his enemies like waves sweeping over him, and the coming of Yhwh in lightning, thunder, and clouds of a storm (2 Sam. 22:4-20). In the central section (vv. 21-28) the psalmist reflects on his own righteousness, the reason, as he sees it, for his reward. The focus then shifts back to God but in order to speak of what the psalmist can do through God's support (vv. 29-51). As noted, it comes to rest on David and his descendants (v. 51).

Distress, theophany, and rescue are described in graphic terms. Participants, emotions, situations, actions—all are heightened into extremes. So too are the protestations of righteousness and achievement. In Psalms, in the context of much similar poetry, this characteristic might slip by the reader unnoticed. In the present prose context it stops readers short: "I was blameless before [Yhwh]," proclaims David, "and I kept myself from guilt" (v. 24). One effect of this lengthy self-adulation, therefore, is to proclaim not righteousness but self-righteousness, not piety but hypocrisy. That is ■ reading hard to resist.

23:1-39, Last Words and Mighty Men. So it is too with the "last words of David" (23:1-7). As David's (non-Levite) sons had become priests, so now the king transforms himself into the divine oracle: "The spirit of Yhwh speaks by me" (v. 2). David speaks of ruling justly and being rewarded for it. "For a lasting covenant [Yhwh] has made with me, ordered in all and secure" (v. 5). These are confident words, yet hedged about with questions: "For is it not thus, my house, with Yhwh? . . . Will he not cause [all my deliverance and desire] to spring forth?" These are rhetorical questions, of course, but they invite scrutiny.

The poem shifts focus to the field (v. 4), to threatening thorns and the "weapons" of those who root out the forces of chaos (vv. 6-7). The vision is like that of David's psalm (chap. 22). Good arms itself for battle with evil, a David against a Goliath. (But, we might wonder, was it not Goliath who armed himself with iron and the shaft of a spear?) So the poem dissolves into a listing and telling of this weaponry—of the anointed's mighty men and their deeds (vv. 8-39).

In the center of the chapter is one of those great stories of David (vv. 13-17). In an unguarded moment he buys water at the price of other men's blood. We see the man who commands intense loyalty and who is alert to providence as he refuses to drink the water, pouring it out to Yhwh, blood upon the ground. That reminds us of the David who would not reach out against Saul, Yhwh's anointed (1 Sam. 24, 26), or who turned Abishai's sword back to its sheath when Shimei cursed him and called him a "man of blood" (16:5-13; cf. 19:21-23).

In turn, however, to think of David as a "man of blood" raises disturbing recollections of other occasions, as we have noted before (in 16:5-12)—recollections of the slaughter of the priests of Nob (1 Sam. 22:11-23, esp. v. 22), or the murder of Uriah (2 Sam. 11), or the execution of the seven sons of Saul (chap. 21).

In fact, the tale of the water of Bethlehem is surrounded by recollections, for the chapter is full of names. As we recognize them we bring the whole story into review. David's psalm speaks only of himself, of his God, and of his righteousness. The lists of mighty men tell a different story. They tell of a house secured by many, with blood and pain and not always with righteousness.

The narrator reminds us of Abishai (23:18) who, we recall, saved David from the giant (21:15-17). Within a verse or two (23:24) another name, Elhanan from David's hometown, has resurrected that unsettling anecdote of Elhanan and Goliath (21:19). Asahel takes us back to the civil war and Joab's killing of Abner (2 Sam. 2-3); Benaiah takes us forward to Solomon's ruthless disposal of Shimei at David's behest (1 Kings 2:36-46)—Shimei of whom the king said, "You shall not die," and gave him his oath (2 Sam. 19:23).

The list in 23:24-39 is particularly rich in allusion to the Bathsheba story. Names jump out: Eliam (Bathsheba's father? cf. 11:3), Nathan, Zobah, and the Ammonites (chap. 10), Joab (chaps. 10-12). Finally (23:39) it comes to rest upon none other than Uriah the Hittite! We might hear other oracular words: "Why have you despised the word of Yhwh, doing what is evil in his sight? Uriah the Hittite . . . you have slain with the sword of the Ammonites; so now a lasting sword will not turn aside from your house" (Nathan in 12:9-10). Is the psalmist blameless before Yhwh? Is his house secure?

David's story has a way of shifting out from under us. It is a story that refuses to be tamed, secured, or neatly ordered.

24:1-25, King and People. Why Yhwh's anger is kindled against Israel we are not told. The divine anger is worked out, however, through David who, as in chap. 21, appears a ready champion of this particular word (again, perhaps, an oracle or a decision by lot, with the questions put by the inquirer). To number the people is to number the army (the same word in Hebrew). A census is a tool for centralizing power; its purpose is usually to raise taxes and an army. The great irony of this story is that it is Joab, the power broker at the center of this centralized government, who protests against the action (24:3-4).

What exactly is wrong with the census is also unexpressed, though in the eyes of Yhwh (and the prophet Gad) it is perhaps its potential for military aggrandizement at the expense of trust in the power of Yhwh. That would take us right back to Samuel's speech about the grasping ways of kings, when the people first ask for a king (1 Sam. 8:10-12).

Yet once more it is difficult not to be impressed by David. He is boldly penitent (2 Sam. 24:10, 17). He invites action against himself and his own house rather than the ordinary people: "these sheep, what have they done?" (v. 17). He is unwilling to make an offering to Yhwh that has cost him nothing (v. 24).

His choice of the plague is couched in piety: "let us fall into the hands of Yhwh, for his mercy is great; but let me not fall into human hands" (v. 14). He thus eliminates the crucial second option, that he flee three months before his foes—the only option in which he is the focus and the spread of death might be contained. So once more a question hangs over our reading. Is the king who promoted the census unwilling still to relinquish power in the interests of his people? Is he unwilling to return to his roots, houseless, living by his wits, pursued by Saul in the wilderness? Instead, he bequeaths on Israel the deaths of seventy thousand people.

"And Yhwh heard supplications for the land, and the plague was averted from Israel" (v. 25). But Yhwh had halted the plague before David had prayed for the people or offered his sacrifice (v. 16). Why, we are not told. And all along, while David thinks that he is the cause of the plague and that the expiation of his sin is the key to everything, we know that it is Israel that is the object of God's anger. David has been merely God's unwitting tool in the expression of that anger.

Saul seems to haunt this last episode of the book, like the first. David, so different from Saul, is yet so alike. David, induced by Yhwh to offend, reminds us of Saul, driven by the spirit to fits of jealous rage. Though both stand at the focal points of their stories, Yhwh's action pushes us to see that they are not the ultimate focus of Yhwh's concern. Rather they facilitate Yhwh's dealings with the covenant community. At heart the story is about God and the people.

Bibliography

- Ackroyd, P. R. The Second Book of Samuel. Cambridge Bible Commentary on the New English Bible. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977.
- Berlin, A. Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative. Sheffield: Almond Press, 1983.
- Brueggemann, W. David's Truth in Israel's Imagination and Memory. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985.
- Interpretation*, vol. 35, no. 4 (October, 1981); vol. 40, no. 2 (April, 1986).
- McCarter, P. K. II Samuel. Anchor Bible, 9. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984.
- Newsome, J. D., Jr. 1 Samuel. 2 Samuel. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1982.
- Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1985.
- Trible, P. Texts of Terror. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984.

1 KINGS

P. KYLE McCARTER, JR.

INTRODUCTION

The First Book of the Kings is the tenth book of the Hebrew Bible, the eleventh according to the arrangement of the Septuagint, in which Ruth stands between Judges and 1 Samuel. Kings is referred to as a single book in the Talmud; it was not divided into two in the Hebrew tradition until the late Middle Ages. But the division came much earlier in the Greek tradition, which treats 1 and 2 Kings with 1 and 2 Samuel as a canonical unit called 1–4 Kingdoms. The divisions between books correspond to the deaths of major figures: Saul at the break between 1 Samuel and 2 Samuel, David at the break between 2 Samuel and 1 Kings, and Ahab at the break between 1 Kings and 2 Kings. The four books of Samuel and Kings together with Joshua and Judges form the traditional canonical division called the Former Prophets. Modern scholarship recognizes this division, with Deuteronomy as an introduction, as an editorial unit, the Deuteronomistic History (see “Literary History” below).

1 Kings relates the history of Israel from the death of David and accession of Solomon to the death of Ahab and accession of Ahaziah. The book divides roughly into four parts. The first part describes the transfer of power from David to Solomon (1:1–2:46). The second part is an account of the reign of Solomon (3:1–11:43), which gives special attention to his erection of the Temple. The third part recounts the early history of the divided monarchy (12:1–16:28), describing the secession of the northern tribes after Solomon’s death and the reigns of the first rulers of the independent kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The fourth part is an account of the reign of Ahab (16:29–22:53), in which the prophet Elijah plays a major role.

Historical Background

Only very limited historical information can be derived from extrabiblical written materials from the time described in 1 Kings (→ Chronology, Old Testament). Neither David nor Solomon is mentioned in contemporary extrabiblical sources. The scope of Shishak’s incursion in the time of Rehoboam (14:25–28) is better understood because of a list of conquered cities he had carved on the wall of the temple of Amun-Re at Karnak. But no king of Israel or Judah is named in contemporary records before Omri, who is mentioned in Assyrian records and in the inscription of King Mesha of Moab (cf. 2 Kings 3:4–8). Ahab is named in the inscriptions of the Assyrian emperor Shalmaneser III, who also mentions the Damascene kings Hadadezer, who may have been the Ben-hadad contemporary with Ahab (20:1), and Hazael (19:15). There is no other direct evidence in contemporary sources, but much can be learned indirectly and inferentially from contemporary records of events that took place outside of Israel and Judah. Archaeological study of Israelite sites also provides primary information. Later histories of Israel, such as that of the first-century historian Josephus, are based largely on the biblical text and have limited independent value. The materials Josephus quotes from the “Annals of Tyre” and other Phoenician sources, however, provide a valuable supplement to the biblical account of the relations of Solomon and Ahab with their Phoenician allies.

In the final analysis, however, the basic source for the history of this period is the biblical record itself. Because of its long and complex literary history, it must be used very cautiously for historical reconstruction, but when critically interpreted, it provides a fairly clear picture of the sequence of events. Solomon’s economic successes were not sufficient to eliminate the regional factionalism that had troubled David’s reign (cf. 2 Sam. 20:1–22). When Solomon died in about 930 B.C., the northern tribes refused to accept the rule of his son, Rehoboam, and made Jeroboam, an Ephraimite officer in Solomon’s labor force, their king (1 Kings 12). The now independent kingdoms of Israel and Judah endured a period of weakness and intermittent civil war that lasted until the reign of Omri (ca. 876–869 B.C.), who seems to have stabilized Israel and established a rapprochement with Judah.

Literary History

Scholars regard 1 Kings as part of an editorial unit that extends from Deuteronomy through 2 Kings. This unit is an account of the Israelites’ experiences from the time they first approached the promised land under the leadership of Moses until the time of their exclusion from the land at the beginning of the Babylonian exile. The purpose of the account is to evaluate the people’s experiences on the basis of the rules of conduct set forth in the Deuteronomistic law code (Deut. 12–26). Thus the work as a whole is called the Deuteronomistic History (→Deuteronomist; Deuteronomistic Historian).

The Deuteronomistic History was composed by one or more writers utilizing a variety of materials drawn from both archival and narrative sources. Some of these materials were annalistic, having been preserved, we assume, in the palace or Temple archives in Jerusalem. The present text of 1 Kings contains citations of three lost works of this kind: "the book of the acts of Solomon" (11:41), "the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel" (e.g., 14:19), and "the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah" (e.g., 14:29). Other sources of the Deuteronomistic History seem to have been transmitted in prophetic circles. Various stories about holy men, prophets, and kings—some legendary in origin, others historiographical—have been incorporated into the larger history. Groups of such stories were probably already combined into larger narratives before their incorporation into the Deuteronomistic History. The most important of these is the Elijah-Elisha narrative complex now underlying 1 Kings 17–2 Kings 10.

The Deuteronomistic History is a product of the Babylonian exile, having reached its final form after the last event reported in 2 Kings, the release of Jehoiachin from prison in 560 B.C. (2 Kings 25:27–30). Nevertheless, many scholars believe that much of the history was completed earlier, during the reign of Josiah (639–609 B.C.) and in the midst of the reforms instituted by Josiah, which seem also to have been based on principles expressed in the Deuteronomistic law code (cf. 2 Kings 23). Of these principles, the most important for an understanding of the books of Kings are, first, the insistence on the sacrificial worship of Yahweh, God of Israel, at a single, divinely chosen sanctuary and, second, the absolute prohibition of the worship of foreign gods.

The Central Sanctuary. Deuteronomy 12 requires that offerings be brought to Yahweh only in the place he chooses, a single, central sanctuary. Israel's prosperity in the land is closely tied to the establishment of this sanctuary and its preservation as the exclusive place of sacrifice. Because Jerusalem was understood in Deuteronomistic theology to be the chosen place, the erection of the Temple of Yahweh by Solomon is presented as a landmark event in the Deuteronomistic History (see commentary below on 5:1–9:25). Later, when the kingship of Israel is taken away from Solomon's heir, the rule of Judah is said to have been left to him for the sake of David and Jerusalem, the chosen city (11:32; see commentary below on 11:26–40). On the negative side, Jeroboam's establishment of rival sanctuaries at Dan and Bethel is presented as a uniquely heinous crime (see commentary below on 12:25–33). Together with other crimes, "the sin of Jeroboam," as the perpetuation of these sanctuaries by his successors is called, is shown to have led finally to the destruction of the Northern Kingdom (2 Kings 17:21–23). The Southern Kingdom too was endangered by violations of the law of the central sanctuary. All of the kings of Judah before Hezekiah are said to have permitted local places of worship, conventionally referred to as "high places," to remain in use. Thus, Rehoboam and his successors are condemned for tolerating shrines "on every high hill and under every green tree" (14:23; cf. Deut. 12:2 and commentary below on 14:21–24).

Foreign Gods. Deuteronomy 13 requires that anyone—whether a prophet, a family member, a wife, or a friend—who induces an Israelite to worship a foreign god should be put to death. The tolerance of such subversive individuals by the kings of Israel is an important theme of 1 Kings, where the particular problem is that of foreign wives who entice their husbands to worship foreign gods. According to the understanding of the Deuteronomistic editors, this was the crime for which Solomon was afflicted with adversaries and his heir deprived of the rule of the Northern Kingdom (see commentary below on 11:1–13). The quintessential foreign wife, however, was Jezebel, who actively promoted the worship of Baal in Israel (16:29–33).

The Deuteronomistic editors provided synopses at the beginning and end of the account of the reign of each king (→ Deuteronomistic Framework). Generally speaking, the purposes of these synopses were to coordinate the chronologies of the northern and southern kings, to provide statistical information drawn from archival sources, and to offer editorial evaluation based on Deuteronomistic principles. The religious policies of seven of the kings of Judah are evaluated positively (Jehoshaphat, Jehoshaphat, Azariah, Jotham, Hezekiah, and Josiah), although the favorable evaluation of the first five of these is qualified by their failure to remove the high places. The northern kings are condemned without exception, usually for perpetuating "the sin of Jeroboam."

Significance for the Ancient Community

The age of Solomon was remembered by the later community as a golden age. The king's dominion was broad (4:21), his wisdom was internationally acclaimed (4:34), and his wealth was fabulous (10:14). The people were prosperous and happy (4:20). Nevertheless, the biblical account of the reign of Solomon has a dark side and concludes with a stern divine judgement. The purpose of the account was not to invite the ancient community to reminisce on glories of the past or to stimulate national pride. As a part of the Deuteronomistic History, it offered the people of Judah sober reflections on what its authors regarded as centuries of national wrongdoing.

The original edition of the Deuteronomistic History was addressed to the people of Judah living in the latter part of the seventh century B.C. For them, the story of the reigns of Solomon and the kings of the Divided Monarchy illustrated the need for the measures instituted by Josiah's reform. Solomon's erection of the Temple was the culmination of a long process by which the divinely chosen place of sacrifice had been established. Most of Solomon's kingdom was taken away, however, because he condoned the worship of foreign gods in Jerusalem. Later, the Northern Kingdom was destroyed because Jeroboam and his successors abandoned Jerusalem, and many kings of Judah incurred Yahweh's anger by permitting sacrifice at local shrines. In the time of Josiah, however, the worship of foreign gods was prohibited and the high places were being dismantled. The lesson of history was clear: if the people of Judah supported their king's policies, they could avoid the fate of their northern kin. Because of Yahweh's special regard for David and Jerusalem, moreover, they could expect to find security in the chosen city under the rule of the Davidic king (11:13; 15:4-5).

For the audience of the final edition of the Deuteronomistic History, the people of Judah living in exile in Babylon, the stories of the kings afforded evidence of the recurrent wrongdoing that justified Yahweh's punishment of his people. The crimes of Manasseh, Josiah's predecessor, had been so heinous that Josiah's reforms could save Judah only temporarily (2 Kings 21:10-16; 23:26-27). Jerusalem had been tested with "the line of Samaria, and the level of the house of Ahab" (2 Kings 21:13) and found wanting. In keeping with Yahweh's warning to Solomon (1 Kings 9:6-9), the people had been excluded from the land, and the Temple itself had been laid in ruins. Nevertheless, as Solomon himself had foreseen (1 Kings 8:46-53), there was hope even in captivity for those who would confess their crimes, look toward the site of the Temple, and return to the faithful service of Yahweh.

Cumstances are suspicious: Solomon is not David's eldest living son, and those who oppose his accession are slain as soon as he becomes king. The document upon which chaps. 1-2 are based seems to have been addressed to an audience that was aware of these circumstances. It was probably composed early in Solomon's reign to explain the events leading up to the succession and demonstrate the legitimacy of the new king.

All of these materials now belong to the larger Deuteronomistic History, however, and the principal significance of the accession of Solomon for the Deuteronomistic historian is the fulfillment of the divine promise made in Nathan's oracle that David would have a son who would build a temple to Yahweh and for whom Yahweh would establish an enduring dynasty (2 Sam. 7:11b-16, esp. v. 13; cf. 1 Kings 2:12, 24, 33b, 45; 8:20).

1:1-53, The Accession of Solomon. At the beginning of the story, David is still alive, but old and debilitated. He cannot live long, and the question of the succession is the central theme of the narrative. Of David's many sons, only two are still alive. Adonijah is the older of the two (v. 6; cf. 2:22) and, thus, the heir presumptive. He has the support of Joab, David's chief general, and Abiathar, one of David's two high priests (v. 7). His rival is his younger brother, Solomon, who has the support of Benaiiah, another ranking military figure, Zadok, the other high priest (v. 8), and Solomon's mother, Bathsheba. As explained above, the narrator's purpose is to defend the legitimacy of the accession of Solomon. To achieve this, he first shows that David exercised his right to set aside primogeniture (the law of the first-born) and designate his successor. In vv. 32-35, therefore, the old king names Solomon his heir, fulfilling a promise made long before (vv. 17, 30). At the same time, the narrator presents Adonijah as an unworthy candidate for the throne by pointedly associating him with his elder brother Absalom, a rebel (v. 6). In vv. 5-6, therefore, Adonijah appears as a very handsome man who procures a chariot with horses and fifty runners and declares himself king—in short, as another Absalom (cf. 2 Sam. 14:25; 15:1, 10).

2:1-12, The Death of David. The narrator shows that two of the executions ordered by Solomon at the time of his accession were carried out in compliance with the deathbed instructions of his father. David condemns Joab for the murders of Abner (2 Sam. 3:27; → Abner) and Amasa (2 Sam. 20:10; → Amasa), crimes for which bloodguilt was attached to David (reading the superior Gk. text of 1 Kings 2:5). He also condemns the Benjaminite agitator Shimei for abusing him and imposing a curse on him (v. 8;

COMMENTARY

1:1-2:46

The Accession of Solomon

The opening chapters of the book describe Solomon's assumption of David's throne. The cir-

2 Sam. 16:5–14). By contrast, David stipulates that Barzillai, the Gileadite who provided for David's troops during Absalom's revolt (2 Sam. 17:27–29; 19:31–39), should be given favored treatment at Solomon's court. A Deuteronomistic expansion of David's words (1 Kings 2:3–4) links the duration of the dynasty to the new king's obedience to Mosaic law, and the biblical story of David's life concludes with a Deuteronomistic succession summary (vv. 11–12), including a calculation of the length of his reign (v. 11; cf. 2 Sam. 5:4–5).

2:13–46, The Death of Solomon's Enemies. Solomon is now king, and those who opposed him are executed one after another. The narrator's purpose is to justify these executions. Adonijah, though given an opportunity to live under the protection of the court (1:52), asks to marry Abishag the Shunammite, the young woman who nursed David during his last illness (1:3–4). Because claiming the harem of the previous king is a standard way of claiming the kingdom itself (cf. 2 Sam. 16:21–22), Solomon interprets Adonijah's request as an attempt to reestablish his claim to the throne, an open act of treason, and orders his execution. Joab is executed not for his opposition to Solomon—though that is the reason for his flight to the asylum of the altar (1 Kings 2:28; cf. Exod. 21:14)—but in compliance with David's deathbed orders (1 Kings 2:5–6; see above). Shimei, who was also condemned by David (2:8–9), is given an opportunity to live under house arrest in Jerusalem, but he violates the terms set by Solomon and forfeits his life. Another opponent of Solomon, the priest Abiathar, is exiled, but his life is spared because of his early assistance to David (cf. 1 Sam. 22:20–23; 23:6; 30:7–8) and his service as high priest (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25). A comment by a Deuteronomistic editor (1 Kings 2:27) connects the banishment of Abiathar with the prophecy in 1 Sam. 2:33.

3:1–11:43

The Kingship of Solomon

The biblical account of the reign of Solomon is a loose collection of miscellaneous materials, much of which seems to be drawn from archival sources. The arrangement, which is topical rather than chronological, has a two-part structure presenting the positive and negative sides of Solomon's kingship. The first part (3:1–10:29) depicts the grandeur of his reign and reports his great achievements. It begins with a vision in which he receives divine favor and is granted great wisdom (3:4–15), and it continues with events and catalogues of information that illustrate both the wisdom of Solomon and its consequences in effective administration and the accumulation of wealth. The second part (11:1–43) describes the religious misconduct into which Solomon's foreign wives led him and identifies the external and internal adversaries who caused conflict throughout his reign. The first, positive part of the account of Solomon's kingship is dominated by the story of the erection of the Temple, which has been elaborated with editorial remarks stressing its supreme importance in the Deuteronomistic understanding of the reign. The long tirade on Solomon's foreign wives that introduces the second, negative part of the account (11:1–13) is almost entirely Deuteronomistic in composition. These things suggest that the larger two-part structure is itself a result of Deuteronomistic editorial activity. A similar, two-part topical arrangement into positive and negative aspects is also visible to some extent in the final, Deuteronomistic arrangement of the accounts of the reigns of both Saul and David.

3:1–28

The Divine Gift of Wisdom

Biblical tradition associates wisdom in general with Solomon. What he requests at the beginning of his reign, however, is a specific and pragmatic kind of wisdom, the ability to govern his people well. The attribution of this type of wisdom to a good king was commonplace in ancient Near Eastern tradition, and it is found in the Bible in the cases of David (2 Sam. 14:17, 19, 20) and other good kings. Such wisdom was regarded as the basis of an enduring kingship and a successful reign (cf. Ps. 72).

3:1, Solomon's Marriage to Pharaoh's Daughter.

The general circumstances of Solomon's alliance with Egypt can be reconstructed from the scattered references preserved in 1 Kings. Early in Solomon's reign an Egyptian army captured the Canaanite-Philistine city of Gezer on the border of Israel. At the same time Solomon married an Egyptian princess, and the pharaoh gave his daughter the city as a dowry (9:16–17). Solomon brought the pharaoh's daughter into the City of David (3:1), where she lived until a house was built for her nearby (9:24). The unidentified Egyptian king is thought to have been one of the pharaohs of the weak twenty-first dynasty (ca. 1070–945).

3:2–3, Sacrifice at "High Places." These two verses are editorial (Deuteronomistic), having been inserted ahead of the account of Solomon's visit to the high place at Gibeon. The later Davidic kings will be censured for their failure to remove the high places (14:23; 15:14; 22:43), but Solomon's action in this chapter is mitigated by the fact that the Temple has not yet been built.

3:4-15, The Dream at Gibeon. Solomon's revelatory dream belongs to the widespread ancient Near Eastern practice of incubation dreaming, by which an individual slept in a sanctuary in the hope of receiving a divine message. Partial biblical parallels include Jacob's dream at Bethel (Gen. 28:11-19) and Samuel's call at Shiloh (1 Sam. 3:2-18). Gibeon, which lay northwest of Jerusalem, seems to have been a prominent city in the time of David and Solomon (→ Gibeon). Although the statement in 1 Kings 3:4 that Solomon made regular sacrifices there of a thousand whole burnt offerings must be an exaggeration, the Gibeonite high place and altar clearly constituted an important cultic center before the erection of the Temple in Jerusalem.

As explained above, the gift Solomon requests is the wisdom to govern well. Yahweh is so pleased that he gives Solomon more than he has asked for: he will receive unparalleled wisdom (v. 12) and, with it, wealth and fame (v. 13).

Note, finally, that the story of Solomon's dream has been expanded editorially by the insertion of certain materials lacking in the parallel version of the event in 2 Chron. 1:3-13, which seems to have escaped Deuteronomistic editing. Thus, 1 Kings 3:6 has been elaborated to connect Solomon's succession to David's throne with the dynastic promise in 2 Samuel 7; 1 Kings 3:14 has been added to qualify Yahweh's promise; and v. 15 has been altered to shift the place of sacrifice from Gibeon to Jerusalem.

3:16-28, The Judgment of Solomon. The account of the divine gift of wisdom is followed by an example of its practical application. The sagacity with which Solomon arbitrates between two prostitutes convinces the Israelites that "the wisdom of God was within him" (v. 28).

The story of the wise judge who identifies the true mother of a disputed child by ordering that the child be cut in half is very widespread in world folklore. Of some twenty-two examples that have been collected, the closest to the biblical story is a Jain tale of two women, widows of the same man, who claim to be the mother of his child and, therefore, the rightful head of his household and heir to his estate. When the magistrate rules that the estate should be divided and the child sawn in half, the true mother earnestly relinquishes all claims, pleading that the child should not be harmed. The magistrate awards her both the estate and the child.

4:1-34

Solomon's Administration

The organization of Solomon's government is described here in materials drawn largely from archival sources. The arrangement of the larger narrative, in which this section follows immediately after the section concerned with Solomon's wisdom, suggest that the governmental structures described here are reflections of the king's divinely given aptitude for wise rule. Under these policies, we are told, the people thrived (v. 20). As noted below, however, many modern historians question both the wisdom and effectiveness of the fiscal policies involved in the division of the kingdom into administrative districts (vv. 7-28).

4:1-6, Solomon's Cabinet. A comparison of this list with the two lists of David's high officials in 2 Sam. 8:16-18 and 20:23-26 shows substantial continuity between the two administrations. Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 4:3) and Adoniram/Adoram (v. 6) were already in office under David (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24). Benaiah, who is now in charge of the army (cf. 1 Kings 2:35), served as commander of David's personal bodyguard (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23). The other officers named here are sons of men who served under David. (The reference in 1 Kings 4:4 to Zadok and Abiathar as priests is out of place here, where Zadok's son is already in office [v. 2] and Abiathar has been banished [2:26-27].)

4:7-28, The Twelve District Officers. Solomon's kingdom is organized into twelve administrative districts presided over by officers whose chief responsibility is the collection of revenues for the maintenance of the royal household. Each district officer has the responsibility for providing for Solomon's court during one month out of the year (vv. 7, 27), and it is this arrangement, rather than the traditional tribal division, that dictates the number twelve. While some of the districts correspond closely to tribal boundaries, others do not. The place of Judah in the list is not clear. "The land" of v. 19b is evidently Judah, as many ancient versions make explicit. Unlike the other district officers, however, the officer in charge of Judah is not named. Moreover, there seem to be twelve districts apart from Judah, and it has been suggested that Judah was exempt from the taxation imposed upon the other parts of the country.

Noting the departure of the list from the traditional tribal allotments, many historians believe that Solomon deliberately tried to weaken tribal loyalties to strengthen the central government. Another purpose for this new arrangement may have been to incorporate newly conquered territories into the kingdom. If so, it seems likely that the reorganization was begun under David, who was responsible for the conquests, and it has been conjectured that David's census (2 Sam. 24) was the beginning of the process.

The conclusion to the list of officers in 1 Kings 4:7–19 is found in vv. 27–28, a miscellany of materials about Solomon's reign having been inserted in between (vv. 20–26). We are told in v. 21 that his dominion extended from the Euphrates ("the River") to the border of Egypt, probably the Brook of Egypt (cf. 8:65), the traditional southern border of Canaan (→ Egypt, Brook of). This statement is usually explained as the nostalgic hyperbole of a writer living long after the time of Solomon, and it is true that the language of the insertion in 4:20–26 is that of the postexilic period. It is quite possible, however, that territories as far away as Tiphshah on the shore of the Euphrates (v. 24) acknowledged at least a nominal fealty to Solomon at the beginning of his reign. David defeated an Aramean coalition that included armies from the western bank of the Euphrates as well as southern Syria (2 Sam. 8:3–13), and the victory brought tributaries to David from as far north as Hamath on the middle Orontes (cf. 2 Sam. 8:9–12).

4:29–34, Solomon's Wisdom. A collection of loosely related remarks has been gathered here to form a paean on Solomon's legendary wisdom. As in the case of vv. 20–26 above, the language suggests that this passage is a late insertion, anticipating the eventual attribution to Solomon of all kinds of anonymous sayings and songs (Prov. 1:1; 10:1; Eccles. 1:1; Song of Sg. 1:1; Pss. 72:1; 127:1), though this does not preclude the possibility that the assertions made in the present section are based on old tradition. Solomon's wisdom is compared favorably with that of the Egyptians and the people of the East, presumably the Mesopotamians, unless the term means "ancient times" rather than "the East." He is said to have been wiser than certain great sages of the past whose names are obscure to us. The statement in 1 Kings 4:33 that Solomon spoke about trees and animals brings to mind not only such proverbs as that about the industry of the ant in Prov. 6:6 (attributed to Solomon in Prov. 1:1) but also Jotham's fable about the trees in Judg. 9:7–21 and Samson's riddle about the lion and honey in Judg. 14:14. A similar use of natural history is found in wisdom materials from Aramean, Mesopotamian, and Egyptian sources.

5:1–9:25

The Temple of Solomon

As explained in the introduction, Solomon's erection of the Temple was understood by the Deuteronomistic historian as the most important event of his reign and a crucial juncture in the larger story of Israel's experience in the land. In Deuteronomy 12, Moses promised the people that, when they entered and conquered the promised land, Yahweh would give them "rest" from their enemies (Deut. 12:9, 10). The promise of rest was linked to the establishment of a single, central sanctuary, "the place that Yahweh will choose" (Deut. 12:5, 11, 14), to which the worship of Yahweh would be confined. Though the time of "rest" seemed at hand after the conquest led by Joshua (Josh. 21:43–45; 22:4; 23:1), the promise could not be fulfilled until the land was fully pacified and the central sanctuary established. These things were left for David and Solomon. David fought the wars that finally pacified the land (2 Sam. 8) and conquered Jerusalem and brought Yahweh's Ark there (2 Sam. 5–6). Now Solomon builds the Temple.

5:1–12, Negotiations with Hiram of Tyre.

Extrabiblical sources indicate that Hiram, king of the Phoenician city of Tyre, was an energetic and successful ruler, especially remembered for his building projects (→ Hiram). He was an ally of David (cf. v. 1), whose palace he helped build (2 Sam. 5:11). Now he sends a delegation to renew the diplomatic relationship with David's son, and Solomon asks him for help in the construction of a temple for Yahweh. The contract calls for timber, including the fabled cedar of Lebanon, to be shipped to Jerusalem in exchange for large quantities of wheat and olive oil.

Though probably based on earlier materials, this passage is cast in the distinctive rhetoric and style of the Deuteronomistic historian. The language of Solomon's proposal to build the Temple (1 Kings 5:5) recalls the promise made to David in Nathan's oracle (2 Sam. 7:4–17), a key Deuteronomistic passage. Indeed, David wanted to build the Temple himself (2 Sam. 7:2), but, according to the understanding of the author of the present passage (1 Kings 5:3), this was impossible because of the constant warfare during David's reign.

5:13–18, The Organization of the Corvée.

The source of manpower for Solomon's Temple project is "a levy of forced labor" (RSV), or corvée. This was an old institution, known from fourteenth-century Canaanite texts, which Solomon and perhaps David (cf. 2 Sam. 20:24) revived in Israel. Apparently it was not the same as the "forced levy of slaves" (RSV) imposed on foreigners, from which Israelites were exempt (1 Kings 19:20–22). The present passage refers to the conscription of "all Israel" for several months out of each year (5:13–14). Work details go to Lebanon to assist in the harvest of timber and to the Israelite hills to quarry and transport. The use of corvée labor in Solomon's various building projects is thought by historians to have been a major source of popular resentment during his reign and a contributing factor in the secession of the northern tribes after his death (cf. 12:4).

6:1-38, The Building of the Temple. Solomon's Temple stands 30 cubits high (about 45 feet). Its floor plan is a rectangle 60 cubits long by 20 cubits wide (about 90 by 30 feet). Entrance is from a forecourt (the "vestibule," "porch," or "portico") into the nave or holy place and, beyond the nave, the inner sanctuary or most holy place. If the cedar altar mentioned in v. 20 is the same as "the bronze altar in front of Yahweh" in 8:64, it is located in front of the Temple next to the molten sea described in 7:23-26 (cf. 2 Chron. 4:1 and esp. 2 Kings 16:14). The interior walls are completely linked with carved cedar, and the floor is covered with cypress planks. The doors are made of carved cypress and olivewood, and a pair of olivewood cherubim is placed in the inner sanctuary. There is very generous use of gold overlay throughout the structure (→ Temple, The).

7:1-12, The Palace Complex. The secular part of Solomon's construction in Jerusalem includes the administrative halls and residential chambers that, collectively, make up the king's own "house" (v. 1). Presumably the House of the Forest of Lebanon is so named because of its extensive cedar paneling. References to it elsewhere suggest that it may function as a treasury (cf. 10:17) and an armory (cf. Isa. 22:8b), among other things. The Hall of the Throne or Hall of Judgment (1 Kings 7:7) must be the place where the king dispenses justice. Like the Hall of Pillars (v. 6) and the private residential chambers of Solomon and the pharaoh's daughter (v. 8), the Hall of the Throne may be a compartment of the House of the Forest or an independent structure.

7:13-51, The Temple Furnishings. The elaborate bronze work of the Temple is crafted by a Phoenician named Hiram, who is not to be confused with the king of the same name. According to v. 14, he is the son of a man from Tyre and an Israelite widow from the tribe of Naphtali (Dan in 2 Chron. 2:14), whose tribal allotment lay in the far north near Phoenician territory. The description of his skill is reminiscent of that of Bezalel, the chief craftsman of the tabernacle, in Exod. 31:3 and 35:31. According to 1 Kings 7:46, his foundry is in the rich clay beds of the Kikkar or Ghor, the plain of the lower Jordan and Dead Sea, between the towns of Succoth and Zarethan.

Hiram's task is to produce the bronze furnishings that will be displayed outside the Temple. Two freestanding pillars with pomegranate capitals will stand on the forecourt flanking the door to the nave (vv. 15-22). The significance of their names, Jachin and Boaz, is not known, but they may be the incipits, or opening words, of Temple inscriptions (Heb. yakin, "May he establish" . . . ; bo'az, "With him strength . . ."). The molten sea (vv. 23-26) is an enormous bronze cauldron resting on the backs of twelve bronze oxen, three of which faced each of the four cardinal directions. In 2 Chron. 4:6, the molten sea is described as a laver for priestly oblations (cf. Exod. 30:17-21), but its rim is at least 10 feet above the ground, and Hiram makes ten other lavers, positioning them atop ten bronze stands (1 Kings 7:27-39). The molten sea may be a symbolic object, emblematic of Yahweh's founding of the earth upon the seas (e.g., Ps. 24:2).

1 Kings 7:48-50 is concerned with a second group of furnishings. These are made of gold rather than bronze, they belong inside the Temple rather than outside, and they are not made by Hiram. The somewhat unclear text of v. 48 indicates that Solomon makes them himself or, perhaps, that he simply puts them in place. In the latter case, we are probably to assume that they are gold furnishings made for the tabernacle in the wilderness by Bezalel and other craftsmen in the time of Moses (Exod. 25-31; 35-40). Many scholars believe that 1 Kings 7:48-50 is a late expansion, based on the tabernacle account in Exodus.

8:1-66, The Dedication of the Temple.

The ceremonial conveyance of Yahweh's Ark into the Temple corresponds to the rites of neighboring peoples by which the image or statue of a god was brought into a newly constructed shrine. The basis of this passage, therefore, is an old account of the dedication of Solomon's Temple. The ceremony takes place in the month of Ethanim, later Tishri (September-October), which was probably reckoned as the beginning of the year in the time of Solomon (→ New Year Festival). The community assembles before the king, who supervises the ritual. The Ark is taken up by the priests, carried into the Temple, and placed in the inner sanctuary. As the procession moves into the Temple, lavish sacrifices are offered (v. 5), the primary purpose of these being the sanctification of the new sacred precinct. The effectiveness of the ceremony is shown by the appearance of a theophanous cloud in the Temple as the priests withdraw from the inner sanctuary (cf. Exod. 40:34-35). The ceremony concludes with further sacrifices (1 Kings 8:63-64), the so-called peace offerings (RSV), which were characteristically made at times of rejoicing and which were eaten by the people after the removal of the blood, fat, and kidneys (Lev. 3). The seven-day feast mentioned in v. 65 is presumably the Feast of Tabernacles or Succoth, which was celebrated at this time of year (cf. Lev. 23:39).

In the course of its transmission, the original account of the ceremony of dedication was gradually elaborated to conform to details of the knowledge of the Ark and the Temple in later times (cf. "to this day," v. 8). Verses 7-9 probably derive entirely from this later development, which led eventually to the extensively expanded version in 2 Chron. 5:2-6:2.

In his dedicatory oration (1 Kings 8:14-61), Solomon praises Yahweh for his loyalty to Israel and petitions him to accept the Temple and interact with his people there. He describes the new shrine as a place from which divine justice can be dispensed (vv. 31-32) and supplications can be heard in time of war, drought, and famine (vv. 33-40). This long speech, which is replete with Deuteronomistic language, is recognized as one of the programmatic passages in the Deuteronomistic History. From the viewpoint of this history, with its emphasis on the importance of the central sanctuary, the erection of the Temple was a major landmark in the history of Israel. It represents the culmination of two of the primary themes of the Deuteronomistic History. The first of these is the promise made to David in 2 Samuel 7 that his son would succeed him as king and build the Temple. Solomon proclaims this promise, paraphrased here in 1 Kings 8:16-19, to have been fulfilled (v. 20), and then, on the basis of the same promise (v. 25), he asks Yahweh to permit David's dynasty to endure. The second theme is the divine promise of a time of "rest" for Israel after the conquest of the promised land and the establishment of a central sanctuary at "the place that Yahweh will choose." Thus, near the end of his long speech (v. 56) Solomon blesses Yahweh for granting this rest to his people. Note, finally, that the speech was further expanded in vv. 41-53 by an exilic writer, whose contribution shows a special concern for the people taken away as captives of war (vv. 46-51; see Introduction, "Significance for the Ancient Community").

9:1-9, A Vision of Destruction. Yahweh appears to Solomon again, as in his dream at Gibeon (chap. 3). This time the message is in response to Solomon's long prayer in the preceding section and, specifically, to his petition for the endurance of the Davidic dynasty (8:25). Yahweh promises to grant the petition, but only on the condition of Solomon's strict loyalty and obedience to Yahweh's laws. This passage was added by a Deuteronomistic editor after the destruction of the Temple, explicitly referred to in 9:8, to qualify the promises cited in chap. 8 in the spirit of the similar qualification in 3:4-15. The warning about the worship of other gods (9:6) looks ahead to the condemnation of Solomon in 11:1-13.

9:10-14, The Land of Cabul. This episode concerns a district of twenty towns on the border of Israel and Phoenicia in the Galilee. A village called Cabul lying southeast of Acco on the border of the tribal territory of Asher (Josh. 19:27) preserved the name in later times. The author seems to relate the name of the district to Hiram's dissatisfaction with the towns, and it has been suggested that Cabul is being interpreted as ka-bul, Heb. for "as nothing," that is, "good for nothing." But the point of the word-play is elusive. Cabul may mean "[property] encumbered by debt," that is, "mortgaged property."

9:15-23, The Corvée. The projects said to have been built with corvée labor include not only the Temple and palace complex (chaps. 7-8) but also the Millo (which, unless 2 Sam. 5:9 is an anachronism, Solomon rebuilt; → Millo) and the wall of Jerusalem (on the levy of forced labor or corvée, see 5:13-18). Although the Solomonic city wall has not been exposed by excavation, its parameters are fairly well known. The pre-Israelite and Davidic wall surrounded only the southeastern hill or City of David. Solomon's expansion of the city to the north and building of the Temple necessitated the construction of new fortifications. Excavations immediately to the west of the Temple Mount have shown that the Solomonic wall did not extend beyond the summit of the northeastern hill. Outside of Jerusalem, Solomon is said to have "built" (that is, refortified) a number of Israelite cities. It has been suggested that this building activity was a response to the threat represented by the rise of Shishak to power in Egypt (cf. 14:25-26). Archaeologists have discovered a network of fortresses in the Negeb that seem to have been built by the Israelites at about the same time. Excavations at Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer (9:15) have revealed similar gates, which must be assigned to a national building program in the tenth century and thus very probably to the time of Solomon. The insertion of the parenthesis in vv. 16-17a was occasioned by reference to Gezer at the end of v. 15. (For the events alluded to here, see commentary above on 3:1.)

9:24, Pharaoh's Daughter. This is a miscellaneous detail. (See commentary on 3:1 and 9:15.)

9:25, Solomon's Offerings. The purpose of the regular offerings is to maintain the sacral integrity of the Temple. Thus the meaning of the last sentence is not "So he finished the house" (RSV), which is grammatically difficult and inconsistent with the fact that the Temple has already been finished and dedicated, but rather "Thus he would restore the house." The three occasions probably correspond to the three feasts of Unleavened Bread, Harvest or Weeks, and Ingathering or Tabernacles (cf. Exod. 23:14-17), as explicitly stated in 2 Chron. 8:13.

9:26-10:29

Solomon's Wealth

After the long section on the Temple (5:1-9:25), the subject of the various enterprises and accomplishments of Solomon's reign resumes. The particular themes now are his wealth and fame, both of which are understood as consequences of his wisdom.

9:26-28, The Red Sea Fleet. The exact site of Ezion-geber, Solomon's Red Sea shipping port, is unknown (→ Ezion-geber). It lay at or near Elath (here Eloth; cf. Deut. 2:8; 2 Chron. 8:17) on the Gulf of Aqabah. The Israelite ships are steered by the much more experienced sailors of Phoenicia. The location of Ophir is unknown (→ Ophir), but it was probably in the southern part of the Arabian peninsula (cf. Gen. 10:26-30). The gold of Ophir was highly prized (Isa. 13:12; Job 28:16; Ps. 45:9; 1 Chron. 29:4).

10:1-13, The Queen of Sheba. Sheba, Seba, or Saba was a land in the part of the Arabian peninsula corresponding to modern Yemen (→ Seba, Sabeans). When they clashed with the Assyrian kings in the eighth century, the Sabeans were still ruled by queens. The tradition of a visit by an earlier queen of Sheba to the court of Solomon suggests that the Sabeans were already actively involved in trade along the caravan routes of the Arabian subcontinent in the tenth century. Solomon's maritime activities in the south brought him to the attention of the those who had their own trading interests in the region.

This episode has been included to enhance the theme of the legendary wisdom of Solomon. The queen comes to Jerusalem to test Solomon with riddles (v. 1). She leaves praising his sagacity and the good fortune of his subjects, and her acknowledgement of the good fortune of the Israelites is all the more significant because—like that of Jethro, Balaam, Rahab, and others—it comes from a foreigner.

10:14-29, Solomon's Wealth. Solomon's reputation for wisdom drew people from all over the earth to Jerusalem, bringing valuable gifts with them. Gold was so abundant during Solomon's reign, we are told (v. 21), that people were contemptuous of silver (cf. v. 27). Thus, when Solomon's gold shields (vv. 16-17) are taken away by Shishak and replaced with bronze shields by Rehoboam (14:26-28), the change may be understood symbolically as a descent from a golden age to a bronze age. It is impossible to say how much historically reliable information is preserved in these notices about Solomon's fabulous wealth and wisdom. The references to the two types of shield in vv. 16-17 and the ornate throne in vv. 19-20 are likely to have been based on recollections of actual treasures preserved in the House of the Forest of Lebanon (cf. 7:2) and used by later kings for ceremonial occasions (cf. 14:27-28). The ships mentioned in 10:22 are probably the Red Sea fleet (9:26-28), as their cargo of "gold, silver, ivory, apes, and baboons" (not "peacocks") indicates. Their designation as "ships of Tarshish" does not indicate that they sailed to the Mediterranean ports called Tarshish in Spain or Cyprus, but rather that they were large ships capable of transporting metal ores long distances from such ports. It has long been recognized that the two places with which Solomon is said to have traded for horses are Kue, that is, Cilicia in southern Anatolia, and Musri, a land located in the Taurus mountains between Cilicia and Arpad in northern Syria. Instead of musri, "Musri," our received Hebrew text has misrayim, "Egypt," a confusion that gave rise to the prohibition of trading with Egypt for horses (Deut. 17:16), but the references to the kings of the Hittites and the Arameans in 1 Kings 10:29 shows that it was in the north that Solomon's horse trading was conducted.

11:1-43

The Condemnation of Solomon

As explained in the introduction to the larger account of the reign of Solomon (3:1-11:43), the Deuteronomistic editors responsible for the arrangement of the account believed that Solomon's reign ended in failure because he erected places of worship for other gods. In their understanding, this was a consequence of his marriages to foreign women (11:1-13), and it was the cause of the troubles he had with various adversaries (vv. 14-40).

11:1-13, Solomon's Wives. Solomon's reputation as a great lover, the husband of a thousand wives (v. 3a), was legendary. He became the idealized bridegroom of the Song of Songs (cf. Song of Sg. 3:6-11), which was eventually ascribed to his authorship (Song of Sg. 1:1). The popularity and persistence of this part of the Solomon tradition can be accounted for by the tendency of a people to take delight in the sexual prowess of their monarch, whose virility represents the welfare and productivity of the community as a whole. Nevertheless, there was probably a substantial historical basis for Solomon's reputation, though his polygynous behavior seems less likely to have been motivated by an amorous disposition than by diplomatic perspicacity. We have already noted the circumstances of his marriage to the pharaoh's daughter (see 3:1), and there were probably other diplomatically motivated marriages to women from neighboring countries.

This passage in its present form, however, is a Deuteronomistic composition that presents Solomon's marriages to foreign women in a wholly negative light. The basis for this judgment is the prohibition of foreign wives in Deut. 7:3–4 (clearly evoked here in 1 Kings 11:2), because of the danger that they might induce their husbands to worship foreign gods (cf. Deut. 13:6–11; 17:17a). Josiah will dismantle three shrines to foreign gods that Solomon is said to have built on the outskirts of Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:13).

Solomon, then, has forsaken the God “who appeared to him twice” (1 Kings 11:9), and we recall in this connection the interpolated Deuteronomistic qualifications of the promises made on the occasion of both appearances (3:14; 9:1–9). In particular, the perpetuation of David's dynasty was linked to Solomon's obedience to divine law in 9:4–5. Because of his failure to keep Yahweh's commandments, therefore, Solomon's kingdom is going to be taken away and given to one of his servants, whose identity will be revealed shortly (11:26). Solomon's son will inherit the rule of the tribe of Judah, a dispensation made “for the sake of David and for the sake of Jerusalem, which I have chosen” (v. 13) in keeping with the Deuteronomistic view of Jerusalem as the chosen place of worship (cf. the discussion at 8:1–66). As for the rest of the tribes, Yahweh is going to “tear” them away—the verb anticipates the symbol of the torn garment in 11:30–31.

11:14–22, Hadad the Edomite. The events described here seem to have occurred early in Solomon's reign (cf. vv. 21–22, 25), but if so, Hadad's hostility did not prevent Solomon from maintaining a trading port at Ezion-geber (9:26). This episode shows that the Edomite royal family, like the Israelite, was linked to the Egyptian court by a diplomatic marriage. It may be that the kings of the weak twenty-first dynasty attempted to maintain a balance of power in Palestine in this way.

11:23–25, Rezon Son of Eliada. David's war against Hadadezer, king of the Aramean state of Zobah, and his allies is described in 2 Sam. 10:1–19 and 8:3–8. Rezon, a refugee from this war, seems to have had a career that paralleled that of David in some respects. He gathered a personal fighting force and eventually established a kingdom in Damascus, henceforward the most powerful state in southern Syria. Note that David administered Damascus through an Israelite prefect after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:6). It has been plausibly suggested that David sponsored Rezon, who “fled from Hadadezer . . . his master” (1 Kings 11:23), and that Rezon rebelled at the time of David's death. This may be the import of the obscure statement “and he abhorred Israel” (RSV) in v. 25.

11:26–40, Jeroboam Son of Nebat. This is an account of the prophetic proclamation of kingship to Jeroboam, the “servant” of Solomon to whom the bulk of the kingdom was promised in 11:11. Jeroboam's encounter with the prophet Ahijah (vv. 29–39) is set in the context of a brief sketch of the circumstances of his first, abortive attempt at a coup. More complete information is preserved in the Greek text of 11:43 and 12:24. Jeroboam seems to have come to the king's attention while still living in the Ephraimite hills. He was put in charge of the local detachment of the corvée (cf. 5:13–18; 9:15–23) and given the task of fortifying his hometown of Zeredah. From there, he was brought to Jerusalem to work on the bulwarks of the City of David. He became very powerful—the Greek text mentions a personal force of horse-drawn chariots—and eventually aspired to the kingship itself. But when he attempted to seize power (“lifted up his hand against the king,” 11:26–27 [RSV]), the coup was not successful, and he was obliged to flee to Egypt, where he found refuge with Shishak (ca. 945–924 B.C.), the founder of the twenty-second dynasty.

In many respects Ahijah's role parallels that of another Ephraimite prophet, Samuel. Here he designates Jeroboam king, and in chap. 14 he will reject him, just as Samuel designated and rejected Saul (1 Sam. 10:1; 13:13–14). The symbolic act involving the tearing of the cloak into twelve pieces is reminiscent of a similar gesture involving Samuel and Saul (1 Sam. 15:27–28). Ahijah's Shilonite background may also be significant in view of Samuel's connections with Shiloh (1 Sam. 1–3) and, more especially, of Solomon's banishment of the scion of the Shilonite priesthood from Jerusalem (1 Kings 2:26–27; cf. 1 Sam. 14:3; 22:20).

In its present, expanded form, Ahijah's oracle expresses the rejection of Solomon's dynasty in favor of Jeroboam in the Deuteronomistic language of 1 Kings 11:11–13. Solomon's son will be permitted to retain one tribe, so that David will always have a parcel of land (not “lamp” [RSV]) “in Jerusalem, the city I chose for myself to place my name there” (v. 36, cf. 8:29, 44; 9:3; Deut. 12:5). Note that Jeroboam's designation as king includes a conditional promise of a “sure house” or enduring dynasty (1 Kings 11:38) expressed in language reminiscent of that used of the Davidic dynasty (cf. 1 Sam. 25:28; 2 Sam. 7:16).

11:41–43, The Death of Solomon. The account of Solomon's reign concludes with a typical Deuteronomistic synopsis. Though it is likely that his reign was a long one, “forty years” (v. 42) is probably an estimate.

12:1–16:28

The Early Kings of the Divided Monarchy

These chapters are concerned with the secession of the northern tribes under the leadership of Jeroboam and the reigns of the kings of the now independent realms of Israel and Judah before the accession of Ahab.

12:1–24

The Secession of the Northern Tribes

The people of Israel, the Northern Kingdom ruled by Saul, actively sought David's rule (2 Sam. 5:1–3) and willingly accepted Solomon. But when Solomon's heir deals high-handedly with them, they refuse to accept him as king. Instead, they follow a fellow Israelite, Solomon's adversary Jeroboam (cf. 1 Kings 11:26–40).

12:1–20, The Assembly at Shechem. At

Solomon's death, his son Rehoboam becomes king of Judah. His succession to the kingship of the northern tribes, however, seems to require a separate investiture, a renewal of the agreement made between David and the "elders of Israel" at Hebron (2 Sam. 5:3). This time the negotiations take place at Shechem, where Rehoboam meets with representatives of the northern tribes. The issue is royal leniency. The Israelites agree to follow Rehoboam if he will lighten the burden of labor imposed by Solomon. This request is not remarkable in itself: some such gesture promising improved conditions was expected at the beginning of a king's reign. Rehoboam's response, then, shows him to be particularly callous and inept. Rejecting the advice of the elders who had counseled his father, he is persuaded by his own privy council, a group contemptuously referred to as "the children who had grown up with him" (1 Kings 12:8, 10), to promise no more than to replace his father's whips with "scorpions," probably a more painful kind of scourge. The Israelites walk out, taking up the old slogan of Sheba, a Benjaminite who tried to foment a rebellion of the northern tribes against David (2 Sam. 20:1–2). When Rehoboam sends Adoram, the boss of the corvée (called Adoniram in 1 Kings 4:6; 5:14), to compel the Israelites to cooperate, they stone him to death. Rehoboam flees Shechem, and the northern tribes are in open rebellion.

Jeroboam, in the meantime, has heard of the death of Solomon and returned from Egypt (12:2–3). He is presented in this account as the chief spokesman for the northern tribes (vv. 3, 12), but v. 20 suggests that he is not summoned until the negotiations break down. In any case, we should probably assume that he continues to be supported by Shishak, who wants to neutralize the power of Jerusalem in southern Canaan.

12:21–24, The Oracle of Shemaiah. Reho-

boam's plans for a war to force the submission of the northern tribes are cancelled by an oracle proclaiming the division of the country to be the divine will. Shemaiah is mentioned nowhere else in Kings, but see 2 Chron. 12:5–8, 15.

12:25–14:20

The Condemnation of Jeroboam

The dynastic promise made to Jeroboam in 11:37–38 is quickly revoked. As we shall see, the condemnation of Jeroboam and his house will become a paradigm for the condemnation of all the northern kings, not only because the fall of the houses of Baasha and Omri will recapitulate the fall of the house of Jeroboam, but also because the particular crime of which Jeroboam is accused by the Deuteronomistic editors, the erection of places of worship to rival Jerusalem, will be perpetuated by all the northern kings.

12:25–33, The Golden Calves of Dan and

Bethel. Evidence of Jeroboam's rebuilding of Shechem has been found at the site (→ Shechem). It will serve as the royal residence in the north until displaced by Tirzah after Baasha's coup (15:33). The reference to Peniel shows that Jeroboam also has power in northern Transjordan. The author of the present passage, however, suggests that Jeroboam feels insecure in spite of these refortified strongholds. He fears that the regular pilgrimages his people made to Jerusalem will incline them to return their allegiance to Rehoboam. This anxiety leads him to establish his own sanctuaries in the north. From the Deuteronomistic point of view, this was done in cold disregard for Yahweh's choice of Jerusalem. It was "devised from his own heart" (12:33), that is, not commanded by Yahweh through Moses, and the illegitimacy of the scheme was exacerbated by the consecration of nonlevitical priests, the construction of high places, and the institution of a festival beginning the fifteenth day of the eighth month to rival the Feast of Tabernacles celebrated one month earlier in Jerusalem (Lev. 23:34). Modern analysis of Jeroboam's religious policies, on the other hand, suggests that he was appealing to old Yahwistic traditions in the north, not innovating arbitrarily. Bethel was an ancient sanctuary with strong patriarchal associations (Gen. 12:8; 28:10–22). The bull was probably also a very old and authentically Yahwistic symbol. The animal represented the Deity, who may have been thought of as invisibly present on its back. It has been plausibly suggested that Jeroboam chose the bull iconography in an attempt to compete with the Ark iconography of Jerusalem. In any case, though the present narrative depicts the bulls not as pedestals but as idols (cf. 1 Kings 14:9) to which sacrifices were offered (12:32), there is no suggestion that Jeroboam introduced any kind of non-Yahwistic cult. From the Deuteronomistic perspective of the present account, however, the installation of the bulls was a heinous crime ("the thing became a sin," v. 30), for which Jeroboam's kingship would be rejected and his family condemned (14:9–11). Moreover, "the sin of Jeroboam," which his successors perpetuated (e.g., 15:26, 34), would prove to be the fatal mistake of the Northern Kingdom, leading finally to the exile of its people (2 Kings 17:21–23).

13:1–34, The Man of God at Bethel. The basis of this narrative is a story about prophetic authenticity. A man of God comes to Bethel from Judah and delivers an oracle predicting the desecration of the altar by the burning of human bones. A prophet from Bethel intercepts him on his way home and tricks him into violating the strict terms of his mission. For this violation, the man of God is condemned in an oracle uttered by the prophet from Bethel, and when he returns to the road, he is slain by a lion. Ironically, the oracle authenticates the man of God's mission at the same time that it condemns him. Realizing this, the prophet retrieves the body of the man of God and buries it in his own tomb, instructing his sons to bury him alongside the man of God.

The Deuteronomistic historian used this story as a vehicle for his condemnation of Jeroboam's cult at Bethel. He understood the altar oracle to refer to Josiah's desecration of the high places of Samaria (cf. v. 32), as described in 2 Kings 23:15–16. Despite a few small discrepancies, the words of the oracle are tightly linked to the report of its fulfillment, and Josiah is even mentioned by name in 1 Kings 13:2. When the oracle is fulfilled, moreover, the mission of the man of God is remembered, and his bones, together with those of the prophet, are spared (2 Kings 23:16–18).

14:1–20, Ahijah's Oracle. Ahijah of Shiloh, the prophet who proclaimed the conditional promise of a dynasty to Jeroboam (v. 2; cf. 11:29–31), now announces the condemnation of his house. The occasion is a visit to Shiloh made by Jeroboam's wife to consult Ahijah about the illness of her son Abijah. Though she disguises herself, the deception is both unnecessary, since the old prophet is blind, and futile, since Yahweh has warned him of her coming. Ahijah announces that not only Abijah but every male in Jeroboam's house will perish (14:10). The new king alluded to in v. 14 is Baasha, who will be the assassin of Jeroboam's son and heir, Nadab (15:25–29). Just as the dynastic promise made to Jeroboam implied a promise of male progeny, so the condemnation of the dynasty involves the elimination of his sons. The grisly language of the oracle (14:10–11) will be echoed in the condemnations of the houses of Baasha (16:1–4) and Ahab (21:21–24). The pattern thus established presents the denunciation of one royal family after another throughout the early history of the Northern Kingdom. The Deuteronomistic editors saw this as a consequence of the perpetuation of "the sins of Jeroboam" (14:16) and, making explicit reference to the Assyrian deportations of Israelites to places "beyond the Euphrates," they expanded the condemnation of the house of Jeroboam into a condemnation of the Northern Kingdom as a whole (vv. 15–16). The passage ends with the standard synopsis for the end of a king's reign (vv. 19–20).

14:21–15:24

The Early History of Judah

The reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah are presented together in strictly chronological order. Rehoboam, Abijah, and Asa—three kings of Judah—are described in succession because they all came to throne before a change of ruler in the north, that is, they were all contemporaries of Jeroboam.

14:21–24, Synopsis of Rehoboam's Reign.

These verses contain the introductory Deuteronomistic synopsis of the reign of Rehoboam. His capital, Jerusalem, is described here in the usual Deuteronomistic way as the divinely chosen city. During Rehoboam's reign, however, the people of Judah disregarded the rule of the chosen sanctuary and celebrated their religious rites "on every high hill and under every green tree," a Deuteronomistic cliché that evokes the description of the pre-Israelite shrines in Deut. 12:2 and anticipates the final condemnation of the Northern Kingdom in 2 Kings 17:10. The list of abominations that Rehoboam is accused of tolerating is also Deuteronomistic and formulaic (→ Asherah; High Place; Pillars [3]). The role of the religious functionaries called "male cult prostitutes" in 1 Kings 14:24 is unclear; but they are prohibited by Deuteronomistic law (Deut. 23:18), and Asa and Jehoshaphat are said to have eradicated them from Judah (1 Kings 15:12; 22:46).

14:25–28, Shishak's Invasion. Shoshenq I (ca. 945–924 B.C.), the biblical Shishak, was a man of Libyan ancestry who founded the twenty-second dynasty and ruled Egypt from a city called Bubastis in the eastern Delta. As we have seen, he gave Jeroboam asylum after his first, abortive revolt against Solomon (11:40), evidently as part of a policy of neutralizing the power of Jerusalem in Palestine. It is tempting, therefore, to interpret his invasion as continuing support for Jeroboam in his struggle against Judah. The biblical accounts give the impression that the raid was directed only at Jerusalem (v. 25) or the fortified cities of Judah and Jerusalem (2 Chron. 12:4), and Rehoboam seems to have had to strip both the Temple and the palace for tribute to save the city (1 Kings 14:26; for Solomon's gold shields, see commentary above on 10:14–29). The editorial insertion of the present account immediately following a denunciation of Rehoboam's religious policies (14:22–24) implies that the attack was divine punishment for the religious inconstancy of Rehoboam, and the leaders of Judah, and this is made explicit in the parallel account in 2 Chron. 12:5. But the city list Shishak left at Karnak names cities captured as far east as Penuel in Transjordan, which had been fortified by Jeroboam (cf. 1 Kings 12:25), and as far north as Megiddo, where a fragment of a Shishak stele has been found. Thus we must conclude that Jeroboam, once his own kingdom was established, lost favor with Shishak and that the invasion was an attempt to reassert Egypt's ancient control over Palestine as a whole.

14:29–31, The Death of Rehoboam. This is the concluding Deuteronomistic synopsis of the reign of Rehoboam, with which has been included a notice about the constant warfare between Rehoboam and Jeroboam (v. 30; cf. 15:7b).

15:1–8, The Reign of Abijah. The rule of Abijah, who is called Abijah in Chronicles (e.g., 2 Chron. 13:1), is described here entirely in formulaic Deuteronomistic notices, which condemn him for continuing Rehoboam's religious policies (1 Kings 15:3). The reference in v. 7 to warfare between Abijah and Jeroboam is supplemented in 2 Chron. 13:3–20 by an account of a major battle fought on the southern boundary of Ephraim in which Judah is said to have been victorious.

15:9–24, The Reign of Asa. Asa is the first of several kings of Judah whose reigns are evaluated positively by the Deuteronomistic editors because of their religious policies. He is said to have banned both “male cult prostitutes” (cf. 14:24) and idols from Judah. He removed Maacah, his mother or grandmother (cf. 15:2; 10), from the office of queen mother because she had honored the goddess Asherah with “an abominable image” (RSV), which Asa cut down and burned. He is also credited with having enriched the Temple with gold and silver votives (v. 15). Except for his failure to eliminate the high places (v. 14), his success is qualified only by the statement that “in his old age he was diseased in his feet” (v. 23), probably a euphemism indicating venereal disease. This detail is presented in a way that suggests the illness was a divine punishment for some kind of sin.

The war against the Northern Kingdom continued during Asa's reign. Baasha of Israel (see 15:33–16:7) sets up an embargo against Judah by fortifying the city of Ramah, a few miles north of Jerusalem. By stripping the Temple and the palace again (cf. 14:26), Asa is able to induce Ben-hadad, the Aramean king of Damascus, to invade Naphtali. The account speaks of an existing alliance between Ben-hadad and Baasha and alludes to an earlier alliance between Damascus and Judah (v. 19), but we know nothing else of either of these arrangements. In any case, the presence of an Aramean army in the northern Galilee forces Baasha to withdraw from Ramah, which Asa dismantles, using the building materials to fortify the border cities of Geba and Mizpah.

15:25–16:28

The Early History of Israel

The reigns of six northern kings (Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Omri, and Ahab) are described in succession, because they all came to the throne before a change of ruler in the south, that is, they all were contemporaries of Asa.

15:25–32, The Assassination of Nadab.

Nadab succeeds his father, Jeroboam, and reigns two years before being slain in a coup led by a member of the tribe of Issachar named Baasha. The assassination takes place while the Israelites are besieging the city of Gibbethon, which at this time is in Philistine hands. Baasha secures his position by exterminating all the descendants of Jeroboam (v. 29). These events are presented as the fulfillment of Ahijah's oracle (14:10).

15:33–16:7, The Reign of Baasha. Baasha's twenty-four-year reign is reported with the usual editorial formulas. As a usurper (15:27–28), he inaugurates a new dynasty, and his son Elah will succeed him as king. There is also a new seat of government, Tirzah, which lies north of Shechem in the direction of Baasha's tribal homeland of Issachar (cf. 15:27). Because Baasha's religious policies are the same as those of Jeroboam, however, his dynasty is condemned in an oracle that echoes that of Ahijah the Shilonite (cf. 14:7–11).

16:8–22, The Rise and Fall of Zimri. Two military coups, spaced only seven days apart, are recorded here. Zimri, a chariot officer, kills Baasha's heir Elah, then takes his own life a week later when Elah's chief military officer, Omri, arrives with the army. The assassination of Elah takes place in Tirzah, the seat of the Baasha dynasty, in the home of Arza, the officer “over the house,” that is, the supervisor of the royal estates (cf. 4:6). Elah’s death and Zimri’s subsequent massacre of the family of Baasha are presented as the fulfillment of the oracle of Jehu son of Hanani (16:1–4). Zimri’s own reign lasts only as long as it takes the army to receive the news at Gibbethon, where a siege is again under way (cf. 15:27), and march to Tirzah. Nothing else is known of Tibni son of Ginath, who competes briefly with Omri for supremacy.

16:23–28, The Reign of Omri. A new dynasty needs a new capital, and Omri finds an excellent prospect on a previously unfortified summit in the hills of Manasseh. The site affords a clear view of the surrounding valleys, and the Hebrew name shomron, “Samaria,” probably means “place of watching,” that is, “Lookout Mountain.” Thus, the notice tracing the name to a certain Shemer, the original owner of the hill, is not likely to be historical. Nevertheless, the tradition of the purchase of the site, formally transferring its ownership to Omri, is important: Compare David’s purchase of the threshing floor of Araunah (2 Sam. 24:24–25), the site of the Temple of Solomon (1 Chron. 21:28–22:1).

Apart from the notice about Samaria, however, the reign of the founder of the first stable dynasty in the Northern Kingdom is described in a surprisingly brief account. Omri’s seizure of power at Tirzah was described in 1 Kings 16:15b–22, but apart from the usual introductory and concluding synopses, no further details of the political or religious history of his reign are provided. We know, nevertheless, that Omri was a powerful and important king who brought stability to Israel, based in part on the establishment of cordial relations with both Phoenicia and Judah (→ Omri). Archaeological evidence shows that he inaugurated a vigorous period of building and fortification, of which the limestone city he and Ahab erected at Samaria is the best example. An inscription of Mesha, the Moabite king contemporary with Ahab (cf. 2 Kings 3:4–27), credits Omri with having seized control of the Madeba plateau in central Transjordan.

16:29–22:33

The Reign of Ahab

The accounts of the reigns of Ahab and his two sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, have been greatly expanded by the inclusion of stories about Elijah and Elisha, which occupy most of the narrative from 1 Kings 17 to 2 Kings 10. Ahab’s own reign, moreover, is given an especially full treatment because of the interest taken in it by the Deuteronomistic editors, who regarded the crimes of Ahab and Jezebel as exemplary of the kind of behavior that led finally to the destruction of the Northern Kingdom.

16:29–34

The Accession of Ahab

The synopsis that introduces the account of Ahab’s reign is followed by a notice about a contemporary event, the rebuilding of Jericho, included by the editors as a part of the prophecy and fulfillment scheme of the larger Deuteronomistic History.

16:29–33, Summary of Ahab’s Reign. The indictment included in this synopsis is the most severe imposed on any Israelite king. Ahab, we are told, was guilty not only of Jeroboam’s sin, the perpetuation of rival sanctuaries outside of Jerusalem, but also of Solomon’s. Jezebel is presented as another instance, perhaps the paradigmatic instance, of a foreign queen who induces an Israelite king to worship a foreign god (cf. 11:1–13). Her father was the Tyrian king Ittobaal (biblical Ethbaal). The marriage between Ahab and Jezebel was probably arranged by their fathers as part of an alliance made necessary by the burgeoning power of the Aramean state of Damascus under the successors of Ben-hadad, son of Tabrimmon (cf. 15:18–19). From the Deuteronomistic point of view, the marriage was a terrible mistake, because it introduced the worship of “Baal,” as Jezebel’s god is called, into Israel. Here, as often elsewhere in the Bible, Baal is used as a generic term for any foreign god. In this case, Baal should be Melcarth, the god of Jezebel’s homeland of Tyre (→Phoenicia). We know that the cult of Melcarth enjoyed international popularity at this time, as shown by the dedication to him of a stele erected near Aleppo by Ben-hadad of Damascus, possibly the son of the Ben-hadad who aided Asa in his struggle against Baasha (15:18). On the other hand, the fully developed biblical tradition clearly understands the Baal of the Elijah cycle to be the widely worshipped Syrian and Canaanite god Baal Haddu or Hadad. This Baal was above all else a rain-giver, and it is over the issue of giving and withholding of rain that Yahweh’s prophet Elijah will challenge the authority of Baal in the narrative that follows.

16:34, The Rebuilding of Jericho. The fortification of Jericho under Ahab was probably undertaken because of the threat posed by the Moabites, upon whom Omri and Ahab imposed tribute but who rebelled against Israel after Ahab’s death (2 Kings 3:4–27). The death of the eldest and youngest sons of Hiel, the builder of Jericho, is presented here as the realization of the curse uttered by Joshua in Josh. 6:26.

17:1-18:46*Elijah and the Drought

The stories about Elijah and Elisha in 1 and 2 Kings probably derive from an old northern complex of prophetic legends and miracle stories. They are composed of a number of discrete episodes, most of which seem to have been independent in origin, though they may have already been combined into a single narrative unit before their incorporation into the Deuteronomistic History. The first group of stories, found in chaps. 17 and 18, are unified around the theme of Elijah's role in the drought that occurred during Ahab's reign.

17:1, The Announcement of the Drought.

Elijah the Tishbite makes his first appearance in the narrative suddenly and without preparation. "Tishbite" has been explained as meaning "from Tishbi in Gilead" or "one of the settlers in Gilead," but no other introduction of the man of God is provided, and many scholars believe that the beginning of the Elijah story has been lost. Nevertheless, the point of Elijah's proclamation to Ahab is clear: the life-giving rains that water the land are under the control of Yahweh and not, by implication, of Baal. Thus the contest that will take place on Mount Carmel in chap. 18 is already in view, and the intervening drought will demonstrate the futility of Ahab's support for the worship of Baal. The effect of a drought lasting for even a part of three seasons (17:1; 18:1) would have been devastating. Josephus quotes a Tyrian source recording a year-long drought in Phoenicia during the reign of Ittobaal (Ethbaal), Ahab's father-in-law and contemporary.

17:2-7, The Ravens of the Wadi Cherith.

Elijah's first place of refuge in this flight from Ahab was in Transjordan, but the exact location is uncertain. The motif of the hero fed by wild animals is very widespread in world folklore.

17:8-16, The Phoenician Widow.

Elijah's second place of refuge is the Phoenician city of Zarephath or Sarepta (→ Zarephath), where he finds shelter with a widow. In place of the miracle of the ravens is the miracle of the unfailing jar of meal and cruse of oil, another common folklore motif. The closest biblical parallel is found in 2 Kings 4:1-7 in the Elisha cycle, where the widow of one of the sons of the prophets is sustained by a bountiful jar of oil (cf. 2 Kings 4:42-44 and, more remotely, Matt. 14:13-21; 15:32-38; Mark 6:30-44; Luke 9:10-17; John 6:1-14).

17:17-24, The Revival of the Widow's Son.

This miracle also has a close parallel in the Elisha cycle (cf. 2 Kings 4:18-37). In the present story, the widow's reactions have thematic importance. When her child is on the verge of death, she angrily blames the catastrophe on Elijah. Various forms of guilt or impurity that might otherwise be inconsequential become dangerous in the presence of the holy man (1 Kings 17:18). When her son is revived, however, she is moved to acclaim the special powers of Elijah, which the transmission of vitality from his body to that of the child has demonstrated (v. 21), and to acknowledge the veracity of the word of Yahweh (v. 24).

18:1-46, The Contest on Mount Carmel.

The Carmel promontory, which rises precipitously out of the sea at modern Haifa and dominates the surrounding lowlands, seems to have been thought of as a sacred place throughout antiquity. It is against the power of the greatly venerated Baal who was lord of Carmel that Elijah pits the power of Yahweh in a contest of sacrificial altars. The people can no longer go on "hobbling on two crutches" (v. 21); they must choose. The authentic god will be the one who answers "by fire" (v. 24). Despite the prayers and self-lacerations of his prophets, the Carmelite Baal does not respond. But when Elijah prays, a lightning bolt ("the fire of Yahweh") falls from a clear sky and ignites the altar (v. 38).

The story of the contest between Elijah and the prophets of Baal seems to be an originally independent narrative. Yahweh is vindicated when the lightning falls, and the adversary is the local Baal of Carmel. In the larger account of the drought, this Carmelite Baal is understood to be the great rain-giving Baal Hadad, and Yahweh is vindicated when Elijah returns and the rain begins at his word (cf. 17:1). The clouds gather after the combustion of Yahweh's altar and the slaughter of the prophets of Baal, as Elijah performs a rite of some kind on the summit of the Carmel headland overlooking the sea (vv. 42-44).

The contest between the gods follows a meeting of the two human antagonists. Ahab greets Elijah as the "troubler of Israel," an expression suggesting the ritual pollution of a community and, therefore, the inducement of communal hardship by the violation of an oath or sacred rule (Josh. 6:18; 7:25; 1 Sam. 14:29). Ahab's point is that Elijah is responsible for the drought, but Elijah replies that it is Ahab who has "troubled Israel" by violating Yahweh's commandments.

19:1-21*Elijah at Mount Horeb

Elijah's journey through the wilderness to Mount Horeb is the most important of a series of episodes that present him as the new Moses. The altar he built on Mount Carmel using twelve stones, "according to the number of the tribes of the sons of Jacob" (18:31-32), is reminiscent of Moses' altar and twelve standing stones "according to the twelve tribes of Israel" set up on Mount Sinai (Exod. 24:4; cf. Josh. 4:8). Now he makes a journey of "forty days and forty nights" to Horeb (1 Kings 19:8; cf. Exod. 24:18b) and enters "the cave" (1 Kings 19:9), which might be the same "cleft of the rock" from which Moses saw Yahweh's back (Exod. 33:22). Like Moses, Elijah watches as Yahweh passes by (1 Kings 19:11; cf. Exod. 33:19-23). Note, finally, that Elijah will part the Jordan and cross on dry ground (2 Kings 2:8), just as Moses did at the Red Sea (Exod. 14:21), and he will ascend into the sky in Transjordan opposite Jericho, where Moses died (2 Kings 2:6-11; Deut. 34:1, 6). At that time Elisha will take Joshua's role of understudy (1 Kings 19:21; cf. Exod. 24:13) and successor, recrossing the Jordan on dry ground (2 Kings 2:14; cf. Joshua 3).

19:1-8, The Journey to Horeb. Many scholars think pious Yahwists made pilgrimages to Sinai during the time of the Israelite and Judean monarchies. The notices of the stages in the wilderness in Exodus and Numbers, summarized in Numbers 33, seem to preserve precise records of one or more routes through the desert. Thus Elijah is often seen as a pilgrim in the present passage. His expressed motivation, however, is not pilgrimage but refuge. Alarmed by Jezebel's threat, he flees first to Beer-sheba, the southern limit of Judah, then one day's journey farther into the desert, where he sits and despairs of his life. The "pilgrimage" itself is a miraculous journey of forty days and nights without food or water, for which he is prepared by an angel who requires him to consume a double portion of both before the trek begins.

19:9-18, The "Still Small Voice." Like Moses before him (Exod. 33:12-23), Elijah watches from a cave as Yahweh passes by at Sinai. The wind, earthquake, and fire of Exodus 19 appear again, but this time Yahweh is not present in them. Instead, the word of Yahweh comes to Elijah in a "slight whispering sound" or "still small voice" (RSV). Many scholars interpret this account as a deliberate rejection of the storm theophany in Yahwism because of its special associations with the Canaanite rain god Baal. The rejection comes at a time when Israel is divided between the worship of Baal and Yahweh, and the danger of syncretism is great. It is clear, in any case, that according to the prophetic point of view from which the Elijah story is told, this incident represents a transition from the spectacular theophanies witnessed by early Israel to the quiet transmission of the divine word to the prophets.

The divine whisper instructs Elijah to appoint three men to office. The third of these appointments will be made immediately, when Elisha is called to become Elijah's apprentice (1 Kings 11:19-21) and, eventually, his successor (2 Kings 2). The first and second appointments will be made by Elisha, not Elijah, when the former reveals to Hazael that he is going to become king of Syria (2 Kings 8:7-15) and then, with the help of an anonymous young prophet, anoints Jehu, the bane of the house of Omri, as king of Israel (2 Kings 9:1-10).

19:19-21, The Call of Elisha. Though Elisha will not appear again until the story of the ascension of Elijah in 2 Kings 2, a thoroughly enigmatic account of his call has been inserted here in consequence of 1 Kings 19:16 above. The picture of twelve teams of oxen working a field at the same time is not impossibly unrealistic, providing that we do not suppose that Elisha is driving them all. Nevertheless, it is tempting to suspect that the number twelve originally had some symbolic significance, now obscured by the abbreviation of a long narrative. The cloak used in Elisha's investiture is evidently the one that will be passed on to him and used in the miraculous splitting of the Jordan in 2 Kings 2:8, 13-14. The impromptu and unexplained sacrifice of the oxen may also be a part of Elisha's investiture, comparable to the bull and two rams sacrificed during the ordination of the high priest (cf. Exod. 29).

20:1-43

The War with Ben-hadad of Damascus

Chaps. 20 and 22 form a continuous narrative interrupted by the story of Naboth's vineyard. These two chapters are markedly different from those that immediately precede and follow them and from chap. 21. Elijah, who has dominated the story up to this point, is absent, though he will return in chap. 21 and 2 Kings 1. In fact, he seems to be completely unknown. Ahab is still here, but he is presented in a less harsh light. Jezebel is not mentioned. It is clear, then, that chaps. 20 and 22 derive from a source that was originally unrelated to the Elijah-Elisha narrative from which most of the surrounding material was drawn.

Note further that the name of Ahab appears only three times in chap. 20 (vv. 2, 13, and 14) and once in the main narrative of chap. 22 (v. 20) before the Deuteronomistic synopsis in 20:39-40. Most often he is called simply "the king of Israel." There is material similar to this elsewhere, much of it embedded within the Elisha stories and especially in 2 Kings 6:24-7:20, in which the conflict between Ben-hadad of Damascus and an anonymous "king of Israel" is described. This raises the possibility that the events described in chaps. 20 and 22 did not occur in the reign of Ahab, whose name has been added secondarily in its few occurrences. This possibility is enhanced by the historical problems raised by these chapters. We know from Assyrian records that Ahab was an ally of Damascus in 853 B.C., when a coalition of Syrian and Palestinian states engaged Shalmaneser III in a major battle at Qarqar on the Orontes. It also seems clear that this anti-Assyrian coalition stayed together until at least 845, several years after Ahab's death in about 850. Only Damascus and Hamath are named as confederates after 853, however, and it is possible, though unlikely, that Israel withdrew. If this is what happened, then we can conclude that chaps. 20 and 22 refer to events that took place between 853 and 850. "Ben-hadad," then, must be the throne name of Hadadezer, who, as we know from the inscriptions of Shalmaneser III, was the king of Damascus contemporary with Ahab. If chaps. 20 and 22 have been wrongly assigned to the reign of Ahab, however, "the king of Israel" portrayed here is probably Jehoash, the grandson of Jehu. Many of the details given in the account of his reign correspond to events described here. Though he inherited an army reduced to almost nothing (2 Kings 13:7; cf. 1 Kings 20:27), he was able to rally and recover cities lost by his father to the Arameans (2 Kings 13:25; cf. 1 Kings 20:34). He also won a major victory at Aphek (2 Kings 13:17; cf. 1 Kings 20:26-30). If this solution is correct, the Ben-hadad who appears here in chaps. 20 and 22 was Ben-hadad son of Hazael (2 Kings 13:24).

20:1-12, Ben-hadad's Provocation of Ahab. The armies of the Aramean kingdom of Damascus besiege Samaria. Ben-hadad, the enemy king, makes certain demands on the city, but because of textual uncertainties, it is difficult to tell exactly what these are. The king of Israel seems at first to agree to give Ben-hadad whatever he wants, but when Ben-hadad insists on having his servants enter the city to choose what they want, the Israelite king becomes suspicious and refuses to comply. There follows a boastful Aramean threat (v. 10) countered by a proverbial Israelite retort (v. 11). The time of battle is at hand.

20:13-21, The First Engagement. An Israelite victory against overwhelming odds is achieved with Yahweh's help. An anonymous prophet conveys the divine promise of success, which also includes tactical instructions. Ahab is told to strike first (v. 14), thus taking the overconfident Arameans by surprise. The first to march out to battle are "the young men of the provincial governors," an otherwise unknown group, followed by the regular militia ("all the people of Israel," v. 15). Ben-hadad, who has been drinking with his field officers, is unable to stop the Israelite advance, and the Arameans are routed.

20:22-34, Ahab's Victory over Ben-hadad. The next engagement takes place at Aphek, east of the Sea of Galilee. The Arameans have chosen this region, an open plateau, because they believe they were defeated at Samaria by the Israelites because "their gods are gods of the hills" (v. 23). This provides the occasion for another divine promise of success to Israel: Yahweh will prove that he is a God of flatlands as well as hills (v. 28). When the battle is over, Ben-hadad asks for clemency, and his life is spared on the condition that he return cities taken from Israel by his father.

20:35-43, The Condemnation of Ahab. For the first time in this independent source (chaps. 20 and 22) the prophetic message is unfavorable to the king of Israel. He is censured by another anonymous prophet for releasing Ben-hadad, when Yahweh requires that he be put to death (v. 42; cf. 1 Sam. 15:9). The condemnation of Ahab in 1 Kings 20:42 looks ahead to his death in chap. 22.

21:1-29 Naboth's Vineyard

This story is not a part of the story of the conflict between Ben-hadad and the king of Israel in chaps. 20 and 22. Elijah, who played no part in chap. 20, returns to utter a final condemnation of Ahab and his dynasty. Thus the larger Elijah-Elisha narrative resumes from chap. 19. It is noteworthy that in the arrangement of the Greek text, the story of Naboth's vineyard follows chap. 19 immediately. The arrangement of the received Hebrew text is the result of an editor's wish to place the episode after the condemnation of Ahab in 20:35-42. The crime of Ahab is that he has "killed, and also taken possession" (21:19 [RSV]). The latter means that he has deprived an innocent citizen of something that rightfully belongs to him. From the prophetic perspective according to which this story is told, this is the quintessential royal crime. As the prophet Samuel warned before the first king was crowned, it is the way of kings to treat people this way (1 Sam. 8:11-17). Ahab's personal denunciation is expanded in 1 Kings 21:21-22 to a condemnation of his dynasty that associates it with the condemned houses of Jeroboam (14:10-11) and Baasha (16:3-4).

Jezebel plays her most prominent role in this episode. Her contrivance of Naboth's unjust execution suggests that the Phoenician queen has acquired an extraordinary knowledge of Israelite law, with its requirement of two witnesses (Deut. 17:6; 19:15) and death by stoning (Deut. 17:5).

Ahab's unexpected reprieve (1 Kings 21:27-29) explains why the full sentence is not imposed until the end of the reign of his son Joram (Jehoram in 22:50), when the extermination of the family will occur (2 Kings 10:10-11). Ahab's blood will indeed be licked by dogs, but in Samaria (1 Kings 22:38), not Jezreel (21:19; but see 2 Kings 9:25-26).

22:1-40

The Death of Ahab

This section is a continuation of the narrative begun in chap. 20. The old prophetic account of the death of the king of Israel at Ramoth-gilead in vv. 1-28 has been filled out with an editorial synopsis concluding the account of the reign of Ahab (vv. 39-40).

22:1-28, The Prophecy of Micaiah Son of Imlah. Ramoth-gilead, an important Transjordanian outpost located on one of the main roads to Damascus, was the headquarters of one of Solomon's district officers (4:13), but now it is in Aramean hands. Ahab decides to join forces with Jehoshaphat, his contemporary in Judah (22:41), to restore the city to Israel. As we know from 2 Kings 8:18, 26, this alliance was sealed by the marriage of Ahab's daughter Athaliah to Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram. The primary interest of the story, however, is not the alliance of Israel and Judah or even the preparations for war. It is the problem of authentic and inauthentic prophecy. Ahab's prophets predict battlefield success for Israel. A prophet called Zedekiah son of Chenaanah dramatizes this outcome with a symbolic act using iron horns, perhaps in evocation of the oracle on the tribe of Joseph in Deut. 33:17. But there is one dissenting voice. Micaiah son of Imlah reports a vision of Israel scattered like sheep without a shepherd—that is, he foresees that Ahab will die in the battle.

It is Micaiah's vision that is authentic. In Jeremiah's indictment of false prophets who give favorable oracles (Jer. 23:16-22), the true prophet is the one who has stood in the divine courtroom and received Yahweh's commission (Jer. 23:18). Thus, Micaiah authenticates himself by his report of a vision of the divine courtroom (1 Kings 22:19-23). He says that he saw Yahweh seated on his throne (cf. Isa. 6:1), flanked by the celestial armies, and heard Yahweh asking for volunteers (cf. Isa. 6:8). Micaiah watched as "a spirit" was commissioned to be "a lying spirit in the mouth of all of [Ahab's] prophets" (1 Kings 22:22). Thus the favorable oracle reported by the other prophets is a hoax, sent by Yahweh to entice Ahab to his death.

The conflict between Micaiah and Zedekiah is often compared to that of Jeremiah and Haniah (Jer. 28). In the end, Zedekiah's viewpoint prevails, and Micaiah's counsel is rejected. He is arrested and, like Jeremiah, placed in the custody of a "son of the king" (1 Kings 22:26; cf. Jer. 36:26; 38:6).

22:29-38, The Battle. Ahab's strategy to protect himself has been obscured by confusion in our received Hebrew text. Fortunately, the versions preserve the original reading. "I will go into battle disguised," he says (v. 30), "but you," he tells Jehoshaphat, "wear my robes!"

The Aramean king has commanded his charioteers to look for the king of Israel, so that Jehoshaphat, dressed as Ahab, is immediately hard pressed, while the real Ahab successfully avoids attention. Soon, however, Ahab is felled by a randomly shot arrow. Both the happenstance of the shot and the arrow's fortuitous penetration of a seam in Ahab's armor (v. 34) are ironic signs of the futility of the elaborate precautions. Micaiah's oracle has been proved authentic, and Ahab will not return to Samaria "in peace" (cf. vv. 27-28).

22:39-40, Summary of Ahab's Reign. This concluding synopsis is from the hand of a Deuteronomistic editor. The reference to Ahab's "ivory house" (v. 39) has been illustrated by the discovery of numerous fragments of carved ivory inlay, once attached to paneling and furniture, in the ruins of Ahab's palace at Samaria (→ Ivory; Samaria, City of).

22:41-53

The Successors of Asa and Ahab

22:41-50, Jehoshaphat of Judah. Jehoshaphat's kingship, like that of his father, Asa (cf. 15:9-15), is evaluated positively by the Deuteronomistic editors. He is said to have finished the job begun by Asa (15:12) of eliminating "male cult prostitutes" (22:46). His only shortcoming was his failure to dismantle the high places. The intent of the cryptic notice in v. 47 may be that Edom was ruled by Judah through a prefect during Jehoshaphat's reign. Evidently it was Jehoshaphat's ambition to revive the Red Sea trade of Solomon's reign, but his fleet seems to have been wrecked while still in port at Ezion-geber. We are also told that he refused an offer from Ahaziah to undertake a joint shipping venture.

22:51-53, Ahaziah of Israel. After this introductory synopsis, with its wholly negative evaluation, the account of Ahaziah's reign continues in 2 Kings 1.

Bibliography

Devries, S. J. 1 Kings. Word Biblical Commentary, 12. Waco, TX: Word, 1985.

Gray, J. I & II Kings: A Commentary. 2d ed. Old Testament Library. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970.

Long, B. O. I Kings. Forms of the Old Testament Literature, 9. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1984.

Montgomery, J. A. Kings. International Critical Commentary. New York: Scribner's, 1951.

Nelson, R. First and Second Kings. Interpretation. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1987.

Robinson, J. The First Book of Kings. Cambridge Bible Commentary on the New English Bible. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972.

2 KINGS

BURKE O. LONG

INTRODUCTION

The Second Book of the Kings is part of an editorial unit that begins with the book of Deuteronomy, includes Joshua, Judges, and 1 and 2 Samuel, and concludes with the books of Kings (→ Deuteronomist; Deuteronomistic Historian). In this final book, the ancient Deuteronomistic historian continues to evaluate his people's experience with the northern and southern monarchies after the death of Ahab (ca. 851 B.C.). The story moves through the destruction of the Northern Kingdom (ca. 722; 2 Kings 17) and comes to rest in the aftermath of Judah's and Jerusalem's demise in 587 (2 Kings 25).

Although the subject of the book is royal history, its theme is the moral and religious failure that led to the loss of national identity and autonomy. In the turmoil that followed Jerusalem's destruction, the Deuteronomistic historian drew a warning from this catastrophe and hinted that hope might be extracted from the favorable treatment accorded Jehoiachin, the last Judahite king, who lived on as a captive in Babylon (2 Kings 25:27–30). (For further information related to 1 and 2 Kings, its sources, literary history, and major themes, see 1 Kings, "Introduction.")

Modern readers confront 2 Kings as an ancient version of history and so must infer the one or more writers' intentions and the ancient readers' reception of the book from the text itself. Historians ask questions about this or that factual event mentioned in the story and collate the biblical versions with scattered extrabiblical evidence. In the last analysis, however, one is left not with history pure and simple, but with historiography, a story told by an author who claims to be bound by the facts rather than free to pick and choose among them, like writers of fiction.

Accordingly, a primary aim of the following commentary is to discern in this story the main transactions between writer and readers, that is, between the Deuteronomistic historian and what scholars assume to have been his ancient audience. Due allowance for modern readers is made as well. The unifying motifs and perspectives of the work, its ruling concepts, its rhetoric of persuasion, all add up to the writer's presentation of a distinctive interpretation of Israel's history. At various points, historical and linguistic information aid in understanding the book's claims. Historical information alone, however, is insufficient to grasp the sense of the literary whole presented to both ancient and modern readers. One needs also to be sensitive to literary matters: compositional techniques, cues, motifs, and allusions that guide readers along certain paths of perception and suggest coherent intentionality in the work. The comments that follow focus on this ancient literary rendering of history that modern men and women in church and synagogue continue to read for self-understanding and inspiration.

COMMENTARY

1:1–10:36

The Divided Kingdom to Jehu's Revolt

The division of Kings into two parts (1 and 2 Kings), with the dividing point in the midst of the reign of Ahaziah, is the work of later editors. In 2 Kings, the Deuteronomistic historian simply continues the synchronistic account of the Divided Kingdom begun at 1 Kings 12.

1:1–18

Ahaziah (ca. 851–849 B.C.)

The reign of Ahaziah was introduced at 1 Kings 22:51–53. Here, the writer records a first event during the reign of Ahaziah (v. 1) and then recounts in 2 Kings 1:2–17 a tradition about Elijah, already known from 1 Kings 17–19; 21 (→Elijah). Typical concluding formulas (2 Kings 1:17b–18) close out Ahaziah's rule.

The Deuteronomistic historian draws a lesson from the king's death. Misguidedly, Ahaziah solicits an oracle from a Philistine god, Baal-zebul (the name means "lord of the flies," perhaps a conscious parody on a Caananite epithet, ba'al zebul, "Prince Baal"). What the king received was a death word spoken by Elijah, prophet of Yahweh (→Baal-zebul; Prophet).

The narrator weaves the action into a fabric of moral combat. An ailing king reaches out first, sending messengers to solicit an oracle from the god of Ekron, one of five Philistine cities, but the God of Israel intervenes and commissions Elijah to intercept the royal emissaries with a prophecy of punishment. Angered, the king then pursues Elijah and, having forgotten his original concern, repeatedly sends royal militiamen to fetch the prophet. His initiative fails disastrously (vv. 9–12), and a Yahweh counterthrust takes over in v. 13. In the end, Elijah repeats his prophecy, and the narrator notes its fulfillment (vv. 16–17; cf. 1 Kings 16:34; 17:16). The king died, just as foretold.

On the one hand, the question, “Is there no God in Israel that you go to inquire of Baal-zebub . . . ?” (JPS; 2 Kings 1:3, 6; cf. v. 16), finds its answer in Elijah’s assault-by-oracle upon a king who has sought other powers. On the other hand, Ahaziah’s question about Yahweh’s prophet, “What kind of man was he who came to you?” (RSV, v. 7), receives its reply in Elijah’s conjury of consuming fire. Like the great contest in 1 Kings 18:20–40, the struggle is between Yahweh and the gods of Canaan and between their respective earthly stand-ins. Ahaziah lost, and the Deuteronomistic historian adds this accounting to the string of apostasies in the Northern Kingdom.

2:1–25

Elisha Succeeds Elijah

Seen in relation to the whole of 1 and 2 Kings, this unit occupies a pausal moment between two regnal periods. Elijah, the champion of Yahwism (i.e., traditional Israelite monotheism) against the Baalists of the Northern Kingdom, departs earth and story, leaving behind a successor to carry on the austere voice of prophetic witness. The Deuteronomistic historian arranged originally independent narratives (now reflected in vv. 1–15, 16–18, 19–22, and 23–24) like itinerary points on ■ map. Elijah and Elisha move from Gilgal to Bethel (vv. 1–2, 3–4) to Jericho (vv. 5–6) to the Jordan River (vv. 7–8a) and cross into the Transjordan (vv. 8b–14). At v. 14b, the direction reverses. Elisha, who is now alone, fords the river back to Jericho (vv. 14b–17, 18–22), whence he moves on to Bethel and beyond (vv. 23–25).

The effect of this ordering of events is to build a certain suspense toward that climactic moment beyond the river when the crack between temporality and eternity opens to Elisha’s sight. At the outset, everybody is aware that Elijah is to be taken away: the readers (v. 1), Elisha, and those members of a prophetic association, the “sons of prophets” (vv. 3, 5; see 2 Kings 6:1). No one, however, knows the time or place. The characters repeatedly suppress conversation about the event while steadily moving toward it. Finally, repeated words and phrases (2 Kings 2:7–8, 14) define a private space beyond the Jordan where one learns for the first time that the departure of Elijah has to do with empowering a successor (vv. 9–10). Suddenly Elijah ascends into the heavens in a visionary whirlwind (v. 11; cf. the similar language of vision reports in Judg. 13:19–21; 2 Kings 6:17). In this visionary space beyond the Jordan and away from bystanders, the prophets confront the power of God, as though containment of the Holy were necessary to bring the power of divinity into the ordinary human realm (cf. the miracles of healing in 1 Kings 17:17–24; 2 Kings 4:33–35; the temptations of Jesus in Luke 4:1–13).

Elisha brings back to the human community Elijah’s power to perform wondrous deeds (2 Kings 2:14–15). The members of the prophetic band seek some assurance, however, that Elisha is really alone and that Elijah will not pop up somewhere to demand his accustomed honor. Their futile search (for a corpse? for Elijah himself?) shows that the succession has taken place and that homage to a new leader is justified. The narrator assures readers of the same point in vv. 19–24. Elisha quickly demonstrates the terrifying power he holds from Elijah and God—for repair of misfortune and for curse.

Elijah’s departure is filled with memory and echo. Like Moses (Deut. 34:6), Elijah leaves the earth without a trace except in the legacy of succession (cf. Deut. 31:7–8, 23; Josh. 1:1–9). The transition from Moses to Joshua marked continuity in Yahweh’s giving of torah (divine teaching) and constancy in covenanted partnership with God. In this later day, the transition from Elijah to Elisha suggests a true and steady voice for allegiance to God in a Northern Kingdom that lives in the shadow of Jeroboam. At the same time, this pausal moment between the reigns and between the two great prophets is a station on the way from that first hint of Yahweh’s victory (1 Kings 19:15–18) to its consummation in a military slaughter inspired by Elisha (2 Kings 9–10).

3:1–10:36

From Jehoram to Jehu

The circumstance that determined the literary organization of this large complex of tradition is that Jehu, ■ military commander in Israel’s army, murdered both Jehoram and the Judean king Ahaziah, thus bringing to an end two regnal periods and launching his own brief rule. The literary problem for the Deuteronomistic historian was to take account of this fateful meeting of three kings and still follow his preferred technique of presenting each regnal period as an enclosed block of tradition, with introductory and concluding summaries. The solution was to begin conventionally with an introduction to Jehoram of Israel (3:1–3), recount events during his time (3:4-8:15), and, without concluding Jehoram's rule, resume the sequence of Judean kings (8:16-24), getting quickly to Ahaziah (8:25-27). Jehu murdered this Judahite while simultaneously revolting against Jehoram of Israel (8:28-9:29). In this way, the historian presents the end of both Jehoram and Ahaziah and the rise of Jehu as an occurrence within the regnal period of Ahaziah. From these circumstances, the writer goes on to recount incidents during Jehu's reign (9:30-10:33) and concludes with the usual summary (10:34-36).

Elisha is placed at or near the center of all these events. Most of what the historian considered relevant to Jehoram's reign is drawn from freely circulating stories or collections of tales about Elisha (3:4-8:15). Even the destructive energies of Jehu are presented as having been commissioned and legitimated by Elisha (9:1-10).

3:1-3, The Regnal Summary for Jehoram.

This summary is typical of most others in the books of Kings (cf. 1 Kings 14:21-24; 2 Kings 13:1-2; the synchronistic date in v. 1 contradicts 1:17—such inconsistencies appear fairly frequently in 1 and 2 Kings and remain an unresolved problem for historians). While condemning the religious loyalties of Jehoram (all northern kings are thus summarily treated), the Deuteronomistic historian nonetheless softens his judgment. Unlike his father and mother, Ahab and Jezebel (cf. 1 Kings 17-21), the king put away the phallic religious object, the stone “pillar of Baal.” The word “baal” means “lord” or “master-owner,” but as a proper name it can refer to various local deities (cf. 1:2) and to a widely revered Canaanite god associated with storms and fertility (→ Baal; Pillars).

3:4-27, The Campaign against Moab.

Although this unit may have undergone extensive development prior to its being included in the books of Kings (cf. 1 Kings 22:1-37), it is now unified around three dialogues (vv. 7-8, 10-12a, 14-15a), a prophetic address (vv. 16-19), and two action sequences (vv. 4-6 and 20-27), which lead into and away from the moments of direct speech. Mesha, king of Moab, rebelled against his overlord, Jehoram of Israel. With his allies, the kings of Edom and Judah, Jehoram wages war against the rebel, but, as v. 27b shows, with less than a clear victory (→ Edom; Moab). Between this main crisis and its qualified resolution, the narrator develops a secondary problem, the lack of drinking water for troops and animals (vv. 9-10). To overcome this threat, Jehoram presses for the aid of a reluctant Elisha, whose double promise of water and military victory leads to a miracle of double duty: water comes to slake the thirst of Israel's forces and to confuse the enemy (vv. 11-20, 22-23).

The narrator builds an invidious contrast between Jehoram and the Judean Jehoshaphat. A man of uncertain devotion, Jehoram put together the expedition against Moab, but when his success was threatened, he decried his fate as though he were a victim of Yahweh, not his chosen hero: “Alas! The LORD has called these three kings [us] to give them [us] into the hand of Moab” (v. 10). Later, Elisha imputes to the king some vestige of his infamous father and mother (v. 13), Ahab and Jezebel, those exemplars of apostasy (see 1 Kings 18-19; 21). In contrast, it is Jehoshaphat who suggests guidance through a Yahwistic prophet (2 Kings 3:11), and it is his merit alone that justifies Elisha's (and Yahweh's) attention. It is a point of Deuteronomistic theology to prefer kings in the Davidic line (cf. 1 Kings 11:36-39; 2 Sam. 7:11-16).

Elisha is portrayed as a defender of true Yahwistic religion after the manner of Elijah, his master. He is the one who “poured water on the hands of Elijah” (2 Kings 3:11) and of whom Jehoshaphat says, “The word of the LORD is with him” (v. 12; cf. 1 Kings 17:24). The narrator notes that “the hand of Yahweh [the rush of divine power] came upon him” (v. 15; cf. 1 Kings 18:46) and depicts events as flowing from prophecy to fulfillment (vv. 16-17, 20-24). This successor to Elijah reproves Jehoram and approves Jehoshaphat. Like his predecessor, he denies to the Northern Kingdom any sort of religious legitimacy.

Yet when the Israelite armies abruptly withdraw from their assault on Kirhareth (2 Kings 3:27), victory is less than clear cut. Following a human “burnt offering” to the Moabite god Chemosh, “great wrath came upon [against] Israel,” and Jehoram's armies withdrew (→ Chemosh). Such sacrifices to appease the anger of the national god horrified the historian (2 Kings 16:3), and he may have understood that the Israelites were gripped with dread at this sight of Moabite devotion—yet another sign of uncertain devotion to Yahweh—and so lost their victory (so several ancient versions, followed by NEB: “The Israelites were filled with such consternation at this sight that they struck camp and returned home”). On the other hand, the tradition upon which the Deuteronomistic historian drew may have implied that the Moabite god accepted the sacrifice and then defended the city, letting loose great terror against Israel. The idea that military success comes from the deity's guiding and protective strength is not only found in the Bible (e.g., Josh. 10:7-11) but is also enunciated by Moabite scribes themselves (→ Moabite Stone, The).

The biblical story speaks, then, with a double voice. Ultimate triumph eludes the Israelites, but Moab is spared final defeat. Yahweh brings about partial victory, but Chemosh too wields power in the world. Nonetheless, for the narrator any contest between Yahweh and the gods is really no contest at all (cf. 1 Kings 18:20-40; 20:26-30). Through Yahweh and Yahweh's prophet, Jehoram achieved some success but without changing God's judgment of the apostate Northern Kingdom.

4:1-44, Miracles of Elisha. Although presented as part of Jehoram's reign, these originally independent traditions (vv. 1-7, 8-37, 38-44) make no mention of the king. Instead, they emphasize Elisha's larger-than-life dealings with ordinary folk and portray him as carrying on Elijah's penchant for rescuing the destitute and the dead (cf. 4:1-7 with 1 Kings 17:8-16; 2 Kings 4:8-37 with 1 Kings 17:17-24). Elisha cares for the hungry just as he did when freshly enlivened with his mentor's spirit (cf. 2 Kings 4:38-44 with 2:19-22). The narratives express adulation for Elisha. In keeping the king apart from these signs of Yahweh's power, the Deuteronomistic writer suggests indirectly that Jehoram is blind to these matters of faith (cf. 6:24-33).

The story of Elisha and the Shunammite (4:8-37) is a centerpiece to the collection of stories in chap. 4. Against a background of the Shunammite's admiration for Elisha (vv. 8-10), the drama encompasses three movements: first, in fulfillment of prophecy, a son is born to this woman who was without child and married to an old man (vv. 12-17); second, the son sickens and dies, creating a crisis for both mother and prophet (vv. 18-25a); third, responding to urgent demands, Elisha intervenes and restores the dead son to life (vv. 25b-35). Dramatic intensity finally drains away in a meeting between the prophet and the woman (vv. 36-37).

In the end, the narrator completes a thematic and structural symmetry. The Shunammite first appeared in deferential respect toward Elisha; she questioned and pleaded, even rebuked him, while demanding his help (vv. 16, 27-28); and now at the end, she falls at his feet in a posture of near worship (v. 37; cf. Gen. 18:2; 19:1; 2 Kings 2:15). In this closing moment, Elisha declares her son restored (2 Kings 4:36b), as earlier he had announced his imminent birth (v. 16). Occurring only as part of the annunciation (vv. 14-17, 28) and restoration (v. 36), this "son" motif spans the narrative's main action. A son is given in promise, lost in sickness, and restored by the mother's pursuit of a holy man's power.

Yet, Elisha's unrivaled claim to center stage is subverted during those moments of pursuit. When the child dies, disturbing the assurances of promise and fulfillment, the woman suddenly emerges as a clearheaded, forceful mother urgently concentrated on rescue. She pushes past every obstacle, including those formalities that kept her standing in the doorway while the men discussed how they might reward her kindness to them (vv. 12-15). Now, on her approach to Mount Carmel, she brushes aside the standard greetings (v. 26), "grabs hold of Elisha's feet," and turns even that gesture of submission (cf. v. 37; 1 Sam. 25:23) into one of assertiveness (2 Kings 4:27). Neither Elisha nor his protocol-conscious servant know what lies behind the woman's headlong intrusion onto Mount Carmel. Elisha is singularly blind: "The LORD has hidden it from me and has not told me" (v. 27).

The Shunammite unwittingly presses an advantage against a prophet whose status has been diminished by ignorance. She calls due a moral chit. Her rebuke (v. 28) and insistence (v. 30a) demand that Elisha accept the moral consequences of his miracle and address the situation personally. Elisha seems to understand, although—still clinging to formality—he speaks nothing directly to the woman. The narrator notes simply that "he arose and followed her" (v. 30b). Readers, however, have been shown a clearheaded mother challenging convention and those who cling to it and extracting from Elisha a direct response he seems not to have entirely wanted.

Events finally vindicate the Shunammite's insistence and restore Elisha to his pedestal (vv. 31-37). By announcing the miraculous birth, Elisha played the part of the wonder worker who dispenses largesse among his patrons. In restoring the son, he merely worked his magic again. Within these conventions, the Shunammite challenges prophetic privilege and wins. She is a victress, even if Elisha does not quite admit her moral claim. Her bowing to the ground in reverence (v. 37) returns to him the status of beloved miracle worker.

Perhaps one should temper admiration for Elisha with the experience of a mother's grief and the knowledge of Elisha's blindness. God did not tell all to his prophet, as readers are made keenly aware. Elisha knows less than he needs to know and does less than he is able to do and surely less than one might expect of a hero. Homage is due this prophet, but not without reservation, for his power and position seem in need of moral restraint.

Verses 38-44 show Elisha fully restored to his accustomed role of miracle worker and beloved master of a prophetic guild. In vv. 38-41, we see him wondrously detoxifying a meal for his disciples in a time of famine (cf. Exod. 15:22-25). In 2 Kings 4:42-44, we see him miraculously feeding one hundred men from what had been only a small amount of food (cf. 1 Kings 17:8-16).

5:1-27, Elisha, Naaman, and Gehazi. In this narrative, Elisha again helps a person in distress, this time a non-Israelite and, ironically, a commander of those armies that so often threatened the Israelite kingdom (see 6:8, 24; 10:32-33; 13:22). Naaman the leprous commander is healed and recognizes Yahweh as the source of his cure (5:15). Gehazi's crass failure to honor this moment draws Naaman's disease onto himself (vv. 20-27). God extends his concern to all the earth (v. 15) and to all human beings who are made in God's image (Gen. 1:26-27). Yet the power of God in the world is not just restorative. It also demands righteousness and is a punishment to those who trifle with it. Perhaps the narrator saw in this story a metaphor for the history of Israel's kingdoms.

The unity of the narrative is best imagined as a series of waves rolling along a line, each bearing energy for the next. One wave carries Naaman from leprosy to cure (2 Kings 5:1-14). A problem emerges as part of the background summary (v. 1) and is resolved by a miracle, as the flesh of this "great man" becomes like that of a "little child" (v. 14).

Borne within this wave is the energy for another. The readers' knowledge that the God of Israel had really given Naaman his success and public reputation (v. 1) stands in ironic contrast to Naaman's intransigently arrogant attitude toward Elisha and the land of Israel (vv. 11-12). Naaman's spirit needs reform as much as his flesh requires healing.

From this point, the writer turns to spiritual transformation (vv. 15-19a). Having been healed (the Hebrew at v. 14 reads literally "his flesh turned back"), Naaman "turns back" to Elisha (v. 15a) and speaks as a convert to Israel's religion (v. 15b). He even wants to reward Elisha for his services. When refused, he insists on a pardon in advance for unavoidable semblances of his old self (bowing, in military duty, to the Syrian god Rimmon) when his heart is truly wed to Yahweh (vv. 17-18; → Rimmon). At the same time, a narrative loop on the level of narrator and reader is closed. Naaman's awareness of the Lord finally converges with that of writer and readers, who already at the outset knew of Yahweh's hand in the Syrian's successes.

A last pulse of energy arises when Gehazi witnesses Naaman's transformation (vv. 19b-27). His latent opportunism drawing encouragement from misapprehension (v. 20), Gehazi sullies this high moment by turning it to self-serving advantage (vv. 21-24). Therefore he stands accused, convicted, and punished for grasping at the very same material outpouring of gratitude that his master refused (vv. 25-27a).

The narrator's final clipped remark draws this tale of reversals and contrasts into a single ironic circle. One recalls Naaman, who was leprous (v. 1), and now reads that Gehazi, who was whole, "went out from his presence, leprous as snow" (v. 27b). Naaman, a foreigner, was healed in body and spirit; Gehazi, an insider, inherits the leper's excludedness (see Lev. 13:45-46).

While Elisha presides in authority and power, a foreign convert affirms the singularity of God (cf. Exod. 18:10-11; Josh. 2:9-11). Next to Elisha, Israel's king seems ineffectual and, next to Naaman, simply uninterested in piety. In this way, the story may indirectly assess Jehoram's reign.

6:1-7, An Axehead Recovered. The tradition in 6:1-7, which follows a common narrative pattern (cf. Exod. 15:22-27; 17:1-7), is one of several brief stories about Elisha that stress in uncomplicated ways his marvelous powers in the service of others (cf. 2 Kings 2:19-22; 4:1-7, 38-44; 13:20-21). The prophet is cast here with "sons of prophets," i.e., members of an established occupational group who "sit before" him (RSV: "dwell under your charge") and who look to him for direction (cf. 4:1; 4:42-44). The narrative seems intended to glorify Elisha, and—like all pious legends—to inculcate attitudes of reverence toward him.

6:8-23, Elisha and the Syrian Threat. In contrast to 5:1-27, this narrative depicts Elisha as an adversary to the Syrians. The enemy king's military campaigns having been continually frustrated (the recurrent sense is strong in 6:8-10), and having at last laid the blame on Elisha, he orders his troops to seize the prophet at Dothan (a strategic point controlling access to the hill country north of Samaria; vv. 11-14). Because Elisha has extraordinary powers and is wrapped in supernatural protection, however, the prophet disarms the personal threat (vv. 18-19) and has the king of Israel send the enemy home with great feasting (vv. 20-23a). With this turn, action that began in Syria returns to its source. A closing comment (v. 23b) notes that the continuing hostilities (vv. 8a; 5:2) had been wondrously dissipated by Elisha's power.

Ironic play on two motifs turns this story toward playful admiration of Elisha. First, there is a double sense of "seeing" in the story. The prophet is a man of preternatural sight. He continually frustrated Syria's bellicose intentions (vv. 8-10), and now the Syrian king—who is limited to natural sight—embarks on a comic quest. He wants to be told the facts plainly: "Will you not show me who of us is for the king of Israel?" (v. 11). The same verb brings a report to the king, "it was told [shown] him . . ." (v. 13). The king's messengers even describe Elisha's early warnings to the Israelites on exactly that level of ordinary military intelligence and with the identical word ("the prophet . . . tells [shows] the king of Israel," v. 12). Later, a similar ironic contrast depicts supernatural against natural perception. Elisha prays that his servant will “see” the unseen heavenly forces that guard him (v. 17), and the menacing Syrian soldiers are struck blind, captured, and made to see again (vv. 18–20). In all this, the narrator takes us through a see-scape: from contrasting Elisha’s “seeing” with the Syrian’s being shown, to blindness supernaturally sent by forces “seen” only by the prophets, to natural sight supernaturally restored. It is no contest. Elisha divulges the secrets and manipulates the players out of his private reservoir of supernatural powers.

The second ironic motif is a contrast between military forces. Syria sends “horses and chariots and a great army” to seize Elisha (vv. 14, 15), but this overwhelming horde faces the visionary “horses and chariots of fire” deployed around the prophet (v. 17). The scene dramatizes panic through the servant’s ordinary sighting of the enemy and then quickly diffuses it in a vision induced by prayer. One sees the protective shield of Elisha and recognizes that the force of Yahweh is concentrated in and about Elisha.

Even the king of Israel must finally submit to this extraordinary power when deciding what to do with the duped prisoners (vv. 21–23). Elisha’s words in v. 22 are difficult. He seems to suggest that when capture has come as a gift of the prophet’s miracle working, the victims are owed their life, perhaps just as obviously as they had been deprived of sight or shown to be without second sight. Such is the power of this prophet in Israel, whom the Syrian army foolishly sought to restrain. Perhaps the narrator is showing his own answer to that question raised by Elijah in 1:3. There is a God in Israel, and Elisha is his prophet.

6:24–7:20, Famine Relieved, Oracle Fulfilled. This is another of the stories that depict Elisha in relation to a continuing Syrian military threat (see 6:8–23; 8:7–15; cf. 5:1). One must assume that the narrator took Jehoram to be the unnamed “king of Israel” in the narrative (6:26). Several known kings of Syria had the name Benhadad, and we do not know that the writer had one specific ruler in mind. In any event, the point seems not to record history so much as to draw moral and religious lessons from historically colored stories.

In the preceding narrative (6:8–23), Elisha is presumed to be on good terms with the Israelite king. Now, having lost all hope during the siege of Samaria, Jehoram blames Elisha for his trouble and despairs of any help from the Lord. In the meantime, unbeknownst to Jehoram, deliverance is wrought by God—just as Elisha prophesied. Thus, two converging sequences of events (breaking the siege and actualizing Elisha’s prophecies) vindicate the prophet’s unwavering confidence in God and dramatize Elisha’s prescience and power.

The trajectory from city under siege to city rescued grows less distinct as the path from prophecy to fulfillment emerges more sharply (7:1–2, 16–17, 18–20 [the last verses may be editorial elaboration]). Yet, the move from word to event is not narrated directly. One wanders through a landscape of four lepers’ comic self-absorption (7:3–10), and the miracle that befuddles leper and king alike and is the cause of Samaria’s relief is revealed to the readers alone—and then only as a secondary comment in retrospect, not as an event witnessed firsthand (7:6–7).

Through this indirect means, the writer portrays, not a miracle, but how various people deal with its aftereffects. The characters themselves remain unenlightened; they bump into cryptic prophecies (the king and his aide, 7:1–2), discover strange happenings (the lepers and the king’s men, 7:8, 15) and offer ill-informed explanations for what they see (the king, 7:12; the Syrian troops, 7:6b). Readers must finally complete the narrative sequence begun in 6:24–25 by inferring that the siege was broken. The narrator notes only that Elisha’s prophecy, which did not look directly to the end of the military campaign, found its fulfillment.

In sum, the narrator and the readers taken into his confidence (7:6–7) see one sequence of events from a point outside narrative time (how the siege of Samaria was broken by a noise sent by Yahweh and how, coincidentally, Elisha foresaw the outcome). Constrained by their finitude, the people embedded in the narrative see another sequence (how a siege camp was abandoned, leaving provisions for the taking, fulfilling Elisha’s word).

Elisha dominates one’s perspective on events. He is calmly prescient (he knows the king pursues him, 6:32; and he knows the famine will end, 7:1–2). It is this power rooted in foreknowledge and insight into God’s ways that the narrator seeks to generate in the readers’ experience (7:6–7, 16–20). From this point of sighting, one admires Elisha and appreciates the humor with which the story has been told.

8:1–6, The Power of Elisha’s Fame. Although v. 1 appears to link this narrative to the Shunammite’s story in 4:8–37, the two traditions may have been originally independent of one another. The Deuteronomistic historian need not have presupposed the death of Elisha, as may seem to be the case, but only the fame of the “great things” attributed to him (v. 4b); in fact, the prophet’s death is reported in 13:20–21, during the reign of Jehoahaz.

The writer implies that even in his absence, when merely talked about by others (vv. 4–6), Elisha helps those in need. He had spun a strand of Elisha’s exploits in chaps. 3–7, and here, within one tiny episode, Gehazi does the same. There is a momentary congruence between the narrators (the Deuteronomistic historian and a narrator-character Gehazi) and their subjects (the king within the story and the readers without). Narrative recollection refracts completely the power of Elisha, as though the mere glow from a flame transmits warmth. The woman receives its benefits (the king restores her property), and even Jehoram—in contrast to some of his other appearances—seems on the side of God's benevolent aid eased into the world.

8:7–15, Elisha, Ben-hadad, and Hazael.

This narrative takes readers back to the larger canvas of political history, against which were set most of the preceding stories about Elisha. The narrator opens a period of severe troubles for Israel at the hand of Hazael and attaches this new beginning to the mysterious inner movements of Elisha's spirit (vv. 10–13). The incident also marks the beginning of fulfillment, for Elisha's predecessor Elijah, speaking for the historian, had already seen the shape of Hazael bulking in the distance and read its meaning as chastisement for an apostate people (1 Kings 19:17).

The narrator builds on a conventional literary pattern: in a situation of distress, a person seeks an oracle from a prophet ("inquire of the LORD"), receives God's answer, and then witnesses its realization (cf. 1 Kings 14; 22; 2 Kings 3). Here, the pattern is modified by dialogue and multiple prophecies (2 Kings 8:11–13) that seem to elaborate and explain an original cryptic oracle (v. 10). Elisha's word to Hazael is ambiguous. One message seems intended for the king: "You [Ben-hadad] shall surely recover." Another is meant for Hazael as information or perhaps wily suggestion: "but the LORD has shown me that he [Ben-hadad] shall surely die." As though foreshadowing biblical interpreters who have struggled with such incoherence or with the moral implications of a prophet who may be suggesting that Hazael deliberately lie, Elisha probes in some trancelike state the ambiguity of his own speech. "He fixed his face, and set [it] until he was ashamed. And the man of God wept" (v. 11).

From this opaqueness springs another modification to the literary pattern—a second dialogue that is, by comparison to vv. 10–11, limpid. Hazael's question about weeping (v. 12a) blends into the specter of gruesome oppression of Israel. In self-abasement, he refuses such worldly glory, and this quickly elicits Elisha's unambiguous announcement "... you are to be king over Syria" (v. 13).

When the narrator tells of events that fulfill that prophecy (vv. 14–15), he seems to suggest that Hazael by violence gave history a little self-serving push. Perhaps he even acted at Eli-sha's suggestion. In any case, one comes to Hazael's accession forewarned, acquainted with his route to power and Elisha's mysterious hand in it. Integrated into the Deuteronomistic history, Hazael will become an external villain, the counterpart to the Baalizing kings and queens who threaten Israel from within. The books of Kings suggest that somehow both are within God's grasp (cf. Isa. 10:5; Jer. 25:9; Gen. 50:20).

8:16–27, Two Kings of Judah. Turning from Elisha to narratives having to do more directly with the kings, the Deuteronomistic historian summarizes the reign of Joram of Judah (8:16–24) and then opens the reign of his successor, Ahaziah (8:25–27). The stage is now set for a major event: Jehu, a rebel from among the Israelite military commanders, comes to power.

8:28–9:29, The Rebellion of Jehu. The process by which underlying sources have been forged into the present narrative is obscure. In its final form, however, readers gradually learn that while Joram lay wounded in Jezreel (8:29), Jehu was chosen to make good Yahweh's prophesied retribution on the house of Ahab (9:1–16). He begins to avenge the transgressions of Ahab and Jezebel by assassinating Ahab's descendant, King Joram of Israel (vv. 17–28). The murder of Ahaziah (vv. 27–28) seems a byproduct of this plot, and, unlike the death of Joram, it is not explicitly interpreted as fulfillment of prophecy.

The Deuteronomistic historian regards these events as a turning point in the history of the monarchy. In Elijah's time, the struggle to preserve an exclusive devotion to Yahweh had been idealized in the confrontation between Elijah and the Baalists—Ahab, Jezebel, and the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18). In that confrontation, a foreshadowing glimpse of the eventual resolution to the conflict was linked to Jehu (1 Kings 19:17–19). Now, as the dynasty of Omri comes to an end, the writer alludes to those older confrontations through repetition of prophecy (cf. 2 Kings 9:7–10 with 1 Kings 21:21–24; 2 Kings 9:25–26 with 1 Kings 21:20–24). Jehu's stirrings in Jezreel begin Yahweh's long foretold judgment on the Omrides.

The twist of narrative plot is set in 9:16 as the paths of Joram, Ahaziah, and Jehu come together at Jezreel. The town was in the north in a valley that separated the central hill country from Galilee, on the road to the east Transjordanian territory. The kings of Israel may have had a palace there (cf. 1 Kings 21:1).

Joram and Ahaziah had fought together at Ramoth-gilead (precise location unknown). Joram had been wounded, and both kings withdrew to the royal lands in Jezreel (2 Kings 8:28– 29). Meanwhile, in Ramoth-gilead (9:1-13), a prophet sent out from Elisha had designated Jehu to be king in Israel and charged him with exacting Yahweh's punishment on the house of Ahab (9:1-10). The selection by a prophet is an old custom (cf. 1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13; 1 Kings 11:29-39). Jehu's fellow commanders offered him open acclamation (2 Kings 9:11-13), and, emboldened by their support, Jehu took up the charge (he coyly downplayed its significance at first) and began to claim his future in conspiracy (vv. 14-16).

Background complete, the writer sets the narrative clock running forward (vv. 17-28). Tension builds around the question of when and how Jehu's murderous design will become known to Joram and Ahaziah and, for readers, what the outcome of Jehu's conspiracy will be. A series of reconnaissance missions (vv. 17-20; note the repeated "Is it peace?") leads into, and defines, the climactic moment when Joram discovers the truth and is murdered (vv. 23-24). Doing the bidding of prophecy and its fulfillment, Jehu disposes of the body (v. 26).

Like an inexorable corollary, Ahaziah's death follows. The narrator closes out the regnal period of Ahaziah in v. 28. (Verse 29 is possibly a scribal correction; apparently understanding that Jehoram of Israel reigned twelve years [3:1] and that Ahaziah ruled for one year [8:26], a scribe has corrected 8:25 "twelfth year of Joram" by writing in 9:29 "eleventh year" so as to allow Ahaziah a full year of rule.) Now that both sitting monarchs are dead, subsequent events will be treated as occurrences fully within the regnal period of Jehu (9:30-10:36).

9:30-37, The End of Jezebel. This narrative tells how Jehu eliminates Jezebel, who is assumed to be both his political and religious opponent. Earlier, Jezebel had been cast as a malignant figure, the powerful queen mother in Israel who is also a Phoenician princess, supporter of Baal worship, and enemy of Elijah (1 Kings 16:31; 18:19; 19:1-2; 21:1-16). Here, she faces Jehu as a queen (the painted eyes suggest royal affluence, not—as in our culture—lurid sexual attraction). Her death, however, is prophecy vindicated (cf. 2 Kings 9:36 with 1 Kings 21:23); it marks Jehu's first step toward the righteous triumph of Yahweh religion over those in Israel who worshipped the Baal of Canaan.

Yet, the queen mother's words flung at Jehu, "Is it peace, you Zimri, murderer of your master?" offer intriguing resonance to the incident. Like Zimri, Jehu was a military commander who "conspired against" and assassinated his king (1 Kings 16:9-10); like Zimri, Jehu moves to eliminate all opposition, and in fulfillment of prophecy (1 Kings 16:11-13). Despite this prophetic justification, Zimri came to his end after only seven days on the throne and failed to win the historian's approval (1 Kings 16:15-19). Jehu will not escape condemnation either, despite the view that his military coup serves God's ends (10:29-31). Thus in recalling Zimri, Jezebel implicitly comments on Jehu. To this extent she not only epitomizes evil for the historian but—like an unwitting prophetess—she presages the mixed moral evaluation of Jehu himself.

10:1-27, Purge of the Baalists. This narrative presents Jehu's action in two phases: first, the murder of Ahab's and Ahaziah's family and supporters—a political act seen as fulfilling a religious aim already prophesied by Elijah (vv. 1-11, esp. vv. 10-11); and second, religious reform in Samaria (vv. 18-27). The incidents in vv. 12-14 and 15-17 are transitions between the two phases.

While these self-contained episodes reflect their original independence, they have been arranged according to a geographic and thematic unity. Jehu moves from Jezreel (vv. 1-11) to Samaria (vv. 18-27), the capital of the Northern Kingdom (cf. 1 Kings 16:24). At the same time, he eliminates political rivals to himself and competition to Yahweh. The move from one place to the other is bridged by two incidents situated "on the way" to Samaria (2 Kings 10:12-14, 15-17).

These transitional reports relate ancillary steps that Jehu took in realizing his transformation from prophet-charged rebel to zealously Yahwistic monarch. Verses 15-17 introduce Jehonadab as witness to Jehu's reforming "zeal for the Lord" (v. 16), and thus announce Jehu's Elijah-like defense of true religion. Just as Jehonadab was bidden to watch, so readers too are asked to take Jehu's ruthless actions as singleminded religious devotion and fulfillment of prophecy (vv. 10, 17).

From Jezreel Jehu first deals with Ahab's "seventy sons" (the number traditionally means the whole family, all the descendants, as in Exod. 1:5; Judg. 8:30). A cleverly worded challenge causes Samaria's leaders to switch their loyalty to Jehu (2 Kings 10:2-5). In response, he asks them to demonstrate their good faith by delivering up the heads of Jehu's rivals. Their compliance and stylized declarations show that this grim exchange represents the substance of negotiated agreement, or covenant, between two parties (cf. Josh. 9:8; 2 Kings 16:7; 1 Kings 20:31-34; Neh. 5:12; Exod. 19:8; 24:3, 7; → Covenant).

Turning to Ahab's supporters in Jezreel (2 Kings 10:8-11), Jehu makes an object lesson of those public reminders of death—which are also the private tokens of newly won political support. The point of the somewhat obscure exchange in v. 9 seems to be, yes, Jehu killed his master, but, inferring from the heap of heads, God alone delivered the kingdom into Jehu's hands. All is made legitimate by citing Elijah's prophecy (v. 10; cf. 1 Kings 21:21-22). Thus justified, Jehu immediately slays those Jezrelean supporters of Ahab (2 Kings 10:11).

The next two scenes (vv. 12-14, 15-17) portray Jehu moving with determination toward Samaria, the control of which will proclaim both physically and symbolically that he is master in the kingdom. Seemingly by chance, Jehu slays "kinsmen" of the Judean Ahaziah ("forty-two" may be a traditional number; cf. 2:24). As Jehu had struck at the Judean kingdom after murdering the Israelite monarch (9:27), so he attacks Judean loyalists after killing those attached to the house of Ahab. In so recording matters, the writer twice raises a disturbing question: will the Davidic line survive this threat posed by Jehu? (See 11:1-20.)

2 Kings 10:15-17 describes a second compact of solidarity with Jehu (v. 15b; cf. vv. 5-6; on "give the hand" as a gesture of fealty, see 1 Chron. 29:24; and, in the context of international treaties, Ezek. 17:18). Jehu invites a newly loyal subject, Jehonadab son of Rechab, to witness Jehu's "zeal for the LORD" (2 Kings 10:16). The expression recalls Elijah's singleminded defense of Yahweh worship (1 Kings 19:10, 14). Whatever Jehonadab's political importance to Jehu (the Rechabites have been connected with riding and chariotry, on the basis of the Heb. root of their name) or whatever his religious allegiances (some think the Rechabites were staunch devotees of an austere Yahwism; cf. Jer. 35:1-19), Jehonadab is made a harbinger of harsh religious reform (→Rechab). As the image of Jehu had been earlier elided with Elijah (2 Kings 9:22-23), so now with Jehonadab as witness, Jehu will show Elijah's characteristic zealotry for a kingdom exclusively devoted to Yahweh.

The final section of the narrative itemizes Jehu's purge of the Baal cult from Samaria (vv. 18-27). Feigning devotion, he calls together the worshipers of Baal, and, in a stageplay calculated to appeal to their expectations that the king supports the national god of Samaria (vv. 18, 23), Jehu orders the people slain. Concluding notes briefly report the destruction of the temple and its sacred objects (vv. 26-27; the "pillar" that was burned may have been the "Asherah," a wooden symbol of Baal's consort [1 Kings 16:33; cf. Deut. 16:21; 12:3]; →Asherah).

Living up to his advanced billing (1 Kings 19:17), fulfilling those execrations that Elijah hurled at the house of Ahab (1 Kings 21:21-29), and undoing precisely what Ahab had put in place (cf. 2 Kings 10:26-27 and 1 Kings 16:32-33), Jehu concludes Elijah's struggle. He embodies the prophetic impulse that shapes events into meaningful history.

10:28-36, Conclusion to Jehu's Reign. The Deuteronomistic historian closes out the time of Jehu with three items: first, theological appraisal, vv. 28-31 (normally these statements are part of a king's opening summary); second, a notice that Jehu gave up territory to Hazael of Damascus (vv. 32-33), implying the fulfillment of Elisha's premonition (8:12; the "Black Obelisk" monument from Nimrud extolls the Assyrian Shalmaneser III, who defeated Hazael in 841 B.C. and collected tribute from Jehu); third, the usual concluding formulas (10:34-36).

The Deuteronomistic historian is of two minds about Jehu. The loss of territory was a consequence of Jehu's religious shortcomings (vv. 31-32), and he persisted in following Jeroboam's ways (v. 29). But his heroic place in the narrative derived from carrying out God's wishes (v. 30). This limited approval, while reported as God's speech, is taken as a prophecy. When it is expressly fulfilled (15:12), it will link subsequent events to God's unseen hand.

11:1-17:41

The Divided Kingdom to Israel's Demise

In this section, the narrator continues the story of both kingdoms during a period of mutual weakness. Steady encroachment on Israelite and Judahite territory eventually led to Assyrian domination of Israel and Judah. The account spans the years from ca. 843 B.C. (Jehu rules in Israel and queen mother Athaliah usurps the throne in Judah) to 722 B.C. (Hoshea of Israel is carried into exile, ending the Northern Kingdom, while Ahaz reigns in Judah, beholden to the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser).

The writer emphasizes Judahite affairs. This comes as an abrupt change, since after the division of Solomon's kingdom in 1 Kings 12, the narrator stressed the northern realm and its waywardness. Here, one lingers over Athaliah (11:1-20), Jehoash (11:21-12:21), Amaziah (14:1-22), and Ahaz (16:1-20). The treatment of Athaliah extends the theme of purging Baalistic and Omride influence to the Southern Kingdom and highlights a concern for theocracy and Jerusalemite Temple protocol (11:4-18). These same issues, which were already evident in 1 Kings 6-9, are also prominent in the presentation of Jehoash (2 Kings 12:4-16, 17-18), Amaziah (14:14), and Ahaz (16:10-18). The rest of the kings appear summarily. Often their reigns are reduced to little more than opening and concluding formulas (13:10-13; 14:23-29; 15:1-38).

11:1–20, Athaliah of Judah (843–837 B.C.).

This account continues the theme of ridding the kingdom of the influences of Ahab and Jezebel. Athaliah was their daughter (8:26); her death is portrayed as necessary to reform in Judah. As Jehu eliminated a Baalist king and exterminated non-Yahweh worship in Israel (chaps. 9–10), so a Judahite Yahwist priest, Jehoiada, executes a Baalist queen mother and—perhaps anticipating the reform of Josiah (23:4–20)—presides over the destruction of Baalism in Judah. At the same time, continuity of David's dynasty, which had been pronounced inviolate by God (2 Sam. 7), was assured.

Despite frequent attempts to postulate that divergent sources have been merged into one account, the narrative is continuous. A brief sketch introduces the villainy of Athaliah (of Ahab's house) and the heroism of Jehoshеba (of David's house through Joram). Then the writer describes, first, the crowning of Joash, the single prince remaining after Athaliah's murderous sweep among the royal sons (2 Kings 11:4–12); second, the nearly concurrent execution of Athaliah, who had been attracted by the clamor of coronation (vv. 13–16); third, the religious purge carried out after her death (vv. 17–19). The narrator concludes with a summary, the very last phrase of which circles back with emphasis to a central event: “for [it was] Athaliah [whom] they slew with a sword [at the] king's palace” (v. 20b; cf. v. 16).

In the first sequence, Jehoiada assembles a military force (the identity of the Carites of v. 4 is uncertain) and makes of it a rank of loyalist guards, bound by covenant oath to protect the young heir apparent. Their orders (vv. 5–8) are not easy to understand. Apparently, both the royal palace and the Temple are to be guarded, but a special contingent is to protect Joash (cf. v. 11). The instructions having been carried out (vv. 9–11), Jehoiada then conducts the coronation ceremony and Joash receives the signs of office (v. 12). The meaning of “testimony” (JPS: “insignia”) is not entirely certain. Many take it to refer to a written, divinely sanctioned warrant for kingship. Customary acclamation follows (cf. 1 Kings 1:39).

These same events are depicted through Athaliah's eyes. Hearing the clamor and seeing the royal celebration, she concludes that her rule has been violated and overthrown. Her cry of protest recalls the shriek of recognition on the lips of her brother Joram as he was about to be slain by Jehu (2 Kings 11:14; cf. 9:23).

Athaliah's death—outside the Temple, thus preserving its sanctity—completes the parallel with events in the Northern Kingdom. As Joram's murder cleared the way for religious reform, so too Athaliah's will lead to pitiless destruction of Baalist elements in Judah.

The basis for reform is a covenant of loyalty, not between soldiers and Jehoiada and sanctioned by God, but between king, people, and the Lord in which the earthly kingdom itself is constituted as the “LORD's people” (vv. 17–20). This Deuteronomistic belief was woven into the fabric of David's dynasty (cf. Deut. 7:6–11; Exod. 19:5; 1 Kings 2:1–4). Here, it authorizes sweeping reform to insure that this “people of the LORD” will be devoted exclusively to Yahweh. Athaliah's religious influence is wiped out with the same zeal as had been attributed to Jehu and Elijah (cf. 1 Kings 18; 2 Kings 9–10). Joash triumphantly processes to his palace seat, to reign over a cleansed nation.

Carrying little more than a patronym, Athaliah is remembered for her Pharaoh-like violence against the young men of Judah. Her reign ended as it began, irregularly, and the narrator recognizes her without the usual opening and concluding formulas that bestow legitimacy upon a monarch. The blood of Israelite apostasy, however, has flowed into Judah—through Ahaziah and his mother Athaliah (8:26–27) and, before that, through Joram his father, who was husband to a daughter in the house of Ahab (8:18). The Deuteronomistic historian views this poison and its purgative seriously, for not since Solomon's lapse (1 Kings 11) had there been such evil to counteract in Judah. Jehoiada's antidote begins a pattern of restoration and renewal that will find its analogies in Hezekiah and Josiah (2 Kings 18–20; 22–23), and its final undoing in Manasseh (2 Kings 21).

11:21–12:21, Jehoash (ca. 837–800 B.C.).

The rule of Jehoash begins and ends with the usual introductory and concluding summaries (12:1–3, 19–21). The narrator reduces a forty-year reign to accounts concerning Temple repairs (12:4–16) and turning aside Hazael's threat against Jerusalem (vv. 17–18). Jehoash is evaluated both positively (v. 2) and negatively (v. 3; cf. the different view in 2 Chron. 24). Repairs to the Temple illustrate his “doing what was right in the eyes of the LORD,” while robbing the Temple treasury merited a punishment of conspiracy against him (2 Kings 12:17–18, 20–21; cf. 1 Kings 15:27–30; 16:9–13; 2 Kings 15:10, 14, 25, 30).

The first report (12:4–16) suggests that the priests ignored the king's orders to make repairs to the Temple with revenues received from their “benefactors” (JPS, vv. 5, 7; RSV: “acquaintances”; the exact meaning is uncertain).

Opposite: Men carrying tribute from King Jehu of Israel to King Shalmaneser III of Assyria; detail of basalt bas-relief on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser, ninth century B.C.

Jehoash then put his own “secretary” in charge of a new system for collecting the funds and carrying out the work (vv. 9–12). The same procedure was used by Josiah, with similar praise noted for the honest workers who managed the funds (22:3–7; cf. 12:15 with 22:7). No new ritual objects were made—all the precious metals went for repairs (12:13–14)—and the priests continued to earn their livelihood from dedicated offerings (v. 16; cf. Lev. 5:15–19). These various details (cf. 1 Kings 7:45–50) suggest what was important about Jehoash: he enforced shared oversight of Temple affairs, diverted substantial sums to the piety of Temple repair, and depended not so much upon the priests as upon the honesty of the workers.

Consequently, it is shocking to read that when Jerusalem was threatened by Hazael (“at that time” [2 Kings 12:17] allows no precise temporal link to the preceding material), Jehoash strips the Temple of its valuables, apparently signifying vassalage to Syria. While saving Jerusalem, this action (cf. v. 18 with 16:7–9) subtracted economic support from Yahwistic religion. The narrator probably understood this tribute as a punishable transgression (v. 20; cf. 20:12–19 with 2 Chron. 28:16–21; Ezek. 23:1–49; Jer. 2:18–19).

13:1–25, Jehoahaz and Jehoash (ca. 816–785 B.C.). In this section, the focus is shifted to Israel and a miscellany of items related to the dynasty of Jehu is presented. The material derives from various sources and seems confusing because both northern and southern kings have identical names, J(eh)oash (vv. 10–13). The first section (vv. 1–13) summarizes the reigns of Jehoahaz and Jehoash with typical introductory and concluding formulas (vv. 1–2, 8–9, 10–13). Remarks in vv. 3–5 follow a schematic pattern of transgression, punishment, plea for help, and divine rescue (cf. Judg. 2:11–16; 3:7–11, 12–30; Deut. 26:7–9; 2 Kings 14:26–27). A second section provides supplementary information in three parts: first, Elisha’s symbolic action, which “prophesies” the terms of Jehoash’s military successes (13:14–19; cf. 1 Kings 11:30–33; Jer. 13:1–11; 19:1–13); second, Elisha’s death (vv. 20–21), which marks his exit from the Deuteronomistic History; third, continual hostilities between Israel and Syria; these statements correlate limited victory with Elisha’s prophecy (vv. 19, 22–23, 24–25).

The purpose of this compilation may be inferred from the writer’s explicit comments in vv. 3–6 and 22–23. Since Jehu had been promised a dynasty to the fourth generation (10:30), the chaos during the regnal years of his sons is presented as a near disaster. Only God’s promise (cf. 15:12), compassion for the people (v. 4b), and, moreover, fidelity to his covenant with the forefathers (v. 23) stood in the way of total collapse. Such generalized reflections make it impossible to identify with assurance any particularities of historical events, such as the identity of the “deliverer” in v. 5 (RSV: “savior”; see 14:26–27). In any case, these commitments were enough to override the sons’ addiction to Jeroboam’s ways (13:2–3, 11) and grant reprieve to the dynasty. Perhaps the revival of a corpse by Elisha’s bones (vv. 20–21) makes a symbolic point about national life that can persist in decay. But God’s patience is not infinite. Israel’s final punishment is only delayed, not avoided, as chap. 17 will make clear.

14:1–22, Amaziah (ca. 800–783 B.C.). The narrator interrupts the summary of Israel’s kings with a more elaborate account of the Judean Amaziah. The usual introductory and concluding formulas (vv. 1–4, 18–22) enclose reports of various incidents during the reign (vv. 5–6, 7, 8–14). Because vv. 8–14 deal largely with Jehoash, a later editor may have added a summary of this Israelite’s reign as well (vv. 15–16; cf. 13:12–13).

Amaziah is remembered for his revenge against those who murdered his father (14:5; cf. 12:20), his assault against Edom in the Valley of Salt, probably at the southern end of the Dead Sea (v. 7), and his disastrous attempt at warring with Jehoash of Israel (vv. 8–14).

The writer claims that Amaziah was good (v. 3), but not good enough. The king perpetuated the “high places,” those ancient countryside shrines scorned by the Deuteronomistic writer (v. 4; → High Place). Even though scrupulous about some commandments in the teaching of Moses (v. 6; cf. Deut. 24:16), Amaziah nearly destroyed Judah by his foolish actions (2 Kings 14:8–14). For that, he suffered his father’s fate, a murderous conspiracy (v. 19).

Verses 8–14 suggest, however, that Amaziah’s poor showing redounds to the glory of Jehoash and the continued success of Jehu’s dynasty. The writer gives no motivation for Amaziah’s challenge to Jehoash, “Come, let us look each other in the face” (v. 8; the idiom means to “confront one another in battle”; cf. v. 11). Instead, one is induced to accept Jehoash’s fable with its application to Amaziah as correct (vv. 9–10; cf. Judg. 9:7–15). Owing to his defeat of the Edomites, Amaziah is swollen with self-intoxicating ambition, and he risks the kingdom for his own glory (v. 10; cf. the nonmoralistic motivation attributed to Amaziah in 2 Chron. 25:6, 10, 13). Not only is he unlike David (2 Kings 14:3), but Amaziah foolishly challenges a royal house that is sustained by God to its fourth generation and protected by the age-old promise to the patriarchs (10:30; 13:23). Naturally, disaster follows. Amaziah loses decisively to Jehoash, and the Temple treasury is again depleted (v. 14). In this matter, besides suffering death by conspirators, Amaziah "did in all things as Joash his father had done" (v. 3; cf. 12:17-18).

14:23-15:38, The Kingdoms from Jeroboam II to Ahaz. In this section, the narrator compresses some fifty years into a rapid summary of eight overlapping regnal periods, two from Judah and six from Israel. Brief notes, heavily interpreted with theological commentary, suffice to represent the accomplishments of various monarchs (e.g., 14:25; 15:5; 15:10). As usual, formulaic opening and concluding summaries delineate discrete periods of time: Jeroboam II, ca. 785-745 B.C. (14:23-29); Azariah (Uzziah) of Judah, ca. 783-742 (15:1-7); Zechariah and Shallum, ca. 746-745 (15:8-16); Menahem, ca. 745-736 (15:17-22); Pekahiah, ca. 736-735 (15:23-26); Pekah, ca. 735-732 (15:27-31); and Jotham of Judah, ca. 742-735 (15:32-38).

The writer presents the final years of Israel, with a sidelong glance at Judah, as a period of chaos, assassinations, and foreign intervention. Through it all runs a current of divine energy that is visible in moral judgment and prophecy fulfilled (cf. a similar summary at 1 Kings 15:1-16:28). Jeroboam II expanded the borders of Israel "according to the word of the LORD" (2 Kings 14:25-27); Azariah of Judah (called Uzziah in 15:13, 32) was struck with leprosy from the Lord, presumably a punishment for not removing the "high places" (15:4-5); so too Zechariah lost the kingship to Shallum—thus ending the prophesied four generations of Jehu's house (15:9-12). Not all the kings' fortunes are thus glossed, but the overall impression is unmistakable. Both Israel and Judah are at risk in this perpetual chaos—Israel because its kings persisted in the ways of Jeroboam I; and Judah, because its kings kept those country shrines even while maintaining political stability and otherwise "doing what was right in the eyes of the LORD." In this, the writer looks to the eventual demise of both kingdoms. On the nearer horizon, the writer anticipates the influence of Tiglath-pileser (15:29) and the troubles from a military assault on Judah (15:37).

16:1-20, Ahaz of Judah (ca. 742-727 B.C.). The regnal period of Ahaz is introduced and concluded with standard formulas (vv. 1-4, 19-20). Within this framework, the narrator represents the king's rule with two incidents: first, a threat on Jerusalem that Ahaz turned away by concluding an alliance with Assyria (vv. 5-9) and, second, extensive alterations to the Jerusalem Temple according to Ahaz's command and Assyrian custom (vv. 8-18). Tucked away inside the first account is a brief mention of Edomite incursions on Judah's southern territories (v. 6).

Apparently, the narrator meant one to judge Ahaz's actions negatively. Noteworthy is the allusion to moral infection from the northern kings and the nations round about (vv. 3-4). Ahaz "walked in the way of the kings of Israel" (RSV), and (the language becomes emphatic) he "even consigned his son to the fire, in the abhorrent fashion of the nations that the LORD had dispossessed before the Israelites" (JPS). Only Jehoram and his son Ahaziah among Judah's kings were similarly aligned with northern monarchs (8:18, 27). And only Manasseh, who will be blamed for Judah's eventual downfall (21:10-15), is similarly condemned for following the customs of those dispossessed Canaanites (21:2-9; cf. 17:29-33). The narrator measures Ahaz by the scale of the Israelite kings, who could do no right, and of Manasseh, whose wrongdoing brought an end to the Davidic house.

Ahaz's action in vv. 5-9 recalls Menahem of Israel (15:17-20; cf. 1 Kings 15:15-20). Jerusalem is threatened by a coalition of Israelite and Syrian forces. (Isa. 7-8 reflects the same circumstances, and 2 Chron. 28:5-21 offers a very different version of events.) Like Menahem, who bargained with Assyria to stave off his own destruction (2 Kings 15:19-20), Ahaz calls upon Assyria to help him maintain a hold on Judah. The narrator clearly envisions a treaty in vv. 7-9, and Ahaz seals the pact with riches drawn from the Temple treasury. The alliance saved Jerusalem but at the cost of lessening the monarch's independence and the wealth of the kingdom and of the Temple. The price would have been too high for the narrator, who likened Ahaz to the hated northern kings.

Moreover, Ahaz does not dislodge the Assyrian influence from the heart of his kingdom. The king orders alterations to the Temple in Jerusalem (vv. 10-18) and thus foreshadows those innovations in worship in Manasseh's time that the Deuteronomistic historian will condemn without compromise (21:2-9). Ahaz oversees the religious establishment (vv. 11, 16) and, like Solomon, builds and furnishes a Yahwistic shrine (cf. 1 Kings 7-9; cf. the "bronze altar" of vv. 14-15 with 1 Kings 8:64). But he uses Assyrian blueprints.

The historian viewed these events in a negative light. Ahaz called for aid from the very power that had already ravaged the Northern Kingdom. He corrupted Temple worship in Jerusalem with an altar of Assyrian design and introduced changes in the Temple furnishings "because of the king of Assyria" (v. 18). In short, Ahaz lived by the standards of others and placed Judah on a surface slipping toward destruction.

17:1-41, Hoshea of Israel (ca. 732-723 B.C.). This section recounts the destruction of the Northern Kingdom—an event that has been anticipated repeatedly by the writer—and explains the religious failures that led to catastrophe. The chapter is a good example of how the writer construed historical events with theological and didactic purposes foremost in mind (cf. Josh. 23-24; 1 Sam. 8; 2 Sam. 7; 1 Kings 12:25-33; see “Introduction”).

Though scholars disagree on the details, it seems likely that the traditions have undergone editing and supplementation. The resultant text, however, is coherent in its larger outline. Hoshea's rule opens with the usual formulaic summary (2 Kings 17:1-2; the evaluation of the king is severely abbreviated) and moves to a report concerning the demise of the Northern Kingdom (vv. 3-6). This is followed by an extensive explanation of the reasons for its fall (vv. 7-23a). Narrative flow resumes at v. 24 with an account of resettlement in Samaria (vv. 24-32; v. 33 is a summarizing conclusion expressing continuous action, “the LORD they [repeatedly] worshiped, and their gods they [continuously] served after the fashion of the peoples . . .”). A final section stops temporal sequence again and offers commentary on the situation in Samaria (vv. 34-41). Hoshea receives no concluding summary.

As in other spaces between regnal periods when he interrupts the flow of time, the writer fills this pausal moment with material of great thematic consequence (cf. 1 Kings 2:12b-46; 12:1-20; 2 Kings 2:1-25). Here, one reads a doubly phased theological commentary on the fate of the two kingdoms.

First, the transgressions of Jeroboam are like a systemic poison that runs through Israel's lifeblood, ending in death (17:7-18, 21-22; cf. 1 Kings 12:26-32; 13:33-34; 14:1-18; 15:29; 16:7; 2 Kings 9:6b-10). The people worshiped other gods (RSV: “fear” [v. 7] does not mean psychological terror but attitudes of reverence bound to actions of obedience; see Deut. 4:10; 5:29; 6:24); they “sinned against the LORD their God” (2 Kings 17:7, RSV); that is, they “transgressed” against the teaching, the torah, of God by carrying out prohibited religious practices (vv. 9-11) despite warnings by the prophets (vv. 7, 13; cf. Jer. 3:12-14; 7:3). Israel indeed “rejected his [God's] statutes and his covenant which he made with their fathers” (a reference probably to the Sinai covenant, which bound God and Israel into a partnership of command and obedience [Exod. 19:4-6]); they chased after “useless things” or “delusion,” perhaps meaning the religious habits of nations round about (2 Kings 17:15; “false idols” in RSV is misleading; JPS: “delusion” or KJV: “vanity” are better choices); they made molten calves (the archetypal image of apostasy, recalling Exod. 32 and 1 Kings 12). In short, led astray by King Jeroboam, the people did all manner of things that implied a diluted loyalty and weakened attachment to Yahweh (2 Kings 17:16b-17, 21-22; cf. Deut. 18:10). Thus, retributive destruction came upon a misguided kingdom.

The writer also mentions the Southern Kingdom and suggests that Judah—like its most recently cited king, Ahaz (2 Kings 16:3)—will go the way of Israel (17:13, 19-20). In fact, many of the faults attributed to the Northern Kingdom are elsewhere associated explicitly with the Judahite monarchs, e.g., burning incense, divination, sacrifice by fire, worshiping the “hosts of heaven” (vv. 16-17).

A second phase of comment reveals the persistence of just those “sins” cut off by the Assyrian invasion (vv. 24-33) and radically extends the duration of this condition into the writer's own day (vv. 34-41). Resettlement of the devastated kingdom brings with it comic malfeasance. Brought from cities in Babylonia and Syria whose locations are not altogether certain, strangers to the land bring god-strangers from foreign lands (only Nergal, god of the underworld [v. 30] can with certainty be identified). Ironically, the settlers (who probably bear no relation to the “Samaritans” of the Second-Temple period) must be taught true religion by a Yahwistic priest brought out of exile. But the instruction fails, and confusion persists. The people simply add the worship (“fear”) of Yahweh to that of their own gods. In short—and here the writer's irony is evident—they replicate the transgressions of the Israelites before them and especially Jeroboam, who, like them, was accused of appointing “all sorts of people as priests” (2 Kings 17:32; cf. 1 Kings 12:31). Further commentary (2 Kings 17:34-40) reiterates that the broken “covenant” persists even to the writer's own times (v. 41b).

Israel lost its soul and after that its land and after that its identity. A similarly lost and confused offspring peopled Samaria in the aftermath. With the destruction of Israel went the loss of that Deuteronomistic ideal of one people, one God, and one covenant. From the vantage point of the Deuteronomistic historian who wrote after Judah's own collapse in 587 B.C. (chaps. 24-25), this event in Hoshea's rule is both explanation and warning for those Judeans who must endure their own exile, learn from their mistakes, and accept the claim that their kinsfolk's misdeeds have been their own. Deliverance follows upon true religion or “fear of Yahweh” (v. 39).

Later in the story, Hezekiah will be presented as a king who takes this lesson to heart (chaps. 18-19). He wholly trusts Yahweh, and for this singular steadfastness he and Jerusalem will be delivered from the grasp of the same Assyrian foes who conquered Hoshea and the Northern Kingdom (the verb translated “deliver” in v. 39 is the same as in 18:30-35).

18:1–25:30

The Last Days of Judah

The narrator now turns to the Southern Kingdom with a fixed gaze on its coming destruction in 587 B.C. The writer had already discretely anticipated this eventuality in 1 Kings 8:23–53; 9:3–9; and 2 Kings 17:19–20. Now the matter presses with overt references (20:16–19; 21:10–15; 22:15–19; and 23:26–27). A series of eight monarchs, each set within his regnal period and framed with the usual introductory and concluding summaries, spans some 140 years from Hezekiah (ca. 727–698) to the last Judahite king, Zedekiah (ca. 597–587). The writer wrestles with the reality of failure and explains in theological terms this catastrophic end to the covenanted nation, the throne of David, and the Temple of God. Despite the faithfulness of Hezekiah and Josiah (18:3; 22:2), the transgressions of Manasseh and the peoples whom he led astray (21:1–9) could not be overcome save by purging the body politic “as one wipes a dish, wiping it and turning it upside down” (21:13; cf. 23:26–27).

The books of Kings close with devastating frankness. Even those left in Judah under a Babylonian-appointed Judahite governor do not escape continued turmoil (25:22–26). Oddly, it is a Babylonian who provides an image of healing in this landscape of despair. Evil-merodach “raised the head of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from prison,” and granted him special privileges among the vanquished kings in Babylon (25:27–30).

One should not claim too much for this note of grace. Perhaps the narrator wrote his account because he envisioned some future for a people in exile or a remnant in Judah. In that case, his voice may be heard in Gedaliah’s: “. . . dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you” (25:24; cf. Jer. 29:1–7).

18:1–20:21

Hezekiah (ca. 727–698 B.C.)

Framed within typical introductory and concluding formulas (18:1–8; 20:20–21), the writer represents the reign of Hezekiah with at least four originally independent accounts: first, exile of the Northern Kingdom (18:9–12), which essentially recapitulates 17:3–6; second, Sennacherib’s invasion of Judah and the survival of Jerusalem (18:13–16; 18:17–19:37; many scholars think that these two units were originally separate and may even have referred to different occasions); third, Hezekiah’s illness, with an oracle of recovery (20:1–11); fourth, Hezekiah’s involvement with Babylon and Isaiah’s announcement of troubles (20:12–19).

The literary history of these materials and their relation to historical events has been much debated, and there remains no consensus. Chaps. 18–19 seem most difficult. Scholars have seen multiple versions of one invasion or two invasions refracted in several traditions. It is also difficult to match the information contained in chaps. 18–19 with that in the parallel tradition of Isaiah 36–37 and with an Assyrian inscription that mentions Sennacherib’s invasion of Judah (→ Sennacherib).

However one decides these matters, it is clear that the writer produced an idealized portrait of Hezekiah. (The idealization is carried much further in 2 Chron. 29–32.) What mattered most about the Assyrian invasion was that Jerusalem was not taken and that the eventual demise of Judah had been forestalled. For this, Hezekiah’s piety gets the credit (2 Kings 18:5–6; 19:1–20) and Sennacherib’s prideful blasphemy, the blame (19:4, 16, 21–28). Even the full twenty-nine years accorded to Hezekiah (18:2) results from the king’s faithfulness, for in his fourteenth year God grants him fifteen more years to rule (20:6). In the end, however, Hezekiah’s open trafficking with a Babylonian king, Merodach-baladan, elicits an oracle of doom—as though a transgression against God was in need of requital (20:12–19). However admirable a priest-king, Hezekiah’s deeds were not sufficient to remove entirely the threat of losing everything to the Babylonians (20:17).

18:1–12, Hezekiah. In this section, we are first given the standard data about the king—the date of his accession relative to the reign of his counterpart in the Northern Kingdom and his age upon assuming the throne (vv. 1–2). Verses 3–9, however, give an unusually positive evaluation of his reign: Hezekiah’s reforms made him one of the Deuteronomistic historian’s few heroes. This faithful and devoted monarch even destroyed the bronze snake that, though cast by Moses (see Num. 21:4–9), had become an occasion for idolatry (v. 4; → Nehushtan). The result, as Deuteronomistic theology would lead one to expect, was national independence and military success for Judah under this obedient king (vv. 7–8). This stands in marked contrast to the fate of the perfidious schismatics of the Northern Kingdom, exiled for their willful violation of the covenant and commandments of Moses (vv. 9–12).

18:13–19:37, The Siege of Jerusalem.

Many scholars believe that 18:13–16 originally had nothing to do with 18:17–19:37 and that, moreover, the latter consists of two different versions of the same incident, 18:17–19:8 and 19:9–37. Nevertheless, the text coheres around a single thematic opposition: the confidence of the Assyrians (focused in the Rabshakeh, an Assyrian officer speaking for Sennacherib) contrasted with the narrator's view that the Assyrians blaspheme and mock Yahweh (focused in the words of Hezekiah, 19:4, 16, and the prophet Isaiah, 19:21–28, esp. vv. 22–23). If the Rabshakeh's words mark him as a blasphemer (18:33; 19:12; in v. 25, he even claims to have been sent by Yahweh himself), then Hezekiah's words imply a deep faith in God (18:3–4, 15–19; cf. 20:3). In short, Hezekiah exemplifies exactly the quality of spirit that the writer mentioned in his introductory summary (18:5–6). Through this theological lens, the siege of Jerusalem sharpens into an archetypal struggle between the powers of unfaith and faith, personalized in Sennacherib and Hezekiah, respectively.

A conventional scene sets the stage in 18:13–16 (cf. 12:17–18; 14:14; 16:8–9; 1 Kings 14:25–26). Presumably in response to Hezekiah's rebellious acts toward Sennacherib (2 Kings 18:7), the Assyrian armies invade Judah, and Hezekiah sues for peace (v. 14). The massive tribute that, incidentally, marked Hezekiah as a temple robber like some of his predecessors, does not appease the invaders. Sennacherib moves to destroy Hezekiah's independence altogether.

The Rabshakeh's first mission comes in two phases (18:19–25, 28–35). Its central theme is the trust that has been placed in Egypt and Yahweh, neither of whom—the Assyrian claims—can bring about deliverance. A key word, “rely” or “trust” and its associated noun, “confidence,” link the entire rhetorical play to the writer's image of Hezekiah, who utterly “relied upon” God (18:5; cf. vv. 19, 20, 21, 22, 30). Rabshakeh hopes to induce Hezekiah, or if not him, the people, to switch allegiances and put their “trust” in the Assyrians (vv. 31–35).

The second diplomatic mission (19:9b–13), this time presented as an exchange of letters, draws down this subject matter to the ideas most evident in 18:29–32 (cf. “deliverance” in 19:10–11 with 18:29–30, 33–35; cf. “gods of the nations” in 19:12 with 18:33–35). This cross-reference of motifs amounts to a new emphasis. Readers hear the Rabshakeh's second burst of bravado with Hezekiah's characterization of it in mind. It is “mockery” of the living God (19:4, 16 bracket Rabshakeh's words in vv. 10–13). Thus, the good and pious king exposes a fundamental theological issue implied in human action and words. God is defamed, and his reputation must be defended or avenged. That is precisely what Hezekiah asks for (19:19) and what the outcome of events will demonstrate (19:29–37).

The narrator develops images of an ideal prophetocracy, a people governed by God through a faithful king guided by a prophet whose words from God do not fail (cf. prophecy fulfilled, 19:7, 35–37). Nothing less than the voice of God confirms this perspective

(19:20–34). The poem in 19:21–28 (which may have been drawn from another source) now functions as prophetic oracle and, by implication, ridicules Sennacherib for denigrating the Holy One of Israel. In an ironic turnabout, Sennacherib is put on trial for exaggerating his own self-reliance in contrast to Hezekiah who relies on God (in 19:22–23 the verbs “mock” and “revile” are those that Hezekiah used in vv. 4–5 and 16).

These heroes and anti-heroes play out a cosmic struggle between the gods. Not surprisingly, Hezekiah's petition (19:15–19) conforms to the stylized epic form associated with the great prophet Elijah, who similarly defended Yahweh and asked that God himself appear among all the peoples (cf. 19:19 with 1 Kings 18:37; see also 1 Kings 20:28; 2 Kings 5:15).

20:1–11, Hezekiah's Illness. This tradition may have originally been independent of its present context, since v. 6 implies that Jerusalem has not yet seen its victory. Relative to chaps. 18–19, however, the incident amounts to a flashback in which the narrator fills an ellipsis in the earlier sequence of events (the phrase “in those days” in v. 1 makes only the vaguest temporal association with the preceding passage).

The narrator remains fixed on Hezekiah's piety, but by including divine recognition and personal reward, he “canonizes the saint” while rehearsing his deeds. Facing an oracle that he would not recover from illness, the king weeps bitterly and recalls his faithfulness to God's ways (v. 3; his words are similar to those of the Deuteronomistic writer who routinely evaluates all kings in the introductory summaries). Seized by a new oracle, Isaiah delivers a promise of deliverance (vv. 5–6).

The oracular language invokes Davidic ideals (see 2 Sam. 5:2; 6:21; 7:8; 1 Kings 1:35; 8:16–21). Moreover, God declares that Hezekiah's and Jerusalem's deliverance (the verb “deliver” recalls 2 Kings 18:33–35; 17:39) will be “for my own sake and for the sake of my servant David” (20:6b). Forthwith, healing begins, and Isaiah, as though cut from the miracle-worker mold of Elijah and Elisha, orders curative action (v. 7). The theological issue of defending God and the kingdom that had been promised to David for all time (2 Sam. 7), however, overwhelms simple medical arts. Hezekiah's goodness is singled out for reward, but the importance of that linkage is quickly subsumed under grander principles—the reputation of God and the sanctity of David's (God's) kingdom (20:6). The viewpoint fits perfectly with 19:34.

Given these associations, a miraculous “sign” that the prophecy may be relied upon seems anticlimactic (vv. 8–11). Yet, human understandings and kings are weak. Perhaps the writer is ambivalent in his approval of Hezekiah, who proved unable to save Judah from its ultimate fate after all.

20:12–21, Envoys from Babylon. Before Sennacherib's assault on Jerusalem, Merodach-baladan ruled in Babylon (→ Merodach-baladan). This fact and the imprecise temporal connective, "at that time," shows again how little the writer cared for strict chronology. By including this tradition at the end of Hezekiah's rule, he seems to suggest another "sign" wherein a prophet reads some incident as a cipher of God's intentions (cf. 2 Kings 13:18–19; visions too are taken similarly, e.g., Jer. 1:11–14; 24:1–9).

The details are somewhat obscure. Receiving the Babylonian envoys with open arms, Hezekiah "shows" them the privy treasures of Judah. The language is emphatic, as though the tour alone were tantamount to concluding a treaty with a foreign power (cf. 1 Kings 20:1–6). Isaiah disapproves and announces God's punishment (2 Kings 20:16–18). Resigned to judgment, Hezekiah suggests that such an ignoble end is the price to be paid for short-term "peace and security" (probably through an alliance with Babylon).

In the end, Hezekiah's heroic size is trimmed a bit. Trust in God, which put him on rank with David, will be insufficient to counteract the flagrant evils of others in the Davidic line. Cast as a prophecy of punishment for Hezekiah, Isaiah's words (vv. 17–18) allude to Judah's tragic end as well (cf. 2 Kings 17:18–19).

The section concludes with a summary (2 Kings 20:20–21) of Hezekiah's reign.

21:1–26

Manasseh and Amon (ca. 697–640 B.C.)

In this section, the writer rapidly summarizes the reigns of two Judean kings, Manasseh (ca. 697–642) and his son Amon (ca. 642–640). Only one "event" is mentioned, a conspiracy against Amon reported in stereotypical form (vv. 23–24; cf. 15:10, 14, 25, 30). The rest of the chapter consists of introductory and concluding formulas for each king (21:1–2, 17–18, 19–22, 25–26) and a lengthy theological review of Manasseh's religious failings (vv. 3–16). This parade of sins greatly expands the evaluative element that is normally included in a king's introductory summary (cf. for Amon, vv. 20–22). Unmoored from its usual berth, the review is comparable in importance to the homily on Israel's demise (17:7–23), the enumeration of Solomon's many women and many gods (1 Kings 11:1–13), and the appraisal of Jehu (2 Kings 10:28–31; cf. similar summaries in Judg. 2:11–15; 3:7–8).

The writer catalogs Manasseh's actions—they correspond to all the condemned deeds attributed elsewhere to Judean kings—and likens him to the northern apostate, Ahab (v. 3; cf. 8:18, 27). The writer also anticipates in virtually every detail those things that Josiah will do to counteract Manasseh's influence (21:3a = 23:8b; 21:3b = 23:4; 21:4–5 = 23:12; 21:6a = 23:10; 21:6b = 23:24; 21:7 = 23:6). Manasseh's deeds, moreover, will be cited as a kind of benchmark for disasters in times to come (23:26–27; 24:3–4).

Obviously, Manasseh is a key figure in the larger Deuteronomistic story. Whatever else might have been reported about his reign (its fifty-five years surpassed those of any other Judean, and one has a less hostile impression of him from 2 Chron. 33 and Assyrian inscriptions), Manasseh is memorialized as the cause of Judah's failure. He is even more wicked than the Amorites (v. 11), whom tradition remembered as having been driven from the land covenanted to Israel (Josh. 24:15; Judg. 6:10). Thus the announcement of judgment, imitating prophetic speech, is irrevocable (2 Kings 21:10–15). Even Hezekiah and Josiah, antecedent and succedent foils to Manasseh, cannot undo the effects of his transgressions (23:26–27; 24:3–4).

Unmistakably, Judah is on a course of self-destruction. One should expect no change in God's purpose, if prophecy is to have its fulfillment. And in the books of Kings prophecy is always fulfilled.

22:1–23:30

Josiah (ca. 639–609 B.C.)

Within the typical introductory and concluding summaries (22:1–2; 23:28–30) the writer epitomizes the rule of Josiah by recounting pious action during the king's eighteenth year (22:3–4; 23:23). The writer assembled materials from various sources and, with generous use of stereotyped vocabulary, shaped them into a coherent account of religious reform: first, Josiah repaired the Jerusalem Temple, following the procedures established by Jehoash (22:4–7 [cf. 12:9–16]); second, a "book [scroll] of torah" is found in the Temple, which stimulates renewed commitment to God and his teachings (22:8–23:3); third, on this basis, Josiah commands and personally carries out reforms in the south (23:4–14), north (23:15–20a), and in Jerusalem, with its renewed Passover festival (23:21–23). More general statements and commendations conclude the account in 23:24.

This text has been crucial to a number of debates among historians. Taking the "book of torah" as essentially equivalent to Deuteronomy 12–26 and 28, literary historians date Deuteronomy close to the reign of Josiah and, from this conclusion, go on to assign relative dates to other documents that make up the first books of the Bible (→ Deuteronomy; Sources of the Pentateuch). Historians of politics and religion look upon Josiah's actions as important but cannot easily establish the sequence of historical events and correlate the version in 2 Kings with 2 Chronicles 34–35.

These matters aside, it is clear that as presently arranged, the rule of Josiah draws into itself thematic strands from the larger Deuteronomistic History. The account has its formal antecedents in Hezekiah, Jehoash, and Jehu (2 Kings 18; 12; 9–10). Its details refer to other reports of the reform of worship: the "high places" of Solomon and Jeroboam (23:13; cf. 1 Kings 11:5; 7; 23:15; cf. 1 Kings 12:32); the altar of Manasseh (2 Kings 23:12; cf. 21:5); actions of former but unnamed kings (23:4, 5, 10–12, 19). Also, some narrative elements were anticipated in earlier material: Josiah's Temple renovation (22:4–7; cf. 12:9–16); the oracle guaranteeing Josiah a fitting burial (22:20; cf. 1 Kings 14:13); the renewed commitment to torah and covenant (2 Kings 23:1–3; 11:17); centralization of worship in Jerusalem (23:8; cf. 18:4); setting aside the wrongs of Jeroboam, formulated as prophecy-fulfilled (23:15–20; cf. 1 Kings 13:1–3).

This Deuteronomistic system of cross-referencing interprets Josiah's reign as a time of convergence and culmination. The transgressions of those who went before, especially Jeroboam and his corrupting effects upon Judeans, are put right (23:4–12). Even the wrongs of Solomon, whose allegiance tilted toward the gods of his foreign wives (cf. 1 Kings 11:1, 5), are corrected (2 Kings 23:13). Josiah reaffirms the book of torah (22:8, 11) as the heart of the body politic, as David himself had exhorted it must be (1 Kings 2:3), only to have his hopes undone by Solomon (1 Kings 11:11). Josiah commands the people to "keep Passover as written in this book of the covenant" (2 Kings 23:21). This memorial to the Exodus from Egypt (Deut. 16:1–8) had never been properly observed, that is, celebrated in Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:9), by any of Josiah's predecessors (but cf. 2 Chron. 30:13–27).

A concluding remark in 2 Kings 23:25 praises Josiah for turning back to God (cf. the language of Deut. 6:5). Josiah perfectly fits the writer's image of an upright king. He reacts to hearing the book of torah in repentance and mourning ("rent his clothes," 2 Kings 22:11; cf. 19:1). In a highly stylized Deuteronomistic oracle (22:16–20) the prophetess Huldah announces a personal reprieve because of his penitence (cf. 20:5–6; 1 Kings 21:28–29). Like no king before or after, he acts "according to the torah of Moses" (2 Kings 23:25), identified here with the "book of the covenant" found by Shaphan (22:8; 23:2). The claim of Josiah's sin-gularity need not be taken literally (cf. 2 Kings 18:5; Deut. 34:10). The writer suggests that Josiah lives up to the standard set by King David, who similarly was said to have lived by the "torah of Moses" (1 Kings 2:3; cf. 9:4).

Yet, for all his exemplary qualities, Josiah cannot overcome the fateful repercussions of Manasseh's transgressions (2 Kings 23:26–27; 21:10–16). All reformers, though floodlit for a time in praise, move offstage in more subdued light: Jehu (10:28–33), Jehoash (12:17–18), Hezekiah (20:12–19). Not even this last and most celebrated reformer can reverse God's judgment (23:26–27). In a system of moral tit-for-tat, Yahweh himself seems bound by the rules—unless, of course, the kindness that will be shown to Judah's last Davidic king (25:27–30) hints at God's freedom to initiate action also, for his own sake.

23:31–25:30

The Last Kings of Judah

In this section, the Deuteronomistic historian recounts the collapse of Judah's political and religious vitality, which, for him, was necessarily centered on the royal Temple in Jerusalem. With customary formulas, readers move through the reigns of four kings: Jehoahaz (ca. 609 B.C.; 23:31–35); Jehoiakim (ca. 608–598; 23:36–24:7); Jehoiachin (ca. 598–597; 24:8–17); Zedekiah (ca. 597–586; 24:18–25:7). It was during Zedekiah's rule that the Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem and its Temple and exiled its leaders (25:8–21). The writer's last word is a sort of postscript in which he contrasts the continuing turmoil among those who remained in Judah (25:22–26) with the relative calm in Babylon, where Judah's last king survives unexpectedly as a privileged prisoner (25:27–30).

Modern historians view the decline of Judah after 605 B.C. as part of a larger struggle between Egypt and Babylon to control vast territories in the ancient Near East. Judahite kings ruled a portion of the land bridge between these great powers and, thus, were drawn into their conflicts. Tribute and forcible change of name, which are prominent here (23:33, 34; 24:17), were gestures and signs of vassalage. A Babylonian document records provisions delivered to Jehoiachin in exile (→ Jehoiachin).

For the Deuteronomistic historian, Judah's problems were not due to geopolitical forces but to a failure of religious nerve. While denouncing the four Judean kings for their evil deeds (23:32, 37; 24:9, 19), the writer ultimately faults Manasseh, whose transgressions move God to destroy Judah and Jerusalem (24:20). The prophecy of that angry judgment (21:11–15) must find its fulfillment in tragic events guided by God (20:17; 24:2–3; 24:13).

The writer fixes on the loss of Jerusalem but emphasizes the destruction of its Temple, God's dwelling place (25:9, 13-17, drawing selectively from elements in 1 Kings 7:15-50). The covenant people are at an end, their center broken, their people dispersed to Babylon. The few symbols of sacred order that remain, that is, the Temple implements and a last Davidic king, are in Babylon too and offer only tenuous continuity with God's favor. Continued turmoil among the ruins of Jerusalem forces a surviving remnant to flee to Egypt (2 Kings 25:22-26).

If conditions are bleak in Jerusalem, there is perhaps hope among the Babylonians. That was, after all, the counsel of Gedaliah (cf. the parallel account in Jer. 40:7-41:8). And the Babylonian king does offer some favor to Judah's last king (2 Kings 25:27-30). At the least, the Davidic house survives but without regnal authority.

Scholars dispute whether the closing tone of the Deuteronomistic work is one of hope or despair. It is neither, exactly. The tale is a cautionary one, told to explain the catastrophe that befell Israel and Judah. The narrator, who wrote among the exiles in Babylonia (note the change to reckoning by Babylonian regnal dates, 25:8, 27), seems to offer an exhortation as well: life can go on with the Babylonians (25:24) and in Babylon (25:27-30; cf. Jer. 29:1-7) so "it shall be well with you" (25:24). The thought may be troubling to modern people of faith. The writer suggests that life with the God of covenant is demanding, even perilous, but that the survivors—scarred and chastised—are exhorted, perhaps commanded, to carry on nonetheless with this same God, whose promises to the people Israel even this catastrophe has not terminated.

Bibliography

Gray, J. I and II Kings. 2d rev. ed. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970.

Halpern, B. The First Historians. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988.

Hobbs, T. R. 2 Kings. Waco, TX: Word, 1985.

Miller, J. M. and J. H. Hayes. A History of Ancient Israel and Judah. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.

Nelson, R. First and Second Kings. Interpretation. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1987.

Robinson, J. The Second Book of Kings. Cambridge Bible Commentary on the New English Bible. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.

1 CHRONICLES

RODDY L. BRAUN

INTRODUCTION

Unity and Place in the Canon

The First and Second Books of the Chronicles form a single unit, and this introduction serves as an introduction to both 1 and 2 Chronicles. In the Greek Bible, and hence in Latin and English Bibles as well, they are placed with the so-called historical books, whereas in the Hebrew Bible they are usually found at the very end of the last group of books, "the Writings" (→ Canon). The quotation ascribed to Jesus in Matt. 23:35 = Luke 11:51 indicates that, by the time of early Christianity, Chronicles already held the latter position (see commentary below on 2 Chron. 24:21).

In the biblical tradition, Chronicles is closely associated with the books of Ezra and Nehemiah; 2 Chron. 36:22–23 is repeated in essence in Ezra 1:1–3a. This same association is seen in the apocryphal book of 1 Esdras, which presents a continuous story running from 2 Chronicles 35 through Nehemiah 8 (see 1 Esdras). Because of this and the correspondences in vocabulary, style, and interests, it has become scholarly orthodoxy to attribute Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah to a single author, often referred to as the "Chronicler."

Nevertheless, remnants of another tradition may also be seen. Although other explanations are possible (Ezra-Nehemiah could have been accepted into the canon prior to Chronicles to supplement the books of Samuel and Kings), Chronicles follows rather than precedes Ezra-Nehemiah in the Hebrew canon. Moreover, the inclusion of the same verses at the end of Chronicles and the beginning of Ezra-Nehemiah (where they are usually considered original) could equally well be a device used to join works originally independent so as to indicate an original unity. It is an undisputed fact that Ezra-Nehemiah makes use of materials from various other sources in its presentation, and recent studies have pointed to significant differences in vocabulary, style, and thought (e.g., the attitude toward the north and ideas on messianism and repentance) that make it difficult to assume that the same author is responsible for both Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah in their present form.

The books of Chronicles embrace the period from creation to the dawn of the Persian Empire in the second half of the sixth century B.C. The period from Adam to Israel's first king, Saul, however, is covered only in the form of lengthy genealogies (1 Chron. 1–9), much of which, like 1 Chronicles 23–27, is often considered secondary, that is, composed or inserted later. Most of the remainder of 1 Chronicles 10–2 Chronicles 36 is probably due to the work of a single author. (The exceptions lie principally in the form of expansions of earlier lists, as in 1 Chronicles 12 and 15, and elaboration of the duties of the Levites. See the commentary below.) This author used as his major source the traditions in 1 Samuel 31–2 Kings 25, which he probably had available to him in a slightly different text from the one we now have (→ Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions). By omission, addition, and alteration of that text, he wrote a new or radically revised picture of Israel's history, which must have been meant to portray more adequately his understanding of Israel's past and of its future hope.

Of the additional material supplied, some may have been based upon other sources available to the writer, but much is quite clearly his own composition. No satisfactory name has yet been found to describe the resulting literature. The most appropriate analogy is perhaps to be found in the biblical commentary itself. Another comparison frequently drawn looks upon Chronicles as a forerunner of later Jewish literature called midrash, in which a biblical text is elaborated upon, often fancifully, for purposes that may be devotional, educational, or merely entertaining (→ Midrash; Haggadah).

The Author's Audience and Age

In view of the uncertainty concerning the ending of Chronicles, it is impossible to say with precision when the author lived. The present ending of the book would place the beginning of the Persian era, i.e., the mid-to-late sixth century B.C., as the earliest date for his work. If, however, an earlier ending of the book has been supplanted by the present form of the books of Ezra-Nehemiah, that date would have to be moved later. Recent scholarship, accepting the unity of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah as a given, has considered the age of Ezra and Nehemiah (late fifth century B.C.) as the terminus a quo of the book, and a few scholars have dated it as late as the second century B.C. A date sometime during the fourth century B.C. (late Persian, early Greek period) is the date most in favor with biblical scholars.

More recent studies have tended at least to permit, if not to favor, an earlier rather than a later date, although it cannot be said that any consensus has developed. If Chronicles is removed from Ezra-Nehemiah and certain portions of Chronicles are recognized as later additions to the book, there is nothing to require a date later than the return from exile as the earliest possible date for the work. Supposed anti-Samaritan polemic is not present in Chronicles itself (→ Samaritans), and study of military organization and equipment has so far been unconvincing. The matter of the author's age must, however, be left an open question.

The Author's Message

While it may not be possible to place the author in a specific historical context, his message to his readers does much to bring to life his audience and the problems that they faced. At the center of his concern is surely the Temple and its worship, and to that end the entire history of the nation is directed (→ Temple, The). The whole work of David and Solomon, with which no less than twenty-six of the sixty-five chapters of the books are concerned, is directed toward the construction of the Temple. That interest in the Temple itself is maintained throughout the remainder of the book, whether its original conclusion be met in the account of the removal of the Temple vessels (2 Chron. 36:18) or Cyrus's edict to rebuild the Temple (2 Chron. 36:22–23) or the rebuilding of the Temple itself (Ezra 1–6).

Together with this interest in the Temple, its vessels, and its personnel, two other interests are apparent. First, the author regularly emphasizes the involvement, participation, and support of all Israel in those activities associated with the Temple. All Israel recognizes the kingship of David and Solomon (1 Chron. 11:1; 12:38–40; 29:22–25) and consents to and participates in the activities leading to the building and dedication of the Temple (1 Chron. 13:1–5; 2 Chron. 7:8–10). After the division of the kingdom into the Northern Kingdom, Israel, and the Southern Kingdom, Judah, the history of the northern tribes is, in a sense, regularly omitted. The activity of various kings of Judah in and toward the north, however, is regularly noted, as is, frequently, the positive response of representatives of the north (e.g., 2 Chron. 11:13–17; 19:4; 28:8–15; and esp. 2 Chron. 29–31).

Second, the author's interest in the Davidic dynasty, although problematic, cannot be ignored. That this interest is prominent and extends beyond the dedication of Solomon's Temple is most apparent in the speech placed in the mouth of Abijah in 2 Chronicles 13 (see esp. vv. 5 and 8). Nevertheless, this emphasis is rare throughout the remainder of the book, and one senses that the monarchy exists primarily, if not solely, for the sake of the Temple. At the end of Chronicles no special attention is directed to the Davidic line (cf. 2 Kings 25:27–29), and it is, in fact, the Persian king Cyrus who becomes Yahweh's instrument to restore the Temple. In the account of the rebuilding of the Temple in Ezra also, there is at best little emphasis upon the Davidic line (cf. 3:2), and in later chapters of the book no mention at all. Perhaps events of the postexilic period presented the author, or a later one, with a difficulty he was incapable of fully resolving. Even in the absence of the Davidic kings who were originally responsible for the Temple, life goes on around the Temple, and more and more on the basis of a legal code closely associated with the Temple. The messianic hope, to the degree that it survived, was increasingly transferred to a future age.

The Message of the Book

The author pictures the people of God worshipping at the Jerusalem Temple planned and built by two kings, David and Solomon, whose kingship and work were given unanimous and enthusiastic support by all true Israelites of both north and south. There is here, and in the activities attributed to other kings throughout the history of the chosen people, a breadth of concern that indicates the author was open to the acceptance of those whose earlier associations had been with Israel rather than Judah. The sole criterion was their allegiance to the Lord as seen in acknowledgement of the unique status of the Jerusalem Temple and, to a lesser degree, the Davidic dynasty. The author must therefore have stood firmly opposed to others who would have severed all ties with the north (cf. Ezra 4). At the same time his understanding of God's ways would hardly be compatible with a more apocalyptic tendency developing in other circles (→ Apocalyptic Literature).

This understanding of God's ways is most commonly summarized under the name "retribution." Obedience to God is rewarded, and disobedience punished. We will have opportunity to note frequently that the Chronicler's portrayal especially of the post-Solomonic kings of Judah is governed completely by this theology (see, e.g., commentary on 2 Chron. 33). Portions of his sources that do not correspond to that understanding are altered accordingly.

Special attention should be given to those expressions used in conveying this theology. Faithful kings are those who seek God (2 Chron. 31:21). They engage in reforming activities, which include also the involvement of the northern tribes (2 Chron. 30). As a result, God causes them to prosper, that is, they have sizable families, engage in building operations, are victorious over their enemies, receive tribute, and enjoy God's rest (2 Chron. 14:6). To be unfaithful means to forsake the Lord or his Torah, often with no additional description added (2 Chron. 12:1). The accompanying statement of God's punishment is often equally vague (cf. "wrath has gone out," 2 Chron. 19:2; 32:25), but most commonly it includes defeat in warfare and exile. Sometimes it is as explicit and concrete as leprosy (2 Chron. 26:19), afflictions of the bowels (2 Chron. 21:19), and foot disease (2 Chron. 16:12).

Finally, however, Chronicles knows of another avenue to God's mercy and blessing, and that is repentance (2 Chron. 12:6, 12; 33:12). God speaks regularly to his people through the prophets, and it is ultimately the refusal to hearken to this prophetic voice (2 Chron. 24:17–22) that brings judgment. This opinion is expressed most fully immediately preceding Judah's final exile (2 Chron. 36:15–16) and should be understood as the final reason for its destruction. At the same time, this means that repentance and new obedience still lie open as the effective avenue to God, in whatever age and circumstances the readers may find themselves.

COMMENTARY

1:1–9:44

The Genealogical Prologue

1:1–54

From Adam to Israel (Jacob)

By genealogy, the writer moves rapidly from creation to Israel/Jacob, where his consuming interest lies. The tracing of Israel's ancestors back to Adam, and hence to God, demonstrates the divine plan in history and Israel's special role in that plan.

1:1–4, From Adam to Noah. The names of the ten "antediluvian" fathers, including the listing of all three of Noah's sons, are identical to those in Genesis 5.

1:5–27, From Noah to Abram. The writer identifies Abram with Abraham in the first editorial comment in the book. This genealogy, like Genesis 10 from which it is taken, lists ten post-diluvian fathers and apparently means to list seventy descendants of Shem, Ham, and Japheth, symbolic of the theoretical seventy nations of the world. The characteristic structure of the unit, in which Noah's sons are dealt with in reverse order of their significance, is also taken from Genesis 10 and becomes characteristic of Chronicles.

1:28–54, From Abraham to Israel (= Jacob). These names too are taken with little alteration from Genesis (cf. Gen. 11, 25, and 36). The lists of the sons of Seir and the rulers of Edom (1 Chron. 1:38–54) seem unnecessary, and their presence is probably due to the desire for completeness and the practice of relating geographically close peoples by genealogy.

2:1–8:40

The Sons of Israel

As indicated by the sheer volume of the material, the author here arrives at the focal point of his interest. "All Israel" includes all the tribes, both northern and southern, descended from the patriarch Israel/Jacob.

2:1–2, The Sons of Israel (Jacob). This listing of Israel's sons is the most extensive in the OT, including Levi, Joseph, and Benjamin as separate tribes. It is most closely related to Genesis 46, although it is not identical with it.

2:3–4:23, The Sons of Judah. The structure of this unit is complex and debated. The argument that its arrangement is chiasmic (that is, in the pattern of A B C C' B' A', or the like) centering on David in the unit (Ram-Caleb-Jerahmeel, Jerahmeel-Caleb-Ram) may be accepted as reflecting the structure of the unit without implying unitary authorship.

Subordinate lines have to this point been dealt with first, but this procedure is reversed in the current unit. Here the descendants of Judah (2:3–4:23) are listed prior to those of his brothers. The sons of Perez (v. 5) are given prior to those of Zerah (vv. 6–8), and Ram assumes pride of place among Hezron's sons (vv. 9–17). Therefore, by structure and content, the writer points both to the importance of the inclusion of all of the tribes of Israel within his "all Israel" and to the special position occupied by Judah, from whose line David is to come.

The listing of Judah's five sons (vv. 3–4) is derived from Genesis 38; Perez's sons Hezron and Hamul (1 Chron. 2:5) are named in Gen. 46:12, and Zerah's line through Zimri, Carmi, and Achar (1 Chron. 2:6–8) is treated in Josh. 7:1, 18. The author, however, has made at least two significant alterations. First, while Joshua 7 reads Zabdi, Chronicles has, probably in view of divergent textual evidence, chosen Zimri, possibly because of its association with Temple music (Heb. zamar, "to make music"). While no other OT tradition links Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Darda to the Judahite Zerah, 1 Kings 4:31 applies the gentilic "the Ezrahite" to Darda and further attaches to Heman, Calcol, and Darda the qualifying "sons of Mahol," a term perhaps related to religious dance (Heb. machol, a dance; cf. Ps. 149:3; Exod. 15:20). It seems the author, aware of the tradition linking Heman and Ethan with the Temple and its music (cf. the superscriptions to Ps. 88 and 89) and noting the fortuitous similarity of the name Zerah with Ezrahite, has on that basis and in view of his love for sacred music incorporated Ethan and his associates into the line of Zerah and hence Judah. Thus Chronicles may well preserve here the tradition that certain Temple guilds were not "levitical" in the strict sense of the term but may have traced their origins to pre-Israelite inhabitants of the land and made their entrance into various Israelite genealogies from outside. Second, the writer has also altered the name Achan (Josh. 7:1, 18) to Achar (Heb. 'akar, "to trouble"), an association made previously in the name of the valley called Achor (cf. Josh. 7:23-24).

1 Chron. 2:9-17 cover the age from Hezron to David. Verse 9 has no parallel elsewhere in the OT and has probably been constructed by the author to form the framework of the remainder of chap. 2, joining three groups of peoples, including the line of David, to Judah through Perez's son Hezron.

Jerahmeel (→ Jerahmeel) and Chelubai (who it appears certain should be identified with the Caleb of vv. 18, 42, and the wilderness tradition) are regularly associated with the southern territory of Judah, but the Jerahmeelites are regularly viewed as non-Israelites (1 Sam. 27:10; 30:29), and Caleb is named the son of Jephunneh who is further defined as a Kenizzite (Num. 13:6; 32:12). Their inclusion in Judah's genealogy here, as is already the case with Caleb in Num. 13:6; 34:19, probably reflects a recurring pattern by which non-Israelites were incorporated into Israel (→ Caleb).

The author is at particular pains to present the genealogical connection between Judah and David as an unbroken line. He accomplishes this by connecting Amminadab to Hezron through the otherwise unknown Ram, and Boaz to Nahshon through the similarly unknown Salma. The similar genealogy in Ruth 4:18-22 is probably dependent upon Chronicles. That David's genealogy nevertheless remains incomplete is apparent in that only nine generations are named, far too few to span the period of more than nine hundred years from the settlement in Egypt to Solomon's Temple that the biblical chronology requires.

The numbering of David here as the seventh son of Jesse (1 Chron. 2:15) is perhaps symbolic, standing in contrast to 1 Sam. 16:10 and 17:12-14, where he is the eighth. 1 Chron. 2:16-17 make it clear that David invested leadership of his troops in his own relatives and that Absalom's choice of Amasa to replace Joab (2 Sam. 17:25) was similarly conditioned.

1 Chron. 2:18-55 and 4:1-7 are lists of descendants of Caleb (Chelubai) and Jerahmeel. In the chiasmic structure of the unit, the two genealogies of Jerahmeel are found in 2:25-33 and 34-41; they are well preserved. Calebite material occurs in vv. 18-24 and 42-55, as well as in 4:1-7, and its precanonical history is more complex. (For details, see the larger commentaries listed in the Bibliography, especially those by Williamson and Braun.)

The material gathered here is without real parallel elsewhere, and the individuals named are largely unknown. Since only David's line is derived from Ram (2:9-17), all remaining genealogical data related to Judah have been gathered under Hezron's remaining sons, Caleb and Jerahmeel. The materials are fragmentary, related to various localities and, we must assume, ages. Some of the names given are not those of individuals but of cities and occupational groups (cf. vv. 51-55). The fact that descendants of Caleb, traditionally associated with the southern extremes of Judah, are in vv. 42-55 and 4:1-7 located nearer the center of the tribe's territory suggests that the misfortune of the Exile has led to a resettlement of the people.

The author's aim here is to document the relationship of various families, groups, and cities to Judah. We can assume that some honor, if not political, economic, and social advantage, accrued to being a member of the sole tribe to survive the exile. Study of the genealogies at hand suggests that many whose fortunes came to be associated with Judah had assumed that status by a long process of absorption. These genealogies serve to legitimate that process.

1 Chron 3:1-9 includes a listing of David's immediate family. This list of nineteen sons and one daughter of David consists of two parts: first, vv. 1-4, names of six sons born to six different wives while David was king in Hebron, based on 2 Sam. 3:2-5; second, vv. 5-9, sons born to David in Jerusalem, four by Bathshua (in 2 Sam. 11-12, Bathsheba) and nine others. For similar lists see 1 Chron. 14:3-7 and 2 Sam. 5:14-16. 1 Chron. 3:9 adds mention of David's daughter Tamar. (On David's rule at Hebron, see commentary on 1 Chron. 11 and 29:27.) The different form of Bathsheba's name may be intended to veil David's adultery, which is also absent from 1 Chronicles 17.

1 Chron. 3:10-16 spans the years from Solomon to the Exile. These verses name all the ruling line of Judah from Rehoboam through Josiah with the exception of the wicked queen Athaliah (2 Kings 11), who was the daughter of Jezebel and Ahab of Israel and not of Solomon's line.

Four sons of Josiah are named. The first of these, Johanan, is otherwise unknown, and the fourth, Shallum, is in Jer. 22:11 identified with Jehoahaz. Their rather unusual order of rule appears to have been Shallum, Jehoiakim, Jehoiakim's son Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah (2 Kings 23–25; 2 Chron. 36). It has been conjectured that Shallum rather than Jehoiakim may have been chosen to rule after Josiah's death because of the pro-Egyptian posture of the latter, who was duly placed upon the throne by the Egyptians after the brief reign of his younger brother. There is confusion in the texts over whether the Zedekiah who was Judah's last king was the son of Josiah, as in the Hebrew of 2 Kings 24:17 and the Greek of 2 Chron. 36:10, or a son of Jehoiakim or Jehoiachin, as in other texts.

1 Chron. 3:17–24 covers descendants of Jeconiah. This list of exilic and postexilic descendants of David stretches eight generations beyond the Exile, or to about 400 B.C. Jeconiah's son Shenazzar (v. 18) has been commonly identified with the Sheshbazzar (→ Sheshbazzar) of the return (Ezra 1:8, 11; 5:14–17), and the Zerubbabel who is in 1 Chron. 3:19 the son of Jeconiah's third son, Pedaiah, is elsewhere the son of his eldest, Shealtiel (cf. Hag. 1:12, 14; Ezra 3:2; Neh. 12:1). Neither Zerubbabel's brother Shimei nor any descendant of David named in the generations following him is mentioned in the remainder of the OT or in the NT genealogies of Jesus. A Shelomith, however, is named on one recently discovered seal as the wife of one Elnathan, who is on yet another seal named governor of Judah, and impressions on storage jars from Ramat Rahel may mention his second son Hananiah as well. Similarly, the Anani of v. 24 could be the individual named in an Aramaic letter dated to 407 B.C. (see James B. Pritchard's Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 492). At a minimum, the inclusion of such a lengthy list of Davidides suggests the Davidic nobility occupied a significant role in the history and theology of the postexilic period, although no messianic significance appears to be attached to them.

For 4:1–7, see 2:18–55 above. Verses 8–23 appear to be constructed of isolated and fragmentary bits, perhaps to provide the final part of the chiasmic structure of 2:1–4:23. (See commentary above on 2:3.)

4:24–43, Sons of Simeon. Simeon (→ Simeon) is regularly listed second in tribal enumerations in the OT. The relatively scant treatment accorded him here, in contrast to Judah, is again indicative of the author's interest.

This unit has three basic parts, typical of a number of those of less significant tribes (see chap. 5): first, descendants of Simeon, 4:24–27; second, their settlements, vv. 28–33; third, other data, vv. 34–43. Each unit seems to be composite.

For other lists of Simeon's descendants see especially Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; and Num. 26:12–13. In Chronicles the third son is Jarib, while all other lists have Jachin. The list of Simeonite cities is drawn from Josh. 19:2–8. The relationship of 1 Chron. 4:34–37 to both the preceding and the following verses is obscure, and we know nothing of the names given there. The historical notes appended in vv. 38–43 cannot be attached to other known events, but it seems likely the author found them in conjunction with other material related to Simeon.

5:1–26, Reuben, Gad, and East Manasseh.

The presentation of these three tribal groups is a unity, as is clear from the terminology in vv. 11, 18, and 26. The result is that all of the tribes located in Transjordan are placed together. Signs of unevenness, such as the multiple conclusions in vv. 18–21 and 25–26, do exist, suggesting multiple authorship.

Most of the individuals named here are otherwise unknown. The exception is Reuben's four sons (v. 3), whose names are found also in Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; and Num. 26:5–6. Joel (1 Chron. 5:4) and those listed after him, however, are not linked into this genealogical structure. The sons of Gad and Manasseh listed in Gen. 46:16; Num. 32:34, 38; and Josh. 17:2 are not included here nor are any of the descendants listed here named elsewhere in the OT.

The author's "all Israel" theme is most clear in his presentation of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:1–10), here placed immediately north of Moab. Like his brother Simeon, Reuben disappeared early as an independent tribe. (The ninth-century Moabite stone names Gad as Israel's southernmost tribe in Transjordan; → Moabite Stone, The.) Here, however, Reuben's territory is dutifully noted as stretching from Aroer on the Arnon in the south to Nebo and Baal-meon, opposite Jericho, in the north, as in Num. 32:34, 38 and Josh. 13:8–13.

Recent studies have also indicated that, although it has often been assumed on the basis of Genesis 48 that Reuben's birthright was transferred to Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, 1 Chron. 5:1–2 is the only OT tradition that states this directly. While equally explicit that leadership was to be vested in Judah, the blessings associated with the birthright are reserved for two significant northern tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh.

To the account of the territory of Gad (vv. 11–17) and Manasseh (vv. 18–22) in Gilead (→ Gilead) and Bashan (→ Bashan), both of which have narrower and wider meanings, are joined two reports of military encounters characteristic of the retributive theology of Chronicles. In a period of religious faithfulness, the Transjordanian tribes are victorious in warfare against their Arabian neighbors (vv. 18-22). In a period of unfaithfulness characterized as religious harlotry after its model in 2 Kings 17, however, God gives those same tribes into the hands of Tiglath-pileser of Assyria for exile (ca. 733 B.C.). Both the military and the theological terminology is similar to that found frequently in Chronicles (cf. 1 Chron. 4 and 12; 2 Chron. 13 and 14).

6:1-81, Descendants of Levi. The length of this section, second only to the attention devoted to Judah (2:3-4:23), reflects the writer's obvious interest in the priestly family (→ Levites; Priests). Much is considered secondary by many scholars. The chapter is composed of four units.

1 Chron. 6:1-15 lists the sons of Levi and Aaron. This is the most extensive listing of the priestly line in the OT, extending from Levi to the Exile. Our list appears dependent upon Ezra 7:1-5, which in turn relies upon the traditions found in Neh. 11:10-11 and 1 Chron. 9:11.

Earlier lists seemed intent on placing the otherwise unknown Zadok within the levitical line of Ahitub. Ezra 7:1-5 makes Zadok the twelfth priest after Aaron and apparently sees Ezra himself as the priest of the return. Our list secures the twelfth position for one of Zadok's sons, Ahimaaz of Azariah (1 Chron. 6:9), who served as Solomon's priest (1 Kings 4:2), and counts the priest of the Exile, Jehozadak, as the twenty-third priest in that line. It might then be assumed that the next priest, whether it be the Ezra of Ezra 7:1, Jehozadak's son Joshua of Hag. 1:1 and Zech. 6:11, or another unknown priest, would be the priest who would participate in the worship of the Second Temple.

1 Chron. 6:16-30 names three groups of Levites tracing their lineage back to Levi's three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. Verses 1-4 are identical in substance with Exod. 6:17-19 and Num. 3:17-20. 1 Chron. 6:20-30 adds additional names. The relevance of this information is seen in vv. 31-47, which make it clear that, of the three levitical groups associated with Temple music, Asaph is attached to Gershon (vv. 39-43), Heman to Kohath (vv. 33-38), and Ethan to Merari (vv. 44-47). The purpose of vv. 25-28, which appear as something of an insertion in the line of Kohath, is to make a Levite of Samuel, who exercised priestly functions (1 Sam. 2:11, 18) although named as an Ephraimite (1 Sam. 1:1).

1 Chron. 6:31-53 adds other Levites and priests (see commentary above on vv. 16-30). The lists differ to a greater or lesser degree from those given earlier. Each levitical line is here extended by one or more generations and made to terminate with the patriarch of a group of Temple musicians duly appointed by David for the music of the Temple. At the same time, the levitical musicians are differentiated in rank both from other Levites (v. 48) and from the Aaronic priests (vv. 49-53). Among the musicians, pride of place belongs to the family of Heman, who is named first and whose genealogy reaches back to Levi and Israel (vv. 33-38). The priestly line reaches to Ahimaaz, priest at the time of David (cf. 2 Sam. 15:27), as do apparently the other lists as well.

1 Chron. 6:54-81 lists the levitical cities (cf. Josh. 21:1-42, upon which our passage seems to be based, although rearranged). Scholarly consensus tends to date the original list of levitical cities in the reign of David or Solomon, since cities such as Gezer (1 Chron. 6:67) were not in Israel's hands until that time, while Gezer, Golan, and Ashtoreth were lost early in the ninth century. It has been persuasively argued that the levitical cities were provincial administrative centers, located principally in occupied territory for supervision of the royal estates (and cf. 1 Chron. 26:30-32). While textual obscurities abound, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that originally forty-eight cities were named, with each of the twelve tribes contributing four. The nine cities of 6:55-59 should be viewed as the combined contribution of Judah and Simeon, although this is not stated explicitly, and it is surprising that nothing is made of the fact that the priestly cities stem from Judah and Benjamin, the heart of postexilic Judah (v. 60; cf. v. 65).

Verses 66-81 give the allotments to the remaining Kohathites (vv. 66-70), to the Gershomites (vv. 71-76), and to the Merarites (vv. 77-81). Aijalon and Gath-rimmon (v. 69) are, in Josh. 21:24, from the tribe of Dan, and it seems likely that the omission of Dan here, as in 1 Chron. 7:12, is intentional on the part of a later writer.

7:1-5, Descendants of Issachar. The enumeration of Israel's northern tribes begins with Issachar, as would be expected from 2:1. Only four generations are listed, insufficient to fill the interval from Egypt to David. The information available to the writer appears skimpy and has perhaps been supplemented from a military census list.

7:6-19, Descendants of Benjamin, Dan, Naphtali, and Manasseh. One would expect the genealogy of Issachar to be followed by that of Zebulun (cf. 2:1; 12:32-33; 27:18), mysteriously absent from 1 Chronicles 2-9. The list of Benjamin's descendants in 7:6-12 begins abruptly (the RSV's "the sons of ..." is not found in the Hebrew), has little in common with other OT lists (cf. Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38; 1 Chron. 8:1–2), and quite possibly reflects a post-exilic tradition in which Benjamin occupied a more significant position. Benjaminites warriors total 61,434, in contrast with smaller numbers in 1 Chron. 12:29 and Num. 1:37 and 26:41.

Comparison with Gen. 46:21–25 indicates the text of 1 Chron. 7:12 is fragmentary and corrupt. While Shuppim, Huppim, and probably Aher are to be identified as sons of Benjamin (see Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38), Hushim is, in Gen. 46:23, the sole son of Dan, followed by the sons of Naphtali, as in 1 Chron. 7:13. The final phrase of v. 13, “the offspring of Bilhah,” is meaningless here unless preserving a part of Gen. 46:25, where it points to Dan and Naphtali as Israel’s sons through Rachel’s handmaiden Bilhah. It thus seems likely that here, as in 1 Chron. 6:61, 69, mention of the tribe of Dan has been purposely omitted and that here, in tandem with the replacement of an original Benjaminites list dependent upon Genesis 46 by a postexilic one, Zebulun has also been omitted and the end of the Benjaminites list obscured.

The list of the descendants of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:14–19) is to be compared with Num. 26:29–34. Gen. 46:20 provides no parallel to these names.

7:20–29, Descendants of Ephraim. Cf. Num. 26:35–36, the only other Ephraimite genealogy available to us. Both similarities and differences are apparent, and direct dependence is unlikely. The list’s seventeen generations that lead to the well-known hero of the conquest, Joshua, are too numerous to be included in the period between Israel’s stay in Egypt and the birth of Joshua and, together with the occurrence of several sets of similar names (cf. Tahath, twice in v. 20, and Tahan in v. 25), suggest that our genealogy may be a conflation of two parallel but divergent ones. Verse 28 appears to give settlements of Ephraim and v. 29 of Manasseh (cf. Josh. 16–18), uniting rather unexpectedly the genealogies of Joseph’s two sons. (Note also the occurrence of “Joseph” to include Ephraim and Manasseh in 1 Chron. 2:2.) Together Ephraim and Manasseh formed the nucleus of the Northern Kingdom, and they remained central to the Chronicler’s concern (cf. 2 Chron. 31:1).

7:30–40, Descendants of Asher. Asher is here, as in 1 Chronicles 12, placed last in the tribal listing (see also 2 Chron. 30:11; for 1 Chron. 7:30–31 see Gen. 46:17, upon which this passage is dependent, and Num. 26:44, more divergent). There are no known parallels to 1 Chron. 7:32–38, which appear to trace the remainder of Asher’s family through Heber’s children named in v. 32. Verse 40 recalls the terminology of the military census seen also in vv. 1–5, 6–12. Shemer/Shomer (vv. 32, 34) is suggestive of the owner of the hill upon which the northern capital, Samaria, was built (1 Kings 16:24).

8:1–40, Descendants of Benjamin. See also 7:6–13 and the references given there. The extensive references to Benjamin here and in chaps. 7 and 9 are evidence of the intense interest in Benjamin in the postexilic period.

Chap. 8 consists of four units based on Benjaminites living in four areas: vv. 1–7, sons of Benjamin and Ehud at Geba; vv. 8–12, sons of Shaharaim in Moab, Ono, and Lod; vv. 13–28, Benjaminites at Aijalon, Gath, and Jerusalem; and Benjaminites in Gibeon and the genealogy of Saul. A later hand, in harmony with the position of chap. 9, has added the notation that “these dwelt in Jerusalem” (v. 28, cf. 9:3, 34).

The sons of Benjamin listed in vv. 1–2 cannot be harmonized with other OT lists, including 7:6, with which it has only Bela in common (although Becher [Heb. beker] probably lies concealed in “his firstborn” [Heb. bekoro] of 8:1, which is consonantly identical). This first unit seems to have as its goal the descendants of Ehud (→ Ehud) in vv. 6–7, although we know nothing of the names given or the “move” to Manahath mentioned there.

The same is true of the persons and events of vv. 8–28. Verses 29–38 are essentially identical with 9:35–44, where they are more likely to have been original. Perhaps 9:1 is meant to stand as the conclusion to chaps. 2–8 rather than the introduction to chap. 9.

9:1–44

Israel After the Exile

This chapter is closely related to Nehemiah 11, a composite list of those dwelling in and around Jerusalem at the time the city’s walls were rebuilt by Nehemiah. The writer of Chronicles, however, apparently also had other material at his disposal. Because of limitations of space, we shall confine ourselves to the more significant variations between these chapters.

Verse 1 joins chaps. 2–8, which are pre-exilic in orientation, with chap. 9, which is postexilic. Verse 1 should probably read “they are written in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah,” by far the most common title of the source referred to frequently in 2 Chronicles, and possibly “and Israel and Judah were exiled” as well, since northern tribes are named in v. 3.

Verses 2–3 introduce the chapter. Verse 2 differs significantly from Neh. 9:2 in understanding the following lists to refer more exclusively to those dwelling in Jerusalem (cf. 1 Chron. 9:34). Verse 3, in a strong statement of the "all Israel" theme, includes descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh in Jerusalem, who are to be understood as representatives of all of the northern tribes (cf. Ps. 78:9, 67-68). Both texts show their composite nature in that the groups named in the introductory verses do not correspond to those mentioned in the remainder of the chapter.

1 CHRON. 10:1-2 CHRON. 9:31

David and Solomon

Verses 4-6 list the Judahites in Jerusalem. Neh. 11:6 names 468 descendants of Judah through his son Perez. Chronicles also includes descendants through Judah's sons Shelah and Zerah and counts a total of 690.

1 Chron. 9:7-9 lists the Benjaminites. After "Sallu, the son of Meshullam," the two lists are entirely different.

Verses 10-13 list six priestly families. The relationship to Nehemiah is quite close, although the Azariah of v. 11 is, in Neh. 11:11, Seraiah (see commentary on 1 Chron. 6:11-14), and three generations have dropped from the genealogy of Adaiah (9:12). Maasai (v. 12) is to be identified with Amashsai (Neh. 11:13), since their genealogies, though more divergent, are consistently similar. The number of priests here is 1760; in Nehemiah, 1192.

1 Chron. 9:14-16 names three levitical families that Chronicles traces to the three chief levitical groups: Merari, Asaph, and Jeduthun. (Merari is not named in Nehemiah.)

Verses 17-32 list the gatekeepers. Chronicles is vastly expanded by the addition of one Shallum, to whom primary attention is directed (v. 17), and by the extensive listing of duties in vv. 24-32. The gatekeepers actually belong to the same line as the high priests and, despite the reference to Phinehas centuries earlier, their installation is attributed to David and Samuel (v. 22), as if to span all ages.

Verse 33 lists the singers. Though of considerable importance elsewhere in Chronicles (cf. chaps. 16, 25), they are not mentioned elsewhere in this chapter or in Nehemiah 11.

1 Chron. 9:34, like v. 3, places all of those previously named in Jerusalem.

Verses 35-42 are lacking in Nehemiah, which, however, does conclude with a reference to Benjamin. The reference to Kish in v. 36 (cf. 8:30) has led to the inclusion of Saul's genealogy, the most extensive in the OT and apparently extending to exilic or postexilic times. Ner, whose name is inserted here in v. 36 as brother of Kish (cf. 8:30), is in v. 39 Kish's father, contrary to 1 Sam. 14:51. The genealogy stands in contrast to 1 Chron. 10:6, which states that all of Saul's house died in his war with the Philistines. The verses apparently formed the original bridge between chaps. 1-9 and Saul's battle in chap. 10.

Current study indicates that the work of David and Solomon forms a single unit centered in the construction of the Temple. Within that framework, chap. 10, recounting Saul's death, serves as an introduction to David (chaps. 11-21), while chaps. 22-29, concerning themselves equally with David and Solomon, are a transitional unit leading to Solomon (2 Chron. 1-9).

Since within these chapters the relationship between Chronicles and the books of Samuel and Kings is very close, even verbatim at times, and the dependency of Chronicles upon Kings is well established, we shall in such cases concentrate upon the divergences to illuminate the special message of Chronicles.

10:1-21:30

The David History

The significance of David for Chronicles has long been recognized. The result has been a one-sided view in which David is elevated to messianic or near messianic proportions and the work of others, such as Solomon, denigrated. That this view has now been modified helps us grasp more clearly the central role that the Temple and its worship played for the writer.

10:1-14, The Death of Saul. Compare 1 Samuel 31, from which Chronicles is taken. The action begins abruptly with the Philistine war, since the writer was interested only in Saul's death. Although there are minor variations throughout the chapter, two of these are clearly important for the writer. First, v. 6 reads "So Saul died, and his three sons, and all his house—they all died together." Instead of "all his house," 1 Sam. 31:6 reads "all his men." Chronicles wants to impress upon the reader that Saul's dynasty has been completely destroyed (note the absence from Chronicles of any parallel to 2 Sam. 2-4, which depicts the continuing struggle with Saul's house) and that no opposition to David's reign is possible from that quarter. That this view is not sustained in 1 Chron. 8:29-40 and 9:35-44 suggests a different author is responsible for those units. Second, vv. 13-14, an addition by our author, state unequivocally that Saul's defeat and death were due to his unfaithfulness (a nonspecific term met repeatedly in Chronicles) in that he did not keep the Lord's word or "seek" him. While it is possible to relate this judgment to specific acts in Saul's life, such as his improper offering of a burnt offering (1 Sam. 13), his sparing the king and the animals of the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15), and his inquiring of the medium at Endor (1 Sam. 28; reflected also in what is probably an explanatory gloss in 1 Chron. 10:13b, “and also consulted a medium, seeking guidance” [RSV]), it is more likely that the author wished simply to paint Saul’s entire life as one of faithlessness. Therefore “God killed him, and turned the kingdom over to David, the son of Jesse.” Divine vengeance has its way with Saul, but divine grace raises up a David to do God’s will.

11:1–12:40, The Rise of David. In narrating David’s rise, the author is at pains to demonstrate the complete and unanimous consent given his kingship by all Israel.

1 Chron. 11:1–9 is a brief statement of the beginnings. In agreement with the alteration of the text in 10:6 (see above), Chronicles bypasses the material found in 2 Samuel 1–4, which includes the anointing of David as king over Judah (only) at Hebron (2 Sam. 2:1–11) and David’s continuing struggle with Saul’s family, and proceeds immediately to David’s anointing over all Israel (1 Chron. 11:1–3; cf. 2 Sam. 5:1–3), adding only that this was “according to the word of the Lord through Samuel” (1 Chron. 11:3). Note also the omission of 2 Sam. 5:4–5 (= 1 Chron. 3:4), which mentions that partial rule. The “all Israel” theme is sounded strongly in 1 Chron. 11:4, which now reads “David and all Israel” instead of the simple “the king and his men” of 2 Sam. 5:6.

David proceeds immediately to the capture of Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6–10). Textual problems make conclusions difficult here, but it is clear that David’s general Joab plays a significant role not mentioned in Samuel. The laudatory words of 1 Chron. 11:9, with which the Chronicler was doubtless in agreement, belong already to his source in 2 Sam. 5:10.

1 Chron. 11:10–47 is a list of David’s mighty men, moved here from the appendix to 2 Samuel in chap. 23. The reason for this is made clear in the introduction provided by the writer in 1 Chron. 11:10: it is to serve as additional example of those who supported David’s kingship, again in harmony with God’s word (cf. v. 3). The text reflects pervasive confusion between the “three” and the “thirty,” both of which would have varied in composition and probably size from time to time. The list of David’s mighty men is extended by some seventeen names in vv. 41–47 (beyond Uriah). Their origin is unknown, and they differ also in form from the first part of the list.

1 Chron. 12:1–23 depicts events at Ziklag and the stronghold. This unit, also unique to Chronicles, continues to depict the widespread support extended to David and is well summarized by v. 22: “So day by day they kept streaming in to David to help him, until there was a great army, like the army of God.” To that end, groups are listed: Benjaminites who came to David at Ziklag (vv. 1–7); Gadites who came to David “at the stronghold in the wilderness” (vv. 8–15); Benjaminites and Judahites who came to David “at the stronghold” (vv. 16–18); and Manassites who came to David at Ziklag (vv. 19–21).

None of those named in the chapter is otherwise known. Emphasis seems to be directed to the fact that early in his career, while Saul was still alive, David was supported by Saul’s kinsmen of Benjamin and that leaders from two more remote northern tribes, Gad and Manasseh, also supported David. Amasai’s speech (v. 18) is clothed in the ancient language of prophetic inspiration, which is used by Chronicles also of the levitical choir (2 Chron. 20:14), the priests (2 Chron. 24:20), and even the Persian Cyrus (2 Chron. 36:22). This again reflects the writer’s own judgment: God is with David and with those who help David.

1 Chron. 12:23–40 concludes the story of David’s rise. This unit devoted to David’s supporters concludes with a numbering of warriors from north and south who came to Hebron for David’s anointing (vv. 23–37) and with a description of the festival attending that anointing (vv. 38–40). The number of tribes included is the largest in the OT, including both Levi and Ephraim/Manasseh. The massive number of warriors (about 340,000) is indicative of the writer’s enthusiasm for his subject.

Some measure of unevenness in composition is present. The numbers attributed to the southern tribes, which are listed first, are uniformly smaller than those of the northern tribes. The inclusion of Levi and the priest of Solomon’s day, Zadok, described with typical military terminology, have suggested to some that that material is secondary.

The entire unit is concluded with vv. 38–40, an exuberant description of the festivities celebrated by those gathered for the coronation. The themes of “all Israel,” “with a perfect heart,” and “of one mind” are profuse here (see “Introduction” above). The three-day feast itself is described so extravagantly that some have considered it an indication of the writer’s messianic viewpoint. While such a view would appear unwarranted, the “great joy” that results (v. 40) is normally reserved by the Chronicler for occasions dearest to his heart, such as the appointment of the levitical singers (15:16), Solomon’s coronation (1 Chron. 29:9, 17, 22), and Hezekiah’s reformation (e.g., 2 Chron. 29:30).

13:1–14:17, David, the Ark, and the Levites. With David securely in office, the author moves directly to his primary concern, Israel’s worship, bypassing 2 Sam. 5:11–25, to which he will return in 1 Chronicles 14. After the second (successful) attempt to move the Ark and the completion of levitical arrangements (chaps.

15-16), the dynastic oracle of chap. 17 places all in readiness for one of David's sons, Solomon, to build the Temple.

1 Chron. 13:1-14 rehearses the first attempt to transfer the Ark, in vv. 1-4. The writer again provides his own introduction in which the "all Israel" theme predominates. David makes the decision to move the Ark in consultation with all the leaders of Israel (v. 1), who agree to invite their brethren from throughout the land to join them. Inclusion of priests and Levites is explicit.

Verses 5-14 are dependent upon 2 Sam. 6:1-11, although with greater variation, especially in vv. 5-9. The narrative begins with the Ark at Kiriath-jearim, presupposing its earlier history (cf. 1 Sam. 4-7). Instead of "the chosen men of Israel, thirty thousand" (2 Sam. 6:1, RSV), however, Chronicles has David assemble "all Israel, from the Shihor of Egypt to the entrance of Hamath" for an undertaking so significant. It has been observed that this is in fact the most extensive delimitation of the extent of the Holy Land in the Bible (see also 2 Chron. 7:8; 30:5, where limits are similarly set in conjunction with festivities surrounding Solomon and Hezekiah).

Of other variations from Samuel, some are probably stylistic, others an attempt to make sense of a difficult text (e.g., "Chidon" in 1 Chron. 13:9), and still others substitute more conventional religious terminology. So David "assembled" Israel (v. 5), from the same Hebrew root (qhl) found in "assembly, congregation" in vv. 2 and 4 and throughout the Priestly writings, instead of merely "gathering" them (2 Sam. 5:1), and the divine name Yahweh is commonly altered to the less personal "God." 1 Chron. 13:14 has been altered to avoid the impression that the Ark of God did not occupy a special tent or house of its own.

The reason for the failure of the first mission is, if somewhat obscure, still that of 2 Samuel 5. For a second explanation see 1 Chron. 15:13. 1 Chron. 14:1-17 points to David's prosperity. This section, found in 2 Sam. 5:11-25 and bypassed earlier in favor of the Ark narrative, is now included. Its inclusion here may be insignificant, or it may serve as an example of the prosperity God extends to those who serve him faithfully.

For 1 Chron. 14:1-2, cf. 2 Sam. 5:11-12. That Chronicles did not find David's relationship with Hiram of Tyre offensive is perhaps surprising (cf. 2 Chron. 2).

1 Chron. 14:3-7 lists David's children. The wording presupposes the earlier list in 2 Sam. 3:2-5, although omitted by Chronicles at that point in the story. The list is sometimes in agreement with Samuel, sometimes with 1 Chron. 3:5-8, and sometimes with neither.

1 Chron. 14:8-16 includes the Philistine wars. The "all Israel" theme is emphasized again by the addition of "all" before Israel in v. 8. David's obedience here is exemplary, and the result is victory (v. 16). Some alterations of the text, especially in vv. 8 and 16, may be to bring the text more into harmony with Isa. 28:21 (reading "Gibeon" instead of the "Geba" of 2 Sam. 5:25). That David had the Philistine idols "burned" rather than picked up (1 Chron. 14:12; cf. 2 Sam. 5:21) is surely meant to his credit.

1 Chron. 14:17 is a summarizing conclusion added by Chronicles after the style of 2 Sam. 5:10 = 1 Chron. 11:9. Such statements as this are incorporated and added frequently by the writer at significant places throughout his work (cf. 29:25; 2 Chron. 11:13-17).

15:1-16:43, The Ark Is Brought to Jerusalem. The writer returns to his primary concern, the Ark of the covenant and the levitical priests. His canonical source is 2 Sam. 5:12b-20a, which is embedded in 1 Chron. 15:25-29 and 16:1-3, 43 and has been supplemented with appropriate psalms and by other materials of unknown origin.

It appears clear from the repetition of similar lists (cf. 15:4-10 with 15:11; 15:17-18 with 15:19-24 and 16:5-6) that also differ from each other (note the position of Obed-edom in 15:18, 21, 24; 16:5) that this section is composite. While certainty is impossible, it seems likely that at least 15:4-10, 16-24 and portions of 16:38-42 are later additions. We shall leave open the question of 16:8-36.

1 Chron. 15:1-3 is introductory, and, like vv. 4-24, without parallel in Samuel. These brief verses are replete with the emphases of Chronicles: the Ark, the Levites (who are termed "chosen of the Lord"), "all Israel," and of course David himself, whose preparations for the Ark are now described.

1 Chron. 15:4-10 names six levitical families and their chiefs. This section, which is commonly considered late, includes the familiar Kohath, Merari, and Gershon, and three lesser known families, all of whom are derived through Kohath (cf. Exod. 6:18; 1 Chron. 6:2, 18). Perhaps mention of the Aaronidic priests in 1 Chron. 15:4 (and in vv. 11, 14) is the work of a later editor.

1 Chron. 15:11-15 names the same six levitical chiefs, as in vv. 4-10, with the addition of the priests Zadok and Abiathar. Although v. 13 is textually difficult, it seems clear that the previous failure to bring the Ark to Jerusalem is ascribed to the fact that the Levites did not participate or did not participate properly, a deficiency stated as remedied in v. 15.

1 Chron. 15:16-24 is a list of levitical and priestly musicians. Three leaders are named in vv. 17-18 (Heman, Asaph, and Ethan) followed by eleven assistants and two gatekeepers (Obed-edom and Jeiel). These are repeated in essence in vv. 19-24 (cf. also 16:5-6), where the cymbals are apportioned to the leaders and the remaining musicians (including Obed-edom and Jehiel; but cf. 15:23b) are to play harps and lyres. This second list appears to be an even later updating in that it adds a musical director, two other gatekeepers, and seven priestly trumpeters (vv. 22-24). According to current studies, the occurrence of Ethan instead of Jeduthun as the third levitical family dates both lists as relatively late.

1 Chron. 15:25-16:3 is taken from 2 Sam. 6:12-19, with characteristic emphases of Chronicles added: first, more emphasis upon the participation of all Israel (cf. 1 Chron. 15:25), although the "all Israel" theme, like that of joy, was already present in 2 Sam. 6:15-19; second, participation of Levites (not priests) in the sacrifices (1 Chron. 15:26-27) and in the music is expanded and made more explicit; third, the priestly acts of David are curtailed, e.g., the sacrificial acts are described more carefully and the priestly "linen ephod" of 2 Sam. 6:14 is exchanged for a byssus tunic (1 Chron. 15:27, where mention of the linen ephod is late); fourth, the mention of the negative reaction of Saul's daughter Michal is omitted, perhaps merely to avoid ending the account on a negative note.

1 Chron. 16:4-7 names Levites (and priests) before the Ark in Jerusalem (cf. 15:4-26). According to Chronicles, Asaphites were to minister before the Ark in Jerusalem, while the families of Heman and Jeduthun were to serve at the tabernacle, which Chronicles (alone) places at Gibeon (cf. 16:37-42).

As a part of the festivities surrounding the placement of the Ark, the Chronicler (or a later writer) includes portions of three psalms. Verses 8-22 are taken from Ps. 105:1-15, part of a psalm of thanksgiving. By omitting the remainder of that psalm the writer has permitted vv. 12-15 of that psalm to stand as a kind of timeless principle of God's protection of Israel.

1 Chron. 16:23-33 is identical with Psalm 96, a psalm of praise to Yahweh the king, with minor changes for which no reason is apparent.

For vv. 34-36, cf. Ps. 106:1, 34-36, which includes the familiar "Give thanks to the Lord, for he is good, because his steadfast love endures forever" (also in Ps. 107:1), a prayer that God would gather Israel from the nations, and the doxology to Book 4 of Psalms. Perhaps these verses were meant to remind Israel also of the remainder of Psalm 106, most fitting for a nation in exile.

At least in the final form of this passage (1 Chron. 16:37-43), David leaves Asaph and his family to minister before the Ark in Jerusalem, while the priest Zadok and the families of Heman and Jeduthun are to do the same at Gibeon, where Chronicles locates the tent of the Lord. Presumably the priest Abiathar also remains at Jerusalem (cf. 15:11). Perhaps an earlier form of the chapters left Asaph and the Levites in Jerusalem and placed the priests at Gibeon, where, the Chronicler may have reasoned, the tent of the Lord must have been (see commentary above on 2 Chron. 1:2-6).

17:1-27, The Promise to David. This chapter is based on 2 Samuel 7, surely one of the most significant passages of Scripture. Two chief points are made by means of a play on the word "house": a member of David's house, one of his descendants, will build a house (i.e., a temple) for Yahweh, v. 12; and the kingdom of David's house will be established forever, vv. 12-14. Thus OT (and NT) messianism will be forever after linked with David.

While divergences between the texts of Samuel and Chronicles have perhaps been overinterpreted in the past, significant differences do occur. First, Chronicles omits the phrase "and Yahweh had given him [David] rest" from 2 Sam. 7:1, since the verbal root embodied in that form is significant for him in explaining why Solomon rather than David built the Temple (see commentary below on 1 Chron. 22:6-10). In 1 Chron. 17:10, another form of the same root is altered to "I will subdue" for the same reason. Second, 2 Sam. 7:14 had alluded to at least the possibility that the chosen seed of David would commit transgression. Since Chronicles presents Solomon's conduct as blameless, the omission of these words from 1 Chron. 17:13 is suggestive, although not essentially altering the meaning of the original. Third, David's prayer places greater emphasis upon the fact that Yahweh has already begun to bless David's house, v. 27 (cf. 2 Sam. 7:29).

18:1-20:8, David's Wars. Chronicles probably includes these accounts largely because they were in its source (cf. 2 Sam. 8-21, with many omissions). Perhaps at the same time, though generally positive toward David (cf. 1 Chron. 18:6; 19:13; 20:3-4) and pointing to God's blessing upon him, they point to his age as a period of warfare in which construction of the Temple was not permitted, in contrast with the age of Solomon, marked by peace and the building of the Temple (see 1 Chron. 22). That spoil from his wars was used for construction of the Temple appears more of an afterthought (18:8, 11) than the purpose for their inclusion.

For 18:1-17, see 2 Samuel 8, with which this chapter is largely identical. Apart from minor differences of text and style, we may see the mind of the writer at work in 1 Chron. 18:2, which appears to absolve David from atrocities in war (cf. 2 Sam. 8:2), and in 1 Chron. 18:8, which adds that Solomon used the bronze taken from Hadadezer for the Temple. (Verse 11 is found already in 2 Sam. 8:11–12.) The larger numbers in 1 Chron. 18:4 (a thousand chariots and seven thousand horsemen compared to seventeen hundred horsemen alone in 2 Sam. 8:4) may be due to the exaggeration for which the writer is often cited, but may also stem from a different text (the number of foot soldiers [20,000] remains the same in both texts). Noteworthy in the light of the idealization of David often posited of Chronicles is his omission of 2 Sam. 8:13a, “David made a name for himself,” and the transference of some of his victories to Abishai (1 Chron. 18:12; cf. 2 Sam. 8:13).

1 Chron. 19:1–19 relates David’s war with the Ammonites and Aram (see 2 Sam. 10). The writer omits 2 Samuel 9, recounting David’s kindness to Saul’s son Mephibosheth, since he has stated that all of Saul’s house was slain in his final battle with the Philistines (see commentary on 1 Chron. 10:6). Apart from minor differences due to textual error, style, and updating, there is little indication of the writer’s hand apart from several cases of hyperbole that appear to glorify David (cf. vv. 6–7 with 2 Sam. 10:6–7; v. 18 with 2 Sam. 10:18).

1 Chron. 20:1–8 tells of additional warfare. Chronicles includes in vv. 1–3 only the beginning and end of the lengthy account of the Ammonite war found in 2 Samuel 11–12, omitting David’s adultery with Bathsheba and the subsequent murder of her husband Uriah, as well as David’s condemnation by the prophet Nathan. Also omitted is 2 Sam. 13:1–21:17, partially from a desire for brevity, but also because it describes in vivid detail the “evil from his own house” (2 Sam. 12:11) that would befall David by way of punishment and thus contradicts a basic premise of the writer, that David faced no opposition in his kingship. He has, in 1 Chron. 20:4–8, picked up the narrative from 2 Sam. 21:18–22, which leads immediately to the account of David’s census, in which he is more interested because of its relationship to the Temple.

In 1 Chron. 20:4, the writer has perhaps omitted “Gob” (2 Sam. 21:18) as unknown, replacing it with the better known Gezer. The addition of “they were subdued” (1 Chron. 20:4) suggests a fulfillment of 1 Chron. 17:10 is here being expressed. In 20:5, Chronicles so rearranges the text that Elhanan kills Lahmi, the brother of Goliath, rather than Goliath himself (cf. 2 Sam. 21:19), erasing the tension with David’s slaying of Goliath in 1 Samuel 17. Thus a general picture of David’s faithfulness is presented, and Yahweh rewards that faithfulness with victory in war.

21:1–30, David’s Census. The writer omits the other materials of 2 Samuel 22–23 (he has used the list of David’s mighty men in 1 Chron.

11:11–41a) and proceeds to David’s abortive census (2 Sam. 24), which in its concluding verse spoke of an altar built by David with divine approval (1 Chron. 21:6) and hence provided a convenient connection to the Temple narrative.

Textual variations from its Samuel source are numerous in this chapter, and since they represent no clear theological direction, it has been felt the author was here using a different text type. Manuscripts from Qumran do show some cases in which texts of Samuel agree with readings in Chronicles.

Several variations are worthy of note. First, in 1 Chron. 21:1 it is Satan (→ Satan) rather than God (2 Sam. 24:1) who incites David’s census, reflecting a developing and popular piety that preferred not to predicate evil directly of God. Second, David’s guilt in conducting the census is actually heightened. His general, Joab, takes issue with him concerning the matter and is himself responsible for the decision not to count Levi and Benjamin. Third, the value of the future site of the Temple is elevated in that David pays Ornan not the fifty shekels of silver named in 2 Sam. 24:24, but six hundred shekels of gold (1 Chron. 21:25). The number of potential warriors in Israel and Judah might represent a similar hyperbole, but the numbers (1,570,000 in Chronicles, 1,300,000 in Samuel) do not differ substantially enough to present a strong case for that. Finally, David’s decree is altered to refer to altar and Temple (21:26; 22:1), and the divine approval of the entire operation is made explicit by fire from heaven (21:26).

With the Levites set aside for their work (chap. 15), the Ark in Jerusalem (chap. 16), and the site for the Temple chosen and approved (chap. 21), all is in readiness for the erection of the Temple, which is the central concern in chaps. 22–29 (and 2 Chron. 1–8).

22:1–29:30

Transitional Unit

Chaps. 22–29 are normally considered a part of the David history; they deal equally with Solomon, however. Since they have no parallel in Samuel, we may see in them again the intention of the writer(s) most clearly. Leaving aside chaps. 23–27 for the moment, which are probably later additions (see commentary on chap. 23), chaps. 22, 28, and 29 serve to bind the work of David and Solomon into one; they are composed principally of three speeches and a prayer of David spoken to or in direct reference to Solomon: 22:6–16, David’s first speech; 28:2–21, David’s second speech; 29:1–5, David’s third speech; and 29:10–19, David’s prayer. He, in turn, is set forth in them as the divinely chosen builder of the Temple.

22:2-5, David Gathers Workers and Material for the Temple. There seems to be no prior tradition to this effect (but cf. 1 Kings 7:51 = 2 Chron. 5:1). Many of the details are derived from the Solomonic portions of Kings. The reason given here for David's preparations is Solomon's youth and immaturity (cf. 1 Chron. 29:1).

22:6-19, David's First Speech. Solomon is designated to build the Temple. This is indicated in three ways. First, the entire unit is modeled upon the account of Joshua's installation in Joshua 1. Second, the "rest" theology of Chronicles referred to previously in 1 Chronicles 17 is given its rationale in 22:6-10. David has been forbidden to build the Temple because he had "shed very much blood, and waged great wars" (cf. 1 Kings 5:3-5, significantly omitted by Chronicles). His seed, however, who will be a man of rest, will build the Temple, and that "man of rest" is identified by name as Solomon, whose name means "peace." Third, three elements of a literary form for the induction of an individual into an office have been isolated: the formula of encouragement, such as "Be strong and be courageous; do not be afraid and do not be terrified" (1 Chron. 22:13); the description of the task for which the individual is inducted; and the formula of accompaniment, "The Lord is with you." Each of these items is found in Joshua 1 and David's speech as well (vv. 11, 13). Most significantly, however, the task to which Solomon is inducted is that of building the Temple.

In vv. 11-13, Yahweh's presence is directly related to obedience to the Torah and prosperity (cf. again Josh. 1:6-8), laying the basis for the doctrine of retribution, which will find fuller expression in 1 Chron. 28:9. 1 Chron. 22:14-16 and 17-19 are probably to be considered a later addition from the hand of a more priestly disciple.

23:1-27:34, Levitical Organization. These chapters are highly composite and represent, in part if not in totality, a later addition to the book. All levitical organization is here linked with David, just as is all law with Moses and all wisdom with Solomon. Divisions of the Levites are covered in chap. 23, priests in chap. 24, singers in chap. 25, gatekeepers in chap. 26, and other appointees in chap. 27.

1 Chron. 23:1-32 lists divisions of the Levites. This chapter is probably late or composite, since v. 2 is a duplicate of 28:1 and internal duplicates and discrepancies abound (e.g., the levitical age in 23:3 and 24; the sons of Shimei in vv. 9 and 10). This chapter is composed of three units.

Verses 1-6 list levitical duties. David's death and Solomon's coronation will not be described until 29:22-30. Thirty-eight thousand Levites are numbered at age thirty or above, a high number in comparison with other OT figures (cf. Num. 3:39; 1 Chron. 12:27; Num. 8:23-26; 2 Chron. 31:17). The fourfold division of the thirty-eight thousand is also unusual in that twenty-four thousand (similar to the number of divisions of priests [1 Chron. 24:18], musicians [25:31], and probably gatekeepers [26:12, 17-18]) are set aside to "direct the work of Yahweh's house" (see also 27:1-15). Striking is the designation of six thousand as "officers and judges" (23:4; cf. 2 Chron. 19:4-11 and Deut. 17:8-13).

1 Chron. 23:7-23 includes sons of Gershon (vv. 7-11), Kohath (vv. 12-20), and Merari (vv. 21-23). On this conventional threefold division of the Levites and for alternative genealogies, see chap. 6. Moses' association here with the Levites rather than the Aaronic priests is strongly affirmed (1 Chron. 23:13-14). The same nine family heads of Kohath are also named in 24:20-25. Since these "genealogies" extend at most three generations beyond the patronymic heads, it is apparent that they, in fact, establish rather than demonstrate levitical ties.

1 Chron. 23:24-32 adds more levitical duties. With the granting of rest to Israel, the task of the Levites is changed by David's decree from carrying the tabernacle to regular assistance in the Temple (v. 26). These verses, like vv. 13-14, emphasize the subordinate role of the Levites and probably reflect a later addition. Levites are here counted above the age of twenty (v. 27).

1 Chron. 24:1-31 gives divisions of the priests (and further levitical arrangements). Twenty-four priestly groups are named (vv. 7-19), preceded by a lengthy introduction. All are derived from Aaron's sons Eleazar and Ithamar, since Nadab and Abihu suffered untimely deaths (v. 2; for the priestly genealogy, see commentary above on 6:1-15). Zadok is here firmly implanted in Eleazar's line, opposite Abiathar, who is from Ithamar's line. Abiathar was removed from office by Solomon (1 Kings 2:27). 1 Chron. 24:19 affirms that priestly duties were established not by David, but by Yahweh himself.

For vv. 20-30, see commentary above on 23:7-23. Five of the families named are here extended by a single name, and an otherwise unknown branch of Merari's family, Jaaziah, is added.

In 25:1-31 the musicians, like the priests and Levites in chaps. 23 and 24, are enumerated and then divided into twenty-four courses. The chapter contains two units, which are themselves composite.

In vv. 1-7, David and the levitical heads set aside three families of levitical musicians (Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun [v. 1], who are named again in vv. 2-5 and 6 in the order Asaph, Jeduthun, Heman; for the singers, see also 1 Chron. 6; 15:16-24; 16:4-7, 41-42). A total of 288 ( $24 \times 12$ ) singers is counted (1 Chron. 25:7), presupposing both the twenty-four sons named in vv. 2-4 and the twelve members of each course in vv. 9-31. While Asaph is regularly listed first and would appear to be formally recognized as preeminent, only four families trace their lineage to him, and it is, above all, Heman, with no less than fourteen sons/families, who is in the ascendancy.

The prophetic nature of the work of the singers is here emphasized repeatedly (vv. 1, 2, 3, 5), as in 2 Chron. 20:14; 29:25; and 35:15. We may sense in such terminology the desire to elevate the work of the singers beyond that of more menial Temple servants.

It has been noted that of Heman's sons named in 1 Chron. 25:4, the last nine (from Hananiah on) differ in form from the first five and are identical or similar in form to regular Hebrew verb forms. Some have understood these words to stem from a psalm verse or the beginnings of various psalms.

Verses 8-31 describe the casting of lots. The order in which the lots fall here seems to presuppose the order of the sons in vv. 2-4, also in that all of Heman's remaining sons are grouped together in vv. 23-31.

1 Chron. 26:1-32 lists gatekeepers and other Levites. For the gatekeepers (vv. 1-19) see 9:17-32. Three groups are mentioned, stemming from Korah (26:1-3, 9) and Merari (vv. 10-11), whose levitical genealogies are given, and Obed-edom (vv. 4-8), for whom none is given. Apparently both Obed-edom and Korah had difficulty establishing levitical credibility. Verses 12-19 again detail the casting of lots. The predominance of Shelemiah, whose name is variously spelled throughout this section, is apparent both in that he is assigned to the most important, or east, gate and that his son Zechariah is chosen to fill the vacancy at the fourth gate.

Verses 20-32 add "other Levites." As in 9:22-32, where the functions of the gatekeepers are similarly expanded, Levites are placed in charge of the Temple precincts and treasuries. This section abounds in textual and other difficulties. 1 Chron. 26:26-28 make the point that the dedicated gifts of all Israel's leaders, from the time of Samuel down to David, were brought to the Levites for use in the Temple service. Two additional families of Kohathites, those of Izhar and Hebron, are named to "outside duties" west and east of the Jordan respectively, apparently pointing once again to broader responsibilities of the Levites.

1 Chron. 27:1-34 is a listing of other Davidic officials. While we know little about administrative arrangements in David's age, it seems quite certain that sweeping administrative changes did take place. This chapter is composed of four independent, probably unrelated units.

Verses 1-15 list commanders of the monthly courses. Twelve divisions of twenty-four thousand each are listed, reminiscent of the twenty-four courses of priests, musicians, and gatekeepers. Each of the twelve heads is included in the first sixteen names of the list of David's heroes in 11:10-47.

1 Chron. 27:16-24 is a listing of tribal heads. The order of the tribes is closest to that of 1 Chronicles 2, but other details are reminiscent of the census of Numbers 1. Unlike 1 Chronicles 21, fault for the census here appears to fall largely on Joab rather than David.

The king's officials are, in 27:25-31, divided into three groups, those responsible for the king's storehouses or treasuries (v. 25), agriculture (vv. 26-28), and livestock (vv. 29-31). Probably none of the individuals named here is otherwise known in the OT, although an Azmaveth is listed among David's heroes in 11:33.

1 Chron. 27:32-34 names other Davidic advisers. Perhaps these enjoyed a close personal relationship with David, in contrast to the more formal list of 1 Chron. 18:14-17 (= 2 Sam. 8:15-18; 20:23-26). The Jonathan named is not Saul's son, whose death is recorded in 1 Chron. 10:2, but an otherwise unknown "uncle" or friend of David.

With the listing of David's officials, the writer concludes his list of those placed in office by David, giving expression by so doing that priestly, levitical, and secular organizations alike were to be attributed to David.

28:1-21, David's Second Speech. Chap. 28 resumes the thought of chap. 22, interrupted by chaps. 23-27. Having earlier informed Solomon of his task as Temple builder, David assembles Israel's leaders and gives them the same information.

The list of officials in 28:1-2a has probably been revised in view of the insertion of chaps. 23-27 (for David's speech [28:2b-10] cf. 22:6-13). David repeats that his own plans to build the Temple, termed a "house of rest" for the Ark in a further development of that term (v. 2; see commentary above on 22:9), have been rejected by God because he was a warrior and had shed blood (28:3). God has instead chosen Solomon for that task (v. 6), and that choice is this time expressed in terms of divine election (Heb. bachar). Verses 4-5 are perhaps secondary, referring that election also to Judah. In vocabulary often borrowed from his sources but especially dear to Chronicles (cf. "all Israel," "a perfect heart and a willing spirit"), vv. 8-10 exhort Solomon to obedience to God's commands, which will result in prosperity, while failure to do so will result in rejection. The statement of

v. 9, "If you seek him, he will be found by you; but if you forsake him, he will reject you forever," is the first explicit statement of the dogma of retribution that dominates 2 Chronicles.

Verses 11, 12a, and 19 tell of the transfer of the Temple plans received by David "from the hands of Yahweh" to Solomon. Verses 12b-18 are a later elaboration of that theme.

Verses 20-21 place for the first time all of the people at Solomon's disposal and repeat the ingredients of the formula of installation (see chap. 22). In addition, the doctrine of retribution is reformulated positively: God will not forsake Solomon until his work is finished.

29:1-9, David's Third Speech. As Moses appealed to Israel for freewill offerings for the construction of the Temple and Israel responded generously to that appeal (Exod. 35:5-29), so David appeals to the princes of Israel and receives their gifts. In the materials named, as well as in the pervasive note of generosity (1 Chron. 29:5, 9), the influence of the tabernacle narrative is clear.

29:10-19, David's Blessing. This splendid prayer, which probably reflects the thought and liturgical style of the exilic or postexilic period, blends three major psalm types (hymn, thanksgiving, and petition) and is replete with the terminology of Psalms. David praises God (vv. 10-12, in notes later echoed in the doxology of the Christian "Lord's Prayer"), thanks God for the offerings received (vv. 13-16), and asks God's continued presence with his people and especially Solomon in the construction of the Temple (vv. 17-19). In describing Israel as sojourners, pilgrims, and without hope (v. 15), the author appears to move from Temple festivity to the more troubling days of the Exile (cf. Neh. 9).

Nevertheless, the notes of generosity, joy, and the perfect heart continue to dominate (1 Chron. 29:17-19).

29:20-25, Solomon's Enthronement. Solomon is enthroned in a two-day ceremony marked by the blessings of the people, sacrifices of at least three thousand animals, an eating and drinking before God, the formal anointing as Yahweh's prince, and a pledge of loyalty on the part of Israel's chiefs and warriors (see 1 Chron. 12:38-39). The anointing of Zadok at the same time may be out of place but is not impossible. The note of joy is again present (29:22), and the epitome of the "all Israel" theme appears to be reached (cf. vv. 21, 23, 25) when it is noted in v. 24 that, in spite of the evidence to the contrary in 1 Kings 1-2 and elsewhere, "all the sons of King David" vowed their allegiance to Solomon. Even as with David, recognition of Solomon is complete and unanimous, and no opposition is voiced to his reign. 1 Chron. 29:25 is indicative of the author's appraisal of his reign.

29:26-30, The Death of David. The mention of David's seven-year reign at Hebron is surprising, but even here there is no indication that his rule there was over only a part of Israel (see 1 Chron. 11:3). The usual evaluation of David's reign is lacking in both Kings and Chronicles, but 29:28 is surely commendatory. Interested readers are referred to the words of Samuel, Nathan, and Gad. The idea for such concluding summaries is probably borrowed from Kings and completed utilizing the names of prophets known to be active in the reign of the king referred to.

Bibliography
See 2 Chronicles, "Bibliography."

2 CHRONICLES

R O D D Y L. B R A U N

INTRODUCTION

See 1 Chronicles, "Introduction."

COMMENTARY

1 CHRON. 10:1-2 CHRON. 9:31

David and Solomon (continued)

1:1-9:31

The Solomon History

These chapters are devoted almost exclusively to the king's role in the construction of the Temple; only chap. 1 and 8:16-9:31 are more general in nature. Even more than in the case of David, it will be seen, the author depicts Solomon as the king divinely chosen to erect the Temple, the king whose kingship was accepted by all Israel unanimously and enthusiastically, and the king whose personal life was without fault.

1:1-17, The Beginning of the Reign of Solomon. Verse 1, which would have immediately followed the story of David's death in 1 Chronicles 29 before Chronicles was separated into two books, begins the Solomon narrative by restating 1 Chron. 29:20. The similar note in 1 Kings 2:12 occurs only after Solomon has ruthlessly eliminated all opposition to his rule.

For 2 Chron. 1:2-6, see 1 Kings 3:3-4, generally favorable toward Solomon but critical of his activity on the high places, as with all kings except the reformers Hezekiah and Josiah. But in Chronicles, the high place at Gibeon, termed "the great high place," has been legitimized in that the tent of meeting (not to be identified with David's tent in Jerusalem, 2 Chron 1:4, but with the tabernacle, v. 5) and the bronze altar for sacrifice were located there (cf. 1 Chron. 16:39; 21:28-30). Solomon thus begins his reign not with a sacrifice at a proscribed high place, but as a pious king at the head of a procession of "all Israel" (cf. 1 Chron. 13:1) seeking the Lord (cf. Saul in 1 Chron. 10:13-14). Whether there is any historical accuracy to this position or, as seems more likely, it is a construct of the Chronicler to preserve Solomon's integrity, cannot be determined with certainty.

2 Chron. 1:7-13 demonstrates Solomon's wisdom (see 1 Kings 3:5-15; 4:1). The wisdom, knowledge, riches, and honor promised Solomon were doubtless in keeping with the author's view of Solomon's greatness. Note the omission of much of 1 Kings 3:6, highly laudatory of David; of 3:14, which would have left room for Solomon's apostasy; and of 3:15, which notes that Solomon returned to Jerusalem and sacrificed.

Chronicles inserts (in 2 Chron. 1:14-17) the demonstration of Solomon's prosperity from 1 Kings 10:26-29, which is surprising in view of its omission of 1 Kings 3:16-28 and 4:2-33 and its use of portions of 10:26-29 in 2 Chron. 9:27. Perhaps especially 1 Kings 4:20-34 is one of those sections (see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction") of such importance for the writer that he has omitted its rote repetition in order to include it in his work in a more important and programmatic way.

2:1-8:16, The Building of the Temple. With these chapters the author comes to the high point of his work, already of supreme importance also in 1 Kings 5-8.

2 Chron. 2:1-18 describes the relations between Solomon and Hiram (see 1 Kings 5, rewritten here with considerable skill), though here the name of this well-known Tyrian king appears as Hiram. Solomon assigns 153,600 aliens to the work (2 Chron. 2:2, 17-18; 1 Kings 5:13-18 mentions an additional levy of 30,000 Israelites conscripted to work by rotation in the forests of Lebanon) and requests Hiram to provide timber for the Temple and a chief craftsman. Hiram responds by sending one Huramabi, whose mother was a Danite and whose father was from Tyre (2 Chron. 2:13-14). This Huramabi is perhaps to be identified with (a second) Hiram (1 Kings 7:13-14), whose mother is, however, from Naphtali. King Hiram also agrees upon a price for the timber.

The tendentious character of the narrative is apparent in that, first, Solomon's letter to Hiram provides opportunity to propound the significance of the Temple (2 Chron. 2:4-6). While agreeing with the Deuteronomistic historian that the Temple is not God's dwelling (1 Kings 5:3) but the place where his name dwells, emphasis falls primarily upon the Temple as a place of worship and sacrifice (the Hebrew qatar, conventionally translated "to burn incense," probably has this broader meaning in 2 Chron. 2:6). Second, the terminology associated with the building of the Temple and with Huramabi is heavily dependent upon the tabernacle narrative (cf., e.g., vv. 7-8, 14 with Exod. 28 and 35), and the designation of Huramabi as a "skilled" worker in vv. 7, 13 with the description of Bezalel in Exod. 31:1-5). Huramabi is, as one writer has called him, practically a second Bezalel, and his unusual name has been considered a conflation of Hiram/Huram and Bezalel's assistant Oholiab, also a Danite (Exod. 31:6). Third, the figure of Solomon presented is more proficient, more pious in Chronicles than in Kings. He leads his people to Gibeon to sacrifice, takes the initiative with Huram, sets the price for the timber, and expounds the meaning of the Temple. All is then in readiness for the work to begin.

2 Chron. 3:1-5:1 describes the construction of the Temple, an abbreviation of 1 Kings 6-7. Chronicles replaces the opening reference dating the building of the Temple in the four hundred and eightieth year since the Exodus with one identifying the site of the Temple with Ornan's threshing floor (1 Chron. 21:18; 22:1) and Mount Moriah (Gen. 22:2), the first known mention of the Jewish and Islamic tradition identifying the Temple site with Isaac's trial. The Chronicler omits the details concerning the construction of the Temple (1 Kings 6:4-20) as well as all mention of the building of Solomon's palace, which required no less than thirteen years (1 Kings 7:1-12), most of the details concerning the two pillars Jachin and Boaz (1 Kings 7:15-22), and all mention of ten bronze stands (1 Kings 7:27-37). His only significant addition appears to be 2 Chron. 5:6b-9, which may have been omitted from Kings by error. Other minor differences may be due to the author's knowledge of the Temple in his own day.

2 Chron. 5:1-14 depicts the placement of the Ark in the sanctuary and is largely identical with 1 Kings 7:51-8:11, except for vv. 11b-13, found in Chronicles only. The following variations appear to reflect the writer's interests: first, the Levites rather than the priests are named as bearing the Ark (2 Chron. 5:4; cf. 1 Kings 8:3). Second, 2 Chron. 5:5 mentions the tent of meeting, which is for Chronicles the tabernacle at Gibeon (1:2-6) and not the tent that David made for the Ark in Zion. The point of vv. 4-5 is that the Ark was brought up from Zion and the tent/tabernacle from Gibeon. The mention of the "levitical priests" (normally a Deuteronomistic expression) in v. 5b may already be secondary and is then borrowed by Kings from Chronicles. (1 Kings 8:4b is lacking in the Greek, though present in the Hebrew.) Third, between the two halves of 1 Kings 8:10, Chronicles contains a major insertion (vv. 11b-13), sometimes judged late, calling attention to both the sanctity of the priests (v. 11b) and to the presence of the Levites and singers, Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun, clothed in garments of fine linen (cf. 1 Chron. 15:27) and with their musical instruments. Fourth, the presence of the glory of the Lord in 2 Chron. 7:1-3, where it is absent from the parallel in 1 Kings 8:54-62, has suggested to some that 2 Chron. 5:11a, 13b-14 are secondary here.

2 Chron. 6:1-42 contains Solomon's blessing and prayer, and is largely identical with 1 Kings 8:12-53. Verses 1-2, like 1 Kings 8:12-13, stand contrary to the basic emphasis of the Deuteronomistic History upon the Temple as the place where God's name dwells and perhaps stems from an earlier day when such precision was felt unnecessary (2 Chron. 6:18-20; 1 Kings 8:27-29). 1 Kings 8:16 seems to say God had chosen no city but had chosen David—Chronicles rephrases this to parallel the choice of Jerusalem and David (2 Chron. 6:5-6). Verse 13 may well have dropped out of the Kings text, since 1 Kings 8:54 mentions Solomon's rising from the kneeling reported only in that verse.

At the end of Solomon's prayer, Chronicles attaches Ps. 132:8-9 (2 Chron. 6:41-42). These verses join Yahweh's choice of Zion as his resting place (Ps. 132:8, 13-14; cf. 1 Chron. 17:1, 10; 22:8-10; 28:2) with his choice of David (2 Chron. 6:4, 10, 11, 17) and so were admirably suited to his own interests. Too much, probably, should not be made of the omission of 1 Kings 8:53, touching upon the Exodus, although the Exodus certainly does not occupy for Chronicles the dominant place it does elsewhere in the OT. The theme of rest expressed here through the quote from Psalm 132 was probably suggested by its mention in a third speech of Solomon reported in 1 Kings 8:56-61 but omitted by Chronicles. Like 1 Kings 5:3-6, this third speech centered on the rest denied David but granted Solomon.

2 Chron. 7:1-22 concludes the dedication (cf. 1 Kings 8:54-9:9). Chronicles presents in this section an account (clearly of paramount importance for the writer) that is both highly dependent upon his source and unusually independent as well.

First, on 7:1b-2, cf. 1 Kings 8:10-11 and 2 Chron. 5:11a, 13b-14, where it is perhaps secondary, Chronicles perhaps thinking this a more appropriate place for the appearance of the divine glory (Heb. kabod). Chronicles adds only the consuming fire of 7:1b, indicating the divine approval and recalling 1 Chron. 21:26; Exod. 24:17; 40:34; and Lev. 9:23-24. To this account of the divine epiphany Chronicles adds the worship of the people (7:3), whose praise is again summarized with the characteristic words "his steadfast love endures forever" (cf. v. 6 and 5:13).

Second, special attention is due at this point to the omission of 1 Kings 8:54-61, Solomon's concluding prayer pointing to this occasion as marking the rest that God has promised his people and as the culmination of his promises to Moses and David (1 Kings 8:56). These verses (1 Kings 8:54-61) also state clearly both poles of that divine retribution seen in 1 Chron. 28:9 that will dominate the writer's presentations in 2 Chronicles 10-36. Recall also the omission of other significant sections, such as 1 Kings 5:3-6.

The report in 1 Kings 8:62-66 already contained themes common to Chronicles, such as the theme of "all Israel" (vv. 62, 65), numerous sacrifices (vv. 63-64), feasting (v. 65), and joy (v. 66). Chronicles has nevertheless again indicated the participation of priests and levitical musicians (2 Chron. 7:6) and lengthened the dedicatory feast by seven days, perhaps believing that the dedication of the altar and Tabernacles (the feast of the seventh month) ought not overlap. Most significantly, God's goodness to "David his servant and Israel his people" has been altered to include mention of King Solomon.

On vv. 11-22, cf. 1 Kings 8:62-66. Yahweh's speech at his second appearance to Solomon is altered to include the designation of the Temple as a "house of sacrifice" (2 Chron. 7:12). It has been observed that, especially in the words of v. 14, four avenues of repentance are uncovered (to humble oneself, pray, seek, turn) that will lead to God's hearing, forgiving, and healing of people and land and that such a theology is meant to proclaim to the exiles that no circumstances are too formidable to prevent God from fulfilling his promise. These terms are indeed the heart of the writer's theology from this point on and point to the dedication of the Temple as the beginning of a new era in Israel's history. Notice too that in these verses the conditional nature of the covenant with Solomon is retained (vv. 17-18; cf. 1 Kings 9:4-8), as is the mention of the Exodus (v. 22; cf. 1 Kings 9:9).

For 2 Chron. 8:1-18, cf. 1 Kings 9:10-28, which presents something of a miscellany of remarks here before concluding its account of Solomon's reign. While textual corruption appears likely in places (cf. the mention of 250 officers in v. 10 with 1 Kings 9:23), the writer of Chronicles has found several statements unacceptable and rewritten them to reflect more favorably upon Solomon.

First, 1 Kings 9:10-13 spoke of cities that Solomon had sold to Hiram, obviously to finance his building operations. The Chronicler, thinking such an action unworthy of Solomon, has simply reversed the direction of the transaction.

Second, 1 Kings 9:15-19 had spoken briefly of building operations of Solomon, including a house for the pharaoh's daughter. While textual corruption seems probable here, Chronicles has Solomon active in the otherwise unknown Hamath-zobah, probably to be identified with Hamath, the ideal northern boundary of Israel (cf. 2 Chron. 7:8), and Tadmor, the significant Syrian city of Palmyra, and explains the move of the pharaoh's daughter from the city of David (1 Kings 9:24) as due to Solomon's concern for the sanctity of the Ark (2 Chron. 8:11).

Third, the brief note of 1 Kings 9:25 concerning Solomon's thrice-yearly sacrifices is taken as the opportunity to present what must be understood as the conclusion to the Temple narrative, 2 Chron. 8:13-15. Solomon's offerings are multiplied to include also the daily, weekly, and monthly offerings, and the appointment of the priests, Levites, and gatekeepers according to David's command is mentioned. In conclusion, the simple statement of Kings, "So he finished the house," is elaborated: "Thus was accomplished all the work of Solomon from the day the foundation of the house of the LORD was laid until it was finished. So the house of the LORD was completed" (v. 16, RSV).

8:17-9:31, Solomon's Riches and Wisdom. 2 Chron. 8:17-18, together with 9:1-24, which repeats almost verbatim 1 Kings 10:1-25, provide a fitting description of Solomon's prosperity. The same is true of 9:25, which, however, varies more from 1 Kings 9:26.

From that point on, Chronicles proceeds more selectively. 2 Chron. 9:26, "And he [Solomon] ruled over all the kings from the Euphrates to the land of the Philistines, and to the border of Egypt" (RSV), is inserted at this point from 1 Kings 4:21 before repeating vv. 27-28 from 1 Kings 10:27-28. But most significantly, the entire content of 1 Kings 11:1-40 is omitted, and the Solomon history is concluded by appending in vv. 29-31 a form of 1 Kings 11:41-43 amended only by the replacement of "the book of the acts of Solomon" with mention of prophets known to be active in Solomon's day: Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo (cf. 1 Chron. 29:29).

The result is that Solomon ends his reign as he has begun it—as a perfectly faithful king. Gone is all reference to foreign women, who turned away his heart to follow foreign gods. Absent is all negative evaluation, such as that of 1 Kings 11:6, "So Solomon did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD, and did not wholly follow the LORD, as David his father had done" (RSV). Omitted also are the references to Yahweh's anger (1 Kings 11:9) and the resulting decision to tear the kingdom from Solomon (although not during his life) but to retain a single tribe for the sake of David (1 Kings 11:9-13).

Likewise omitted is the opposition that God raised up against Solomon from Hadad the Edomite, Rezon of Syria, and Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:14–40). Solomon thus dies, in the presentation of Chronicles, as the king who has not only built the Temple but who remained faithful throughout his life and whose life has accordingly witnessed that God-given prosperity that regularly attends such faithfulness: building operations (2 Chron. 8:3–6), riches and wisdom (9:22, 27–28), and receipt of tribute from foreign kings (9:24). At the end of Solomon's life there is faithful obedience to God; hence there is peace, unity, and prosperity, with the Temple and its services standing firmly at the center of the nation's existence.

10:1–36:23

Post-Solomonic Kings of Judah

With the death of Solomon the writer adopts a different manner of dealing with his subjects. After giving his account of the division of the kingdom (2 Chron. 10), he normally omits those portions of Kings dealing with the Northern Kingdom (cf. 1 Kings 12:25–14:20). Concerning the Southern Kingdom, evaluations of the various rulers are generally accepted at face value; these are, however, understood rigidly in terms of the dogma of retribution. Obedience results in prosperity, expressed in terms of wealth, wisdom, "rest," building operations, a large family, victory in warfare, and tribute from foreign nations. Disobedience results in punishment, most commonly in the form of defeat in warfare. Prophets appear upon the scene frequently, interpreting events in that light, and while repentance is always a possibility, rejection of the prophetic message leads to individual, and ultimately national, disaster.

10:1–12:16

The Reign of Rehoboam (ca. 922–915 B.C.)

The Chronicler devotes considerable space to Rehoboam, including not only all of the material of Kings except that related exclusively to Jeroboam but also considerable material of his own (cf. 11:5–23; 12:1, 3–8, 12). In so doing he expresses his own theology.

10:1–11:4, The Division of the Kingdom. Cf. 1 Kings 12:1–24, repeated here almost verbatim. But Chronicles omits most of 1 Kings 11, which describes both Solomon's faithlessness and Jeroboam's place in the divine plan.

Recent textual studies indicate that some ancient versions of Kings gave Jeroboam little part in the schism between north and south (cf. the current confusion in the text of the RSV between 1 Kings 12:2, 12, and 20). On the basis of various Greek manuscripts, it appears likely that Chronicles was the first to judge Jeroboam a chief cause of that schism, a viewpoint later inserted into Kings from Chronicles. Earlier versions of Kings had Jeroboam returning from Egypt only in 12:20.

Note should be made that in 1 Kings 11 the term "Israel" is used for the northern tribes, whence it is borrowed by Chronicles and used in the same sense. In 1 Kings 12:19, for example, "Israel" is used in contrast with the house of David. At other times, however, a theological distinction is made. Thus Kings speaks of the words of the prophet Shemaiah to "all the house of Judah and Benjamin, and to the remainder of the people" (12:23), which Chronicles rephrases as "all Israel in Judah and Benjamin" (2 Chron. 11:3). Precise meaning of the term must also be derived from the context.

11:5–23, Rehoboam's Faithfulness. The passage is without parallel in Kings and apparently placed here to establish a principle. 1 Kings will report (14:25) that Shishak of Egypt successfully invaded Jerusalem in the fifth year of Rehoboam, a judgment accepted by 2 Chronicles (12:2). Since retribution is not only certain but swift, the author has apparently concluded that Judah was faithful for three years (defined as walking "in the way of David and Solomon," 2 Chron. 11:17) and apparently became disobedient in the fourth year (12:1–9).

This three-year period of faithfulness results in God-given prosperity, expressed concretely in terms that will be met repeatedly. First, Rehoboam engages in building operations in Judah and Benjamin, especially fortified cities (2 Chron. 11:5–12; cf. v. 23). While most of the cities named are reasonably well known, it is disputed whether the list actually comes from the time of Rehoboam or from a later date. Second, "All Israel," represented by the priests and Levites who had been driven out of the north by Jeroboam's religious innovations (cf. 1 Kings 12:25–33) and others "who had set their hearts to seek the Lord" (2 Chron. 11:16), immediately recognized the legitimacy of the Jerusalem Temple. Third, Rehoboam fathers no less than twenty-eight sons and sixty daughters of his eighteen wives and sixty concubines. Fourth, despite Rehoboam's apparent foolishness, as reported in chap. 10, leading to the division of the kingdom, Chronicles nevertheless remarks upon his wisdom (2 Chron. 11:23). Such prosperity, the writer wants to say, is the reward of the faithful!

12:1–16, Rehoboam's Apostasy. Kings had reported (1 Kings 14:25–28) the invasion of Shi-shak, which is outlined also in that king's own annals. In line with his theology of retribution, the Chronicler adds his own comments in 2 Chron. 12:1 and in the words of Shemaiah in v. 7, making that disaster due to the fact that Rehoboam and "all Israel with him" forsook the law and so abandoned the Lord (cf. 1 Chron. 28:9). His words in 2 Chron. 12:6-8 are more nuanced, and perhaps specifics are out of place. The writer clearly wants to affirm both that Shishak executed punishment in some form upon Judah/Jerusalem because of Rehoboam's unfaithfulness and that because Rehoboam and Israel's leaders repented ("humbled themselves," vv. 6, 7 [twice], 12), they were spared complete destruction (vv. 7, 12). God will grant them "some deliverance" (v. 7), although they will be servants of Shishak. It may well be that the writer has tried to include here a description of the circumstances of his own age, which were themselves more complicated than simple formulas could describe.

The phrases evaluating conditions show something of that same ambivalence. Kings contains no evaluation of Rehoboam but does contain a more extended statement on the evils of Judah, including Judah's erection of idolatrous high places (1 Kings 14:22-24). Chronicles states that Rehoboam did evil and adds its own characteristic vocabulary, "for he did not set his heart to seek the LORD" (emphasis mine; cf. 1 Chron. 10:14). The statement that "conditions were good in Judah" (2 Chron. 12:12, RSV) is certainly unusual.

For vv. 15-16, see 1 Kings 14:29-31. The reference to the "Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah" has again been replaced with two prophetic sources: Shemaiah (cf. 2 Chron. 12:5) and Iddo, previously named in 9:29.

13:1-22

The Reign of Abijah (ca. 915-913 B.C.)

The brief story of Abijah in 1 Kings 15 includes only the customary introduction (1 Kings 15:1-2; repeated here in vv. 1-2); a somewhat expanded statement of his evil ("he walked in all the sins which his father [i.e., Rehoboam] did before him," 1 Kings 15:3) contrasting him with David (vv. 4-6); the mention of his continual warfare with Jeroboam (v. 6); and a closing notice (vv. 7-8). Chronicles features, instead, a single battle between Abijah (perhaps a more "Yahwistic" form of the name Abijam) and Jeroboam, which serves as the stage for a lengthy speech of Abijah, surely reflecting the thought of Chronicles itself.

First, the "kingdom of the Lord" (2 Chron. 13:5, 8) has been given to David and his descendants for ever. Second, Jeroboam and his followers have forsaken God, rebelling against his chosen king Rehoboam when he was young and immature (v. 6; cf. 1 Chron. 29:1) and replacing the legitimate ministry of priests and Levites with illegitimate priests serving "nothing gods" (2 Chron. 13:9), i.e., the golden calves who are pictured as being present with Jeroboam (v. 8). Third, the Lord is with Abijah and his people, however, who have not forsaken the Lord but have Aaronidic priests and Levites performing the services of God.

In such circumstances, of course, the course of the battle is never in doubt. Those who fight against the Lord cannot succeed (v. 12). The battle itself is related in terms reminiscent of holy war. Although Abijah's army numbers "only" 400,000 men versus Jeroboam's 800,000—both unrealistically large numbers—the men of Judah, with priestly trumpeters at their head, cried to the Lord (v. 14) and shouted (v. 15), and "God defeated Jeroboam and all Israel before Abijah and Judah" (v. 15, RSV). With no fewer than 500,000 Israelites slain, the message of the battle is made explicit: "Thus the men of Israel were subdued at that time, and the men of Judah prevailed, because they relied upon the LORD" (v. 18, RSV). So, the writer surely wishes to state, those who are faithful to God will regularly triumph over their enemies!

Following the battle, additional evidence is given for the principle of retribution: Abijah captures cities in Israel, including Bethel, and takes them from Jeroboam (v. 19), "grows mighty" (v. 21), and has a large family of fourteen wives, twenty-two sons, and sixteen daughters (cf. 11:18-22); while, Jeroboam, on the other hand, never recovers his power, is smitten by the Lord, and dies (13:20).

The unknown prophet Iddo is again cited as the source for further information (v. 22; cf. 12:15), and Abijah is buried peacefully.

It is difficult to determine the reason the writer has used the reign of Abijah (whose evaluation as an evil king it was necessary to reverse) to introduce such a programmatic statement of faithfulness and illustrate it so elaborately. Perhaps, with Rehoboam's defeat before Shishak an established fact, Abijah's reign simply presented the first convenient opportunity to do so. At any rate, the picture of the "ideal Israel," with Davidic king and legitimate priesthood at its head, is here painted clearly.

14:1-16:14

Asa (ca. 913-873 B.C.)

Kings evaluates Asa very highly (cf. 1 Kings 15:9-24). Three items, however, would have been adverse to the theology of Chronicles: first, it is noted he had war with Baasha (1 Kings 15:16); second, he made a treaty with Ben-hadad of Damascus; third, in his old age he had diseased feet (1 Kings 15:23). With those problems in mind, Chronicles has expanded the sixteen verses of Kings into some forty-seven and divided Asa's reign, like that of Rehoboam, into two distinct periods.

14:1–15:19, Asa's Faithfulness. Asa is one of the kings most highly regarded by the Deuteronomistic historian, who concludes that his heart was "wholly true to the Lord all his days" (1 Kings 15:14). Asa even engaged in reforms of the system of worship and contributed to the Temple treasury (1 Kings 15:12–15). His only shortcoming was that the high places were not abolished (1 Kings 15:14), a criticism made of every king of Judah except Josiah.

In view of Asa's faithfulness, Chronicles expands this first and positive portion of Asa's reign. After rephrasing his cultic reforms (2 Chron. 14:3), Chronicles adds other signs of Asa's prosperity. Three times it is stated that the land had rest under him (vv. 1, 6, 7), marking a further development of the rest theology expressed most fully in 1 Chron. 22:8–10. Asa also engaged in building operations (the fact that they are listed as fortified cities is insignificant). In addition to the explicit statement that he prospered (cf. 1 Chron. 28:8), we are told he fielded an army of 580,000 from Judah and Benjamin. This happened because, in response to Asa's plea, the people had sought the Lord (2 Chron. 14:7).

As a further mark of Asa's prosperity, a battle with one Zerah the Ethiopian is recounted (vv. 9–15). Although Zerah had an army of a million men (!), Asa's cry to God indicates his trust in him (v. 11), so that Zerah and his army were totally decimated before "the Lord and his army" (v. 12). Notes of the "fear of the Lord" (v. 14) and the plunder of the enemy (vv. 13–15) add to the note of holy war and parallel the thought in 13:13–19. While it may be disputed whether a historical kernel underlies this account, in its present position it serves as an example of military victory following upon faithfulness.

2 Chron. 15:1–7 contains the words of Azariah, designated a prophet by the fact that the spirit of the Lord came upon him (v. 1), and is again full of the thought and vocabulary of Chronicles. This is true above all of vv. 2 and 4, where the doctrine of retribution is stated in classic form (turned, sought, was found). The specific time referred to in vv. 3–6 when Israel was without the true God, a teaching priest, or Torah is unclear, but the age of the judges is the most likely. More important are the marks of unfaithfulness cited and the resulting warfare and distress. In view of that negative example, Asa is exhorted to courage and action (v. 7).

2 Chron. 15:8–19 contains additional reforms. Azariah's exhortation leads Asa to renewed reforms, including, significantly, removal of (all?) idols from Judah, Benjamin, and "the cities which he had taken in the hill country of Ephraim" (v. 8, RSV). Thus Asa, like Rehoboam (11:16), welcomes converts from the north and, like Abijah (13:19), makes military incursions into the north. These reforms and his covenant with those from Judah and Benjamin as well as from Israel (Ephraim, Manasseh, and Simeon; 15:9) appear to presage those of Hezekiah and Josiah, which are similarly marked. The ceremonies attending this covenant, which is probably associated with the Feast of Pentecost in the third month, are described in terms similar to other festive events—trumpets, rejoicing, "all their heart," "whole desire," "was found by them"—such as David's coronation at Hebron (1 Chron. 12), Solomon's accession (1 Chron. 29), and the dedication of the Temple (2 Chron. 7). In conclusion, it is stated yet again that "the LORD gave them rest round about" (emphasis mine; 15:15).

2 Chron. 15:6–19 largely repeats 1 Kings 15:13–15, the removal of Asa's grandmother Maacah for her idolatry. But Chronicles has reconciled the statement of 1 Kings 15:14 that the high places were not taken away with its own position that Asa removed some high places (14:3) by adding "from Israel" (i.e., the north).

16:1–14, Asa's Faithlessness. Verses 1–6 describe Asa's war with Baasha of Israel and his alliance with Ben-hadad of Syria (cf. 1 Kings 15:16–22). The warfare that Kings notes as lasting throughout Asa's reign is here dated to his thirty-sixth year (v. 1; cf. 15:19). Baasha's embargo of Judah results in an alliance by Asa with Ben-hadad. In the holy war context, such an alliance is always a sign of lack of faith and calls for retribution (cf. Isa. 8:1–15; → Ban).

In 2 Chron. 16:7–10, the words of Hanani express Chronicles' theology. The prophet condemns Asa's lack of faith, recalls his victories over the Ethiopians and Libyans when he trusted in the Lord, and indicates that from now on he will have war. Asa not only rejects the words of the prophet but adds to his evil by having him imprisoned and inflicting other undefined cruelties upon the people.

Verses 11–14 recount Asa's last days. Asa's diseased feet, placed only in "old age" by 1 Kings 15:23, are dated by Chronicles in the thirty-ninth of his forty-one-year reign. Chronicles adds that even this final indignity did not lead Asa to trust, but that he turned to doctors instead. The burial notice is an expanded form of that found in Kings.

We could conclude that Asa is marked at his death as an unrepentant and faithless king. That would be to ignore the generally positive evaluation of him taken over from Kings, however, together with the extensive reforms and prosperity attributed to him earlier. It should be noted that the Chronicler's theology devotes no less than thirty-five of his years to peace and prosperity, with only the final five to warfare and bodily affliction. The total picture, therefore, is overwhelmingly positive and highly suggestive of the two kings evaluated most strongly by Kings and Chronicles, Hezekiah and Josiah.

17:1-20:37

Jehoshaphat (ca. 873-849 B.C.)

Chronicles contains some hundred verses devoted to King Jehoshaphat, of which some sixty-three (including most of chaps. 17, 19, and 20) have no parallel in the fifty verses of Kings. On the other hand, 2 Chronicles 20 is a nearly verbatim copy of 1 Kings 22.

Jehoshaphat was highly regarded by the Deuteronomistic historian, who concluded, as with his father Asa, that he did that which was right except that the high places were not removed (1 Kings 22:43). The Chronicler accordingly uses Jehoshaphat's reign to restate a number of his previous emphases and to add new dimensions to the work of the pious king, apparently finding only two matters in the account of Kings to which he felt it necessary to take exception.

2 Chron. 17:1-6 points to Jehoshaphat's prosperity. The story of Jehoshaphat begins by stating his faithfulness and presenting examples of the resulting prosperity. His building operations included garrisons not only in Judah, but also "in the cities of Ephraim which Asa his father had taken" (v. 2). Because he sought the Lord, God was with him and established his kingdom (v. 3). Jehoshaphat received tribute from Judah (sic) and had great riches and honor. Verse 6 even states, contrary to 20:33 (cf. 14:3), that he removed the high places from Judah. These are the regular marks of a pious king in Chronicles.

2 Chron. 17:7-9 describes Jehoshaphat's faithfulness further in that, in his third year, i.e., early in his reign, he sends a group of five princes, nine (or ten) Levites, and two priests throughout Judah teaching the book of the Torah (see also 19:4-11).

2 Chron. 17:10-19 describes Jehoshaphat's military might. The marks of God's blessing are again stereotypical. Jehoshaphat is feared by the surrounding nations, two of whom, the Philistines and Arabs, bring tribute. He builds fortresses and store cities and has an army of no fewer than 1,160,000 men, not counting those in the fortified cities throughout the land!

In 18:1-34, Jehoshaphat joins Ahab of Israel to fight against the king of Aram at Ramoth-gilead. Apart from vv. 1-2, which restate Jeho-shaphat's honor and riches (cf. 1 Kings 22:1-2, where the position of Jehoshaphat is more honorific and Ahab more treacherous), these verses are almost a carbon copy of 1 Kings 22:3-35a.

The reason for the inclusion of the chapter is difficult to determine, since Chronicles will voice somewhat gentle exception to it (see 2 Chron. 19:1-3). Perhaps the writer, who is intensely interested in prophecy, was struck by the presentation of that phenomenon here. The only obvious tendentious alteration is in 18:31, where Jehoshaphat's outcry to God results in his being helped (cf. 1 Kings 22:32-33).

The writer somewhat surprisingly omits the rather gruesome details surrounding Ahab's death, even though it was in accord with the prophetic word (2 Chron. 19:1-3; cf. 1 Kings 22:35b-38). He is more interested in the safe return of Jehoshaphat to Jerusalem (2 Chron. 19:1) and in his meeting with the prophet Jehu, the son of the prophet Hanani who had prophesied to his father Asa (16:7). Jehu condemns Jehoshaphat for his association with the wicked Ahab, although the punishment is very general ("wrath has gone out against you from the Lord") and is immediately blunted by noting that "some good things" were found in him, including his destruction of the Asherahs and establishing his heart to seek the Lord.

2 Chron. 19:4-11 demonstrates Jehoshaphat's zeal for the Lord in that he personally undertakes "missionary work" to "bring back" the people "from Beersheba to the hill country of Ephraim" (v. 4; i.e., in both Judah and Israel) to God. Jehoshaphat appoints lay judges throughout the land, exhorting them to judge justly and impartially, and does the same with Levites, priests, and family heads in Jerusalem. This "supreme court" in Jerusalem had a priest in charge of religious matters and a representative of the king in secular matters, assisted by Levites. Jehoshaphat's final words to them (v. 11) are closely akin to the installation genre utilized by David in 1 Chronicles 22.

Since these verses are without parallel, it is disputed whether they have a historical basis or whether they might be a product of the writer's understanding of the name Jehoshaphat, which means "Yahweh judges." That priests and Levites at one time exercised a teaching and judicial function in Israel is clear (cf. Deut. 17:8-13); whether a specific example of that is given here is impossible to say with certainty.

2 Chron. 20:1-30 describes Jehoshaphat's battle of faith. In the face of attack by Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites (see RSV footnote), Jehoshaphat responds as a faithful king should. He proclaims a fast throughout the land and assembles Judah to seek the Lord (vv. 3-4).

2 Chron. 20:5-12 contains Jehoshaphat's prayer. This prayer before the Temple in Jerusalem, like David's earlier, points to the omnipotence of God and the impotence of the people without him (v. 6; cf. 1 Chron. 29:10-19). Drawing upon traditions as diverse as Abraham, the gift of the land, and the Temple (2 Chron. 20:7-9), Jehoshaphat casts himself and his people upon God's mercy. It is quite probable that the exilic or postexilic situation of the Jews is prominent here in the writer's mind (cf. the prayer in Neh. 9, which voices many similar themes).

The prophetic response to Jehoshaphat's prayer comes through Jahaziel, a member of the levitical choir (2 Chron. 20:14). Enveloped by the "fear nots" of the priestly oracle in vv. 15-17 is the reminder that the battle belongs to God, who will deliver his people without any need on their part to fight. In response, Jehoshaphat, Judah, the Jerusalemites, and the remaining Levites worshiped and praised God.

The battle, which might better be termed a liturgy, takes place in the wilderness of Tekoa. Jehoshaphat urges faith in God and his prophets (cf. Exod. 14:31) in order that they might succeed (cf. 1 Chron. 29:23). The appointed singers, obviously to be considered Levites, break forth with their favorite chorus, "Give thanks to the Lord, for his steadfast love lasts forever" (cf., e.g., 1 Chron. 16:41; 2 Chron. 5:13), and with the outbreak of their singing God's ambush of the enemy is sprung (20:21-23). In typical holy war language, the scene is described as one of panic in which Israel's enemies destroy themselves. When the people of Judah arrive, they find nothing but dead bodies, and nothing remains but to pick up the spoil, which requires no less than three days (v. 25).

The journey to the Jerusalem Temple is more like a choir procession, and the language that speaks of musical instruments (esp. trumpets), joy, and rejoicing is reminiscent of other occasions of great festivity (cf. 1 Chron. 15:25-28; 2 Chron. 7:1-10). Fear once again descends on the surrounding countries (20:29; cf. 17:10), and God gives Jehoshaphat rest, even as he has Solomon and Asa (1 Chron. 22:8-10; 2 Chron. 14:1, 6).

2 Chron. 20:31-34 reproduces 1 Kings 22:41-46 without significant alteration. The repetition of the statement that the high places were not taken away, which stands in conflict with 2 Chron. 17:6, is probably due to careless editing exhibited rather commonly by the writer, who appears unconcerned about this type of inconsistency. Finally, the Kings account refers us to the "Book of the Kings of Judah" for more information, while Chronicles refers to the works of Jehu in the "Book of the Kings of Israel."

1 Kings 22:47-50 is rewritten significantly in 2 Chron. 20:35-37. Trading alliances, like military alliances (16:7-9; 19:1-3), are obviously anathema to the writer. Eliezer prophesies destruction of a fleet built to go to Tarshish, and the result is as predicted.

21:1-20

Jehoram (ca. 849-842 B.C.)

Jehoram is the first king the Chronicler portrays as completely evil. In doing so, he again adopts the evaluation of Kings (2 Kings 8:18) and, in view of the material presented there (vv. 16-24), has no need to condition that judgment.

Of Jehoram, Kings had reported only his evil, together with the usual closing formulas. Kings appears to attribute Jehoram's evil to the fact that the daughter (or sister) of Ahab (i.e., the wicked Athaliah) was his wife; that, because of his promise to David, God refused to destroy Judah; and that Edom and Libnah revolted during his days.

The Chronicler includes almost all of this material, since it conforms perfectly to his scheme of retribution. He has however expanded his account significantly.

Verses 1-4 are a list of Jehoram's brothers. Although without parallel elsewhere, at least the names may well be based on a historical source. The statement of v. 3 that Jehoram was made king because he was the eldest at least suggests that he was otherwise unfit, and the notice that he murdered his brothers (v. 4) adds to that possibility.

Verses 5-10 are taken from 1 Kings 8:16-24, with only minor variations. Although the wording of the dynastic promise in 2 Chron. 21:7 appears to be sharpened, one somehow feels it has been done dispassionately, and it is not Judah, as in 1 Kings 8:19, but the house of David itself that is the benefactor of the promise. The portrayal of the Edomite revolt here (2 Chron. 21:8-10a), as in Kings, is unclear, but the outcome is surely meant to be negative for Jehoram and Judah. The final phrase of v. 10, "because he had forsaken the Lord" (emphasis mine), is the Chronicler's typical addition.

Verses 12-15 speak of a letter from the prophet Elijah, who may well have been dead by this time (cf. 2 Kings 2), condemning Jehoram for his unfaithfulness (2 Chron. 21:13; cf. v. 11) and promising a plague upon the nation and Jehoram's family in general and sickness for Jehoram in particular. The vocabulary and generalized nature both of Jehoram's "unfaithfulness" and of the resulting punishment strongly suggest this letter is a free composition of the Chronicler, who may well have felt that Elijah's activity, while centered in the north around Ahab, should include the similar activity of Athaliah in the south as well.

Verses 16-20 reflect the outcome of that prophecy. Philistines and Arabs revolt and despoil the king's house, his wives, and sons so that only Jehoahaz (who is the Ahaziah of 22:1) remains. Jehoram himself is smitten with an affliction of the bowels (21:18-19) and dies in pain and, quite obviously, in humiliation and disgrace. His burial notice (no fires [v. 19], "with no one's regret," "not in the tombs of the kings" [v. 20]) indicates the disdain of the public (and the writer) for him, as does perhaps the omission of the closing reference to other sources of material on his life (though present in Kings). Nobody, the writer seems to be saying, really cared.

22:1-9

Ahaziah (ca. 843-842 B.C.)

Verses 1-6 are taken from 2 Kings 8:25-29 with little variation. Ahaziah's mother, Athaliah, is cited as the cause for her son's evil (2 Chron. 22:2-3), as she had been for her husband earlier (21:6). Ahaziah's action in joining with Joram of Israel in war against Syria is also related more directly to evil counsel received from the house of Ahab (22:5; cf. 2 Kings 8:27).

Verses 7-9 represent a summary rewriting of 2 Kings 9:14-28, told here with the entire emphasis upon Ahaziah and provided with interpretative comments. Above all, it is stated that Ahaziah's death in visiting Joram was ordained by God (2 Chron. 22:7). There are other minor differences between the two accounts, such as the circumstances surrounding Ahaziah's death, and Chronicles adds the explanation that Ahaziah was buried because he was the grandson of Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart (v. 9).

22:10-23:21

Athaliah (ca. 842-837 B.C.)

For vv. 10-12, cf. 2 Kings 11:1-3. Athaliah takes advantage of the death of her son Ahaziah to kill the remainder of the royal family of Judah. Ahaziah's sister, Jehoshabeath (Kings: "Jehosheba"), however, hides her nephew Joash with her six years in the house of the Lord while Athaliah serves as the only queen ever to reign over Judah (or Israel). Chronicles makes explicit that this Jehoshabeath was the wife of Jehoiada the priest (v. 11), who appears unannounced in 2 Kings 11:4.

2 Chron. 23:1-15 recounts Jehoiada's revolution (cf. 2 Kings 11:4-16, with which our text is often in verbatim agreement). The Chronicler, however, includes the following in his account of placing Joash on the throne.

First, while Kings speaks of the captains of the Carites and of the guards (v. 4), i.e., various Temple officials, Chronicles pictures a much broader conspiracy involving five captains of hundreds (23:1) who gather the Levites from Judah and the heads of father's houses from Israel to place Joash on the throne. Indeed, apart from Jehoiada, there is no explicit participation of priests and Levites in the Kings account.

For Chronicles, the priests and Levites alone enter the Temple (v. 6) and take up guard around Joash (v. 7). And while the participation of the people of the land is duly noted, the mention of Judah's obedience and the participation of the singers with their musical instruments is added (vv. 8, 13; cf. 2 Kings 11:9, 14).

Second, when Jehoiada presents Joash before the initial assembly, Kings states only that he showed them the king's son. Chronicles states dramatically: "Behold, the king's son. Let him reign, as the Lord spoke concerning the sons of David" (2 Chron. 23:3; cf. 2 Kings 11:4).

2 Chron. 23:16-21 contains Jehoiada's covenant. In 2 Kings 11:17-21 there is reference to two covenants, one religious and one civil. Chronicles speaks only of the religious covenant in which all agree that they should be the Lord's people. The scope of the reforms that follow, including destruction of the house of Baal, is the same in both texts, but the "watchmen" whom Jehoiada installs for the Temple in Kings (11:18) are placed under proper levitical supervision, and opportunity is taken to add additional reference to their position with reference to Moses and David (vv. 18b-19). The notes of joy and peace and quietness voiced in 2 Chron. 23:21, however, are already found in the Deuteronomistic source (2 Kings 11:20; see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction"), another example of a note first sounded there but intensified in Chronicles.

24:1-27

Joash (ca. 837-800 B.C.)

On Joash, see 2 Kings 12, which affirmed that "Jehoiash did what was right . . . all his days, because Jehoiada the priest instructed him" (v. 2, RSV), although the high places were not taken away. Kings, however, also contains two items incongruous with that position as understood by Chronicles: tribute paid to Hazael of Syria (vv. 17-18) and Joash's death in a conspiracy (vv. 19-21). Accordingly, Chronicles has characteristically retained the general evaluation of Joash as good but divided his reign into two distinct periods.

24:1-14, Joash's Faithfulness. 2 Kings 12:2 is rewritten so that Joash did good only so long as Jehoiada the priest lived (2 Chron. 24:2). Verse 3, which speaks, though very briefly, of Joash's family, is probably to be considered a part of the indication of Joash's blessing (cf. 2 Chron. 13:18-21), as is the account of the reforms undertaken in vv. 4-14, a more drastic rewriting of 2 Kings 12:4-16.

While detailed comparison is impossible here, Chronicles' rewriting characteristically gives more importance to the work of the Levites (vv. 5, 11), although, if the present text is a unit, vv. 5b-6 would mark a rare case in which the writer is critical of the Levites. Other changes, such as placing the offering chest "outside the gate of the house of the Lord" (v. 8) rather than "beside the altar" (2 Kings 12:9), reflect the writer's view of what was permitted in his own day. Once again, some of the problem is laid at the feet of Athaliah (v. 7). The writer also apparently considered it unlikely that sufficient money was not raised to pay both for Temple repair and for the precious vessels (v. 14; cf. 2 Kings 12:13-14).

24:15-16, Jehoiada's Death. The praise of the priest Jehoiada is indicated in that he lived no less than one hundred and thirty years and was buried among the kings.

24:17-27, Joash Under Judgment. This is 2 Kings 12:17-21 rewritten and expanded. The words are fully characteristic of Chronicles. Judah forsakes the house of the Lord, and "wrath came upon Judah and Jerusalem" (2 Chron. 24:18; cf. 19:2). The significance of the prophetic warning is both reminiscent of 12:12 and 16:10 and anticipatory of the final judgment upon Judah's fall in 36:12-16.

The prophetic message is delivered this time by a priest, Jehoiada's son Zechariah. Judah has forsaken the Lord and so has been forsaken by him (24:20; cf. 1 Chron. 28:9) and cannot prosper (cf. 1 Chron. 29:23). Zechariah's murder indicates a final refusal to respond to divine correction, and its mention in Luke 11:51 (as well as Matt. 23:35, where he is improperly called the son of Barachiah, confusing him with the literary prophet of the same name, Zech. 1:1) indicates that already at that time Chronicles stood near the end of the Hebrew canon.

Retribution is once again swift. The Syrian invasion (2 Chron. 24:23-24; cf. 2 Kings 12:17-21) is described both as a result of Judah's having forsaken the Lord and as an execution of judgment upon Joash. Missing, however, is any indication that Joash used the contents of the Temple treasuries to buy off Hazael (cf. 2 Kings 12:18).

For the closing notice, 2 Chron. 24:25-27, cf. 2 Kings 12:20-21. The conspiracy mentioned in Kings is here explicitly related to the murder of Jehoiada's son, and the two conspirators are designated as a Moabite and an Ammonite through their mothers, probably a further dishonor. Finally, Chronicles does not permit Joash to be buried among the kings (cf. 2 Kings 12:21). The work to which readers are referred for further information is here the "Midrash of the Book of Kings," a name found otherwise in the OT only in 13:22 and later used as the generic name for the imaginative explanation of a biblical text (of which one might consider Chronicles one of the earlier examples). It is unlikely that the reference to this source or others in such notices was to any existing document.

25:1-28

Amaziah (ca. 800-783 B.C.)

For Amaziah's reign cf. 2 Kings 14:1-14, 17-22. Kings concludes that Amaziah did "what was right in the eyes of the Lord, yet not like David his father; he did in all things as Joash his father had done" (v. 3), although noting that the high places were not removed (v. 4). Chronicles states, instead, "he did what was right . . . yet not with a blameless heart." After a brief and nonjudgmental note that Amaziah killed ten thousand Edomites and took Sela (v. 7), however, 2 Kings 14:8-14 reports that Amaziah was defeated in a war he had provoked with Jehoash of Israel and killed by his own people in a conspiracy (vv. 17-20).

Chronicles accepts Kings' basic evaluation with some difference in phraseology (v. 2) and omits reference to the high places. But vv. 5-13, without parallel in Kings, describe an action in which Amaziah, who has conscripted 300,000 from Judah and Benjamin and hired 100,000 from Israel, is confronted by a nameless prophet who tells him that "God is not with Israel, with all these Ephraimites" (v. 7) and that if he proceeds in this way, God will defeat him (v. 8). Amaziah somewhat reluctantly discharges the men from Ephraim and is victorious against the Edomites (v. 11, the only connection with 2 Kings 14:7). The men of Judah kill another 10,000, but those discharged by Amaziah fell upon cities of Judah "from Samaria to Beth-horon" (v. 13) and killed 3,000 people.

Verses 14-16 describe as a further consequence of the Edomite war that Amaziah set up Edomite gods, worshiped them, and rejected the advice of yet another prophet who condemned that action. Verses 17-24 repeat in essence Amaziah's defeat before Israel from 2 Kings 14:8-14, adding only a phrase indicating that this was God's decree, since they had sought the gods of Edom (2 Chron. 25:20). A similar addition in v. 27 indicates that the conspiracy against his life also began from the time when he turned away from the Lord. Unlike Joash, however (24:25), he is nevertheless buried "with his fathers" (v. 28).

26:1-23

Uzziah (ca. 783-742 B.C.)

Chronicles' method of portraying Uzziah is by now familiar. Kings had reported briefly concerning Uzziah, whom it usually names Azariah, that he did that which was right, that he reigned no less than fifty-two-years, and that he died a leper (2 Kings 14:21-22; 15:1-7). To illustrate and harmonize that data, Chronicles adds as examples of his prosperity, and perhaps in virtue of his unexcelled fifty-two-year reign, that he built Eloth and restored it to Judah (2 Chron. 26:2) and that his prosperity was due to his seeking God in the days of a certain Zechariah, whose identity is uncertain but who is surely to be considered a priest and who instructed him in the fear of God (v. 5; cf. 24:2).

Most extensively, however, Chronicles' additions in 26:6-15 depict those building operations, victory in warfare, large army (307,500), fame, and strength that were his so long as God helped him.

In contrast, vv. 16-20, likewise without parallel in Kings, explains Uzziah's leprosy. He was unfaithful to the Lord (vv. 16, 18; see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction") and became angry with Azariah and his eighty fellow priests when they warned him not to enter the Temple to burn incense, and so he broke out with leprosy.

The concluding notice is again altered to refer us to the annals of a prophet, Isaiah in this instance (v. 22), and Uzziah's burial place, while royal in some sense, is due to his leprosy and clearly not meant to be identical to that of the other kings (cf. v. 23 with 2 Kings 15:7).

27:1-9

Jotham (ca. 742-735 B.C.)

The brief account of Jotham in 2 Kings 15:32-38 notes, in addition to the expected formulas, only that Jotham did what was right "according to all that his father Uzziah had done" (v. 34), although the high places were not removed; that he built the upper (i.e., northern) gate of the Temple (v. 35); that in his days Judah began to be threatened by Syria and Israel (v. 37); and that he was buried with his fathers (v. 38).

One would assume, particularly with the mention of the impending warfare with Syria and Israel, that Jotham's reign would be divided into a good and bad portion as have those of other kings. Instead, Chronicles, accepting as usual the Deuteronomistic evaluation of Jotham as good, adds only that he did not enter the Temple as Uzziah had done (27:2), lists additional building activities on Ophel and in Judah (vv. 3-4), and has Jotham war successfully against the Ammonites, who pay him tribute for at least three years. The mention of the threat from Syria and Israel is omitted, and it is stated instead that Jotham "became mighty, because he ordered his ways before the LORD" (v. 6, RSV). His burial notice also is unchanged.

The reason for permitting Jotham such a perfect reign is difficult to determine and suggests either that the Chronicler simply had little information or interest in Jotham and was hurrying on to Ahaz and Hezekiah or that he was introducing here the pattern that he would use with Ahaz (all evil) and Hezekiah (essentially good).

28:1-27

Ahaz (ca. 735-715 B.C.)

Chronicles, like 2 Kings 16 (cf. esp. 2 Kings 16:1-4), views Ahaz as entirely evil. Verses 1-4 make his idolatry and apostasy more explicit.

Verses 5-8 tell of the Syro-Ephraimite war (cf. 2 Kings 16:5-6, rewritten and expanded here, and Isa. 7). The incursions of Syria, Israel, and Edom (2 Chron. 28:17) are here separated, Judah apparently suffering defeat before each in turn (vv. 5, 6, 17) "because they had forsaken the Lord" (emphasis mine; v. 6).

When the Israelites are returning 200,000 Judeans and much spoil to Samaria, they are, as is typical in Chronicles, met by "a prophet of the Lord," an otherwise unknown Oded, who expresses the Chronicler's thoughts: Judah has been given into their hand because of her unfaithfulness, but the anger of Samaria, who has "sins of her own" (v. 10), has exceeded the divine plan (v. 9). He urges them to return their kinsmen with the further warning that the wrath of God is upon them (v. 11).

Unlike many of the southern kings, the people of Samaria react positively to the prophet's warning. Under the leadership of certain men of Ephraim, named in v. 12, who confess that their guilt and God's anger upon them is great (v. 13), the captives are clothed, fed, and returned to Jericho.

In vv. 16-25, it is the threat of the Edomites (cf. 2 Kings 16:6) and Philistines that leads Ahaz to appeal to Assyria for help. Ahaz's faithlessness is repeatedly emphasized (2 Chron. 28:19, 21, 22-24), concluding with idolatry (which the writer defines as the "ruin of him and all Israel" v. 23), the dismantling of the Temple vessels, and the closing of the doors of the Temple itself (v. 24)! As might be expected, Chronicles denies Ahaz a burial place with the kings (v. 27).

Thus, in immediate conjunction with the fall of the north to Assyria (30:6, 7), the south under Ahaz reverts to a position analogous to that of the north. A faithless king rules, idolatry is rampant throughout the country, and the Temple doors are shut. Indeed, the situation in the north is in some ways preferable to that in the south, for in the north there is found a prophet of the Lord, and those who listen to his voice, recognize their guilt and respond, if not in repentance, at least in obedience. The way is thus prepared for the work of Hezekiah, who will be, in the Chronicler's eyes, Judah's best king.

29:1–32:33

Hezekiah (ca. 715–687 B.C.)

Hezekiah is shown to be the king most favored by Chronicles by both content and by the sheer volume of space devoted to him. Of chaps. 29–31, only 29:1–2 have a parallel in Kings; chap. 32 is more closely related to 2 Kings 18–19.

29:1–36, The Rededication of the Temple.

On vv. 1–2, see 2 Kings 18:1–3. Chronicles accepts the high evaluation of Kings but omits at this point specific reference to Hezekiah's removal of the high places (cf. 31:1; 2 Kings 18:4), as well as the laudatory evaluation of 2 Kings 18:5–8, which states that there was none like him before or after him, that he trusted in the Lord (v. 5), that the Lord was with him, and he prospered (v. 7).

Hezekiah's charge to the Levites is contained in 2 Chron. 29:3–11. As it has done with David and Solomon, Chronicles moves immediately to Hezekiah's concern for the Temple. In the first month of his first year (cf. Ezek. 45:18–20), he opens the doors of the Temple, with the Levites even beginning work the first day (2 Chron. 29:17), thus reversing the work of Ahaz (cf. 28:24). Hezekiah's speech recalls that of David in 1 Chron. 28:2–10 and calls on the Levites to sanctify the Temple in view of the fact that the fathers have been unfaithful, forsaken the Lord (v. 6), and in effect closed the Temple (v. 8), thus incurring God's wrath and causing the captivity of their families (v. 9; cf. 28:23). The vocabulary of v. 10 recalls David's in 1 Chron. 28:2, and the closing charge to the Levites recalls David's to Solomon in 1 Chron. 28:9–10.

The Levites, with fourteen representatives of all the significant groups named, begin their work on the first day and complete it on the sixteenth day of the first month, i.e., two days after Passover (2 Chron. 29:12–19).

Verses 20–24 contain the purgation offering. The "all Israel" nature of the offering is emphasized repeatedly in v. 24.

The Levites are installed in vv. 25–30 (on David's commandment, only here conveyed through the prophets Nathan and Gad; see esp. 1 Chron. 15–16; 2 Chron. 8:12–15). Primary attention falls on the musicians and singers and the joy with which they worshiped (29:30).

Verses 31–36 complete the dedication. The emphasis upon the willing heart recalls 1 Chron. 29:17–18. Sacrifices are so numerous that the Levites, described as more conscientious than the priests (2 Chron. 29:34), had to assist the priests. Verses 35–36 are parallel to 8:16, marking the conclusion of Solomon's work.

30:1–27, Hezekiah's Passover. Hezekiah moves rapidly to celebrate the Passover on the fourteenth day of the second month, prescribed in Num. 9:3 as the date for those unable to do so in the first month.

2 Chron. 30:1–12 contains Hezekiah's invitation to "all Israel and Judah . . . Ephraim and Manasseh" (v. 1) and from Beersheba to Dan, the ideal limits of the land (v. 5). The couriers point to the faithlessness of the northerners and their plight in captivity to Assyria (vv. 6–8), inviting them to the Temple in Jerusalem, "which he has sanctified forever," and urging them to repent so that their brothers and sons might return to the land (v. 9).

The courier's message is met with mocking by many in the north, but some men (to be preferred to the "only a few" or "however, a few" of the RSV) repent and come to Jerusalem. In Judah too God gave the people one heart to do what the king and princes commanded "by the word of the Lord" (v. 12).

Verses 13–27 describe the Passover. The priests and Levites are shamed by the zeal of the laity, who cleanse Jerusalem of illegitimate altars (vv. 14–15). In view of the ritual uncleanness of many from the north (Issachar is here added to the tribes named in v. 11), Hezekiah offers a particularly gracious prayer for the people (v. 19), so that God hears and forgives them (v. 20). The festival is celebrated with great joy for fourteen days, as was Solomon's feast of dedication (2 Chron. 7:8–10). The final acknowledgement of prayer heard recalls Solomon's prayer in 7:12–15.

31:1–21, Other Religious Reforms. The chapter is without parallel in Kings. 2 Kings 18:1–8 had spoken of reforming actions of Hezekiah, including removal of the high places in Judah. Chronicles, however, envisions "all Israel" engaged in a massive reform that resulted in the removal of the high places not only in Judah and Benjamin but in Ephraim and Manasseh as well (31:1).

Verse 2 details the appointment of the priests and Levites (cf. esp. 8:12–15, 16, where Solomon's similar act marks the conclusion of the Temple narrative).

Hezekiah's offerings (31:3–10) recall Solomon's in 2 Chron. 7:5; the generosity of the people recalls that of David and the people in 1 Chron. 29:1–9 and the tabernacle narrative upon which that was dependent. Notice especially the blessings (v. 8; cf. 1 Chron. 29:10, 20; 1 Kings 8:55) and the overabundance of offerings (v. 10).

Storerooms are prepared for "the contributions, the tithes, and the dedicated things" (vv. 11–12, RSV), and placed in charge of the appropriate Levites. Allotments are also made to the priests living throughout the land, although the details of vv. 16–19 are far from clear.

Verses 20–21 summarize Hezekiah's reign. Notice the characteristic words of Chronicles:

seeking, the whole heart, and prosperity (see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction").

32:1–33, Hezekiah and Assyria; Hezekiah's Last Days. For the Assyrian crisis (vv. 1–23), see 2 Kings 18–20; Isaiah 36–39. The Chronicler's introduction (v. 1) suggests a change in Hezekiah's fortunes at this point, but as vv. 20–23 make clear, that is not the case.

The Chronicler's rewriting of his sources here evidences considerable skill. The account of Hezekiah's capitulation to Sennacherib in 2 Kings 18:14–16 is omitted, probably as inappropriate to Hezekiah's faithfulness, although the text of Kings is confused here (see 2 Kings, "Commentary"). 2 Chron. 32:2–8 reflects preparations taken by Hezekiah for warfare, which are themselves signs of the blessings of God that he enjoyed as a result of his faithfulness: building operations and military provisions (vv. 3–6). Hezekiah's brief exhortation (vv. 7–8) echoes themes heard throughout the work: be strong; don't be afraid; God is with us (cf., e.g., 1 Chron. 22:13; 2 Chron. 19:5–7; 20:15–17, 20).

2 Chron. 32:9–19 (esp. vv. 9–15) is more closely related to 2 Kings 18:19–35. God responds to the prayer of Hezekiah and Isaiah (2 Chron. 32:20), and the result is the somewhat disparate material of 2 Kings 19:7, 35–37 is reshaped and summarized nicely in v. 21. Verses 22–23 apply God's deliverance not only to Hezekiah's victory over Sennacherib but to all his enemies. Hezekiah, like Solomon and Asa before him (1 Chron. 22:8–10; 2 Chron. 14:5), enjoys rest, gifts are brought to the Temple and to Hezekiah, and he is honored before all nations.

2 Chron. 32:24–33 tells of Hezekiah's last days (on v. 24, cf. 2 Kings 20:1). Hezekiah's sickness, which would appear unjustified in view of the writer's theology, serves here only as a prelude to his failure to respond appropriately to the healing granted him (2 Chron. 32:25, 31). His pride resulted instead in wrath upon him, Jerusalem, and Judah (v. 25). On account of his repentance, however, that wrath, which in 2 Kings 20 related to exile to Babylon, was not to come during the days of Hezekiah.

2 Chron. 32:27–33 gives more examples of Hezekiah's prosperity—riches, building operations, and prosperity (cf. 31:21; 32:22–23). His closing notice is altered to refer us to the prophet Isaiah, and the note is added that he was buried with the sons of David and that all Jerusalem and Judah did him honor.

In summary, despite difficulties presented in the source, including foreign invasion and sickness, Hezekiah is considered more favorably than any king after Solomon. Indeed, in many ways his reign marks a reversal of that of Ahaz and is pictured as parallel to that of Solomon. Solomon ruled over a united Israel, completed the construction of the Temple, and set in motion the personnel and service of the Temple; Hezekiah rededicates the Temple, reestablishes those same services, restores the ideal of the single central sanctuary, and, perhaps most significantly, brings north and south together in a common worship. That picture is surely the one that the Chronicler wishes to set before his readers as ideal and divinely approved.

33:1–20

Manasseh (ca. 687–642 B.C.)

Cf. 2 Kings 21:1–18, which is wholly negative about Manasseh.

33:1–9, Manasseh's Wickedness. Verses 1–9 are essentially identical with 2 Kings 21:1–9, depicting Manasseh's fifty-five-year reign and wickedness. Notice the parallel of David and Solomon already in v. 7 of Kings.

33:10–13, Manasseh's Captivity and Repentance. Verses 10–13 are without parallel in Kings and commonly considered unhistorical. Assyrian records list Manasseh as a vassal, but there is no suggestion that he rebelled. While it is quite likely that he may have had to appear before the Assyrians at some such place as Damascus, as did Ahaz (2 Kings 16:10), his deportation here to Babylon (v. 11) is striking and may indicate, as has been suggested, that Manasseh, in both his exile and repentance, is being considered a type of the Exile. The tradition of Manasseh's prayer of repentance is continued in the Prayer of Manasseh recorded in the Apocrypha (→ Prayer of Manasseh, The).

33:14–17, Manasseh's Prosperity and Reforms. The prophetic summary of 2 Kings 21:10–15 pictures Manasseh as Israel's archvillain, as a result of whose sins Jerusalem and Judah will be destroyed without remnant. (This prophetic censure may be that referred to in 2 Chron. 33:10, the ignoring of which led to Manasseh's captivity.) In repentance, however, Manasseh is restored, and these verses, again without parallel, picture Manasseh as the typical pious king, engaged in building operations and even in the reform of worship. The sole negative note remaining is the continued existence of the high places.

33:18–20, Closing Notice. In addition to the usual inclusion of a prophetic reference (here, anomalously, the "Chronicles of the Seers"), this notice too includes repeated reference to Manasseh's repentance and God's acceptance of that prayer, obviously matters of great importance for the writer. Chronicles has retained the burial notice of Kings, which has Manasseh buried on his own property rather than with the other kings (cf. 2 Kings 21:17–18).

33:21–25

Amon (ca. 642–640 B.C.)

Kings pictured Amon as evil like his father Manasseh (cf. 2 Kings 21:19–26); since the Chronicler viewed Manasseh as repentant, he has had to modify his report accordingly, adding that Amon “incurred guilt more and more” (v. 23, RSV). The conspiracy that led to his death is also reported in Kings. Chronicles omits his burial place, in the gardens of Manasseh.

34:1–35:27

Josiah (ca. 640–609 B.C.)

For 2 Kings 22–23, Josiah was the king without equal, who, on the basis of the book of the law found in the Temple in the eighteenth year of his reign (i.e., 622 B.C.), undertook extensive religious reforms, including removal of the high places in both south and north. Nevertheless, because of the wickedness of Manasseh, the Lord remains firm in his resolve to destroy Jerusalem.

34:1–7, Josiah's Reforms. On vv. 1–2, cf. 2 Kings 22:1–2, repeated here almost verbatim. Verses 3–7, however, are without parallel and place the beginnings of the reform in Josiah's eighth and twelfth years. While described much more briefly here than in 2 Kings 23 (since much of the work has been assigned to other kings, especially Hezekiah), that reforming work does include the removal of the high places both in Judah and Jerusalem and in Manasseh, Ephraim, Simeon, and as far as Naphtali (vv. 3, 6).

34:8–28, The Book of the Torah. Verses 8–28 are very similar to 2 Kings 22:3–20, with typical alterations. Josiah's officials are specifically sent to repair the house of Lord (2 Chron. 34:8) and deliver money that the Levites have collected from north and south (cf. 24:4–14, where they are restricted to the south only, v. 9). It is added that the work was under the direction of the Levites, who are nonetheless skillful musicians (34:12–13). Verse 21 adds “those left in Israel” to Judah as the object of Josiah's inquiry.

Verses 22–28 are reproduced closely from 1 Kings 22:14–20, which exhibits a number of facets of the Deuteronomistic theology that has also broadened in Chronicles. This is true in particular of Judah's forsaking the Lord, occasioning the outpouring of God's wrath (2 Kings 22:17). Josiah was also “penitent” (RSV; perhaps better translated “immature”; cf. 1 Chron. 29:1 and 2 Chron. 12:7) and humbled himself (2 Kings 22:19), repeated and reemphasized in 2 Chron. 34:27. As in Kings, Josiah's repentance spares him the sight of the impending destruction.

34:29–33, Josiah's Covenant. Cf. 2 Kings 23:1–3. Notice again a familiar theme of Kings adopted by Chronicles, “with all his heart and all his soul” (v. 31; cf. 2 Kings 23:3). Josiah's role in pursuing the covenant is more pronounced, and “all the people” who joined in the covenant are identified as those present in Jerusalem and Benjamin (2 Chron. 34:32). The two uses of Israel in v. 33, however, may apply just as well to the north or to both north and south.

35:1–19, Josiah's Passover. At this point Kings includes the details of Josiah's reform (2 Kings 23:1–23), which conclude with a brief mention of the Passover (vv. 21–23). Chronicles has inserted these at the beginning of Josiah's reign and now elaborates extensively the Passover proceedings, as if to climax Josiah's reign.

Emphasis here falls, as might be expected, on the proper appointments and ceremony, perhaps reflecting these as they were in the author's own day. The work of David and Solomon is considered primary, both in the construction of the Temple (2 Chron. 35:3) and in the levitical arrangements (v. 4). The reason for the apparent change in levitical function given in v. 3 is not apparent, but the change is probably meant to be significant. The generosity of Josiah (v. 7) and his officers (v. 8) provides yet another bridge with similar ceremonies in the book, as does the participation of the Levites, singers, and gatekeepers, who are apparently here (v. 15) not considered Levites.

Verse 16 recalls the completion of Solomon's work in 8:16 and Hezekiah's in 29:35. The reference to Samuel in v. 18 is problematic. 2 Kings 23:22 speaks of the age of the judges, and it is possible that the author here simply wants to list a prophet from the end of that era, one who also marks the beginning of the monarchy (cf. also the reference to Solomon at Hezekiah's Passover in 2 Chron. 30:26). Josiah's Passover would thus seem to be given wider significance, encompassing “all Judah and Israel who were present” (35:18), though this is perhaps due only to the Kings source the author had before him.

35:20–27, Josiah's Death. Cf. 2 Kings 23:28–30. Chronicles omits 2 Kings 23:24–25, including the highly laudatory words of v. 25. Josiah's death in battle at the hands of Pharaoh Neco has obviously presented some problems for the writer's understanding of God's ways in history, and he has accordingly included a command from Neco as inspired prophecy, disobedience to which occasioned Josiah's death. Other minor alterations in the narrative are probably due to the attempt to make Josiah's fate more compatible with the earlier words of Huldah's prophecy (2 Chron. 34:27–28). Jeremiah's lament in his honor is not preserved, and the reference is not to our book of Lamentations. The omission of the customary burial notice and other variations in this final section have suggested to some the use of another source than Kings.

36:1-23

The Last Kings of Judah

The writer moves rapidly, almost prosaically, over the details of 2 Kings 23:31-25:30, omitting much but also adding considerable comment of his own. It is obvious that the final fate of the nation has already been determined.

36:1-4, Jehoahaz (609 B.C.). Cf. 2 Kings 23:30-34. Omitted is the name of his mother, the evaluation of him as evil (cf. Jer. 22:10-12), his bondage in Riblah, and the reference to his death, which is replaced with mention of his deportation to Egypt.

36:5-8, Jehoiaikim/Eliakim (ca. 609-598 B.C.). Cf. 2 Kings 23:34-24:6. Striking is Chronicles' brevity, omitting Jehoiaikim's taxation (2 Kings 23:35), his rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar (24:1), and the important rationale for Judah's destruction (24:2-4), including mention of the Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites (and, according to the Septuagint, the Samaritans) as God's instruments to destroy. Instead, Chronicles adds mention of a captivity of Jehoiaikim in Babylon (36:6) and of a deportation of some of the Temple vessels to Babylon (v. 7).

36:9-10, Jehoiachin (ca. 598/597 B.C.). Cf. 2 Kings 24:8-17, drastically abbreviated. Verses 10b-16a are omitted, which recount the exile of the king, his family, at least a sizable portion of the population of Jerusalem, and all the treasures of the Temple and the palace, with specific mention that the golden vessels Solomon had made were cut in pieces. Chronicles mentions only the exile of Jehoiachin and the "precious vessels" of the Temple.

36:11-16, Zedekiah (ca. 597-587 B.C.). Cf. 2 Kings 24:18-25:17. In vv. 12b-14, without parallel in Kings, the writer gives the reason for Judah's destruction. Zedekiah did not humble himself before Jeremiah, who spoke from the mouth of the Lord. He also rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar after swearing an oath to him by God (cf. 2 Chron. 35:21-22 and Ezek. 17, esp. v. 16). The priests and people are also characterized as unfaithful and as having polluted God's holy house (2 Chron. 36:14).

Nevertheless, as we have seen repeatedly, their ultimate sin was their failure to respond to the prophetic voice in repentance. Because of God's mercy he sent prophet after prophet, but they were scorned and mocked until finally there was no more forgiveness (vv. 15-16; cf. 7:14; see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction").

36:17-21, The End of Judah. Verses 17-21 are comparable to 2 Kings 25:1-21, but different in important ways. Kings had emphasized the destruction of the remainder of the city, the poorest of the people, less valuable items from the Temple, and the leaders of Zedekiah's government. Chronicles concentrates instead upon the Temple and its vessels, which are pictured as both carried to Babylon (v. 18) and destroyed (v. 19), and indicates that the entire population was killed or deported (vv. 17, 20). The land thus lies empty and fallow, enjoying a "sabbath rest" for seventy years until the rise of Persia (i.e., about 539 B.C.), in fulfillment of the prophecy of Jeremiah and as a supposed punishment for the failure to observe that rest throughout at least a significant period of its history (v. 21, cf. Jer. 25:11-13; 29:10-14; Lev. 26:34-39).

36:22-23, Cyrus's Edict. Verses 22-23, essentially identical with Ezra 1:1-3a, raise the vexing problem of the original conclusion and the purpose of the Chronicler's work (see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction"). The rise of Cyrus the Persian is here associated with the fulfillment of the prophecy of Jeremiah. Yahweh has "stirred up" Cyrus to make his proclamation that Yahweh has both given him all the kingdoms of the earth and commanded him (Cyrus!) to build him a Temple in Jerusalem. The stage is thus set for Israel's return from the Exile and for the rebuilding of the Temple.

Bibliography

Ackroyd, P. R. I & II Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah. Torch Bible Commentary. London: SCM, 1973.

Braun, R. L. 1 Chronicles. Word Biblical Commentary, 14. Waco, TX: Word, 1986.

Coggins, R. J. The First and Second Books of Chronicles. Cambridge Bible Commentary on the New English Bible. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.

Myers, J. M. 1 Chronicles. Anchor Bible, 12. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965.

———. 2 Chronicles. Anchor Bible, 13. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965.

Williamson, H. G. M. 1 and 2 Chronicles. New Century Bible Commentary. London: Marshall, Morgan, & Scott, 1982.

———. Israel in the Books of Chronicles. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977.

Wilson, R. R. Genealogy and History in the Biblical World. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1977.

EZRA

R A L P H W. K L E I N

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Ezra contains a theological history of the postexilic community, from the first return in 538 B.C. to the end of the first year of Ezra in 457 B.C. Ezra 1-6 describes the return from the Babylonian exile and the rebuilding of the Temple; Ezra 7-10 describes the first year of the work of Ezra.

While the majority of the book is written in the standard Hebrew of the postexilic period, Ezra 4:8-6:18 and 7:12-26 are written in imperial Aramaic. The first of these sections contains letters sent to the Persian kings Artaxerxes or Darius and their replies (4:8-16; 4:17-22; 5:6-17; 6:3-12), but it also contains Jewish narrative that connects these letters to one another. The narrative was one of several sources available to the author of the book of Ezra. The second section, 7:12-26, is the Persian king's commission to Ezra.

The account of the work of Ezra, conventionally called his memoir, consists of paragraphs written in the first person (7:27-9:15), as well as in the third person (7:1-26; 10:1-44; Neh. 8, and part of Neh. 9:1-5). All of the Ezra memoir may once have been written in the first person and may come from Ezra himself. It is probable that Nehemiah 8 originally stood between Ezra 7-8 and 9-10 and that Neh. 9:1-5 stood between Ezra 10:15 and 10:16.

Williamson proposes that the Ezra memoir and Nehemiah memoir (see Nehemiah, "Commentary") were combined about the year 400 B.C. into a work that juxtaposed the lives of the two great leaders of the restoration and brought their careers to a climax in Nehemiah 8-10. This document, basically Ezra 7:1-Neh. 13:31, lay before the editor who composed Ezra 1-6. By adding the latter chapters in about the year 300 B.C., he wanted to show that the Jerusalem Temple of his day and its form of divine service were the legitimate successors of pre-exilic Israel. Other scholars believe that Ezra and Nehemiah are part of the Chronicler's history, which consists of 1 and 2 Chronicles, in addition to Ezra and Nehemiah (see 1 Chronicles, "Introduction").

According to Ezra 1-6, the LORD brought about the return of the exiles and the rebuilding of the Temple through the favorable actions of the Persian kings. The book seems to foster a collaborative attitude toward the Persians. This may explain the absence of any reference to the Davidic ancestry of Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel.

The book of Ezra is concerned about the purity of the community in Jerusalem and gives the impression that this community was made up primarily of those who returned from exile. Continuity with pre-exilic Israel is based on the return of the Temple vessels through Sheshbazzar and on the restoration of both the altar and the Temple on their former sites. The delay in the building of the Temple is not blamed on the people's concern for their own comforts (as in Hag. 1:4) but on the actions of the enemies of Judah and Benjamin, who persistently opposed the work in Jerusalem and disheartened the people. The celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles after the completion of the altar (Ezra 3:4-5) anticipates the joyful dedication of the Temple (6:16-18) and the equally joyful observance of the Passover a few months thereafter (6:19-22). The Temple was completed by Zerubbabel, the governor, and Jeshua, the high priest, with the hearty endorsement of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah.

Ezra, who was linked to Aaron by his genealogy and to Moses by his attitude toward the law, was sent by the Persian king in 458 B.C. to make inquiries about conformity to the law in Judah and Jerusalem and to appoint officials to teach the law. When a problem arose about intermarriage with peoples of the land, Ezra appointed a commission to remove the foreign wives and children and so to create a purified community. For Ezra's additional actions on behalf of the law—reading and teaching it publicly—and the people's subsequent covenant to keep the law's prescriptions, see Nehemiah, "Commentary," chaps. 8-10.

COMMENTARY

1:1-6:22

Return from Exile and Rebuilding of the Temple

1:1-4:7

A Narrative in Hebrew

1:1-11, The Return Under Sheshbazzar. Cyrus the Persian began his rule in Babylon in October 539 B.C. His permission for the Jews to return home is seen in Ezra as the fulfillment of a prophecy made through Jeremiah (Jer. 29:10) that the LORD would bring the exiled Judeans home after a seventy-year captivity. The author expresses in these opening verses a positive, collaborative attitude toward the Persian authorities of his day (cf. Isa. 44:24-45:6). The generosity of Cyrus to the Jews was part of a wider policy toward all the peoples held captive in Babylon (→ Cyrus II; Persia). The Hebrew decree issued by Cyrus (Ezra 1:2-4) is paralleled by a similar Aramaic record in 6:3-5. The Hebrew copy of the decree provides for the repatriation of the Jews in addition to the rebuilding of the Temple. It is unclear whether these verses are an authentic document available to the author (perhaps the text of a herald's proclamation) or whether the author created this decree on the basis of 6:3-5.

Those Jews who elected not to return to Jerusalem were urged to offer financial support to those who planned to return (v. 4). Only members of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin were present in Babylon and available for the return. The clergy consisted of priests (descendants of Aaron) and Levites (non-Aaronidic descendants of Levi, who were assigned the less important tasks in the system of worship). That the return pleased God is shown by the reference to all who returned as "those whose spirits God had stirred up." Material assistance from gentile neighbors makes the return resemble the Exodus from Egypt (cf. Exod. 3:21-22; 11:2-3; 12:35-36).

The Jewish leader of the return was Sheshbazzar, the prince (Ezra 1:8) or governor (5:14) of Judah. Appointed by Cyrus and entrusted with the Temple vessels (1:7-11), he laid the foundation of the Temple (5:14-16; but see 3:10-12). Sheshbazzar is a Babylonian name ("May the sun god Shamash protect the father"), although he is clearly Jewish. Recent studies have undermined the proposed identification of him with Shenazzar (1 Chron. 3:18). The length of his tenure at the head of the restoration community is unknown but was probably fairly brief.

The Temple vessels themselves establish a continuity between the Solomonic Temple and the postexilic Temple, lending an aura of authenticity to the latter. An exilic prophet had also announced that the returning exiles would bring the vessels of the LORD home (Isa. 52:11-12).

2:1-70, The List of Those Who Returned.

This list presupposes that Zerubbabel has replaced Sheshbazzar (v. 2). Zerubbabel is called the son of Shealtiel in 3:2, 8; 5:2 (cf. Neh. 12:1) and in the book of Haggai (where he is also given the title of "governor," Hag. 1:1; 2:2), but a genealogy in 1 Chron. 3:17-24 makes him the son of Shealtiel's younger brother, Pedaiah. It is possible that Pedaiah was his physical father, while Shealtiel was his father according to the rule of levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5-10). In any case, the genealogy in 1 Chronicles identifies him as a descendant of David. The silence about this in Ezra may result from the author's acceptance of Persian domination and the absence of any hope for deliverance through the Davidic house. The list may be a composite summary of a number of returns to Palestine made during the reigns of Cyrus and his successor, Cambyses. Some have taken it as a census of Judah from about the time of Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 2:2). A copy of this list, with many variations in the numbers and in spelling of names, appears in Neh. 7:6-73, which is probably its original location.

The list of leaders in Ezra 2:2 should include a twelfth, Nahamani (cf. Neh. 7:7). Jeshua was the grandson of Seraiah, the last chief priest before the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 25:18). Laity are listed in Ezra 2:3-35 (identified by family in vv. 2-20 and by place of residence in vv. 21-35); priests (about one-tenth of the total population), a few Levites (cf. Ezra 8:15), and other Temple personnel (Temple servants and Solomon's servants [cf. 1 Kings 9:20-21]), in Ezra 2:36-58; and those who could not prove their ancestry, in vv. 59-63. The latter were excluded temporarily from the priesthood until a high priest could be installed who could consult Urim and Thummim, the dicelike objects that had been used in earlier days to determine God's will in matters that were beyond human wisdom (→ Urim and Thummim). The "governor" mentioned in v. 63 is designated by a Persian term (tirshata). It is not clear whether the author intended to refer to Sheshbazzar, Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, or some other official. Since the vast majority of people could prove their ancestry, the continuity between the restored community and the community before the Exile is affirmed (cf. the twelve leaders mentioned in v. 2).

The whole assembly numbered 42,360, plus some 7,337 male and female servants and 200 singers (vv. 64-65). The totals cannot be harmonized with the numbers assigned to the individual families in the list (did copyists make errors, or do the larger totals include women?). The high number of servants may indicate that the postexilic community was not so impoverished as many assume. The gifts for the Temple (2:68-69) are discussed in Neh. 7:70-72, where the text is more nearly complete. The priests, Levites, and some of the people settled in Jerusalem, but all the rest of the people returned to their own towns (v. 70). The list presupposes that the community in Palestine was composed almost exclusively of Jews who had been in exile (cf. Jer. 24:4-10). Though this does not conform to historical fact, it does reflect the exalted station of the eastern Diaspora in the author's theology.

3:1-6, The Reestablishment of the Altar. Jeshua (identical with Joshua of Hag. 1:1) and Zerubbabel, the joint leaders of the restoration community, reestablished the sacrificial altar on its old site—thus stressing continuity with pre-exilic Israel. The LORD himself had indicated where the altar of burnt offering for the first Temple should be by answering David's petition at the threshing floor of Ornan (1 Chron. 22:1). The restored altar was presumably made of unworked stones, as prescribed in the Mosaic law (Exod. 20:25). While occasional sacrifices had taken place in Jerusalem during the Exile (Jer. 41:5), the returning leaders may have considered the existing altar unclean.

Fear of hostile neighbors led to scrupulous observance of the law in hopes of ensuring God's protection (Ezra 3:3), but it also kept the community from engaging in other building projects at this time (cf. 4:4-5). The text implies that the altar was set up in September 538, but the major period of activity for Jeshua and Zerubbabel was in 520 and later. The author may have mistakenly identified Zerubbabel with Sheshbazzar. In any case, he emphasized that regular worship was initiated without delay.

The people celebrated the Feast of Booths or Tabernacles (Heb. Sukkot), which began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, and offered up daily sacrifices required for this feast (cf. Lev. 23:33-36 and the detailed laws of Num. 29:12-38). Thereafter, all appointed feasts were kept (Ezra 3:5), surely including Passover/Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost; Shavuot in Heb.), and Booths again (Lev. 23).

3:7-13, The Foundation of the Temple Laid. Though sacrifices began on the first day of the seventh month (September 17, 538), the foundations of the Temple were not yet laid (3:6) or, perhaps, "the Temple was not yet repaired." It is possible that the activities described in these verses were actually undertaken during the reign of Darius, while the altar itself was restored during the reign of Cyrus. The second year mentioned in v. 8 is the second year of the exiles' work on the house of God, not the second year after their return from exile. With the permission of Cyrus, they arranged for cedar logs to be imported from the Phoenician cities of Sidon and Tyre. Logs had also been imported for the Temple in Solomon's time (2 Chron. 2:16). Joppa was located just north of the modern city of Tel Aviv. The masons and carpenters who were hired for the reconstruction (Ezra 3:7) recall similar workers who were used in building Solomon's Temple (1 Chron. 22:2, 15).

Levites twenty years of age or older were appointed to supervise the work, although Mosaic law set the minimum age limit at thirty (Num. 4:23, 30) or at twenty-five (Num. 8:24).

Perhaps it was necessary to lower the age limit because of the few Levites who were part of the community (Ezra 2:40-42).

The ceremony at the beginning of the repairs echoes the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 8; 2 Chron. 5-7) and of David's bringing the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15-16). The cymbals were played by the levitical sons of Asaph (Ezra 3:10), who are identified in 2:41 as singers. Their song (v. 11) appears to be a citation of Ps. 106:1 and the refrain in Psalm 136, praising the LORD in advance for the completion of the Temple. The Levites, who once had been assigned to carry the Ark, were given new duties by David after the Ark was placed permanently in the Temple (cf. 1 Chron. 15-16; 23-26; 2 Chron. 7:6; 29:25-26).

While most of the people shouted when the repairs were begun, many of the older priests, Levites, and other leaders, who had seen the Solomonic Temple years earlier, cried. Did some fear they would not live long enough to see the completion of the Temple? Or did the plans for the restored Temple seem pale by comparison with the original (cf. Hag. 2:3; Zech. 4:10)? The din from the combined shouting and weeping aroused the attention of hostile neighbors (4:1), with nearly disastrous consequences.

Throughout this chapter the theme of continuity plays an important role. The altar was placed on its old site and erected according to the law of Moses. The Feast of Booths was kept "as it is written," and there are many parallels between the repairs of the Temple and the construction and dedication of the first, Solomonic Temple. Even the singers praised the LORD according to the directions of David. The author of chap. 3 is building an argument against those who might question the validity of the postexilic Temple and its worship.

4:1-3, Offer of Assistance Refused. The noise created by the rites of 3:10-13 attracted the attention of hostile neighbors, who offered to assist with the building of the Temple and who claimed to have worshiped the God of Israel since they had been brought to Palestine by the Assyrian emperor Esarhaddon (681-669 B.C.), presumably to fill a gap left after the Assyrian deportation of the population in 721. Their offer was categorically rejected. Why?

A passage from 2 Kings 17:41 suggests that the new residents in Samaria were syncretistic, worshiping the LORD but also their native deities. The Jewish community in Ezra argued that they alone had been commissioned for this work by Cyrus.

4:4-5, Opponents Stop the Building of the Temple. Once their offer to help had been rejected, the people of the land employed various strategies to frustrate work on the Temple. Work on the Temple had begun under Cyrus (559–530), and it was only resumed under Darius I (522–486).

4:6–7, Summary of Letters. These verses describe negative reports about the Jews that were sent to the Persian authorities long after the completion of the Temple, first in the reign of Ahasuerus (Xerxes), 486–465, and then in the reign of Artaxerxes I, 465–424.

4:8–6:18

A Narrative in Aramaic

Aramaic was the official diplomatic language of the Persian Empire. The document incorporated into the text contains a number of official records and a Jewish narrative. It is currently debated by scholars whether only the letters themselves (4:8–16; 4:17–22; 5:6–17; 6:3–12) were available as sources to the author of Ezra or whether the correspondence had been woven together into an Aramaic chronicle prior to its editing by the biblical writer.

4:8–16, A Letter from Rehum to Artaxerxes.

Rehum and other Samaritan leaders wrote to the Persian king that Jews who had returned from exile had attempted to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem and that this effort constituted rebellion and could lead to a decrease in revenue for the king. The Samaritans claimed to have been settled in Palestine by Osnappar, that is, Ashurbanipal (669–627 B.C.). “Beyond the River” (Trans-Euphrates) is an administrative title for the area from the river Euphrates to the Mediterranean. The words of v. 14 suggest that the Samaritan officials and the Persian authorities were treaty partners (cf. the “salt of the covenant” in Lev. 2:13; Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5) who required mutual support of one another. They informed the king that the state records of his predecessors, including those of the Babylonian kings, would show that Jerusalem had always been rebellious and that was the reason that it was destroyed in 587 B.C.

4:17–23, The Reply of Artaxerxes and Its Consequences.

The Persian king replied to the Samaritans that a search through the state records had confirmed their accusations: Jerusalem had constantly been rebellious. Since some of his predecessors had ruled over “Beyond the River” and been successful in collecting taxes (v. 20), Artaxerxes made a decree that the work on the walls of Jerusalem should be brought to an immediate end. Perhaps this failed attempt to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem lies behind the report of Jerusalem’s broken walls and destroyed gates at the beginning of Nehemiah

(Neh. 1:2–3). After receiving the king’s reply, the Samaritan officials immediately went to Jerusalem and brought the work of the Jews to a halt through the use of force.

4:24, Work on the Temple Stopped.

This verse treats vv. 6–23 as a digression and continues the story of v. 5, where the people of the land had stopped work on the Temple from the time of Cyrus to that of Darius. The digression justifies the Jewish rejection of help from their neighbors, since subsequent history proved that the Samaritans had no positive interest in the restoration of Jerusalem.

5:1–5, Opposition to Renewed Temple Building.

Haggai and Zechariah, whose words are preserved in the canonical books named after them, gave prophetic support to the efforts of Zerubbabel and Jeshua to rebuild the Temple (cf. 3:8). Tattenai, the governor of “Beyond the River,” asked the Jews if they had proper authorization for rebuilding the Temple, but he did not stop their construction projects while he sought a ruling from higher Persian officials. His leniency is interpreted as God’s providence: “The eye of their God was on the elders of the Jews” (v. 5).

5:6–17, A Letter from Tattenai to Darius.

This letter repeats and expands upon information provided in vv. 1–5. The technique of building with courses of stone interspersed with wood is known from other places in the ancient Near East (cf. 1 Kings 6:36; 7:12; Ezra 6:4). In vv. 11–17 is the Jews’ defense of their building activities. They claimed that the God of heaven and earth was the deity whose Temple they were rebuilding—such a God would require a magnificent building. Because of the sins of their ancestors, God had delivered them to the Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar (606–562), who destroyed the first Temple and exiled the population (2 Kings 25). Cyrus, here identified as king of Babylon, granted permission for the Jews to rebuild the Temple on its former site in the first year of his reign (cf. 1:3), and he restored to them the ceremonial vessels that had been removed from the first Temple. Sheshbazzar, to whose care the vessels were entrusted and who had also been named governor (cf. 1:8) by Cyrus, repaired the foundations and began the rebuilding of the Temple immediately after his return. In chap. 3, the laying of the foundations is credited to Zerubbabel and Jeshua during the reign of Darius. The ascription of this work to Sheshbazzar and the claim of uninterrupted work on the Temple (which contradict 4:4–5, 24; Hag. 1:2, 4, 9) seem to be attempts by the restoration community to impress the Persian authorities that the edict of Cyrus had not been ignored. Tattenai and his associates ask that the Jewish claims be checked against the official records in the city of Babylon. As it turned out, the records actually were found in Ecbatana, the summer residence of the Persian kings (6:2).

6:1–12, Darius Replies. The king began his reply to Tattenai and his associates with a quotation of the original decree of Cyrus (vv. 3–5). This decree authorized the building of the Temple, with support from the royal treasury, and it provided for the restoration of the Temple vessels to the Jewish community. If this Persian financial support had actually been provided, it is hard to imagine why the Temple was delayed as long as it was. Strangely, the decree mentions only the height and breadth of the building. If the length is restored from the account of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 6:17, 20), the Temple would be a cube, 60 cubits on each side. But since this would make it much bigger than Solomon's Temple (60 cubits long, 20 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high), this reconstruction is unlikely. Perhaps the text should be restored to make the new Temple have the same dimensions as Solomon's.

Darius endorsed the earlier provisions and ordered the group associated with Tattenai not to interfere with the Jews. He also mandated financial support for the building project and for the daily sacrifices. In exchange for this support, he asked that prayers be offered for the life of the king and his sons. Cyrus made a similar request in a famous inscription: "May all the gods whom I have settled in their sacred cities ask daily Bel and Nebo for a long life for me" (see James B. Pritchard Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 316). Jeremiah too had urged the exiles to seek the welfare of the city where they had been taken as captives and to pray on its behalf (Jer. 29:7). If people dared to change the decree of Cyrus or disobey it, they would be impaled and their houses destroyed (Ezra 6:11).

The governor referred to in 6:7 is probably Zerubbabel, although the immediate context of this verse might suggest Sheshbazzar (cf. 5:14). In v. 12 the decree refers to the God who has caused his name to dwell in Jerusalem, which is so similar to a characteristic phrase of Deuteronomy (e.g., Deut. 12:11) that one suspects that a Jewish scribe helped give expression to the royal decree.

6:13–15, Completion of the Temple. Tattenai and his associates complied with the king's decree, and the building of the Temple went forward with the support of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. Neither Zerubbabel nor Jeshua is mentioned in these verses. It is often proposed that Zerubbabel's term of office ended before the Temple was finished. God's command and the Persian decree enabled the elders (cf. 5:5, 9) to finish the task. The mention of Artaxerxes is out of place in v. 14, since he ruled long after the dedication of the Temple. Perhaps his provisions for the Temple at the time of Ezra (7:12–27) led to the addition of his name here. The Temple was finished on March 12, 515 (or on April 1, 515, if the word "third" in v. 15 is emended to "twenty-third" to avoid making the work end on a Sabbath day).

6:16–18, Dedication of the Temple. More than seven hundred animals were sacrificed at the dedicatory rites, although Solomon had offered up almost sixty times as many (1 Kings 8:63)! The priests and Levites were installed according to their divisions and courses. While 1 Chronicles 23–26 ascribed these divisions to David, the author here traces them back to the time of Moses (cf. Exod. 29; Lev. 8; and Num. 3, 4, and 8).

6:19–22

The Celebration of the Passover

The language is Hebrew once more. Passover was celebrated by those who had returned from exile and by those who had separated themselves from the surrounding pollutions. The joy at Passover and the subsequent seven-day celebration of the Feast of Unleavened Bread expressed the people's thanksgiving for the assistance of Darius, who is here given the unusual title of "the king of Assyria."

7:1–10:44

The Initial Work of Ezra

7:1–26

A Third-Person Narrative About Ezra

7:1–10, Ezra's Return. Ezra is provided with a genealogy that traces his ancestry back to Aaron, the chief priest. Seraiah, identified in the genealogy as Ezra's father, preceded him by about 150 years, since he was a pre-exilic high priest (1 Chron. 6:14). Perhaps Ezra's father was in fact a different Seraiah, and the names between his father and the pre-exilic priest of the same name were lost accidentally. Ezra is also called a scribe skilled in the law of Moses. He may have been secretary of state for Jewish affairs in the Persian bureaucracy. The law that he desired to teach is the Pentateuch, although it is impossible to tell whether it was identical with the present text of that document. The seventh year of Artaxerxes I was 458 B.C. (Many scholars in the past have put Ezra in the time of the second Artaxerxes, that is, at 398.) The period intervening between his reign and the last date of the previous chapter, 515, is passed over in silence. Ezra was accompanied by laypeople (the people of Israel) and clergy (priests, Levites, singers, gatekeepers, and Temple servants; cf. 8:1-14). His nine-hundred-mile trip lasted about fourteen weeks, from the twelfth day of the first month (April 8) to the first day of the fifth month (August 4).

7:11-26, The Letter Commissioning Ezra.

Verse 11 provides a Hebrew introduction to the letter that, like other governmental documents, is written in Aramaic. The letter commanded Ezra to lead Jews to Jerusalem (v. 13); deliver gifts to the Temple from the Persian authorities, the people of Babylonia, and Babylonian Jews (vv. 15-18); make inquiry about compliance with the law in Judah and Jerusalem (v. 14: 10:16-17); and appoint magistrates and judges to teach the law (7:25).

The law of Moses was very likely already known in Judea (cf. 7:25), and those who did not yet observe it were to be instructed to do so. Artaxerxes required the treasurers to support the Jewish community with grants and to exempt the clergy from various kinds of taxation (7:21-24). The grants were enormous. One hundred talents of silver, for example, was the amount of tribute paid by all Judah to Pharaoh Neco (2 Kings 23:33). Ezra 7:23 suggests that Israel's God would be angry with the king and his sons if the grants were not paid. God's law is equated with the king's law in v. 26; failure to obey it could be punished with execution, banishment, confiscation of goods, or imprisonment.

7:27-9:15

A First-Person Narrative About Ezra

7:27-28, Doxology. This first person account, written in Hebrew, thanks God for giving Artaxerxes the idea of beautifying the Temple (by improving its worship practices) and for giving Ezra favor before the Persian authorities.

8:1-14, The List of Those Who Returned with Ezra. After naming the priests from the lines of Phinehas and Ithamar first (unlike Ezra 2), the list identifies some fifteen hundred laymen from twelve families, suggesting that the total number of persons with Ezra was about five thousand. Hattush (v. 2), a descendant of David (cf. 1 Chron. 3:22), heads the list of laypeople.

8:15-36, Ezra's Trip to Jerusalem. Ezra discovered that no Levites had decided to make the trip with him. Perhaps they had heard of the inferior status that would be afforded them in the land of Israel. Ezra's urgent request of Iddo for additional returnees led to 38 Levites joining his entourage, plus 220 Temple servants to assist the Levites. As in chap. 2, the Temple servants, whom David is credited with establishing, outnumbered the Levites. The names of the river Ahava and of the place Casiphia are otherwise unknown.

Ezra proclaimed a fast before he set out on the trip home to secure God's protection on the way. While Nehemiah was provided with a military escort (Neh. 2:9), Ezra refused to ask for similar help. He had assured the king that his God would protect all who seek him, and to request an escort from the Persian king might seem to express doubt about God's ability to care for his own.

Ezra entrusted the gifts he was bringing along to twelve priests, who were responsible for them until they could be turned over to the authorities in Jerusalem. Six hundred and fifty talents of silver would amount to nineteen tons; a hundred talents of gold would be three tons. Clines estimates that Ezra's entire treasure would be equal to the annual income of one hundred thousand to five hundred thousand people. These inflated totals may be an attempt to give glory to the Temple, or they may result from a misunderstanding of the original figures in the list.

The delay caused by the need to recruit Levites led to a departure of Ezra's entourage from Babylon on the twelfth day of the first month (8:31; cf. 7:9). They arrived in Jerusalem safe and sound—delivered from the hand of the enemy and from ambushes—and rested three days before turning over the gifts to two priests and two Levites (8:33).

Ezra and the other exiles offered a series of sacrifices in thanksgiving for their safe arrival. All the numbers given are multiples of twelve, which may imply that the restoration community was the legitimate continuation of the twelve tribes of pre-exilic Israel. The king's officials in "Beyond the River" offered financial assistance for the returnees in their conduct of the Temple worship. The final two verses of the chapter describe the returnees and their actions in the third person and so are not an original part of the first-person narrative.

9:1-5, Crisis over Mixed Marriages. Pentateuchal law ruled out marriage with the inhabitants of Canaan (Exod. 34:11-16; Deut. 7:1-6) for fear that "their daughters would play the harlot after their gods and make your sons play the harlot after their gods" (Exod. 34:16). In Ezra's time there was intermarriage with the non-Jewish peoples of the lands, who are denoted in Ezra 9:1 by a stereotyped list of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of the land. The marriages were between Jewish men and non-Jewish women; the officials of the community led in this offense. Ezra dramatically expressed his shock and fasted, while he was surrounded by faithful Jews who trembled at the contrast between the law of God and the behavior of their fellow Jews.

9:6-15, Ezra's Prayer. Ezra confessed the sins of Israel throughout its history but also noted the gracious actions of God that had restored the Jewish community within the Persian Empire and had allowed them to repair the Temple. The recent sin of intermarriage violated commandments given by the prophets, prohibiting the marriage of Jewish men or women with outsiders. The law as stated occurs in none of the extant books of the Prophets, though its essential content is recorded in the pentateuchal laws cited in the previous paragraph. Since Ezra no doubt regarded Moses as a prophet (Deut. 18:15; 34:10; Hos. 12:13), such laws could be considered prophetic. Ezra claimed that the calamities Israel had experienced were less than the nation deserved (cf. Isa. 40:2), and he proposed that the sin of intermarriage raised the possibility that God would wipe out the community completely. While individuals had intermarried, the whole community bore the responsibility and faced the consequences of this guilt.

10:1-44

A Third-Person Narrative About Ezra

10:1-17, Decision to Expel Gentile Wives and Children. The people echoed Ezra's confession of sin and entered into a covenant to expel the foreign wives and their children from Ezra's religious community. Ezra spent a night fasting and mourning in the chamber of Jehohanan the son of Eliashib (v. 6). Those who date Ezra to 398 have seen this meeting with Jehohanan as crucial since Eliashib was the high priest in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3:1). Jehohanan, then, would have been high priest at the end of the fifth century and the beginning of the fourth century (cf. Neh. 12:22-23). Cross, however, suggests that the names of another Eliashib and J(jeh)ohanan have fallen out of the list of high priests before the Eliashib of Nehemiah's time, and this reconstruction allows the dating of Ezra to 458. Others suggest that Jehohanan was not a member of the high-priestly family at all.

When the community assembled during inclement weather to express its contrition, it requested the creation of a special commission to carry out the removal of the gentile wives and their children. Only four men expressed opposition. Did they want more severe actions? The assembly met on the twentieth of the ninth month (December), Ezra appointed the commission on the first of the tenth month, and the work was completed on the first day of the first month. Within a year of Ezra's departure from Babylon (cf. Ezra 7:9), a purified community had been created in Jerusalem.

10:18-44, The List of Those Involved in Mixed Marriages. There were twenty-seven clergy (members of the high priest's family, other priests, Levites, singers, and gatekeepers) and eighty-four to eighty-six laity (in twelve family divisions) who had intermarried—out of a community of some thirty thousand. The problem was largely confined to the upper strata of the society (cf. 9:2).

Bibliography

- Clines, D. J. Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther. New Century Bible Commentary. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1984.
- Cross, F. M. "A Reconstruction of the Judean Restoration." Journal of Biblical Literature 94 (1975):4-18.
- Holmgren, F. Ezra and Nehemiah: Israel Alive Again. International Theological Commentary. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1987.
- Myers, J. M. Ezra-Nehemiah. Anchor Bible, 14. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965.
- Williamson, H. G. M. Ezra, Nehemiah. Word Biblical Commentary, 16. Waco, TX: Word, 1985.

NEHEMIAH

R A L P H W. K L E I N

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Nehemiah contains an account of the career of Nehemiah, the story of Ezra's public reading of the Torah (instruction), and a number of lists from the postexilic period. Nehemiah 1-7 describes Nehemiah's return to Palestine and his rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem; Nehemiah 8-10 depicts Ezra's reading of the law and the responses to it; Nehemiah 11-13 reports further acts of Nehemiah.

The history of Nehemiah is based primarily on the Nehemiah memoir, an autobiographical narrative in which the author frequently appeals to God to remember him and hear his prayer (1:1-7:73a; 12:31-43 [partly]; 13:4-31). A first edition of this memoir (chaps. 1-7) may have been composed a year or two after Nehemiah's arrival in Jerusalem in 445 B.C. A second edition, contained in the present book of Nehemiah, gives Nehemiah credit for a number of later reforms in the community (see esp. chap. 13).

The materials dealing with Ezra are drawn primarily from the Ezra memoir (see Ezra). Nehemiah 8, the present text of which makes Ezra and Nehemiah contemporaries, is thought to have dealt originally only with Ezra and to have had a location within the Ezra memoir between Ezra 8 and 9. An earlier version of Neh. 9:1-5 may have been located between Ezra 10:15 and 10:16 or at the end of Ezra 10.

About the year 400 B.C., an editor combined the Ezra memoir with the Nehemiah memoir, thus juxtaposing the lives of the two great leaders of the restoration and bringing their careers to a joint climax in Nehemiah 8-10. He added, from the Temple archives and other sources, the prayer in Neh. 9:6-37, the pledge to keep the law in Nehemiah 10, the report of the repopulation of Jerusalem in Neh. 11:1-2 (plus vv. 3-20), and an expanded description of the dedication of the walls in Neh. 12:27-43. A later hand provided the lists in 11:21-12:26. Toward the end of the fourth century, an editor added Ezra 1-6 to the Ezra-Nehemiah narrative and produced the present books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The book of Nehemiah can be summarized as follows: Nehemiah, authorized by the Persian authorities, led a group of Jewish exiles home and rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem despite the persistent opposition of Sanballat of Samaria and his allies. Nehemiah corrected abuses dealing with loans and the charging of interest and generously provided for others at his table, with no help from the taxes enjoyed by former governors (chap. 5). He also resolved to relocate to Jerusalem people whose genealogy could be correlated with the list of those who returned with Zerubbabel (chap. 7).

Before the actual repopulation of Jerusalem had taken place, the people requested Ezra to read them the law (8:1). This reading was explained by the Levites and heard by the people with a mixture of joy and weeping. On the basis of their study of the law, the people revived the correct celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (8:17). Thereupon, the people separated themselves from foreigners and confessed their sins (9:1-3). After a speech rehearsing the history of Israel's sinning and the LORD's repeated benefactions (9:6-31), the community entered into a covenant to walk in God's law and to do all his commandments (10:28).

This purified community relocated one of every ten persons from local towns to Jerusalem (11:1-2) and then dedicated the walls (12:27-43). Lists identify those who lived in Jerusalem (11:3-24) and in the villages (11:25-36) and those who served as priests, Levites, and high priests at various times in the restoration period (12:1-26). The final paragraphs of the book report reforms effected by Nehemiah (12:44-13:31).

COMMENTARY

1:1-7:73a

The Return of Nehemiah and the Rebuilding of the Walls of Jerusalem

1:1-11, Nehemiah's Response to the Destruction of Jerusalem's Walls. In November/December (the Jewish month Chislev) of 445 B.C. (the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I), Nehemiah, who lived in Susa, one of the three capitals of the Persian Empire, received a discouraging report about the physical condition of Jerusalem (→ Shushan; Persia). Hanani, who delivered the report, was a brother of Nehemiah.

Nehemiah engaged in various acts of sorrow (weeping, mourning, and fasting), during which he confessed his own sin and that of the people. According to the kind of retributive theology characteristic of Deuteronomistic thought, sin was the moral cause of the Exile and of the dismal state of affairs in Jerusalem. The formulaic list in v. 7 does not allow us to identify the specific sins he may have had in mind. Verses 8–9 are a loose paraphrase of Deut. 30:1–5. Nehemiah identified the people in Jerusalem as heirs of the original group that experienced God's redemption in the military acts of the Exodus (Neh. 1:10; cf. Deut. 9:29). He prayed that God would remember the promise revealed to Moses and bring about the restoration that was supposed to follow acts of repentance.

In addition, Nehemiah appealed to the LORD to pay attention to the prayer of himself and the people—whose obedience and dedication to God are indicated by the term “servants” (Neh. 1:6, 10)—and to give him a favorable response from “this man” (i.e., Artaxerxes I).

A cupbearer tasted the king's wine to thwart assassination attempts and also guarded the royal living quarters. Some Septuagint manuscripts identify Nehemiah as a eunuch instead of a butler, but this is probably only a confusion in the Greek text and not a reflection of the Hebrew. Nehemiah's opponents would have used his condition as a eunuch to disqualify him for leadership in the community (cf. Deut. 23:1) if he had in fact been castrated.

2:1–10, Artaxerxes Authorizes Nehemiah to Return and Rebuild the Wall. Four months later, Nehemiah found an opportunity to present his case before the king. The king's solicitous question about his depression led to great anxiety in Nehemiah. A royal official should not bother the king with his own personal problems! But Nehemiah revealed his concerns, after praying to the God of heaven (cf. 1:4–5), wishing the king a long life and referring to the spoiled condition of his home city, where his ancestors had been buried. His silence about the name Jerusalem may mean that he knew of the city's rebellious reputation among Persian officials (cf. Ezra 4:9–16).

The king's favorable attitude toward Nehemiah may have been enhanced by the queen's presence, before whom the king may have wanted to appear generous. Her name was Damsipia, as we are told in the classical writer Ctesias. Perhaps the king was also generous because of the start of a new year (the incident is dated to Nisan, the first month of the Jewish year). Nehemiah named a time span for his absence, which surely was not as great as the twelve years that his first term in Jerusalem actually lasted (Neh. 5:14). In addition, he requested safe passage and a supply of lumber from the royal forest to use in repairing the gates and walls and in building (or repairing) a house for himself. Nehemiah attributed the king's generosity to the intervention of God's good hand (cf. Ezra 7:9; 8:18).

Accompanied by a military guard (cf. Ezra, who refused such a guard, Ezra 8:22), Nehemiah presented his credentials to the governors of the various provinces through which he passed. Two officials, however, were displeased by his coming, and Nehemiah interpreted their opposition to him as hostility toward the Israelites as a whole. Sanballat, whose name is of Babylonian derivation (“May the moon god Sin give life”), was governor of Samaria, though Nehemiah never uses this title in connection with him. Instead, he calls him the Horonite, which may be a term of derision. Sanballat continued as governor of Samaria until at least 407 B.C.; the names of his two sons, Delaiah and Shelemaiah, known from the Elephantine papyri, show that he was a worshiper of Yahweh (the ending “iah” is a shortened form of the name Yahweh). Tobiah, the other opponent, who also has a Yahwistic name, is called an Ammonite. According to the Pentateuch, Ammonites were to be excluded from the worship assembly of Israel (Deut. 23:3), but Tobiah had ingratiated himself with some of the rulers in Jerusalem (Neh. 6:17–18; 13:4–5), and this was no doubt an irritant to Nehemiah. Tobiah was probably an assistant to Sanballat rather than the governor of Ammon (→ Sanballat; Tobiah).

2:11–15, Inspection of the Walls. Nehemiah inspected the walls and gates by night before he informed the Jewish officials what his plans were. The city at the time of Nehemiah included the Temple area and the spur to its south, called Ophel (→ Color maps 15 and 16). He left the city by the Valley Gate, which exited into the Tyropoeon (or Central) Valley, and proceeded around the city in a counterclockwise direction. The Dung Gate (through which rubbish was removed from the city) and the Fountain Gate were on the southern end of Ophel. His difficulty in traversing the east side of the city may have been caused by the collapse of a series of terraces built there in monarchical times.

2:16–20, Opposition to Nehemiah's Plans. When Nehemiah reported on his inspection tour to the Jewish officials, he made mention of his divine and political authorization (v. 18). A ruined Jerusalem brought its people and its God into disrepute (v. 17; cf. 1:3). The people immediately accepted Nehemiah's proposal to rebuild the walls and gates, but strong opposition was raised by Sanballat, Tobiah, and a previously unnamed Gessem, who controlled vast areas south and east of Jerusalem. The opponents ridiculed the project and suggested that Nehemiah was engaged in rebellion against the Persian Empire. Nehemiah, in reply, called on the God of heaven (cf. 1:5; 2:4) and denied his opponents civic, legal, and liturgical rights in Jerusalem.

3:1-32, A List of Those Who Worked on the Wall. Despite the fact that this list is at times obscure and incomplete, it is of great value to geographers of Jerusalem and Judah in the postexilic period. Five administrative centers are mentioned (Jerusalem, v. 9; Beth-hachcherem, v. 14; Mizpah, vv. 15, 19; Beth-zur, v. 16; and Keilah, vv. 17-18). The area included in Judah was perhaps less than half of the pre-exilic kingdom of Judah (cf. the area of pre-exilic Judah [see Color map 7] with that of later Judea [see Color map 11]). On the north and west, the workers were able to repair the older walls and gates (vv. 1-15), but on the eastern side a whole new wall had to be constructed closer to the crest of Ophel (vv. 16-32). Archaeologists have found remnants of this wall that are 2.75 meters thick.

Eliashib (v. 1) was high priest during the time of Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 10:6). The Sheep Gate (Neh. 3:1, 32) was probably on the eastern end of the northern wall; the Fish Gate (v. 3) was on the northwest corner, facing the Mediterranean Sea; the Water Gate (v. 26) was on the east, near the spring of Gihon (since Nehemiah's wall was built to the west of the pre-exilic city wall, the old Water Gate was outside the new wall); the Horse Gate (v. 28; cf. Jer. 31:40) was also on the east, near the Temple area (note that priests did the work on this area of the wall).

4:1-5, Ridicule by Opponents. Sanballat and Tobiah made fun of Nehemiah's efforts and scoffed at his ability to build a formidable defensive wall. Nehemiah's prayer is much like the imprecatory psalms (e.g., Ps. 109), which wish harm to one's enemies. The Hebrew text of Neh. 4:4 has a play on words between the words "despised" and "plundered." The acts of the opponents deserved a punishment to fit their crime. Nehemiah identified the hostility toward the Jews as a sin that would provoke God's own anger. Since God clearly intended that Jerusalem should be reestablished, any opposition to the building plans was opposition to God himself.

4:6-23, Wall Building and Guard Duty. As building on the wall progressed, so did the opposition—Sanballat and Tobiah on the north, the Ammonites on the east, the Arabs on the south, and the Ashdodites on the west. While the enemies planned to disrupt the project by guerrilla raids (v. 11), the Judeans themselves were losing their morale. Verse 10 seems to be a lament song, bemoaning their loss of strength and the abundance of the debris.

The Jews who lived away from Jerusalem appealed to those working in Jerusalem to escape danger by returning home (v. 12). Nehemiah, however, rallied his workers by assembling them and reminding them of the capabilities of the LORD as a great warrior (vv. 14, 20; cf. Exod. 15:3). He urged the people to fight for their families and their homes. This assembly was held in an exposed place so that it might impress the opponents with the military capabilities of the Jews.

Nehemiah divided his workers into three groups. One contingent served as soldiers, armed with various kinds of weapons (Neh. 4:16). Another group, the porters, reserved one hand for their labors and the other for a weapon (v. 17). The builders themselves, who needed both hands for their task, had a short sword girded on their side (v. 18).

Since the circumference of the city was about 1.5 miles, Nehemiah appointed a trumpeter to rally the forces in case of crisis. He also lengthened the work day from the usual sunset (Deut. 24:15) to the time when the stars appeared. He increased both security and efficiency by eliminating the daily commuting to the workers' hometowns. All spent the night in Jerusalem, fully dressed, and ready for any emergency. Nehemiah not only claimed credit for all of these innovations, but he also set an example of readiness himself.

5:1-13, Socioeconomic Problems. A severe famine and the need to pay royal taxes forced a number of Judeans into an economic crisis. In order to get food, people offered their sons and daughters as pledges for loans (v. 5). Others mortgaged their fields, vineyards, or homes. A third group went into debt to pay their taxes.

A cry of moral outrage (v. 1) arose because children, especially daughters, were being sold into debt slavery to their fellow Judeans (cf. Exod. 21:7-11). Since all the crop money went to creditors, there was nothing left over that they could use to redeem their children (Neh. 5:5). Nehemiah was enraged, and he contended with the moneylenders who were mistreating their own flesh and blood. The point at issue seems to involve the practice of demanding pledges from debtors, rather than with the taking of interest (despite the translation in RSV; → Loan).

Previously, Jews had been buying back their sisters or brothers who had been forced to sell themselves into debt slavery to gentile masters. But now people were selling themselves into slavery to fellow Jews, with the result that the community had to use its precious money to pay off Jewish creditors. Nehemiah urged his colleagues to stop such outrageous loan practices. Anything taken in pledge—fields, vineyards, olive orchards, and houses—should be returned to its rightful owner.

The creditors agreed to follow Nehemiah's reforms, and he sealed their commitment with an oath administered by the priests. In a symbolic curse, he asked that anyone who did not follow through on these reforms be shaken out, like pockets. By their "amen," the creditors agreed to be bound by the stipulations of the oath.

5:14–19, Nehemiah's Generosity. Nehemiah's first term as governor lasted from 445 to 433/432 B.C. In distinction from his predecessors, he refused the governor's food allowance, which amounted to about 40 shekels of silver a day (roughly one pound). His piety and his sympathy for the people's heavy tax burdens (vv. 15, 18) were behind this generous policy. Nehemiah persisted in his work on the wall at considerable expense and assigned his servants to fill in wherever they were needed. Daily he fed some 150 officials in addition to numerous foreign guests. One modern commentator has estimated that the oxen and six sheep he butchered every day would provide enough meat to serve some 600 to 800 people. His prayer for God to remember his generosity to the people (v. 19) is repeated in 13:14, 22, and 31. It expresses a strong belief in the doctrine of retribution (cf. 6:14). Of course, Nehemiah also recognized that forgiveness was ultimately possible only because of God's great mercy (13:22).

6:1–14, Escapes from Enemy Plots. Two of his opponents, Sanballat and Geshem, invited Nehemiah to a meeting in the plain of Ono, some twenty-five miles northwest of Jerusalem. Their intentions were to do him bodily harm and to stop his work on the walls. Nehemiah declined their invitation with an ironic excuse: he was too busy working on the walls to meet with them! After receiving four negative replies to his invitation, Sanballat sent a fifth invitation in an open letter delivered by a courier. Sanballat charged that the wall building was part of a rebellion designed to make Nehemiah king. He also alleged that prophets were hailing Nehemiah as king, and he threatened to send word of these activities to the Persian king if Nehemiah failed to meet privately with him. Nehemiah categorically branded the charges as futile attempts to frighten the Judean community and make them weak. In his prayer he asked God, therefore, to strengthen his hands so that the work might be completed.

A second effort to discredit Nehemiah came in an invitation from the prophet Shemaiah, urging him to seek asylum in the Temple. While laypeople could seek asylum by grasping the horns of the altar in the Temple courtyard (1 Kings 1:50–53; 2:28–34), it was not permitted for them to enter the Temple itself. If Nehemiah had followed Shemaiah's invitation, he would have violated an important law. Nehemiah angrily rejected this invitation and accused Shemaiah of being paid off by Tobiah and Sanballat. Perhaps Shemaiah's suggestion that he enter the Temple in defiance of the law helped Nehemiah to see through his pretensions. Nehemiah prayed for God to punish Tobiah and Sanballat appropriately. He also mentioned a prophethess Noadiah and a group of other prophets who wanted to make him afraid, though the details of these incidents are not preserved.

6:15–19, Completion of the Wall. The repairs of the wall were completed on October 2, fifty-two days after they had been begun on August 11. This speedy completion may have resulted from the high dedication of Nehemiah. It needs to be remembered that he did not restore the severely damaged eastern wall, but relocated it further up on the ridge. Archaeologists have not been impressed with the workmanship on the "wall of Nehemiah" that they have unearthed.

The speed shown in this task convinced Nehemiah's enemies that the wall had been completed solely with the help of God (v. 16). Consequently, their own self-confidence and self-esteem suffered.

All during this period ("in those days," v. 17), a lively correspondence was carried on between the nobles of Judah and Tobiah the Ammonite. Tobiah and his son Jehohanan had both married women from Jerusalem, perhaps women of some importance (cf. 3:4, 30, in which Meshullam seems to possess a high rank). The nobles tried to mediate between Nehemiah and Tobiah, but Nehemiah observes that Tobiah himself tried to intimidate him (6:19).

7:1–73a, The List of Those Who Returned. Only the first five verses of this chapter are new; the rest of the chapter is duplicated by Ezra 2 (see Ezra, "Commentary," 2:1–70). Nehemiah, who was governor of Judah, appointed his own brother as governor of Jerusalem. This man's name was Hanani or Hananiah (alternate spellings of the same name); several English versions give the impression that Nehemiah appointed two people with nearly identical names. Hanani feared God, and he also was faithful to both Nehemiah and to the Persian authorities. Verse 3 deals with details of the security system for Jerusalem. Apparently, the gates of the city were to be closed during the midday hours, when the guards might be drowsy. Lay inhabitants of Jerusalem were also appointed for security purposes at positions near their own homes and wherever else they were needed.

Jerusalem at the time of Nehemiah may have comprised thirty or forty acres, but the population seemed sparse to the governor, and this increased the security risks about which he was worried. Nehemiah decided to remedy this situation by bringing 10 percent of the province's purely Jewish population to Jerusalem (cf. 11:1). To determine genealogically who was eligible to be transferred to Jerusalem, he referred to the extant list of those who had returned from the Exile, which was probably a composite summary of a number of returns to Palestine during the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses.

In Neh. 7:70-72, the list notes the donations given to the Temple. The unnamed governor in v. 70 was especially generous, and Nehemiah may have believed that his own gifts made him that governor's legitimate and worthy successor. According to a plausible reconstruction of v. 73a, the priests, the Levites, and some of the people lived in their country towns, but the leaders lived in Jerusalem.

7:73b-10:39

The Climax of the Work of Ezra

7:73b-8:12, Ezra Reads the Law. This unit originally was part of the Ezra memoir and probably did not refer to Nehemiah (the reference to him in 8:9 is lacking in the Greek translation known as 1 Esdras). Chap. 8 belongs chronologically after Ezra 8. Thus the public assembly here described took place on the first of the seventh month (8:2), whereas the assembly called to deal with the problem of mixed marriages (Ezra 10:9) came together on the twentieth of the ninth month. In later times, the first day of the seventh month was celebrated as New Year's Day (Lev. 23:24-25; Num. 29:1-6).

The book from which Ezra read for five to six hours (Neh. 8:3) was very likely some form of the Pentateuch (note "the Torah of Moses" in 8:1; 13:1). Since the books of Ezra and Nehemiah are not explicit about the extent of this torah-book, one's view of its identity may be colored by one's view of the composition history of the Pentateuch. Some would restrict this torah to the book of Deuteronomy or the so-called Priestly portions of the Pentateuch.

Ezra had six (lay?) officials on his right and seven on his left (unless Meshullam, the seventh person on his left, is the result of a textual error; see 1 Esd. 9:44). Ezra stood on a platform, much like the one Solomon used at the dedication of the first Temple (2 Chron. 6:13), and opened the scroll containing the Torah. The people assented to the reading by calling out "amen, amen" and by prostrating themselves to the ground. Thirteen Levites helped the people understand the Torah, perhaps by translating it on the spot into Aramaic or by moving among the people and explaining it after every paragraph had been read.

The people heard the Torah with a mixture of joy and weeping (Neh. 8:9 and 12). Weeping expresses the sorrow people felt for failing to observe its demands. Ezra reassured them that the joy of the LORD offers protection against the judgments that the Torah proclaimed against transgressors (v. 9). Since the day of the law reading was holy to the LORD (vv. 9, 10, 11), Ezra commanded the people not to mourn or weep and to celebrate the occasion in a festival meal. All were urged to share their food with those unprepared for this meal, though we are not told why some were unprepared.

8:13-18, Celebration of the Feast of Booths. The people resolved to study the Torah just as Ezra had done (v. 13; cf. Ezra 7:10). On the basis of this study, they held a unique celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (Booths), unparalleled since the days of Joshua (here called Jeshua the son of Nun, Neh. 8:17). This festival was normally held on the fifteenth to the twenty-second days of the seventh month (Lev. 23:33-36, 39-43). Perhaps Ezra's celebration marked the first time that the Feast of Booths had been held at the central sanctuary since Israel was gathered at Gilgal during the time of the conquest or the first time in centuries that the booths represented Israel's wilderness wanderings and not just the way people lived at harvest time.

Each day of the festival Ezra read from the book of the Torah. According to Deut. 31:10-13, the Torah was to be read every seventh year. The solemn assembly or holiday on the eighth day is in accord with the ordinances of Lev. 23:36 and 39 and Num. 29:35-38 (cf. Deut. 16:13-15).

9:1-5a, National Day of Mourning. This national day of mourning fits best between Ezra 10:15 and 10:16 or at the end of that chapter. The position after Ezra 10:15 would place this incident on the twenty-fourth of the ninth month of Ezra's first year; the position at the end of Ezra 10 would place it on the twentieth of the first month of his second year. In either case, it seems to be related to the incident in which Ezra forced the people to divorce their foreign wives, and it is not a direct sequel to Nehemiah 8.

This section reports that the people resolved to separate themselves from all foreigners and spent half the day in reading the Torah and in making confession of their sin. In its present context, this act of separation shows the purity of all those who entered into covenant (9:38). The worship was led by Levites, who are listed in vv. 4–5; they also are the ones who recited the following prayer.

9:5b–37, Confessional Prayer. The prayer begins with words of blessing and praise for the LORD, whose righteousness in judging Israel is acknowledged toward the end (v. 33).

First among God's praiseworthy acts is his creation and preservation of the entire world (v. 6). God's uniqueness is reflected in his worship by the whole host of heaven (the stars or heavenly beings).

This mighty God is the one who chose Abram, took him from southern Mesopotamia to the promised land, and entered into a covenant with him to give him the land. God's fidelity to this relationship (his righteousness) brought about the fulfillment of these promises (vv. 7–8).

God also heard the cries of distress in Egypt and led Israel to freedom in the Exodus (vv. 9–11). During the wilderness wanderings, he guided Israel in a pillar of cloud and fire and gave them the Sabbath, commandments, and laws at Sinai. He also fed them with manna and provided water from the rock; he told them to proceed with the conquest of the land, in fulfillment of his promises (vv. 12–15).

Despite numerous rebellions and the apostasy in the incident of the golden calf (cf. Exod. 32), God showed his readiness to forgive and be merciful. While he led them by the pillars of cloud and fire more than once and gave them food, water, and clothing over a forty-year period, he gave the Torah only once. Finally, at the end of the wilderness period, he gave them victories over the kingdoms of Sihon and Og in Transjordan. Increase in population among the descendants of the exodus generation served as a fulfillment of God's earlier promises, and he subdued before them the various peoples and kings of the Canaanites. The richness of the God-given land is described in terms of its many crops. The notice in v. 25 that they "became fat" may have a double meaning: it can be a sign of blessing and prosperity or it can be a prelude to stubbornness, haughtiness, and rebellion (cf. Deut. 32:15).

The behavior recounted in these verses follows the pattern of the Deuteronomistic History (→Deuteronomistic historian). God's goodness is followed by Israel's rebellion—Israel rejected the law and killed the prophets! Evidence for killing prophets in OT times is very slim, and the charge, so frequent in the NT, is first raised in the Bible here. It dramatically illustrates how Israel rejected the prophetic word. As in the book of Judges, sin was followed by deliverance into the hand of enemies, a cry to God for deliverance, and his raising of saviors to deliver them (Neh. 9:27). After a period of rest, the whole cycle would begin again. God delivered them "many times" (v. 28) and patiently warned them over "many years" (v. 30). The spirit, which had instructed them in the wilderness period, spoke through the prophets, but the people refused to hear. The history of Israel in the land, as in Ezek. 20:28–29, is very brief, and the moral is clear: because of its disobedience in the face of repeated warnings and divine acts of mercy, Israel was turned over into the hands of great nations like Assyria and Babylonia.

Neh. 9:32–37 resembles the communal laments in the book of Psalms. The poets affirm God's covenant loyalty and ask him not to overlook the hardships they have experienced since the invasion of Assyria. The history reported in this chapter demonstrates that the LORD has dealt faithfully and Israel has acted wickedly (v. 33). Since the ancestors refused to "serve," those who pray these words "serve" or become slaves in the rich land that had once been given to the ancestors. Here the Persian rule is not viewed from a collaborationist perspective. The people complained that the produce of the land went to the victorious kings, who forced them to work on state labor projects and who requisitioned livestock whenever they wanted to. The last words of the prayer are poignant: we are in great distress.

9:38–10:39, A Pledge to Keep God's Law.

The community entered into a covenant to walk in God's law and to do all his commandments. A number of the areas identified as in need of correction required Nehemiah's direct actions later in the book: mixed marriages, the Sabbath, the wood offering, first fruits, levitical tithes, and proper care of the Temple. It seems that after Nehemiah's efforts at reform, the community as a whole resolved to put these abuses to an end permanently. From a historical perspective, therefore, chap. 13, which mentions Nehemiah's efforts on these problems, preceded chap. 10. For the editor of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, however, this making of a covenant served as the climactic work of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The list of signatories includes Nehemiah, Zedekiah (perhaps Nehemiah's chief official), twenty-one priests, seventeen Levites, and forty-four heads of the people. The vast majority of names can be found in other lists in Ezra and Nehemiah. Their inclusion here shows that the entire community agreed with what had been covenanted. In 10:28, the groups within the community are called people (laity), priests, Levites, gatekeepers, singers, and Temple servants.

The decision not to enter into mixed marriages (v. 30; cf. 13:23–30) is based on Exod. 34:11–16 and Deut. 7:1–4, where marriages with the pre-Israelite inhabitants of the land are prohibited. No provision is made here about mixed marriages that already existed (cf. Ezra 10).

The people also resolved not to purchase goods on the Sabbath or other holy days (Neh. 10:31; cf. 13:15-22) and to observe the Sabbatical Year by letting the land lie fallow (cf. Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:2-7, 20-21) and by canceling all debts (cf. Deut. 15:1-8). Thus, by this unique combination, both farmers and merchants/employers alike would share equally in the observance of this year (cf. Neh. 5:1-13; → Sabbatical Year).

An annual Temple tax was designated to provide sacrifices and to make repairs on the Temple (10:32-33). The community decided by lot when the various families would bring an annual wood offering to keep the fire on the altar burning perpetually (v. 34; cf. 13:31; Lev. 6:8-13). Gifts in kind are specified in Neh. 10:35-36: first fruits of crops and livestock (cf. 13:31) and firstborn sons. Firstborn sons and the firstborn of unclean animals would be redeemed. Tithes from the crops were perquisites for the Levites (Num. 18:26-32; cf. Neh. 13:10-14). A final pledge not to neglect the Temple (10:39) seems to respond to the complaint of Nehemiah in 13:11.

11:1-13:31

Further Acts of Nehemiah

11:1-2, Action to Increase Population. By casting lots, the community decided to bring one of every ten people in Judea to live in Jerusalem. Neh. 7:1-5a had also been concerned with the low population of the holy city.

11:3-24, A List of Family Heads in Jerusalem. This list shows the success of the repopulation effort by identifying those who lived in Jerusalem: people of Judah (vv. 4b-6); people of Benjamin (vv. 7-8); leaders (v. 9); priests (vv. 10-14); Levites (vv. 15-18); gatekeepers (v. 19); Temple servants (Nethinim; v. 21); and singers (v. 23). Pethahiah (v. 24) was an official in charge of Jewish affairs connected with the Persian monarch. How his office was related to that of Ezra or Nehemiah cannot be determined. Verses 1-19 are roughly paralleled by 1 Chron. 9:2-17.

11:25-36, A List of the Settlements in Judah and Benjamin Outside of Jerusalem. The editor of Ezra-Nehemiah thought it appropriate to specify the population in the rest of Judah (cf. vv. 1-3, 20). (For identifications of the various place names, see the book-length commentaries listed in the "Bibliography.")

12:1-9, A List of Priests and Levites from the Time of Zerubbabel and Jeshua. The authenticity of this list is widely questioned. It may have been artificially reconstructed from 12:12-25 to provide a list of clergy from the first period of the restoration community.

12:10-11, A List of High Priests from Jeshua to Jaddua. Jeshua, the first in the list, was high priest in 520 B.C., and Jaddua, the last, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, who died in 323 B.C. Since there are only six names in the list, this creates an average tenure of more than thirty years. Cross argues that papponomy (the naming of a baby after his grandfather) was used within the high-priestly line. He conjectures that an additional Eliashib and Johanan should be inserted before the Eliashib of v. 10 and an additional Johanan and Jaddua before Jaddua. His reconstructed list of high priests is as follows (additions marked with brackets): Jeshua, Joiakim, [Eliashib I], [Johanan I], Eliashib II, Joiada I, Johanan II (an emendation for "Jonathan"; cf. vv. 22-23); Jaddua II; [Johanan III]; and [Jaddua III]. Cross locates Ezra in the time of Johanan I and Nehemiah in the time of Eliashib II. Critics of his solution have pointed out that there is no necessary reason to conclude that papponomy was practiced at this time in the high-priestly line, that the relationship between Joiakim and Eliashib I that Cross proposes (brothers) is contradicted in 12:10-11 (Eliashib is the son of Joiakim), and that the chronological difficulties are not so severe as Cross implies.

12:12-26, A List of Priests and Levites from the Time of Joiakim. The dating of this list to Joiakim is found in vv. 12 and 26. The latter reference puts both Nehemiah and Ezra during the high-priesthood of Joiakim. While this is not accurate historically (Nehemiah's high priest was Eliashib; 3:1), the editor of this list was intent on showing the unified character of their work, a concern that is also behind the present arrangement of chaps. 8-10. Neh. 12:23-25 puts the list of Levites in the time of Johanan (= Jonathan of v. 11). While Johanan is called the son of Eliashib in v. 23, the Jonathan of v. 11 is Eliashib's grandson. Some, therefore (e.g., NEB), translate the Hebrew word ben (usually, "son") in v. 23 as "grandson."

12:27-43, Dedication of the Wall. This dedication, which one might expect to have taken place shortly after the completion of the building, is reported now after a series of intervening events and lists (8:1-12:26). A double procession emphasizes the joint contributions of Ezra and Nehemiah to the founding of the postexilic community. Ezra led a procession that proceeded around Jerusalem in a counterclockwise fashion; Nehemiah led another group clockwise around the city. Both groups came together in the Temple square. Apparently the two processions walked along the top of the wall. The sacrifices at the dedication were "great," that is, many; the joy was also great. The verb "rejoice" is used three times in v. 43; the noun "joy" is used two times. The joy on this occasion did not cause the political troubles it did at the beginning of the restoration of the Temple (Ezra 3:13).

12:44-47, Contribution Supervisors Appointed. This paragraph associates the appointment of contribution supervisors with the completion of work on the city. The community's happiness with the clergy continued from the time of Zerubbabel to the time of Nehemiah (v. 47). Authority for the various distinctions within the clergy is traced back to the efforts of David and Solomon (→ Levites; Priests).

13:1-3, Separation from Foreigners. The action described in these verses prepares readers for Nehemiah's treatment of Tobiah in the next paragraph. The ban on Ammonites and Moabites is recorded in Deut. 23:3-6. Balak, king of Moab, had hired Balaam to curse Israel during their trip through the wilderness (Num. 22-24).

13:4-9, Misuse of Temple Chambers. While Nehemiah had returned to Mesopotamia after completing his first term as governor, Eliashib (not the high priest of 3:1, etc.) had allowed Nehemiah's enemy Tobiah to take over one of the rooms in the Temple. When Nehemiah returned to Jerusalem for his second term, he immediately banished the Ammonite Tobiah from these quarters and threw out all his furniture. Perhaps Eliashib and Tobiah had concluded that Nehemiah would never return. From the Temple area Tobiah would have been in a good position to develop his local contacts (cf. 6:17-19).

13:10-14, Provisions for the Levites. Because the people had provided no income for the Levites, they had fled to the countryside, leaving the Temple understaffed. Nehemiah brought the Levites back to the city and saw to it that tithes were once again paid and that treasurers were appointed to collect and distribute the contributions. Three times in this chapter he asks God to remember his good deeds and reward him for them (vv. 14, 22, 31; cf. v. 29).

13:15-22, Reform of the Sabbath Day. Ezra's work was thirty years old at the time of Nehemiah's second term, and people had begun to violate the Sabbath commandment, which his torah demands be enforced. Nehemiah warned that the present offenses might lead to the same dire consequences as the offenses of the ancestors—destruction of the city and exile. By closing the gates of the city during the Sabbath, he tried to ensure that no burdens would be carried into the city and no commerce would take place. He warned those merchants who set up their shops just outside the city on the Sabbath and appointed the Levites to guard the gates in order to keep the Sabbath holy.

13:23-29, A Crisis of Inter-marriage. Nehemiah noted that many Jews had married women from Ashdod, Ammon, and Moab and that the children of these unions often could not speak Hebrew. We are not told that he dissolved existing marriages, but he did rebuke those who had intermarried, both verbally and physically. He forced the community to swear not to intermarry with foreigners in the future, that is, to keep the law recorded in Deut. 7:3. The criticism of Solomon's marriages with foreign women in Neh. 13:26 is an important argument against the notion that one person wrote both 1-2 Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, since Solomon's foreign marriages are not reported in Chronicles, but only in 1 Kings 11.

Nehemiah acted decisively against one of the grandsons of Eliashib, the high priest during his first term, who had married the daughter of his arch-enemy, Sanballat. Nehemiah expelled them from the community and asked God to "remember" them because they had violated the requirement that a high priest should never marry a Gentile (Lev. 21:13-15; in Ezek. 44:22, the prohibition against having a gentile wife applies to all priests; on the levitical covenant, see Mal. 2:4-8).

13:30-31, Summary of Reforms. These verses rehearse Nehemiah's efforts to cleanse the community from foreign influence and to regulate the duties of the priests and Levites and the offerings of the people. The final prayer for God to remember him makes no additional requests for rewards.

Bibliography

Clines, D. J. Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther. New Century Bible Commentary. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1984.

Cross, F. M. "A Reconstruction of the Judean Restoration." Journal of Biblical Literature 94 (1975):4-18.

Holmgren, F. Ezra and Nehemiah: Israel Alive Again. International Theological Commentary. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1987.

Myers, J. M. Ezra-Nehemiah. Anchor Bible, 14. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965.

Williamson, H. G. M. Ezra, Nehemiah. Word Biblical Commentary, 16. Waco, TX: Word, 1985.

ESTHER

DAVID J. A. CLINES

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Esther is the story of the greatest threat to the survival of the Jewish people. It recounts how a series of happy coincidences, allied with the courage and wisdom of the Jewish woman Esther, so successfully averted the threat that not a single Jewish life was lost.

The story of Esther exists in two principal versions. The first is the ten-chapter form we find in the Hebrew Bible and in Protestant translations of the OT. The second is the sixteen-chapter form appearing in the Septuagint (Greek) version of the Bible and in Roman Catholic translations. The material that appears in the Roman Catholic but not the Protestant Book of Esther is put by Protestants in the Apocrypha, where it is known as The Additions to Esther. (See The Additions to Esther, "Introduction" and "Commentary.") The Additions do not appear in Jewish Bibles.

History

Given the serious threat to the Jewish people narrated by this book, readers are naturally eager to know whether the events it depicts actually occurred or whether the book is fiction. Most scholars agree that the book is essentially a fictional account in which a good deal of historical detail is incorporated.

There is no doubt that the Persian king Ahasuerus of the book of Esther is the historical Xerxes (486–465 B.C.) known to us from the Greek historian Herodotus' History of the Persian Wars, especially Books 7–9 (→ Ahasuerus). The events narrated in the book of Esther as occurring in his third year (1:3) would fit into the period before his departure for his ill-fated expedition against the Greeks (483–479); the four years between his deposition of his queen Vashti and the installation of her successor Esther in his seventh year (2:1) coincide with those four years of his absence from Persia. The book of Esther also contains many details of Persian life that we find confirmed from extrabiblical sources, such as the extent of the empire from India to Ethiopia (1:1), the impressive postal system (3:13; 8:10), the keeping of official diaries including records of the king's benefactors (2:23; 6:1–2), and the use of impalement as a form of punishment (2:23; 5:14; 7:10).

But the plausibility of the chronological framework and the accuracy of the local color do not amount to a demonstration of the book's historicity. It is more significant that the essential plot of the book hangs upon a considerable number of improbable coincidences—for example, that there should be a Jewish queen on the Persian throne at the very time when genocide of the Jews is being plotted; that Mordecai's service to the king (2:21–23) is not rewarded at the appropriate time but brought to the king's attention merely hours before Haman, the prime minister, arrives to ask for Mordecai's life (6:1–3); or that Haman, in begging for his life at Esther's feet, should be thought by the king to be attempting to rape the queen and for that reason be executed (7:8–10). The combination of coincidences, none perhaps entirely improbable in itself, brings the historical credibility of the work into question.

Function

If the book is not a historical narrative, what is its function? Clearly it addresses itself to the Jewish community as an affirmation that God is just as concerned with the survival of the Jewish people as they themselves are and that no danger to them can arise that will not issue in "relief and deliverance" (4:14). Within that affirmation stands the assertion that Jewish and gentile interests are not necessarily contradictory (despite Haman in 3:8) and that Jews should expect to enjoy security through peaceful cooperation with their gentile masters. The more ostensible function of the book is to recount the origin of the Jewish festival of Purim (9:20–32)—a goal it manifestly does not accomplish if the book is not historical. But what it does do is to insist that this festival celebrating Jewish survival should not be an acclamation of Jewish military might or Jewish diplomatic cunning but serve as reminder of an occasion when simply "rest" or "relief" came the Jews' way (9:16, 18); at Purim the order of the day should be domestic merrymaking and the exchanging of gifts rather than solemn or militaristic ceremony (→ Purim, The Feast of; Lot, Lots).

Structure and Plot

The book has a clearly demarcated beginning, middle, and end; chaps. 1–2 form the exposition, chaps. 3–9 the complication, and chaps. 9–10 the resolution. The exposition contains seven distinct scenes, and the complication nine scenes.

The plot proper begins with the refusal of the Jew Mordecai to do obeisance to his superior Haman, on the religious ground that Haman the Agagite comes from a race once hostile to the Jewish people. From Haman's angry response there develop two arcs of tension, the one the question of what will happen to Mordecai, the other the question of what will happen to the Jews, since Haman has determined that the whole of Mordecai's race should suffer for Mordecai's intransigence. Mordecai's fate is first determined when the king, discovering that he has failed to reward him for an earlier favor, elevates him to a position of honor. The fate of the Jews still hangs in the balance, however, so long as the unalterable Persian decree Haman has issued against them remains in force. Only when Mordecai dispatches a second decree that, while not literally canceling the first, effectively annuls it, are the Jews safe. The fateful day on which a mass assault, a veritable pogrom, against them was planned becomes a day on which—on the contrary—they manage to kill their enemies throughout the empire without loss of a single Jewish life.

COMMENTARY

1:1–2:23

Exposition

1:1–4, The Royal Banquet for the Officials. The story begins at some distance from the main action of the plot, with the depiction of a sumptuous 180-day banquet for officials from all over the Persian Empire. The function of this scene is principally to portray the magnificence and luxury of the Persian court as a backdrop to the decidedly shabby treatment that will be meted out to one of the subject races of that empire, the Jews.

1:5–9, The Royal Banquets for the Citizens of Susa. The narrative focus sharpens on a briefer, but equally pretentious pair of banquets given immediately thereafter by the king and the queen for the citizens of the Persian capital Susa. The king's banquet for the males is, according to the Persian custom, primarily an extended drinking bout, the only rule for its conduct being that "the drinking is to be unstinted" (1:8). The ostentation of the men's banquet and the elaborate description of the decor of the palace pavilion where it is held contrast with the perfunctory notice given to Queen Vashti's banquet for the women (1:9). But at least the queen, who will prove a mainspring of action in this chapter, has been introduced, even though her strict subordination to the king is emphasized with the notation that her own quarters, where she gives her banquet, are "the palace that belonged to King Ahasuerus" (1:9).

1:10–22, Vashti's Refusal to Obey the King's Command. On the seventh and closing day of the festivities and thus presumably as the climax to his self-advertisement, the king sends for Vashti to appear before him at the men's banquet "to show off her beauty" (1:11)—to his advantage rather than hers. Contrary to custom and expectation, she refuses. It is all the more alarming that she gives no reason for her refusal, not even the fact that the king is tipsy. A feminist reading of the narrative is today inescapable, but the author more probably intends a satire against Persian men as incapable of commanding their wives' obedience. It is hardly to the credit of this absolute monarch, fabulously wealthy and masterfully supreme in every sphere, that on the domestic front he can be so decisively worsted. He, rather than Vashti, has become the spectacle.

Vashti's unelaborated refusal forms an amusing contrast to the histrionic reaction of the king and his counselors. While the outcome is (perhaps) tragic for Vashti—though we observe that her punishment, never to come again before the king (1:19), is conceivably her dearest wish—it is in other respects pure farce. It involves the whole elaborate machinery of Persian law and administration—to say nothing of the postal service—in asserting the right of every man in the empire to be master in his own house. And it is implied that the story of Vashti's independence will spread like wildfire throughout Persian lands, every wife in the empire waiting only for this sign from the empress to break out in long-stifled rebellion against her husband.

2:1–4, The King's Decision to Seek a New Queen. We move closer to the main action of the story in this chapter as we discover how the Jewish girl Esther, who will be indispensable for the salvation of her people, comes to be queen on the Persian throne. Certainly her ancestry will be no recommendation for the post of successor to Vashti; only a nationwide beauty contest, open to virgins everywhere regardless of ethnic background or social status, will succeed in replacing a Persian queen with a Jewish one. It is an extra piece of satire against the king, and so against Persians, that he cannot think how Vashti may be replaced without the advice of his counselors.

2:5–11, Esther's Admission to the Court. Esther is an improbable candidate for the throne of Persia, being not only Jewish but also the descendant of captives (2:6) and lacking both father and mother to promote her cause. She is, however, beautiful. It is only later that we learn of her other qualities. For the moment it is her beauty alone that gains her entrance to the harem and, once there, to the favored position in the eyes of the harem-master.

2:12-18, Esther's Accession to the Throne.

The depiction of the twelve-month course of beautifying treatments for potential bedfellows of the king is hard to take seriously; it highlights the extravagance and artificiality of the court. A hint is dropped of Esther's character when we learn that she takes no advantage of the custom of taking possession of the most expensive jewelry and clothes for her night with the king. But we cannot be sure that it signifies her modesty or unwillingness to enrich herself at the king's expense; could it be her innate cunning (which we will have clearer tokens of in later scenes) to distinguish herself from her competitors by dressing "down" for the occasion, or is she making a silent protest at Persian ostentation?

The king, in choosing Esther for nothing other than her good looks, no doubt thinks that he has now got himself a "little woman" who will be receptive and obedient. The banquet he gives for her (2:18) contrasts with the banquet given by the more self-confident Vashti.

2:19-23, Mordecai's Discovery of the Plot Against the King.

This episode serves a foreshadowing purpose; it will become truly functional only for the events of chap. 6, when Mordecai's good deed is rewarded. Mordecai appears to be a palace official, with his seat "at the king's gate," though perhaps the story gains in punch if we see him as simply one of the crowd of loungers who gather outside the palace gate. We do know that he walks in front of the harem to pick up gossip on how Esther is faring (2:11). In either case, his position enables him to overhear a plot to assassinate the king, and because he still has contact with Esther he can pass the news on to her. She, because she stands so high in the king's favor, has ready access to him and can inform him of the plot "in the name of Mordecai" (2:22).

Up to this point everything has been setting the scene. The real action of the story will begin only in chap. 3.

3:1-8:17

Complication

In the ten scenes that form the complication, or main action of the plot, we are confronted with a constantly changing grouping of the four main characters of the plot—Esther, Mordecai, Ahasuerus, and Haman.

3:1-6, Haman's Promotion and Mordecai's Refusal to Honor Him. The focus shifts from the figures of Esther and Mordecai to the axis of Mordecai the Jew and Haman the prime minister. Haman is not himself a Persian, but an "Agagite." We never hear in nonbiblical literature of such a racial designation in the Persian Empire, but Jews know that Agag was not only the foe of Saul who indirectly cost him his kingship (1 Sam. 15:8-33), but also the king of Amalek, the tribe that was the archetypal enemy of Israel (Exod. 17:14-16; Deut. 25:17-19; → Amalekites). Jewish readers immediately understand that Haman will play the role in this story of the "enemy of the Jews" (Esther 8:1). In this connection, note that just as Haman's descent recalls Agag, so does Mordecai's recall Saul (2:5; 1 Sam. 9:1). But whereas Agag is Saul's downfall, Mordecai will be Haman's.

Why Mordecai refuses the customary obeisance to Haman remains unclear. The narrative makes no judgment on Mordecai's behavior or its motive; it is simply the datum of the text from which the narrative will take its rise. If there is a recklessness or an excessiveness about Mordecai's behavior, there is an irrationality about Haman's, who promptly decides that to humiliate Mordecai would be beneath his dignity and that the only adequate retribution would be to wipe out the whole people of Mordecai. This is the first notice we have of the nervousness and overreaction characteristic of Haman, the outsider and parvenu.

3:7-15, Haman's Plot Against the Jews Gains the King's Consent.

Haman first chooses by lot the most suitable day for carrying out his design; the casting of lots by an astrologer among the Persians is attested by the Greek historian Herodotus. The impression is given that Haman remained firm to his evil design throughout the whole of the twelfth year of Ahasuerus, from the first to the twelfth month (though 3:7 may mean that the lot casting determined on one day in the first month which would be the fateful day for the Jews). The day fixed upon is the thirteenth day of the twelfth month; thirteen is an unlucky number among Babylonians and Persians. Could this be a hint that the day will turn out worse for Persians than for Jews?

Haman's speech, like the courtier Memucan's in 1:16-20, states first the precise offense, then a proposed solution, and then the advantages to be gained. In both cases the disproportion between the actual events and the proposed punishment is striking. Haman cunningly mixes truth, half-truth, and innuendo: the Jews are indeed scattered throughout the empire (though Haman manages to make that sound like a conspiracy); they do indeed have their own customs, but it is a misrepresentation to suggest that means that they therefore do not obey the king's law. (Haman is playing upon the fact that the same word means "custom" and "law.")

His offer of an enormous bribe, equivalent to two-thirds of the annual budget of the Persian central government, does not alert the king to the likelihood that Haman cannot be acting disinterestedly out of pure concern for the king's welfare.

4:1-3, Mordecai Hears the News. Mordecai's reaction to the threat of genocide against the Jews is not dismay at what damage his principles have done to his people, but a public protest ("at the king's gate") at the injustice that now has royal assent. Mirroring Mordecai's public response is the more private and religious response of the less powerful Jews throughout the empire; though God is not mentioned in the book, their fasting is a sign of their religious commitment (→ Fasting; Sackcloth).

4:4-17, Mordecai Impresses on Esther the Need for Action. In this brilliant narrative, communication between Mordecai and Esther passes through three stages. In the first (4:4), no words are spoken, and the gift of clothes that Esther sends to Mordecai is rejected. In the second (4:5-9), a message, both oral and written, is sent from Mordecai to Esther, but the words are not reported. In the third (4:10-17), words from Esther, from Mordecai, and from Esther again are narrated. The whole narrative represents a movement from ignorance to understanding to decision. Esther is the one who initiates each of the communications, but Mordecai's part is equally crucial: it is he who gives news of the king's decision, challenges Esther to approach the king, and convinces her against her inclination to act courageously.

In this scene Esther comes of age; by the end of it she is no longer acting as merely the adoptive daughter of Mordecai who obeys him in everything (cf. 2:10, 20), but as the one who takes charge, Mordecai going away and doing "everything that Esther had commanded him" (4:17; my emphasis). The change has come about through Mordecai's argument that staying out of the king's presence is no less dangerous than entering it: "do not think that in the king's palace you have more chance of escape than do the other Jews. . . . If you keep silence, you and your family [including Mordecai!] will die" (4:13-14). But Esther does not need only to be convinced intellectually of the right action; she needs also the support of her compatriots, expressed in an exceptionally rigorous period of fasting that is in keeping with the enormity of her undertaking.

5:1-8, Esther's First Audience with the King and Its Outcome. The difficulty in approaching the Persian king lies in not being summoned (4:11), and now that the king has apparently tired of her and she has not been called to his presence in the last month, there is little reason to think that she will again be summoned. There is no extrabiblical evidence for this rule of the Persian court, but it is in harmony with the picture the book has drawn of the exceptional severity of the Persian autocracy.

Since the king offers Esther anything she wants, up to half his kingdom, it seems strange that she does not ask there and then for the deliverance of her people. From a narrative point of view, her invitation of the king and Haman to a banquet retards the resolution of the plot for another three chapters and keeps the tension alive. But from the point of view of the characters, we are perhaps meant to know that it is impolite (and risky) to take monarchs' extravagant promises at face value and that some more delicate bargaining needs to be done before the safety of her people is secured. And who is to say what will count as half the kingdom, especially if the head of the prime minister is at risk? In this narrative we have simply the first exchange in a play of oriental courtesies.

Even more surprising is her refusal, at the first banquet (5:6-8), to say what her request actually is. But what she commits the king to, in extending the invitation to the second banquet, is the granting of her petition sight unseen, without any quantifying of fractions of the kingdom. Unlike the first banquet, which she said she had already prepared when she invited the king, the second will be prepared only when the king has agreed, by accepting her invitation, to give her exactly whatever she will demand. So ingenious is her logic that by the end of her speech she is able to represent what she wants as "what the king has said" (5:8); it has all been a subtle play of bargaining.

5:9-14, Haman Grows More Incensed Against Mordecai. The domestic setting of this scene makes Haman's malice all the more sinister. There is a parallel with Ahasuerus in the setting of his palace in chap. 1: Haman at home, worsted by his inferior, Mordecai, and in desperate need of counsel about his next move, mirrors Ahasuerus in the palace, worsted by his inferior Vashti. Like Ahasuerus who must put every woman in the kingdom in her place in order to assert his own dignity, Haman must butcher the whole race of the Jews to conquer his own sense of inferiority and alienness. All his honors do him no good, he pathetically admits (5:13), so long as one Jew does not offer him the customary respect. Haman's friends rightly understand that Haman has been so publicly dishonored that something more than Mordecai's death is required: it must be public humiliation. The pole 50 cubits (80 feet) high, on which Mordecai's body is to be impaled, will stand in Haman's courtyard but be visible throughout Susa. And Mordecai's death must not be an act of private vengeance, but authorized by the king.

Opposite: Readings for Purim (the Jewish festival based on the book of Esther) accompanied by illustrations depicting the deaths of Haman and his ten sons (hanging from the tree) and his daughter (lying on the ground below); manuscript page from the Leipzig Mahzor, early fourteenth century A.D. The illustration is partly based on the biblical narrative and is partly an elaboration of it.

6:1-14, Mordecai Is Rewarded by the King.

With a flurry of coincidences the narrative now suddenly begins to move toward a resolution favorable to the Jews. The king is by chance that night sleepless. By chance the passage in the royal chronicles recording Mordecai's benefaction to the king is read aloud before him. By chance Mordecai has not already been rewarded. Haman is by chance the first afoot in the palace in the morning ready to give the king advice—advice without which Haman cannot act against Mordecai, the very man the king delights to honor. All these key events are such pure chance that readers are compelled to wonder whether they are chance at all and not the workings of a hidden providence (cf. 4:14).

Any courtier would have served the king's purpose, but for the sake of the irony it is Haman who must give advice on how Mordecai should be honored and who alone is in the position to propose honors for Mordecai because he has come to seek authorization for Mordecai's execution. There is irony too in the way the king unintentionally destroys Haman by keeping from him the name of the man he wishes to honor, just as Haman had intentionally kept from the king the name of the people he wished to destroy (3:8). Haman's dearest desire for himself is intimacy with Persian royalty; hence the thrill when he is invited to private dinner parties with the king and queen (5:9, 12) and his ambition to wear clothes the king has already worn and ride on the horse the king has himself sat on. This is the psychology of the outsider who can never believe he has truly become an insider. As the roles of the honored and the endangered are reversed, Haman adopts Mordecai's garb while Mordecai is clothed in the garment Haman had coveted for himself.

7:1-10, The Fall of Haman. Here the narrative reaches its first major climax. The fate of the Jewish people remains undecided and will not in fact be settled until chap. 9. But here the fall of their archenemy is a clear enough sign that they will escape his design upon them. In the three scenes depicting Haman at the court of Ahasuerus his fate has been disclosed: in the first (3:8-15), Haman has initiated the conversation and has achieved his purpose; in the second (6:4-11), the king has initiated the conversation and has diverted Haman from his purpose; and now in the third (7:1-10), Haman is excluded from the conversation and has his own purpose turned against him.

In this scene Esther reappears; she is now in firm control. With her characteristic subtlety, she responds to the king's repeated offer of the half of his kingdom with the apparently minor request for her own life—and for that of her people; surely this request has no financial implications on the scale of half a kingdom! Since the king has to this moment known neither that Esther is Jewish nor that the race whose death warrant he has signed is that of the Jews, it only gradually dawns on him what the significance of her request is. Paradoxically, in the moment when she pleads for her own safety she puts herself in her greatest danger by revealing her Jewishness, for the unalterable law of the Persians and Medes (cf. 1:19) still stands written against them. And in the moment when she is most obedient to Mordecai's exhortations to her, she first disobeys his one command—not to make known who her people are (2:20).

Everything is happening too fast for the king, and for the first time in the story he is without counselors to turn to. When he has to make a decision for himself, his first instinct is to run away—out into the garden, for more than the wine (7:2) has made him dizzy this evening. Whether he realizes it or not, Esther has pointed the finger of accusation against him as well as Haman; for who has “sold” the Jews to death (7:4) and who has “bought” them except Ahasuerus for the one part and Haman for the other? The culprit, and the “foe and enemy” (7:6), is perhaps not only Haman in his genocidal design, but also the king who, in his fecklessness, agrees to mass murder without even inquiring who its victims are to be.

When the king returns from the garden, he has evidently not yet decided between his queen and his prime minister, for it is the sight that meets his eyes that determines his move. He sees Haman on his knees beside Esther, begging for his life; whether he really believes Haman is trying to assault or rape Esther or whether he simply finds it convenient to put that construction on Haman's posture, the king knows how to behave once his “property” is threatened. To his decidedly theatrical cry of outrage, “Will he even assault the queen in my presence, in my own house?” (7:8; my emphasis), Esther raises no objection; but this is hardly callousness, for is it not true that Haman by his plot has already "assaulted" the queen, even in the palace? Haman's end, quickly narrated, is a nice piece of dramatic irony: he is impaled on the stake he himself has prepared (cf. Prov. 11:27; 26:27). The story folds back on itself, reminding us that the previous impalement was that of the conspirators against the king (Esther 2:23), while this impalement is of the man who has plotted against both the queen and the man who saved the king from the first conspiracy.

8:1-17, Haman Is Replaced and His Plot Overturned. A major narrative problem still remains to be solved. Even after the death of Haman, the edict against the Jews still stands, and, being written in the king's name and sealed with his ring (3:12), it is irreversible. How can unalterable law be altered?

It is not enough that Mordecai is elevated to the position of prime minister. Nor will it be of any help for Esther to beg the king tearfully to "avert the evil design of Haman the Agagite" (8:3). The king is not unsympathetic (8:7), but he refuses to regard it as his problem. Esther and Mordecai have his permission to take any action they care to about the decree and "write whatever [they] like about the Jews" (8:8). Mordecai now has the king's signet ring, and any edict he seals with it cannot be revoked. But there is a sting in the tail, for the edict of Haman has also been sealed with the selfsame ring! Write what you like, says the king, so long as it does not alter, contradict, or revoke what has already been written!

The plot has encountered a conundrum. Before we are told the terms in which it will be solved, we are tantalizingly treated to an elaborate description of how the letters conveying its solution are dispatched (8:9-10). Then at last we learn of Mordecai's ingenious ploy: a second decree, not contradicting the first verbally, but effectively annulling it by giving authorization to the Jews to defend themselves against anyone who tries to carry out the first decree. If attack and defense are both recommended by the Persian government, what is the honest citizen to do on the thirteenth of Adar?

Not very surprisingly, both the Jews and the inhabitants of Susa regard the issuance of the decree as a bloodless victory for the Jewish cause, and throughout the empire it is so clearly felt that the Jews now have the upper hand that many Gentiles convert spontaneously to Judaism (8:17).

9:1-10:3

Resolution

9:1-19, What Actually Happened on Adar 13? Though the intellectual problem is solved, readers are still curious to know what, if anything, actually happened on the day assigned for the massacre of the Jews. The Jews, in fact, do not wait for anyone to attack them but take the initiative in slaying 75,800 of their enemies (somewhat surprisingly, since hitherto Haman has been the only enemy of the Jews we have heard of). They themselves apparently do not suffer a single casualty.

The narrative does not linger too long over the unsavory details but tends to concentrate on the pacific results of the killing. Adar 13 is noted not as a day of triumphant bloodletting, but as a time when a reversal of expected fortunes occurs, as a day of gaining mastery, as an occasion of self-defense, and above all as a gaining of relief from hostile neighbors (9:1, 16). What is celebrated thereafter is not the victory itself, but the day(s) of rejoicing after the victory (9:17-19). A distinct program of demilitarization of the memory has been going on.

9:20-32, The Institution of the Festival of Purim. So signal an event in Jewish history is bound to be commemorated. It is the community in the first place that decides to celebrate the events (9:19, 23). But this being the Persian Empire, and Mordecai and Esther now being officeholders in that empire, we are hardly surprised that they should take it in hand to give the celebration the full Persian bureaucratic treatment. So Mordecai harnesses the resources of the chancellery and the imperial postal system, and Esther duplicates the whole undertaking rather unnecessarily (9:29-32), both of them dispatching letters throughout the empire in order to ensure that annual celebrations be carried out by Jews everywhere. In the fashion of a prudent bureaucrat, Mordecai even prevents potential conflict among the Jews over which day to celebrate by authorizing commemorations on both of the days suggested.

The name by which this festival of rejoicing for deliverance (not of gloating over slain enemies) is to be known is Purim, "lots." The name probably originally referred to a Persian spring festival at which lots were cast to determine destinies and fortunes for the coming year. But in this narrative the word "pur" has been linked with the "lot" cast by Haman to determine the most propitious day for the extermination of the Jews (3:7). This is not a major element in the plot, but it serves to give a specifically Jewish dimension to a festival much older than the Jews' first celebration of it. Today Purim remains a major festival of the Jewish year, an occasion of feasting, gift giving, and charity. Its principal religious ceremony is the public reading, once in the evening and once in the morning, of the book of Esther from a special scroll (Heb. megillah).

10:1-3, Mordecai as a Symbol of Jewish Success. This closing note, perhaps later appended, of the high office and esteem of Mordecai is probably not intended to detract from the significance of Esther, but to round off the story with a cameo portrait of the possibility and desirability of Jewish-gentile cooperation. A Jew who is highly esteemed by his compatriots (10:3) may still be a Persian official of the highest rank, to the advantage of Jews and Gentiles alike.

Bibliography

Anderson, B. W. "The Place of the Book of Esther in the Christian Bible." Journal of Religion 30 (1950):32-43.

Berg, S. B. The Book of Esther: Motifs, Themes and Structure. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series, 44. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979.

Clines, D. J. A. The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story. Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, no. 30. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984.

———. Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther. New Century Bible Commentary. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; London: Marshall, Morgan and Scott, 1984.

Moore, C. A. Esther. Anchor Bible, 7B. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1971.

———. Studies in the Book of Esther. New York: Ktav, 1982.

PART TWO

---

PSALMS AND WISDOM

INTRODUCTION TO PSALMS AND WISDOM

---

J A M E S L. K U G E L

Beside historical writings, bodies of legal material, prophetic collections, and the like, the Hebrew Bible contains numerous songs, prayers, compilations of wise sayings, and similar compositions. These are sometimes found in the midst of narratives (as the "Song at the Red Sea," Exod. 15, is found in the midst of the Exodus narrative), but they exist as well in independent collections such as those of the books of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs. Indeed, these works are sometimes spoken of as the "poetic and didactic" books of the Bible, and the name, though inexact, represents well the view that such books stand apart from the rest of the Bible by virtue of their special "literary" or "poetic" character. Indeed, it was apparently such a judgment that led to the arrangement of books that is now found in many modern Christian Bibles (and whose roots ultimately go back to the Old Greek Bible of the Jews, the Septuagint), an arrangement that groups the material according to the categories (Law and) History, Psalms and Wisdom, and Prophecy. In introducing this middle group, Psalms and Wisdom, we shall thus be dealing with a collection of different writings that struck early readers of Scripture as fundamentally similar because of their literary artistry and poetic character—but that nonetheless appear to modern scholars as quite diverse in their origins, literary types, life setting, and structure. Although there is some overlap between the two broad categories "Psalms" and "Wisdom"—some psalms, as we shall see, are redolent of the wisdom worldview—it will be best to deal with each of these separately.

---

PSALMS

---

The book of Psalms (or "Psalter") is a collection of one hundred and fifty brief compositions that might generally be described as praises and prayers addressed to God. As such, these compositions are hardly unique in the Bible; as noted, narratives also contain songs of praise like the Song at the Red Sea, as well as personal prayers, and prophetic collections contain compositional units similar to those found in the Psalter. Indeed, some psalms themselves occur both within the Psalter and outside of it (e.g., Ps. 18 = 2 Sam. 22). Thus our book of Psalms is in some sense an arbitrary collection of diverse materials—in fact, as scholars have come to see, a collection of smaller collections reflecting quite different origins and original purposes.

---

Previous page: Head of David; one of several medallion mosaics in the apse of the Church of St. Catherine, Sinai, sixth century A.D.

How did our Psalms come to be written in the first place? Much recent research has suggested that, like other divine praises known from elsewhere in the ancient Near East, the Psalms—or at least many of them—were connected with the formal worship conducted at specific sacred sites, sites like the great Jerusalem Temple, where animals and other sacrifices were offered up to honor Israel's God. The precise role of the Psalms in sacrificial worship is, however, far from clear. Remarkably, there is no mention of psalmody in prescriptions in the Pentateuch for sanctuary worship, but it seems likely that psalms and sacrifices were somehow coordinate forms of worship, the sacrifices constituting a standardized and quite tangible medium of human-to-divine communication, and songs and prayers constituting a more diverse, and wholly verbal, medium. The latter might have had, thereby, a somewhat more specific, even personalized, character: after all, there is not merely one "formula of thanks," "prayer for aid," and so forth in the Psalter, but dozens, and this diversity may bespeak an effort to create in the Psalms a verbal expression that, while perhaps accompanying standard sacrifices, would serve to connect the offering with the particular circumstances and motivation of the offerer(s).

This hypothesis is supported by the very words of some of the psalms found in our Psalter. There are, of course, numerous psalms that are expressions of community celebration, and these doubtless served as liturgies for such occasions as the various festivals and holy days described in the Pentateuch. But there are others of a more individual character, psalms that evoke states of distress such as illness or personal intrigue, or that offer thanks for God's having "heard my cry" in time of need. Yet these evocations—curiously!—lack detail: the identity of the psalmist's "enemies" or the precise nature of the dire straits involved is glossed over. They are alluded to starkly as "the Underworld," "the Pit," or represented metaphorically by wild beasts or similar perils. Apparently this lack of specifics was intentional, a way of tailoring the individual's plea or praise to his or her circumstances, but in such a way as to permit the reuse of a particular text again and again by different worshippers.

Thus, a great many, indeed, most of our psalms were likely connected to the formal worship of God through sacrifices at sacred sites, and their form and very words reflect this original life setting. Indeed, much of recent Psalms scholarship has been devoted to exploring that life setting in detail, and to classifying psalms into different putative genres or literary types, depending on whether the psalm was apparently intended for the individual or the community, and whether its intent was principally praise or petition (→ Psalms, The). Such classification notwithstanding, it would be a gross distortion to reduce our Psalter to a collection of verbal accompaniments to sacrificial worship which, in the absence of such a form of worship, now lack a significant context. Quite the contrary. Indeed there is clear evidence that well within the biblical period, psalmody itself had developed something of an independent existence: the singing or speaking of the words of existing psalms (as well as the creation of new ones inspired by extant models) became a form of individual or group devotion outside of the sacrificial setting, and under such new circumstances, the very words of the Psalms themselves sometimes took on new meanings. Since late antiquity, the book of Psalms has been the focus of Jewish and Christian spirituality, providing much of the actual liturgy for synagogues and churches (as well, again, as a model for new liturgical compositions), and the recitation of psalms as a form of individual devotion has similarly flourished since ancient times. Thus, however diverse the origins and purposes of its various components, the Psalter has in effect taken on a unified identity and use all its own, as a manual of prayer and praise through the ages.

---

THE WAY OF WISDOM

---

“Wisdom literature” is a modern critical term used to describe a kind of writing that flourished not only in ancient Israel but throughout the ancient Near East. Its hallmark in the Bible is the meshal (Heb., “proverb”), that pithy, two-part sentence that embodied some fundamental truth about life. The meshal is the basic building block of the books of Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and is well known in other parts of the canon also, especially in the book of Psalms and prophetic oracles. (It is also characteristic of some books in the Apocrypha, such as Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon.) But to understand the meshal and the books that are collections of meshalim (Heb., “proverbs”), it is necessary first to understand something about “wisdom” itself.

Wisdom was not only a class of writings in ancient Israel; it was first and foremost a way of life and of understanding the world. The wise man or sage was one who sought to look deeply into the meaning of things, and as such he was a valued member of society. He was associated with various (related) professions: royal counselor and court adviser, judge, teacher, scribe. The sage in the ancient Near East was one who knew how to interpret dreams—the portrayal of both Joseph and Daniel in the Bible is redolent in many particulars of the world of wisdom—and to interpret other mysteries as well, the movement of the stars and planets, omens of animals and birds, indeed, of the natural world in its fullness. Although some of these pursuits have little to do with the biblical books in question, they belong to the same organic unity and bespeak, to a great extent, the same mentality.

What is that mentality, the “world of wisdom”? Among its fundamental tenets is the belief that the world makes sense, that underlying all the apparent confusion and injustice and disorder of daily existence is a basic pattern, an ordering by which all such phenomena can ultimately be understood. This pattern itself is sometimes referred to as hokmah (Heb., “wisdom”) as in Prov. 3:19:

By wisdom the Lord founded the earth;
by understanding he established the heavens.

One who can perceive the pattern, or at least part of it, is said to have “found” or “acquired” wisdom—but such is no easy undertaking according to Ps. 92:5:

How great are your creations, Lord, and most profound your plans;
a simple man does not know, nor a fool understand this.

How then could one go about glimpsing this underlying pattern? “Whence then comes wisdom, and where is the place of understanding?” (Job 28:20).

An outsider to the world of wisdom might say that acquiring wisdom was first and foremost an act of faith, a willingness to believe, despite at times considerable evidence to the contrary, that all is happening according to plan and that the old verities about divine justice, the triumph of righteousness, and the necessity for fair and pious conduct were still the best guide in leading one’s life. But biblical wisdom texts themselves present another answer: evidence of the workings of this pattern and order does indeed present itself, if only one is sufficiently discerning and takes the “long view.” As Ecclesiastes observes, “Better is the end of a thing than its beginning” (7:8). How so? Beginnings, however auspicious, can go awry, and that which started off so well can come to naught. The thing completed, on the other hand, is unarguable: how it may turn out was beforehand a matter of opinion, but once it has turned out it is simply a fact. And what is life but a series of processes that are ever moving toward their conclusion, often ending up in configurations that would surprise their beginnings? So, of course, “Better is the end of a thing than its beginning” because it is only the “end of a thing” that counts.

So it is that we can discern one of the cardinal virtues in the world of wisdom: patience. Indeed, the proverb from Ecclesiastes just cited is, in its entirety, “Better is the end of a thing than its beginning, and the patient one better than the haughty.” For only with patience can one hold back from snap judgments and escape the prison of the moment. In fact, the English word “patience” corresponds well to the whole spirit of Israelite wisdom, for it suggests not only an ability to wait things out, but also an ability to accept discomfort and suffering (the Latin root of “patience” means suffering and is present in, for example, the English use of “patient” for someone suffering from a disease and under a doctor’s care). So too the sage is one who has patience and knows that, however much at any given moment the world seems to be in imbalance and he himself or others are forced to suffer in a manner that appears unjust, sooner or later the underlying order will appear; things will be set aright again, or a previously unknown explanation will become apparent. So it is, for example, that Joseph, whom we have already seen as having many of the characteristics of the sage, is swept up by events beyond his control, sold as a slave to Egypt, then falsely accused and thrown into prison. A “fool”—that is, the opposite of a “sage” and the constant foil of sages in books like Proverbs and Ecclesiastes—would certainly despair under such circumstances or undertake desperate action, but Joseph, sage that he is, patiently greets each new turn, and ultimately assumes his place as ruler over Egypt: When, at last, he reveals his true identity to his brothers, he urges them not to blame themselves for having dealt ill with him, for their actions were only part of the divine plan (Gen. 45:5-8); later he says, "As for you, you meant evil against me, but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be alive, as they are today" (Gen. 50:20).

Proverbs

This virtue of patience is very much in evidence in our biblical book of Proverbs, a collection of wise sayings and exhortations from different periods and geographic centers. One who first looks into Proverbs will immediately be struck by the "old-time" morality found in this book. Here are no surprises: honesty, diligence, self-restraint, and humility—"the wise man's path" (Prov. 15:24)—are endlessly praised, while their opposites are unceasingly condemned. Read in sequence, its chapters take on the quality of a litany of virtues, a kind of propaganda tract for the way of wisdom. Through this array of praiseworthy traits, it is perhaps patience (in the sense in which we have described it) that dominates the picture, though the concept itself is scarcely invoked. For though the "fool" or the "wicked" (the two are synonymous in Proverbs) may gain immediate satisfaction, it is the "sage" or the "righteous" who wins out in the end, as in Prov. 10:17-18:

The fear of the Lord lengthens life,
but the years of the wicked will be short.
The hope of the righteous ends in gladness,
but the expectation of the wicked perishes.

Patience is not only the proper attitude of the sage in the face of the wicked man's immediate gratification or of his own suffering or frustration; it is also that by which the ultimate justice of the world, the great pattern underlying human existence, will ultimately become apparent. Thus, Prov. 13:18, 21:

Poverty and disgrace come to him who ignores instruction, but he who heeds reproof is honored.
Misfortune pursues sinners,
but prosperity rewards the righteous.

Indeed, what are continence, abstemiousness, respect for parents and teachers, humility, and the other virtues of Proverbs but a reflex of that general attitude of patient moderation that is the hallmark of the righteous sage?

It is virtually a logical consequence of this mentality that wisdom itself is properly associated only with old age. A young person may strive to master the sages' teachings (the "son" spoken of, or to, in so many proverbs is, apparently, a young initiate setting out on the path of wisdom), but only with age can one overcome youth's impetuosity, and only with age can one see the truth of wisdom's dictates confirmed in the end. So is it that the word "old man" is virtually synonymous with "sage": "Wisdom is with the aged, and understanding in length of days" (Job 12:12). For the same reason Elihu is reluctant to speak out in the book of Job (32:6–7):

I am young in years, and you are aged;
therefore I was timid and afraid to declare my opinion to you.
I said: "Let days speak, and many years teach wisdom."

The old man knows the lessons of the past (Deut. 32:7) and the lessons of his own life; but more than that he is one who has endured, and this in itself bespeaks his mastery of the path of wisdom—thus Prov. 16:31:

A hoary head is a crown of glory;
it is gained in a righteous life.

We have seen how the notions of "patience" and "suffering" are intertwined, and it is perhaps not surprising that suffering too is addressed in Israelite wisdom literature. But is suffering, as "orthodox" wisdom would have it, always the reward of wickedness?

Job and Ecclesiastes: Two Challenges

This is the question of Job, the sage whose wisdom is challenged by personal catastrophe and physical suffering in order that his ability to endure patiently and reverently be put to the test. Most of our biblical book of Job is taken up with "dialogues" between Job and his comforters, sages come from the proverbial centers of wisdom and who therefore represent the wisdom worldview in its purest form. They attempt a particular form of "comforting" known to us from elsewhere in the Near East—an attempt to bring the sufferer to accept his suffering as part of the divine plan, and therefore as just, no matter how great his pain. That this is what comforting is all about or that wisdom's whole world of patience and plan underlies their remarks is nowhere stated; it did not have to be. It is evident in their very identity as sages. But the person of Job here is set in contrast to those of his fellow sages: he is, in Eliphaz's first words, "impatient" (Job 4:5) because he dares to challenge the canons of wisdom and refuses to accept their comfort. The book as we have it is therefore not so much an exposition of wisdom teachings (wisdom's basic teachings are assumed by the very form of the book, though eloquently reiterated in the comforters' words) as it is a serious challenge to it: these are the meditations of an author disturbed by wisdom's pat verities in the face of human suffering—though he is willing, in the end, to give God the last word.

Ecclesiastes is another book that presumes the world of wisdom as we have described it and that also seeks to question its dictates, albeit in a somewhat different fashion. Its author knows the version of the world espoused by sages but sets out (Eccles. 2) to put everything to the test: is hokmah, the path of wisdom and restraint enjoined by the sages, the best in life, or is its opposite, siklut (Heb., often translated as "folly," the word in Ecclesiastes means self-indulgence and hedonism) the way to choose? Although the answer is quick in coming (Eccles. 2:13), the book's search is far from over; indeed, it implies that learning the truth of wisdom's way is a lifelong task. For the book of Ecclesiastes is framed by its author's life: the young hedonist of chap. 2 ages as his book progresses, and at each turn he propounds new insights in his clipped meshalim. But he does not hesitate to confess his frustration: however much the ancient verities seem validated here and there, he is nonetheless baffled at the world's unfairness. How, for example, can one continue to maintain that the righteous are rewarded in old age and the wicked are cut off, when our very experience tells us differently? "Surely it happens that a righteous man may perish in his righteousness, and that a wicked man may live long life in his wickedness" (Eccles. 7:15). It is all hebel (Heb.), not so much "vanity" (as this word is often translated) as something insubstantial, ungraspable, futile. In this very judgment is a summons to go on, and as our author continues his quest he sometimes contradicts what he has said before; at the end of his book he is apparently an old man (Eccles. 12 presents a moving description of the progress of old age); indeed, at the very end he is spoken of in the third person, already dead (Eccles. 12:9-10). Considered as a whole, Ecclesiastes is a remarkable book, a collection of wise sayings that is at the same time a quarrel with wisdom teachings, a sort of brief intellectual autobiography of one who was not content merely to transmit the accepted maxims.

Song of Songs

Having made mention of the major works of wisdom literature in the Hebrew Bible, we ought as well to say a word about the Song of Songs, since it too is connected to wisdom's world. Anyone who reads the Song will recognize in it a series of love lyrics between a shepherd girl and her rustic lover. Yet the very presence of this book within Israel's sacred Scriptures, indeed its collocation with other books of wisdom, suggests that this external form was understood as just that, an outer covering that, like proverbs generally, required deep inspection for its full significance to emerge. Read in such a manner, the Song yielded a meaning fully consonant with the teachings of wisdom: for what was the significance of the on-again, off-again encounters between lover and beloved, the alternating evocations of nearness and frustrating distance, but that God's ways with his people are similarly trying, alternately blissful and unfulfilled? Patience, the sagely virtue, is a human being's sole recourse; this is the hidden sense of the Song's refrain, "Do not stir up, oh do not arouse Love before its time." And yet, in this context, there is something wonderful about the lovers' urgent desire for one another, a suggestion that the sage's life was not merely the colorless, rather passive, submission to divine will that we have described, but something vibrant as well, a passionate and vital devotion.

---

POETIC FORM

---

It remains only to say a few words about the form of the meshal, and more generally about the form in which not only much of Israel's wisdom literature but the Psalms and a great deal more in the Hebrew Bible are written. For the basic unit that makes up almost all of the Bible's songs, psalms, proverbs (meshalim), oracles, sayings and the like is a clipped, two-part sentence that might be represented schematically like this:

_____ /                      _____ //

A    B

The notations / and // represent two different sorts of pauses, partial and full, and might be said to correspond to the comma and semicolon or period in our system of punctuation. The first part of the sentence (A) ends in a slight pause, the second in a longer one; these pauses in turn are expressive of the relationship between the two parts. For B, although separated from A by a slight pause, is nonetheless a continuation of it and its completion; whereas the break between B and the next line is more substantial—B is “end-stopped” and does not flow into the next line. A brief example (Ps. 111:1–3) will make the structure clear:

I will praise the Lord with all my heart / in the company of the upright and the assembly //

Great are the works of the Lord / studied by all who have pleasure in them //

Splendor and majesty are his work / and his righteousness endures forever //

Each of the above lines is just the sort of two-part sentence described, in which the B part is both separated from A by a brief pause (the above translation, taken from the RSV, does in fact divide each A clause from B with a comma), yet grammatically and semantically connected to it. The end of each line is, by contrast, more final (RSV punctuates with periods). How are these two grades of separation achieved? In the examples cited, one might note that the first two A parts are complete statements in and of themselves, grammatically independent, while their following Bs cannot stand alone; this is one very common way of articulating B's separate-yet-connected status. The third line contains two potentially independent clauses, but B's “and” here serves to emphasize the connection.

This “adding on” or “seconding” style of writing, in which each A was followed up, carried further, or otherwise completed by its corresponding B (and, on occasion, by a third clause, C) was very versatile, both easily accomplished and yet elegant in its regularity; it created an oscillating pattern of partial and full disjunction, of brief lines with a short break in the middle and a longer break at the end. This is what constitutes the “poetry” of the Bible, though it is a form of poetry that involves neither rhyme nor regular meter, but only the approximate regularity imposed by the brevity of A and B (each usually consists of only two to four words in Hebrew) (→ Poetry). It also is a form that frequently has an emphatic character: B is sometimes made to restate A or intensify its meaning as in Ps. 92:12:

The righteous man will flourish like a palm tree / [indeed] like a cedar in Lebanon he will grow great //

Now when one turns to the wisdom proverb, this same emphatic sort of sentence recurs (its prominence has in fact led this particular style to be labeled, somewhat misleadingly, parallelism, because B often parallels A in grammar or meaning). An example is Prov. 10:1:

A wise son makes a father glad / but a foolish son is his mother's sorrow //

But one also finds a more subtle use of the bipartite form, in which, for example, there is an implicit comparison between A and B, as in Prov. 11:22:

A golden ring in a pig's snout / a beautiful woman poorly behaved //

Here mere physical beauty is compared to the dazzle of gold: it is doubtless of value, but, shackled to an uncouth spirit that leads it about, it loses all its charm. This is the meaning of the proverb, but we have hardly exhausted the evocativeness of its image in which our perception of physical beauty is made to precede the nonphysical qualities as the golden ring precedes the pig in its peregrinations. Another comparison (which is also informative about how the makers of proverbs saw their own handiwork) is Prov. 26:9:

A thistle alights in a drunkard's hand / and a proverb in the mouth of a fool //

The thistle comes into the drunkard's possession not by design but rather by mishap: groping around on the ground, the victim of his own inebriation, he accidentally gets jabbed. So is it with fools who pretend to be sages and even recite proverbs: they have not taken possession of the proverb intentionally—that is, through the systematic pursuit of and devotion to the way of wisdom—but casually, accidentally, and without real understanding. Far from being truly the fool's possession, his proverb is his adversary, it pricks him and does him no good.

Merely knowing the words, then, did not necessarily imply understanding: indeed, establishing the precise relationship between A and B was sometimes the whole point of the proverb. Often that relationship was not so much "Just as A . . . / so B . . . //" (as we have seen it to be in the previous examples), but more "Since A . . . / therefore B . . . //" or "You know A . . . / now understand B . . . //" This is really how the previously cited proverb, Eccles. 7:8, is to be understood:

Better is the end of a thing than its beginning / and the patient one better than the haughty //

Everyone knows—for the reason explained above—that the project completed is infinitely more valuable than the project just undertaken; since that is so, our proverb argues, so one who is patient and is able to follow things through their course is better than one who is "haughty." Now haughtiness is no more the precise opposite of patience in Hebrew than in English, but in formulating this proverb as he has, our author is in fact relating the two. When one considers the haughty person, with his take-charge, "What's-going-on-here?" attitude, and compares his stance to the taciturnity and apparent passivity of the patient one, the former's course may indeed be appealing. But beware, says our proverb: just as you know that the end of a thing is better than its beginning, so understand patience ultimately wins out over haughtiness. We see a similar example in Prov. 27:6:

A friend's criticism is trustworthy / false are an enemy's kisses //

The first part of the proverb (a more literal translation would be: "The wounds of a friend are trustworthy") is one whose truth has been experienced by all: who has not been stung by a friend's criticism, ■ criticism whose reliability is vouchsafed by its very source? A friend does not criticize to hurt, but to correct and set aright (cf. Prov. 15:12; 19:25; 27:5 [the verse just preceding ours]; and esp. 28:23). However clear that lesson may be, its opposite may prove nonetheless elusive: flattery has its appeal, and we may welcome praise ("kisses") even when of notorious provenance. Hence our proverb's true import: you already know that the barbs of a friend are sincere; now understand, therefore, that an enemy's kisses are by the same logic not to be trusted. Their source utterly undermines their substance. One final example is Prov. 10:18:

One who conceals hatred has lying lips / one who spreads slander is a fool //

No doubt the truth of A and B is clear enough, but what is the relationship of the two to each other? To repeat, A and B are not to be understood merely as juxtaposed assertions, but as significantly juxtaposed, and the unfolding of that significance is what is meant by understanding a proverb. So here we begin by noticing that the two actions described in A and B are in fact opposites. The first involves not telling when telling is warranted, for if, instead of making a clean breast of one's hatred and its cause (allowing, thereby, the hated person to seek to make amends), one instead covers over that hatred, the result is hypocrisy, "lying lips" in the words of our proverb. Part B, on the other hand, involves a form of telling that is not warranted, that is, the telling to others about a person behind the person's back that is called in the Bible dibbah (Heb., "slander"; as in Gen. 37:2; Prov. 25:10). But these two actions are not unrelated, for the not telling involved in dissembling hatred often leads to the telling of dibbah, and one who hypocritically hides feelings in front of an enemy will often slander that enemy when he or she is not around. So it is that the two are juxtaposed here, just as in biblical law (see Lev. 19:16–17); indeed, the import of this juxtaposition is quite similar to that of Prov. 25:9–10, whereby failure to confront a disputant openly leads to "disclosing a secret" to others, which in turn may backfire and turn oneself into the ultimate subject of others' dibbah.

Such are the ways of wisdom—and more than wisdom! For such pithy, dense, two-part sayings are found not only within the corpus of "wisdom literature," but here and there in narrative and in biblical law as well. (Indeed, the connection of the world of wisdom to such legal compilations as are found in Deuteronomy or in Leviticus, has become increasingly apparent in recent years.) The two-part sentence upon which the mashal is built is, as explained, the basic building block of what is called biblical poetry, and its self-enclosed, couplet-like quality apparently had wide appeal. This sentence form, with its infinite potential for subtle juxtaposition, intensification, and refinement, might truly be said to be the vehicle of choice for biblical Israel's literary creativity, one most fully evidenced in the Bible's Psalms and wisdom literature.

Bibliography

On the Psalms:

Kugel, J. L. "Topics in the History of the Spirituality of the Psalms." In Jewish Spirituality: From the 16th Century Renewal to the Present. Vol. 1. Edited by A. Green. New York: Crossroad, 1987. Pp. 113-144.

Miller, P. D. Interpreting the Psalms. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986.

Westermann, C. Praise and Lament in the Psalms. Translated by K. R. Crim and R. N. Soulen. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1981.

On Wisdom:

Crenshaw, J. L. Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction. Atlanta, GA: Knox, 1981.

Kugel, J. L. The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981. Pp. 1-58.

von Rad, G. Wisdom in Israel. Translated by J. D. Martin. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1972.

JOB

EDWIN M. GOOD

INTRODUCTION

Overview

The praise the Book of Job has received may put some readers off. After all, who feels equal to comprehending "one of the grandest things ever written" (Carlyle)? But Job is too well worth the effort of understanding for readers to pass it by in favor of the mediocre. And, unlike the mediocre, the excellent requires effort of its readers, a willingness to work mentally, to read a passage again when comprehension does not come immediately, to think hard about what one has read.

It is most useful for modern readers to approach Job as fiction. Job refers only to itself; it does not factually portray anything outside itself. To view the book as fiction may help to keep distractions about it at bay. One does well to think of Job, Eliphaz, and the others as characters in a story, not as actors in history.

Outline. The book consists of five parts:

- Part One (1:1–2:13): The opening tale
- Part Two (3:1–31:40): Dialogue with the friends
- Part Three (32:1–37:24): Speeches of Elihu
- Part Four (38:1–42:6): Dialogue with Yahweh
- Part Five (42:7–17): The closing tale

